The ſubtle Sir Henry Vane Junior, by whom the reſt of the Engliſh Commiſſioners were blindly and ſtupidly govern'd, was not ſurpris'd with the Propoſition, and tho' he equally hated Epiſcopacy and Presbytery, yet knowing that one was ſooner aboliſh'd, than the other eſtabliſh'd, he came reſolv'd to pay their own Price for their Friendſhip. Thereupon a Covenant was drawn up, in which this Gentleman artfully intermixt ſome dubious Expreſſions, and was agreed upon, for a perfect Combination and Marriage between the Scots and the Engliſh Parliament, and indeed a Conjunction of all the three Kingdoms. The Title of it was, A Solemn League and Covenant for Reformation, and Defence of Religion, the Honour and Happineſs of the King, and the Peace and Safety of the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Beſides the Preamble or Preface, which complains of bloody Plots, Conſpiracies, wicked Attempts, Practices, &c. it conſiſts of theſe ſix great Branches. 'I. That they wou'd ſincerely and conſtantly 'endeavour, in their ſeveral Places and Callings, the Pre'ſervation of the Reformed Religion in the Church of 'Scotland, in Doctrine, Worſhip, Diſcipline and Go'vernment, againſt their Common Enemies; the Refor'mation of Religion in the Kingdoms of England and 'Ireland, in Doctrine, Worſhip, Diſcipline and Go'ment, according to the Word of God, and the Example 'of the beſt Reform'd Churches, and they wou'd endea'vour to bring the Churches of God in the three King'doms, to the neareſt Conjunction and Uniformity in Re'ligion, Confeſſion of Faith, Form of Church-Govern'ment, Directory for Worſhip and Catechiſing. ------ II. 'That they wou'd in like Manner, without Reſpect to 'Perſons, endeavour the Extirpation of Popery, Prelacy, '(that is Church-Government by Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, 'their Chancellors and Commiſſaries, Deans, Deans and 'Chapters, Arch-Deacons, and all other Eccleſiaſtical Of'ficers depending on that Hierarchy) Superſtition, Hereſy, 'Schiſm, Prophaneneſs, and whatſoever ſhall be found to 'be contrary to ſound Doctrine, and the Power of Godli'neſs. --- III. They wou'd with the ſame Sincerity and Con'ſtancy, in their ſeveral Vocations endeavour, with their 'Eſtates and Lives, mutually to preſerve the Rights and 'Privileges of the Parliaments, and the Liberties of the King'doms, and to preſerve and defend the King's Majeſty's Per'ſon and Authority, in the Preſervation and Defence of the 'true Religion, and Liberties of the Kingdoms. ----- IV. 'They wou'd alſo, with all Faithfulneſs, endeavour the 'Diſcovery of all ſuch as have been, or ſhall be Incendi'aries, Malignants, or evil Inſtruments, by hindering the

The Form and Subſtance of it.

‘Reformation of Religion, dividing the King from his People, or one of the Kingdoms from another, or making any Factions or Parties among the People, contrary to this League and Covenant; that they may be brought to receive condign Puniſhment,-----V. And whereas the Happineſs of a bleſſed Peace, deny'd in former Times to their Progenitors, was by the good Providence of God granted unto them, and had been lately concluded and ſettled by both Parliaments, they wou'd each of them endeavour that they may remain conjoyn'd in a firm Peace and Union to all Poſterity, and that Juſtice may be done upon the wilful Oppoſers thereof.------VI. They wou'd, in this common Cauſe of Religion, Liberty, and Peace of the Kingdoms, aſſiſt and defend all Thoſe that enter into this League and Covenant, in the Maintaining and Purſuing thereof; and not ſuffer themſelves, directly or indirectly, by whatſoever Combination, Perſuaſion or Terror, to be divided, and withdrawn from this bleſſed Union and Conjunction, whether to make Defection to the contrary Part, or give themſelves to a deteſtable Indifference or Neutrality in this Cauſe;----but wou'd, all the Days of their Lives, zealouſly and conſtantly continue therein, againſt all Oppoſition, and promote the ſame according to their Power, againſt all Lets and Impediments whatſoever.'----Then it concludes with a particular Reſolution of humbling themſelves before God, amending their Lives, &c. for the better Enlargement of the Kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt; and confirming all with as ſolemn an Oath, as cou'd well be drawn up in Words.

It is receiv'd generally, and with Applauſe.

This famous Covenant was offer'd to the General Aſſembly on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, and after it was publickly read, Mr. Henderſon, the Moderator, made a long Speech concerning the Excellency of it. Upon a ſecond Reading, many of the moſt eminent Miniſters, and ruling Elders, were deſir'd to deliver their Opinions about it, who all highly magnify'd it; and the King's Commiſſioner preſs'd a Delay, till at leaſt it might be communicated to his Majeſty, yet the Approving of it was put to the Vote and carry'd unanimouſly; and being ſent to the Convention of Eſtates, it was approv'd of there on the ſame Day. This Covenant was vaſtly extoll'd by all Sorts, and came to be as much Idoliz'd as the Former; and the Lord Maitland, afterwards Duke of Lauderdale, was ſo extreamly delighted with it, that when his Voice came to be ask'd, he ſtood up and declar'd, How upon the ſeventeenth of Auguſt four Years ago, an Act paſs'd for thruſting Epiſcopacy out of the Church of Scotland, and now upon this ſeventeenth of Auguſt alſo, an Act was paſſing for the Extirpation of it out of the Church of England; and that Providence having order'd ſo, as both to happen on one Day, he thought there was much in it, and that Men might thereupon warrantably expect glorious Conſequences to follow, even further off than England, before all was done. This Obſervation was applauded by the moſt, as very ingenious, tho' others thought it no leſs ridiculous. Being paſs'd, the Aſſembly appointed Mr. Henderſon, Mr. Bailey, Mr. Rutherford and Mr. Gileſpy, together with the Earl of Caſſels, Lord Maitland and Mr. Archibald Johnſton, as Ruling Elders, to repair to London, for promoting this great Work. And having ſettled Matters for a future Correſpondence, the Aſſembly roſe with Triumph, on the nineteenth Day of Auguſt.

Cenſures upon it.

Wiſe Obſervers wonder'd to ſee a Matter of that high Importance, carry'd through with ſo little Deliberation or Debate; and it was thought ſtrange to find all Mens Conſciences of ſuch a Size, and to agree ſo exactly as the ſeveral Wheels of a Clock; which made all apprehend, there was ſome firſt Mover that directed all thoſe inferior Motions: This by one Party was imputed to God's extraordinary Providence; but by Others, to the Power and Policy of the Leaders, and the Simplicity and Fear of the reſt. One Article of it was thought ſtrange, that one ſort of Government of the Church was abjur'd, and none ſworn to in its Place for England; in which the Scots were outwitted by the additional Words of Reforming according to the Word of God. They wou'd have had Epiſcopacy abjur'd as ſimply unlawful, but by the Engliſh Commiſſioners the ſecond Article was ſo Manag'd, that it might import only an Abolition of the preſent Model of England; the Scots either not perceiving the Change, or were willing to have it paſs upon any Account. But many believ'd that the moſt unaccountable Part of it, was their Oath to maintain the Privileges of both Parliaments, ſince they were never defin'd, and were ſcarce capable of a Definition; and the Privileges of the Engliſh Parliament were far from the Knowledge of the Scottiſh People, who in this Caſe muſt believe juſt as the Members at Weſtminſter were pleas'd to inform them.

Sir Henry Vane's Cunning.

The main of it indeed was manag'd by the ſuperior Cunning and Artifice of Sir Henry Vane, who, as Dr. Gumble tells us, was very earneſt with the Scots to have the whole call'd a League, as well as a Covenant, and argu'd it almoſt all Night, and at laſt carry'd it: He held another Debate about Church Government, which was to be According to the Example of the beſt Reform'd Churches; he wou'd have it only According to the Word of God; but after a great Conteſt, they joyn'd both, and the laſt had the Precedence. One of his Companions afterwards asking him the Reaſon why he ſhou'd put them to ſo much Trouble, with ſuch needleſs Trifles; he told him, He was miſtaken, and did not ſee enough into that Matter, for a League ſhewed, it was between two Nations, and might be broken upon juſt Reaſons, but not a Covenant. For the other, that Church Government according to the Word of God, by the Difference of Divines and Expoſitors, wou'd be long enough before it be determin'd, for the Learnedeſt held it clearly for Epiſcopacy; ſo that when all are agreed, we may take in the Scotch Presbytery.

This Gentleman was certainly a Perſon of extraordinary Parts, a pleaſant Wit, and a deep Underſtanding, which penetrated the Deſigns of others with wonderful Sagacity, while his own were ſcarce known to any; a Perſon who in myſterious Articles could vie with the great Mr. Hambden; and a Perſon who was choſen to deceive a whole Nation, that was thought to excell in Graft and Policy: Which he effected with ſtrange Pregnancy and Dexterity, and prevail'd with a People, that cou'd not be mov'd but by advancing their Idol of Presbytery, to ſacrifice every Thing to the Erecting a Power that reſolv'd to proſecute it to an utter Extirpation. For this Reaſon Sir Henry artfully comply'd to all their high Demands, which they did not believe wou'd have been granted; and ſo in few Weeks a Treaty was concluded, in which, ‘Upon the Engliſh Parliament's advancing of a Hundred Thouſand Pounds Sterling, the Scots were to be ready with an Army of Twenty Thouſand Horſe and Foot to their Aſſiſtance; that the Covenant ſhou'd be taken throughout all the King's Dominions; That a Committee of the Scots ſhou'd always ſit with the cloſe Committee at Weſtminſter, for the carrying on the War with equal Authority; That there ſhou'd be no Treaty of Peace with the King, without the joynt Conſent of the Parliaments of both Kingdoms:' With many other Particulars, very derogatory to the Honour of the Engliſh Nation; and ſuch as wou'd not have been allow'd, but by reaſon of the declining Condition of the Parliament at that Time.

A Treaty concluded with the Scots.

2. The Covenant being compleated and ratify'd at Edinburgh, it was diſpatcht with all Expedition to the two Houſes at Weſtminſter, together with a Signification, ‘That the Scots were in ſuch Forwardneſs to advance, that they wou'd be in England as ſoon as they cou'd be reaſonably expected.' Still many believ'd that this Engagement was propos'd by the Scots, rather to decline being concern'd in the Quarrel, than out of Expectation that the two Houſes wou'd concur with them; ſince they well knew that moſt of the Peers, and Perſons of Quality and Intereſt in the other Houſe, were in their Hearts againſt their Presbyterian Eſtabliſhment; for which, and other Reaſons, they concluded that this Interpoſition was a politick Stratagem to amuſe the Engliſh. But however it was, the two Houſes were at that Time in ſo great Want of their Aſſiſtance, that no ſooner the Draught of the Covenant arriv'd at Weſtminſter, but they ſhew'd a mighty Inclination to receive it. Yet finding ſome Delays uſeful at that Time, and that they might expreſs all neceſſary Deliberation in a new Caſe that concern'd the Eccleſiaſtical Fabrick of the Kingdom, they tranſmitted it to their Aſſembly of Divines, to return their Opinion of the Lawfulneſs of taking it in point of Conſcience. That Aſſembly, having purg'd it ſelf of the few loyal Members, ſoon came to a Concluſion of the Lawfulneſs and Piety of it, with only a ſmall Oppoſition of two, who were likewiſe ſoon convinc'd. Upon which the Lords and Commons, and their Aſſembly of Divines, met together with great Solemnity at the Church at St. Margaret's, to take this holy Covenant, on the twenty fifth Day of September; a double Holy-day, by the Earl of Eſſex's Return to London, and this Religious Exerciſe.

The Covenant receiv'd at Weſtminſter.

The manner of taking of it, in St. Margaret's Church.

Upon this ſolemn Occaſion, two or three of their Divines went up into the Pulpit ſucceſſively to pray, according to their ſeveral Gifts, and others made Orations upon the Work of the Day. Mr. White pray'd a whole Hour that God wou'd ſanctify them for that great Work. Mr. Nye ſhew'd the Warrant of it from Scripture, the Example of it ſince the Creation, and the Benefit of it to the Church; then read the Covenant. Others of them ſaid, ‘That this Oath was ſuch, and in the Matter and Conſequence of it of ſuch Concernment, as it was truly worthy of them, Yea of thoſe Kingdoms, Yea of all the Kingdoms of the World: That it cou'd be no other than the Reſult and Anſwer of ſuch Prayers and Tears, of ſuch Sincerity and Sufferings, that three Kingdoms ſhou'd be thus Born, or rather new Born in a Day: That the Work was a Matter of the greateſt Moment, a Duty of the firſt Commandment, and therefore of the higheſt and nobleſt ‘Order and Rank of Duties: That it was to advance the Kingdom of Chriſt here upon Earth, and make Jeruſalem once more the Praiſe of the whole Earth;’ with many other ſtrange and high Expreſſions. When the Covenant was read out of the Pulpit, all held up their Hands in Teſtimony of their Aſſent to it; and then all the Members of Parliament, and after them the Members of the Aſſembly, ſubſcrib'd their Names. The whole Solemnity was concluded by Mr. Henderſon, who magnify'd what had been done, and aſſur'd them ‘of great Succeſs after it, by the Experience of that Nation, who from their Union in their firſt Covenant, found nothing hard they propos'd to Themſelves;’ and told them, That were the Covenant now painted upon the Wall within the Pope's Palace, it wou'd doubtleſs put him into Belſhazzar's quaking Condition.

The Speaker and Commons being return'd to their Houſe, and obſerving that many of their Members were abſent, they order'd, ‘That as ſoon as they came to the Houſe, the Covenant ſhou'd be tender'd to them, and whoſoever refus'd to take it, ſhou'd be proceeded againſt as a diſaffected Perſon.’ And the warm Mr. Strode made a Motion, That all thoſe who wou'd neither contribute, or take the Covenant, ſhou'd have a Price put upon them, and be ſent to Sea; that ſomething might be given for them, who wou'd give nothing of themſelves. The Commons likewiſe made a ſpecial Order, ‘That all Miniſters of Pariſh Churches within London and Weſtminſter, &c. ſhou'd read and explain the Covenant to their ſeveral Congregations, and ſtir them up, the next Faſt Day, to the chearful taking of it:’ And particular Care was taken, ‘That all the Students of the Inns of Court ſhou'd be perſuaded to receive it.’ Thus began the Covenant to take place and reign in England, which, conſiſting of ſix great Branches, was compar'd by ſome to the ſix knotted Whip, or the Statute of the ſix Articles under King Henry the Eighth; which caus'd the ſhedding of Blood, and the Ruin of Families, infinitely beyond thoſe Articles; and which, under the ſpecious Veil of Reformation, was that fatal Engine, by which not only the Hierarchy of the Church was ſoon after deſtroy'd, the Patrimony of it, with the Revenues of the Crown ſwallow'd up, but the very Perſon of the King murder'd, and the ancient Monarchy of England, ſo far as it was in their Power, ruin'd and ſubverted. This is the Covenant which Mr. Nye in a few Words deſcribes, Such an Oath, as for Matter, Perſons, and other Circumſtances, the like hath not been in any Age, in Sacred or Human Stories: Which many Abhorrers of the Covenant believ'd to be literally true. It is look'd upon as one of the ſtrange Parts of Hiſtory, that this Covenant did with ſo much Eaſe paſs the two Houſes, when the Leaders were at the ſame Time known to be Enemies to Presbytery; and he who was the principal Contriver of it, Sir Henry Vane, was not afterwards more known to abhor the Covenant, and the Presbyterians, than he was at that very Time, and laugh'd at them then, as much as ever he did afterwards. We know not how to account for all this, but by ſaying, It was the Effects of the moſt refin'd Policy, or of the moſt deſperate Condition.

The two Houſes order it to be taken in the City.

3. The two Houſes had a particular Ceremony, and Application to recommend the Covenant to the City, and another and greater Uſe to be made of it. For it was not only to bring, but to keep Men together; and the taking it had only given the Scots an Inclination to march to their Aſſiſtance; but they were to have a Hundred Thouſand Pounds advanc'd, and paid to them at Edinburgh, before they cou'd move; and how to raiſe this great Sum was not eaſy to reſolve, being at preſent under no common Difficulties as to Mony. To effect this, a Committee of Lords and Commons, with ſome ruling Divines of the Aſſembly, was ſent to Guild-Hall, where the Lord-Mayor had prepar'd a Common-Council for their Reception; and there repreſented to them ‘The wonderful Advantage and Strength their Party wou'd gain by being united in this Covenant, and their deſperate Condition without it: For if the Scots came not to their Aſſiſtance, which they cou'd not without this Obligation, they were in Danger to be overwhelm'd by the Enemy, or to be driven to a diſadvantagious and ruinous Peace: But by this Acceſſion of the Strength of a whole Nation, they wou'd certainly be able to maſter the War, and to make the Cauſers of it defray the Charge; and ſo all the publick Debts being diſcharg'd out of the Eſtates of Delinquents, the Kingdom wou'd be no ways impoveriſh'd, and the Peace wou'd be render'd ſecure by the Strength of this Union; and therefore it cou'd not be purchas'd at too dear a Rate.’ Then to make the Matter ſtill more plauſible, they further alledg'd, ‘That it was neither Covetouſneſs, nor want of Zeal for their Relief, that the Scots deſir'd an Advance of Mony before they drew their Army into England, but pure Neceſſity, and the Poverty of that Kingdom, already exhauſted by their late Expeditions, and reſerving their Soldiers for the good of this. And if they cou'd have procur'd Mony enough in that Country, upon publick Credit, or Mortgage of private Eſtates, their Love to their Brethren here was ſuch, that they wou'd have neither ask'd, nor receiv'd Mony for their Aſſiſtance: For Evidence of which Brotherly Inclination, they offer'd the Engagement of their own Eſtates, for the Re-payment of the Mony to be advanc'd.’ In Concluſion, they devoutly extoll'd the Covenant, magnify'd the Scottiſh Nation with the higheſt Words of Eſteem and Reverence, ‘A Nation, that had engag'd it ſelf to God in a more extraordinary Way, in a more exalted Manner, than any Nation this Day upon the Face of the Earth; a Nation, that had more reform'd their Lives, for ſo ſmall a Time, than any People they knew of in the World; a Nation, that God had honour'd and bleſs'd with as glorious Succeſs, as ever he had done to any before them:’ And ſo they very earneſtly deſir'd the Loan of a Hundred Thouſand Pounds.

Their way of Application to the City.

Car. 19.

This Rhetorick and Zeal prevail'd; a Hundred Thouſand Pounds was promis'd, and ſhortly after provided, and ſent to Edinburgh; where they ſoon reſolv'd to raiſe a great Army and invade England; and their old General Leſley, now Earl of Leven, who had ſo ſolemnly promis'd the King, ‘not only never to bear Arms againſt him, but to ſerve him without asking the Cauſe,’ without any Heſitation undertook the Command of it. All this time, Duke Hamilton look'd on, and ſometimes ſat with them; and when a Proclamation was prepar'd, in the King's Name, for a general Rendezvous the ſooner to form their Army, his Brother Lanrick put the King's Signet, to whoſe keeping it was truſted, to the ſaid Proclamation: All this being done, both the Brothers left Scotland, to give the beſt Account they cou'd of all their Proceedings, to the King at Oxford: Many of the Nobility of that Kingdom, who were Well-wiſhers to the King, were gone from thence before, and inform'd his Majeſty at large of that which they thought foul Infidelity. They were now ſo far believ'd, and the King was ſo much allarm'd, that as ſoon as the Brothers arriv'd at Oxford, before they cou'd ſee the King's Face, they were both made Priſoners: The Duke of Hamilton was ſent to Pendennis Caſtle, and the Earl of Lanrick confin'd to his Chamber, from whence ſhortly after, by means of Mr. Cunningham, actual Servant to the King, he made his Eſcape, and went directly to the Scotch Commiſſioners at London, where he was well receiv'd. The Duke himſelf was detain'd a Priſoner for above two Years, and had a long Charge drawn up againſt him, but was never brought to a formal Tryal. The Materials conſiſted of peculiar Crimes of a very high Nature, cover'd over with ſuch nice Pretenſions and ſubtle Managements, as wou'd admit of infinite Diſputations, and intermix'd with ſuch refin'd Pieces of Treachery and Ingratitude, as cou'd hardly be brought under the Reach of ordinary Laws; therefore more proper for the Cenſure of an Hiſtorian, than any legal Judge. Notwithſtanding the many Things that have been ſaid in his Vindication, the Stream both of good and bad Writers bear hard upon the Reputation of this unfortunate great Man; and his ſerpentine Ways of proceeding have rais'd ſtrong Suſpicious, both in his Friends and Enemies: And what we have had Occaſion to ſay of him, has been with all the Caution and Tenderneſs that our Evidence wou'd allow, and which we have been generally careful to mention. If his living Friends have any Thing new to ſay in his Defence, it ſhall be moſt thankfully receiv'd, and incerted, as Opportunity ſhall permit, and likewiſe as to any other Family that may be thought to have been hardly characteriz'd in this Work. And ſo we ſhall at once diſmiſs this Subject by ſaying, That if this great Man was really innocent and honeſt, he has had the hardeſt Meaſures that can be receiv'd from Hiſtorians; but if guilty of the Charge, his Memory cannot be too much loaden with Infamy, for which his Blood was but an imperfect Compenſation.

The Scots reſolve to raiſe an Army.

Duke Hamilton made a Priſoner by the King.

XII. 1. During theſe Proceedings and Deſigns, and long before the Arrival of the Scots, there hapned ſome conſiderable Actions, both in the North and the Weſt. In the North, as was formerly hinted, the Lord Fairfax had been driven by the Earl of Newcaſtle's Forces into Hull, where he was made Governor by the Parliament in the Room of Sir John Hotham, who, together with his Son, was ſeiz'd by their Order, upon Suſpicion of correſponding with the King's Party. The Earl of Newcaſtle, lately made a Marqueſs by the King, was infinitely deſirous to reduce the Town of Hull, tho' he had been otherwiſe advis'd by his Majeſty; and accordingly on the ſecond of September, he ſat down before the Place, with an Army of fifteen thouſand Horſe and Foot, according to Ruſhworth. The Governor ſoon open'd all the Sluices, and drown'd the Country for two Miles about the Town; ſo that the Marqueſs was compell'd to begin his Works and Approaches at a great Diſtance. But upon a Bank, which was the High-way, he got ſo near as to ſhoot many hot Cannon Bullets into the Town; but by the Diligence of the Governour, who caus'd every Inhabitant to watch his own Houſe, the Damage was much prevented. It prov'd a very wet Seaſon, ſo that the Siege was both tedious and deſtructive to the Men, who daily work'd in the midſt of Dirt and Water, and more likely to rot without, than the Beſieged to ſtarve within. Sir Philip Warwick tells us, that waiting upon the Marqueſs in the Trenches, and ſhewing ſome Diffidence as to the Succeſs, the other jocoſely turn'd the Diſcourſe by ſaying, You often hear us call'd, the Popiſh Army; but you ſee, we truſt not in our good Works. The Siege was maintain'd with much Bravery and Reſolution, and manag'd with great Variety, both by the Aſſailants and Defendants; but at length, after it had continu'd above five Weeks, the Marqueſs found it neceſſary to draw off, and quit the whole Deſign. Thus the Siege of Hull prov'd as unſucceſsful, and perhaps as unfortunate, as that of Gloceſter.

He quits the Siege.

The Earl of Mancheſter in Lincolnſhire.

Before the breaking up of the Siege, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Son to the Governour, croſs'd the Humber with twenty Troops of Horſe, into Lincolnſhire, to join with the Earl of Mancheſter, who having drawn his Forces from about Lyn, advanc'd and quarter'd in the Towns about Bullingbrook Caſtle. On the 9th of October, Major Knight ſummon'd that Caſtle in the Earl of Mancheſter's Name, but was anſwer'd, That his Bugg-Words ſhou'd not make them quit the Place, and on the next Day they kill'd ſome few of his Men: That Afternoon the Earl himſelf came within a Mile of the Caſtle, where he was met by the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Colonel Cromwell; and Sir Thomas Fairfax lay at Horn-Caſtle, about five Miles diſtant. The King's Forces, under Sir William Widdrington, Sir John Henderſon an old Soldier, and others, being adviſ'd of Mancheſter's coming, had drawn out all their Horſe and Dragoons from their ſeveral Garriſons at Lincoln, Newark and Gainsborough, with a Reſolution to find him out, and fight with him; and accordingly they beat up ſome of his Quarters, and ſeveral Skirmiſhes happen'd between them. The next Morning the Earl order'd his whole Body of Horſe and Foot to be drawn up to Bullingbrook-Hill, towards a Place call'd Winsby; and the King's Forces alſo drew all their Horſe and Dragoons into the Field, having ſeventy four Colours of Horſe, and twenty one of Dragoons. Mancheſter had not half ſo many Colours of Horſe and Dragoons, but as many Men, for his Troops were fuller; but it was late before the Foot cou'd be drawn up. His Horſe and Dragoons advanc'd in ſeveral Bodies, ſinging of Pſalms; Quartermaſter-General Vermuden, with five Troops, had the Forlorn Hope, and Colonel Cromwell led the Van, ſeconded by Sir Thomas Fairfax. The Royaliſt's Word was, Newcaſtle; the Parliamentarians, Truth and Peace. In an open and fair Field by Winsby, the Earl's Dragoons gave the firſt Charge, and then the Horſe fell in: Colonel Cromwell charg'd with great Reſolution, immediately after the Royaliſt Dragoons had given them their firſt Volley; yet within half Piſtol-ſhot they bravely ſaluted him with a ſecond Charge. His Horſe was kill'd, and fell upon him; and as he roſe, he was again knock'd down by the Gentleman that charg'd him, ſuppos'd to be Sir Ingram Hopton; tho' others ſay Captain Portington, who afterwards freely told him, That he aim'd at his Noſe, when he hit his Horſe on the Head. He never was in greater Danger in his Life; but with Difficulty he got remounted. The Van of the Royaliſts Horſe, being driven back upon their own Body that was to Support them, put them into Diſorder; and Mancheſter's Troops taking that Advantage, charg'd all in with them, and put them to the Rout; and vigorouſly purſuing them, they did Execution upon them for four or five Miles together, before their Foot cou'd come up.

The Fight at Winsby, or Horncaſtle.

Such was the Iſſue of Winsby Fight, or, as ſome call it, Horncaſtle Fight, which was fought upon the 11th Day of October, the Day before the Siege of Hull was rais'd; but is not at all mention'd in the Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory. It was a ſharp Conflict, but continu'd leſs than an Hour, when the Royaliſts were defeated, with the Loſs of four or five Hundred Men ſlain, a Thouſand Horſe taken, thirty Colours, and eight Hundred Priſoners. Writers diſagree as to the Number of the ſlain, and Sir Thomas Fairfax mentions but two Hundred on the King's Side; among whom the Chief were Sir Ingram Hopton, Sir George Bowls, and Lieutenant-Colonel Markham, all Men of Note and Worth. In purſuance of this Victory, the Earl of Mancheſter march'd to Lincoln, ſat down before it, and ſummon'd it, and afterwards took the Place; Gainsborough was alſo quitted by the Royaliſts, and poſſeſs'd by Sir John Meldram; and the Lord Willoughby of Parham took in Bollingbroke Caſtle.

The Earl of Mancheſter*'s Succeſs.*

2. In the mean Time the Power of the Parliament ſtill declin'd in the Weſt, where their Party was extreamly reduc'd, and confin'd within narrow Limits after the taking of Exeter by Prince Maurice; who found a general Concurrence in the neighbouring Gentry to advance Levies of Men and Money; ſo that within a few Days after the Surrender of that Town, his Foot Army was increas'd to ſeven Thouſand Men, beſides a proportionable Body of Horſe, excellently equipp'd for Action. And at the ſame Time Colonel Digby was before Plymouth itſelf, with above three Thouſand Foot, and ſix Hundred Horſe, and had taken an Outwork of great Importance, call'd Mount-Stamford, within Half a Mile of the Town, and which commanded ſome Part of the River; the Loſs of which prov'd a mighty Diſcouragement to the Town. This was a great Advantage, but was not well cultivated by Prince Maurice, who ſtay'd too long at Exeter, and did not march directly to Plymouth; which was now full of Diſtraction and Jealouſy among themſelves, as well as unprovided for the Reception of an Enemy. It was a rich and populous Corporation, and had in it a Caſtle very ſtrong towards the Sea, and a little more than Muſket-ſhot from the Town was an Iſland with a Fort in it, much ſtronger than the Caſtle, both which were, before the Troubles, under the Command of a Captain, with a ſmall Garriſon, and were only deſign'd for a Defence of the Town againſt a Foreign Invaſion, having a good Command of the Entrance into the Harbour; but towards the Land, there was very little Strength. This Command was in the Hand of Sir Jacob Aſhley, and then as unprovided to reſiſt an Enemy, as the other Caſtles and Forts of the Kingdom; leſs for the receiving a Recruit, there being only Ordnance and Ammunition, without other Proviſions for the Support of the Soldiers within the Walls; and the Garriſon being by Time, Marriages and Trade, incorporated into the Town, became rather Citizens than Soldiers: So that Sir Jacob Aſhley being ſent for to the King, before the ſetting up his Standard, as ſoon as there was any Expectation of a Party for the King in Cornwall, after the Appearance of Sir Ralph Hopton, and thoſe other Gentlemen there, the Mayor and Corporation of Plymouth ſoon got both the Caſtle and Iſland into their Power.

The Succeſs of Prince Maurice in the Weſt.

The Parliament was highly pleas'd to find Plymouth thus ſecur'd; and to put an Obligation upon this, and other Corporations, they committed the Government of it to the Mayor, who well knew what Reſpect to pay to their Committee, which was appointed to reſide there for his Aſſiſtance, and to Conduct their Affairs in thoſe Parts. Of that Committee, Sir Alexander Carew was chief; a Gentleman of good Fortune, and Knight of the Shire for Cornwall, who having concurr'd in the Beginning with their moſt violent Concluſions, had the chief Strength, the Fort and Iſland, committed to him, with a ſufficient Garriſon; while the Mayor commanded the Caſtle and Town, about which a weak and irregular Line of Earth was caſt up. After the King's great Succeſſes in the Weſt, this forward Governor began to find, that his Iſland and Fort wou'd hardly ſecure his Eſtate in Cornwall, and having been wholly guided by Popularity and Intereſt, reſolv'd to redeem his Errors, and found Means to Correſpond with ſome of his old Friends and Neighbours in Cornwall, and by them to make a direct Overture to ſurrender his Government to the King, upon an Aſſurance of his Majeſty's Pardon for all paſt Offences. Sir John Berkley was then the chief Officer qualify'd to receive ſuch a Treaty, who inſtantly return'd him ample Aſſurance of his own Conditions, and particularly adviſ'd him, 'Not to inſiſt upon Forms, the Defects of which 'ſhou'd be ſupply'd with all poſſible Expedition, but 'ſpeedily to conſummate the Work, which hereafter 'might not be in his Power to effect; ſuch Deſigns being 'at once to be conſulted and executed.' But he was ſo ſtupidly Cautious of his own Security, that he wou'd not proceed, till he was ſufficiently aſſur'd that his Pardon had paſs'd the Great Seal of England; before which cou'd poſſibly be effected, by the Infidelity of a Servant whom he truſted, his whole Deſign was diſcover'd to the Mayor and the reſt of the Committee; and, according to the uſual Diligence of that Party, he was ſuddenly ſurpris'd in his Fort, and carry'd Priſoner into Plymouth, and from thence by Sea ſent to London, where more will be ſaid of him afterwards.

Sir Alexander Carew*'s Revolt.*

He is ſecur'd by the Parliament.

But how fortunate ſoever they thought this Diſcovery, the Fame of the winning Exeter, by which a victorious Army was at leaſure to viſit them, the Loſs of Mount-Stamford, their chief Land Fortification, and ſome other Diſcompoſures, produc'd a mighty Conſternation among the People of Plymouth; ſo that the Mayor himſelf was not without Inclinations for a Treaty to ſurrender the Town to the King: And it was by many believ'd, that if Prince Maurice had immediately march'd from Exeter before it, that Treaty wou'd have been certainly concluded; but he was perſwaded firſt to bend his Courſe to Dartmouth, ‘ as an eaſy Work, and a Harbour, which wou'd ‘ draw a very good Trade; and that ſhort Work being ‘ over, Plymouth wou'd have the leſs Courage to make ‘ Reſiſtance: And if it ſhou'd, it was better Work for the ‘ approaching Winter than the other, by reaſon of the ‘ Conveniency of good Accommodation for the Soldiers ‘ near the Place, which cou'd not be had at Dartmouth.’ Upon which Inducements he marched directly to Dartmouth, which, tho' unfit upon many Accounts to hold out againſt ſuch an Army, he found no ways diſpos'd to yield; ſo that he was oblig'd to inveſt it. And ſhortly after, there ſucceeded ſuch a terrible Seaſon of Rain and foul Weather, that many of his Men dy'd with lying upon the Ground, and more run away. Yet almoſt after a Month's Siege, and the Loſs of many good Men, particularly the brave Colonel Chudleigh formerly mention'd, it was ſurrender'd on fair Conditions: And the Prince having plac'd a Garriſon there, under Colonel Seymour, with all Expedition march'd to Plymouth, which was now in a better condition for a Siege: For the Parliament being ſoon inform'd what a dangerous Impreſſion the Loſs of moſt of the Weſt had made upon the Spirits of that People, had before ſent a Recruit of five Hundred Men, and a Scotch Officer to be Governor; who eas'd the Mayor of that unequal Charge, and ſoon made it appear that nothing but an obſtinate Defence was reſolv'd on. So the Prince, after he had joyn'd Colonel Digby, ſat down before it with an Army much inferior to that which he had carry'd from Exeter to Dartmouth, yet with much Confidence to reduce the Town before Winter ſhou'd be over; but after a tedious Siege, which occaſion'd ſome inferior Actions on both Sides, he was compell'd to quit the Place.

Prince Maurice takes Dartmouth,

And inveſts Plymouth.

The Mediation of France.

3. During theſe numerous and unnatural Conteſts, there were great Expectations, both in King and People, from the Mediation of the Court of France, which ſeem'd very inclinable to reſtore Peace and a good Underſtanding at this Juncture. The State of that Kingdom was now very much alter'd: Cardinal Richelieu, the great Fomenter of theſe Troubles, as formerly mention'd, was dead; King Lewis the Thirteenth follow'd him, not long after, leaving his Son about five Years of Age; the old Miniſters of State, who had undergone Impriſonment or Baniſhment, were ſet at Liberty and recall'd; and Queen Anne of Auſtria, during her Son's Minority, was declared Regent, who was ſenſibly concern'd to ſee the dangerous Condition, to which not only the King, but all the Royal Family of England was reduc'd. The firſt Step made was the Revocation of la Ferte Senneterre, the then Reſident Ambaſſador in England; a Perſon who had not only contracted a mighty Familiarity with the chief Leaders in Parliament, but had perſwaded ſome Engliſh Prieſts and Jeſuits to ingage the Papiſts by no Means to aſſiſt the King, with a full Aſſurance, That the Parliament wou'd allow them Liberty of Conſcience. In his Room was ſent the famous Count de Harcourt, a Prince of high Birth, near ally'd to the Crown, who in Catalonia had lately given the Spaniards the greateſt Defeat they had receiv'd; He came with private Inſtructions from the prime Miniſter, Cardinal Mazarine, who ſoon ſhew'd that he follow'd the Steps of his great Predeceſſor Richelieu.

The Count de Harcourt's Arrival.

His Reception at London was with great Solemnity, to ſhew that the Abſence of the King did not take off from the Grandeur of the State. But the Parliament ſoon put two open Affronts upon him; firſt in ſeizing and impriſoning Mr. Mountague, a Gentleman in Diſguiſe, but one of his Retinue; and next in ſearching his Coach and Carriages with vaſt Rudeneſs, after they had granted him a ſafe Conduct to Oxford. He much reſented both theſe Indignities, as a Violation of his Honour and Privileges, but not with ſufficient Vigour, either to obtain the Enlargement of his Friend, or any Reparation in the other Caſe. The King expected that at this Time the Crown of France ſhou'd have made a briſk Declaration on his Behalf; and the Ambaſſador gave him fair Promiſes of Aſſiſtance, and propos'd a League Offenſive and Defenſive; tho' the Queen Regent and the Cardinal afterwards deny'd they had given him any ſuch Inſtructions. But when the King was ready to cloſe with the Propoſal, and thereupon deſir'd a preſent Supply of Mony and Arms, he artificially declin'd it with an affected Compliment, and a new Promiſe, and ſo apply'd himſelf to the Parliament, by means of the Earl of Northumberland, and deſir'd ‘ to interpoſe, and pacify the ‘ Differences, by ſuch Expedients, as ſhou'd be moſt ‘ conformable to the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms of the ‘ Realm.’

He returns without any Succeſs.

This was deliver'd to the Houſe of Peers, and ſo to the Commons in a Conference between both Houſes, who return'd Anſwer, ‘ That they did, with all due Reſpects, ‘ accept of the affectionate Deſires of the King and Queen ‘ Regent of France, to contribute towards a happy Peace; ‘ and That, when the Count de Harcourt ſhou'd make ‘ any ſuch Propoſitions to the Parliament, by Authority ‘ from their Majeſties of France, they wou'd then give ‘ ſuch an Anſwer to the ſame, as might ſtand with the ‘ Intereſt of both Kingdoms, and their late Solemn League ‘ and Covenant.’ The Lords propos'd that there might be a Committee appointed to treat with the Ambaſſador; but the Commons wou'd by no means conſent to it, till he ſhou'd make it manifeſt, that he had full Authority to treat with the Parliament; and withal they earneſtly labour'd to draw from the Ambaſſador ſome publick Acknowledgment, That they were a real Parliament, the Freedom, and conſequently the Being whereof, had been deny'd by his Majeſty in a late Proclamation. So the Ambaſſador, after a Journey or two to Oxford, and ſome general Addreſſes to the Houſes, return'd to France, without open Succeſs, or any publick Marks of Diſlike to their Proceedings. And his particular Behaviour made many Men believe, that this great Man, notwithſtanding his ſpecious Profeſſions, was ſent rather to blow up, than extinguiſh the preſent Flames of the Nation. However it is certain, that during his Stay, he did not in any Degree advance the King's Service; but left the Parliament more united againſt the King, and the Scots more advanc'd, than he found them; there being likewiſe at the ſame Time a French Agent in Scotland, who produc'd no Change in the Affections of that People towards the King's Advantage.

The Parliament aſſume new Powers.

They make a new Great Seal.

4. The Lords and Commons were now unanimous, and equally joyn'd in ſuppreſſing the King's Power; new and ſtricter Orders were made for taking the Covenant, and an Ordinance, ‘ That none ſhou'd bear Office or Truſt ‘ in their Armies, Kingdom, &c. but ſuch as had taken ‘ the Covenant; nor even they themſelves, if they had ‘ been formerly impriſon'd, or ſequeſter'd upon Suſpicion ‘ of Malignancy.’ And now to ſecure their Sovereign Power in Civil Matters, they re-aſſum'd their former Conſideration of the Great Seal of England. The Commons had often urg'd the Lords to concur with them in the making a new Great Seal, and had declar'd, ‘ That in Right ‘ it ought always to attend upon the Parliament;’ in which the Peers as often refus'd to joyn with them, being ſtartled at the Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward the Third, which expreſly declares the Counterfeiting of the Great Seal of England to be High-Treaſon. This Diſſent hinder'd not the Proceedings of the Commons, who freely Voted, That a Seal ſhou'd be provided, and took order to have one engraven, exactly of the ſame Size and Impreſſion, with that which the King us'd at Oxford. Being prepar'd, and finding the Lords leſs ſcrupulous than formerly, on the eleventh of November, they let them know, ‘ They had a Great Seal ready, which ſhou'd be at the ‘ Diſpoſal of the two Houſes, and if they wou'd name ‘ ſome Peers, a proportionable Number of the other Body ‘ ſhou'd joyn in that Truſt.’ To which their Lordſhips did not only concur, but likewiſe in an Ordinance, which declar'd, ‘ All Letters Patents and Grants paſs'd the Great ‘ Seal by the King, after May 22, 1642, to be invalid, and ‘ void in Law; and henceforward, their own Great Seal ‘ ſhou'd be of equal Force and Validity, as any Great Seal ‘ of England had formerly been. At the ſame Time the Cuſtody of it was given to the Earls of Bullingbrook and Kent, and to Mr. St. John, Serjeant Wild, Mr. Brown and Mr. Prideaux; who were to keep it in the ſame Manner, as any Lord-Chancellor, Keeper, or Commiſſioner, formerly had done. Theſe were ſolemnly ſworn in the Preſence of both Houſes, to execute this Office, and obſerve their Directions in all Things; and the Seal was lock'd up in a Cheſt, which cou'd not be open'd but in the Preſence of three of them, and with three ſeveral Keys.

The Inſolence of Harry Martin.

Shortly after this new Uſurpation, the famous Harry Martin was order'd to ſurvey the Regalia in Weſtminſter Abby, which he did after a moſt contemptuous and ludicrous Manner. For breaking the Iron Cheſt, where they had been carefully preſerv'd, he took out the Crown, Sceptre, and Veſtments of Edward the Confeſſor, which always ſerv'd for the Inauguration of the Kings of England, and with a ſcornful Laughter, cry'd, There will be no more Uſe for theſe Trifles. With the ſame Degree of Boldneſs and Buffoonery, he caus'd George Withers, a ſtrange uncouth Poet of their own then preſent, to be dreſs'd in thoſe Royal Veſtments; and being alſo Crown'd, he firſt walk'd up and down in State, and then put himſelf into a thouſand mimical Poſtures, to expoſe the ſolemn Ornaments to the Contempt and Deriſion of the By-Standers. Theſe became the Subject of a Conference between the Houſes, wherein the Lords were brought to be of Opinion, That many Superſtitious Things among the Regalia were fit to be remov'd, as no longer of Uſe. To which one made a Prophetick Reply, The King himſelf wou'd ere long be ſome ſuperſtitious Monument of decay'd Divinity, and ſo thought fit to be remov'd; the King not making the Crown, but the Crown the King, which being now in their Hands, they might beſtow it on whom they pleaſe. Afterwards the Regalia, as alſo the Robes and Plate belonging to the Abby-Church, were all ſold; nor cou'd they be perſuaded to leave one Silver-Cup to be us'd at the Communion, ſome affirming, after an unheard-of manner, That a Wooden Diſh wou'd ſerve the turn. Nor was it any wonder that ſuch Sacrilege ſhou'd be incourag'd, when the ſacred Function of Miniſters was ſo inhumanely treated; of whom a hundred and fifteen in the City and Suburbs, for their Fidelity to the King according to the Laws, and Zeal for Religion according to their Conſcience, were, with their Wives and Children, ejected, plunder'd, and barbarouſly conſum'd in Priſon, in Exile, and with Hunger; of which ſomething has already been ſaid.

The Regalia ſold.

And now to ſhew that they wou'd be abſolute, and not joynt Sharers in the Sovereign Power, they gave an Inſtance of Boldneſs and Severity, that render'd them very formidable. The King had publiſh'd ſeveral Proclamations, for the Adjournment of the Term from London to Oxford, which hitherto had been in vain; and therefore he ſent two ſpecial Meſſengers, who deliver'd Writs of Adjournment to two of the Judges, Reeve and Trevor, who immediately caus'd them to be apprehended. Upon which the Houſes gave Direction, 'That they ſhou'd be try'd as 'Spies by a Council of War;' which was done at Eſſex Houſe. The Meſſengers alledg'd, 'They were ſworn 'Servants to the King, for the Performance of that Buſi-'neſs for which they were accus'd, and for the Refuſal 'of which they had been legally puniſhable; the Term be-'ing to be adjourn'd no other way.' Notwithſtanding which, they were both condemn'd to be hang'd as Spies; and within a few Days were carry'd to the Royal-Exchange, where Gallows were purpoſely erected: And there one of them, Daniel Kniveton by Name, ſuffer'd, and with a more noble Courage than was expected from one of his Condition and Education. The other, nam'd Carpenter, after he had ſtay'd ſome Time at the Gallows, was repriev'd and ſent to Bridewell; where he was kept long after, till he made an Eſcape, and return'd to Oxford. This rais'd great Terror in all the King's Friends in London, and the more, becauſe about the ſame Time an Ordinance was made, 'That whoever went into the King's 'Quarters without leave from one of the Houſes, or a Paſs 'from their General, and who ever held any Correſpondence 'by Letters with any in the King's Quarters, ſhou'd be 'proceeded againſt as diſaffected to the State, his Perſon 'committed, and his Eſtate ſequeſter'd; and ſhou'd be 'liable, according to the Circumſtances, to be try'd as 'Spies.

The Houſes hang up the King's Meſſenger for a Spy.

As this Power made them terrible to their Enemies, ſo they gave another Inſtance of Severity, which render'd their Government no leſs awful to their Friends and Aſſociates. The ſucceſsful Defence of Gloceſter made the Loſs of Briſtol the more felt by the Parliament, and ſo the yielding it up more freely cenſur'd. This became very uneaſy to the Governor Colonel Fiennes, who being a Member of the Commons, and of mighty Intereſt in that Houſe, raſhly deſir'd, 'That he might be put to give an Ac-'count of it at a Court of War, the proper Judicature for 'Crimes of that Nature.' And in the mean Time, was powerful enough to procure ſome of the Chief of his Accuſers to be impriſon'd, and reprehended; which rais'd Heats and a Faction, both in the Houſe of Commons, and the Army. But he met with two reſtleſs and indefatigable Proſecutors, the famous Mr. Prynn, and Mr. Clement Walker, a Gentleman who had been in Briſtol, and was a ſtrict Obſerver of the Colonel's Actions in that Place. Theſe two, under Pretence of Zeal to the Publick, undertook the Proſecution, and boldly charg'd the Colonel with Cowardice and Treachery; and gave ſeveral Inſtances of high Profeſſions and faint Performances, with ſome Mixtures of Pride and Avarice, throughout the Courſe of his Government. This Colonel, beſides the Credit and Influence of his Father the Lord Say, had a ſtrong Footing in the Houſe of Commons, upon the Account of his Activity, Parts and Knowledge, and his unalterable Zeal for their Cauſe; all which made him too much deſpiſe thoſe that appear'd his Adverſaries, and others whom he knew to be ſuch, tho' they appear'd not; and being ſure that he was intirely free from wiſhing well to the King, he concluded that his ſignal and unqueſtion'd Affection to the Parliament, wou'd weigh down all Objections. But notwithſtanding the numerous Services, after a long and ſolemn Hearing before the Court of War at St. Albans, where the Earl of Eſſex then lay, he was condemn'd to loſe his Head, 'For not having defended Briſtol ſo well, 'and ſo long, as he ought to have done.' This Sentence was paſs'd upon the twenty eighth of December, to the great Surpriſe of his Friends, who tho' they procur'd a Pardon for his Life, yet the Infamy of the Judgment cou'd not be remov'd, by which he became unfit to continue an Officer of the Army. In concluſion, the Shame of it caus'd him to quit the Kingdom; ſo that he retir'd for ſome Time into Foreign Parts, but ſtill retaining the ſame Diſaffection to the Government of the Church and State, and indeed no Provocations cou'd make him leſs zealous for the Parliament Party, or leſs concern'd in their Confederacy.

Colonel Fiennes try'd by a Court of War,

And condemn'd.

5. Thus ſtood the Affairs of the Nation at the End of the old Year 1643, when thoſe of the King's were in a Superior State and Condition. And whereas a Year before, his Majeſty had but one ſmall County in all the Weſt; in Yorkſhire, no more than that City and Pomfret Caſtle; and except at Reading, Wallingord, Brill and Abington, not a Soldier quarter'd out of Oxford; not a Ship, nor a Port, except Newcaſtle and Falmouth, and an inconſiderable Strength beſides; he had now five Armies in the Field, was poſſeſs'd of all the Weſtern Counties except Plymouth, Poole and Lyme; of all Yorkſhire, Hull only excepted; and in Cheſhire none but Namptwich ſtood out againſt him; and he had all the Principality of Wales, except a Sea-Town or two in Pembrokeſhire. But as theſe Succeſſes increas'd, the King's Soldiers fell inſenſibly into all the Licentiouſneſs, Diſorder and Impiety, with which they had charg'd the Rebels; and they, on the contrary, into great Diſcipline, Diligence and Sobriety. So that, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, One Side ſeem'd to fight for Monarchy with the Weapons of Confuſion, and the Other to deſtroy the King and Government, with all the Principles and Regularity of Monarchy.

The King's Condition at that Time.

Tho' the King himſelf was exemplary in all his Actions and Proceedings, yet both the Camp and Court was unhappily mix'd, ill diſpos'd and divided. The Perſons conſulted in Martial Affairs, beſides Prince Rupert, were General Ruthen, Earl of Forth, and afterwards Earl of Brentford; the Lord Wilmot, General of the Horſe; the Lord Hopton, who frequently commanded an Army apart; Sir Jacob Aſhley, Major-General of the Army; the Lord Digby, Secretary of State; and Sir John Colepepper, Maſter of the Rolls, and ſoon after made a Baron. Theſe, with Colonel Goring, who the following Year ſucceeded Wilmot in his Office, were very often divided among themſelves, both in their Opinions and Projects, and no leſs differ'd in their Morals and Practices; ſo that they many Times brought an Unſteadineſs into the King's Counſels, as well as a Diſgrace upon his Actions. Prince Rupert hated Wilmot, and Wilmot hated Goring, and all ſeem'd averſe to the Perſons, or rather Advices, of Digby and Colepepper; for from the Beginning, the Army had been diſpos'd to a Neglect and Contempt of the Council or Civil Power, to the plain Diminution of his Majeſty's Royal Dignity.

The Diviſions among his Officers.

We have formerly given the Characters of Prince Rupert, the Lord Digby, and Sir John Colepepper, and ſhall now proceed to ſay ſomething of the reſt. The General, tho' a very good Officer, and of great Experience, and ſtill of unqueſtionable Courage and Integrity; yet at preſent was much decay'd in his Parts, and with the long Cuſtom of exceſſive Drinking, doz'd in his Underſtanding, which had never been quick, or cultivated with the leaſt Degree of Learning; tho' his Actions had been ſprightly and vigorous, and one of thoſe who, as his Country-Men ſaid, was reſolv'd to do or die. He was now become very Deaf, and ſeem'd unwilling to oppoſe a Stream that bore againſt him, and in a little Time was brought in Prince Rupert in his Place. The Lord Hopton, and Sir Jacob Aſhley, were indeed great Men, and of admirable Merit. The Former was the Glory of the Weſt, a Man ſuperior to any Temptation, who abhorr'd the Licence and Levities with which he ſaw too many corrupted. He had a ſound Underſtanding, a clear Courage, an Induſtry not to be tired, and a Generoſity not to be exhauſted; a Virtue that none of the reſt had: But in Warlike Debates, was longer in reſolving, and readier in changing, than was agreeable to the Higheſt Office; which render'd him rather fit for a Second than a ſupream Commander. Sir Jacob Aſhley, or rather Aſtley, of an ancient Family in the County of Norfolk, was an honeſt, valiant, plain Gentleman, and as fit for the Office he held, of Major-General of the Foot, as Chriſtendom cou'd afford: He was a Man of many Years Experience, very diſcerning and ready in giving Orders, as Occaſion requir'd, and moſt chearful and preſent in any Action. In Council he us'd few but pertinent Words, and was not pleas'd with long Speeches; ſo that he rather collected the Ends of the Debates, and what he himſelf was to do, than enlarg'd them by his own Diſcourſes.

A Character of General Ruthen,

The Lord Hopton,

And Sir Jacob Aſtley.

The Lord Wilmot was of a haughty and ambitious Nature, of a pleaſant Wit, and a poſitive Temper, who by his exceſſive Good-Fellowſhip had made himſelf very popular Wilmot and Goring compar'd.

pular in the Army; and in that he excell'd in every Part. But the beſt Way to judge of him will be to compare him with his Rival and Succeſſor Goring, as the Lord Clarendon has done, and made it one of the moſt beautiful Parts of his Hiſtory: Therefore we ſhall take leave to uſe his own Words, ſince better can hardly be found. Wilmot lov'd Debauchery, but ſhut it out from his Buſineſs; never neglected That, and rarely miſcarry'd in it. Goring had a much better Underſtanding, and a ſharper Wit (except in the very Exerciſe of Debauchery, and then the other was inſpir'd) a much keener Courage, and Preſentneſs of Mind in Danger: Wilmot diſcern'd it farther off, and becauſe he cou'd not behave himſelf ſo well in it, commonly prevented, or warily declin'd it; and never drank when he was within Diſtance of an Enemy: Goring was not able to reſiſt the Temptation, when he was in the middle of them, nor wou'd decline it to obtain a Victory. ----- Neither of them valu'd their Promiſes, Profeſſions, or Friendſhips, according to any Rules of Honour, or Integrity; but Wilmot violated them the leſs willingly, and never but for ſome great Benefit, or Convenience to Himſelf; Goring without Scruple, out of Humour, or for Wit's ſake, and lov'd no Man ſo well, but that he wou'd cozen him, and then expoſe him to publick Mirth for having been cozen'd: Therefore he had always fewer Friends than the other, but more Company; for no Man had a Wit that pleas'd the Company better. The Ambition of both were unlimited, and ſo equally incapable of being contented; but both unreſtrain'd by any Reſpect to good Nature or Juſtice, from purſuing the Satisfaction thereof: Yet Wilmot had more Scruples from Religion to ſtartle him, and wou'd not have attain'd his End by any groſs or foul Act of Wickedneſs; Goring wou'd have paſs'd through thoſe pleaſantly; and wou'd, without Heſitation, have broken any Truſt, or done any Act of Treachery to have ſatisfy'd an ordinary Paſſion, or Appetite; and in Truth wanted nothing but Induſtry, to have been as eminent, and ſucceſsful, in the higheſt Attempt of Wickeneſs, as any Man in the Age he liv'd in, or before. Of all his Qualifications, Diſſimulation was his Maſter-Piece; in which he ſo much excell'd, that Men were not ordinarily aſham'd, or out of Countenance, with being deceiv'd but twice by him.

The Death of the Earl of Cumberland,

We have in ſeveral Places taken Notice of many Eminent Men this Year unhappily ſwept away by the Deluge of the Civil War, as the Earls of Northampton, Denbigh, Carnarvon, Sunderland and Kingſton; the Lords Falkland, Brook, and Grandiſon; the Honourable Colonel Charles Cavendiſh, Sir Bevile Greenvile, Sir Nicholas Slanning, Sir Ingram Hopton, Sir George Bowles, Mr. Sidney Godolphin, Colonel Trevannion, Colonel Chudleigh, and Major Sheldon: We ſhall now for a Concluſion of the old Year, and this Period, take Notice of ſome few others who dy'd a natural Death: As firſt, Henry Clifford, Earl of Cumberland, a Loyal Gentleman, who being of a peaceable and affable Diſpoſition, had few Enemies; and was diſtinguiſh'd by the various Copies of Verſes he wrote, which obtain'd him the Character of The beſt of Poets among the Nobility. Next Dr. Samuel Ward, Maſter of Sidney-College in Cambridge, and Margaret-Profeſſor of Divinity in that Univerſity for above twenty Years, an Ornament to the Univerſity, who was accounted a Puritan before theſe Times; but now a Malignant, and a Papiſt, yet was always a true and ſtanch Proteſtant; who dy'd with theſe Words in his Mouth, God bleſs the King and my Lord Hopton. Mr. George Sandys was the next, the youngeſt Son of Edwin, Arch-Biſhop of York, and Brother to Edwin, mention'd in the Year 1629, an accompliſh'd Gentleman, a Linguiſt and Poet, whoſe ready Diſcourſe, and excellent Comportment, render'd him acceptable to all Men; but is moſtly noted at this Time for his Travels into ſeveral Parts of the World, which he publiſh'd with Satisfaction and Applauſe. After him dy'd Mr. William Cartwright, a very fine Gentleman of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, an excellent Linguiſt, Orator, Philoſopher and Preacher, as well as an admirable Poet: So that when the Wits read his Poems, Divines his Sermons, and Philoſophers his Metaphyſical Lectures, they can ſcarcely believe that Death ſeiz'd him at a little above thirty Years of Age, which happen'd by a Malignant Fever, not only to the Affliction of all the great Men in the Univerſity, but alſo to the King, Queen, and all the Court then reſiding at that Place.

Dr. Ward,

Mr. Sandys,

Mr. Cartwright,

And Mr. Pym.

Laſt of all dy'd the fam'd Mr. John Pym, on the 8th Day of December, whoſe Intereſt and Authority had been ſo prevailing, as to gain him the Name of King Pym; having had, for ſome Time, as much Power to do Good or Hurt, as any Man living; tho' in private, he was not a little influenc'd by Mr. Hambden, and Mr. St. John. Tho' in the Beginning, he was not ſo inviolably true to his Party as to be accounted an abſolute Patriot, yet in a little Time none became more deeply or irreconcilably ingag'd; and when the Earl of Eſſex, this Year, was diſpos'd towards a Treaty, his Power and Dexterity wholly chang'd, and immovably fix'd him. Sufficient have been ſaid of the Character, and indefatigable Labours of this powerful over-bearing Man; which made his Death of infinite Loſs to his Party. The Lord Clarendon, and ſome others intimate, that he dy'd in great Torment of that loathſome Diſeaſe call'd Morbus Pediculoſus, and that he was a very ſad Spectacle, and none but ſelect Friends were admitted to ſee him; but Ruſhworth, and others, deny the Fact, and ſay, That his dead Body, upon that Report, was expos'd to many hundreds of People; which I have heard confirm'd by a good Hand, not long ſince deceas'd. Whatever was his Life and Death, his Name and Memory was in effect idoliz'd by the Multitude, and his Body was bury'd with extraordinary Pomp and Magnificence among the Engliſh Kings in Weſtminſter-Abby; and his Funeral Sermon was preached and printed by Mr. Stephen Marſhal, who compar'd him to John the Baptiſt, For that he was taken away violently, after but two or three Years Work. He was infinitely deſirous of the Scots Arrival; but was not ſo happy as to ſee that Day. It is pity that we know not the laſt Thoughts and Sentiments of this great Man, and Mr. Hambden, who queſtionleſs, at firſt, never deſign'd thoſe Train of Miſeries they really occaſion'd.

CHAP. IV.

The CIVIL WARS of England:

From the Arrival of the Scots in England, to their Return into their own Country; when the War was concluded, the King's Party reduced, and Himſelf made a Captive.

Containing the Space of a little above Three Years.

I. 1. Hitherto we have treated of the Civil Wars of England, while that Nation was only concern'd, without any Foreign Aſſiſtance, and while the King's Party had manifeſtly the Advantage; but now we are to conſider them, as they were carry'd on in Conjunction with Scotland, which for ſome Time had ſupported and given Life to the declining Party, and at length was one Cauſe of turning the Scale. The Scots had twice before invaded England, and receiv'd ſuch ample Satisfaction, that they promis'd all future Service to the King; yet now contrary to Faith, as well as Loyalty, and indeed contrary to Expectation, they had prepar'd a powerful Army under their old General Leſley, now Earl of Leven, who had given the moſt ſolemn Aſſurances, That he wou'd never bear Arms againſt the King, let the Cauſe be what it wou'd. Their Forces conſiſted of about eighteen thouſand Foot, three thouſand Horſe, and between five and ſix hundred Dragoons; among whom John Bayly was Lieutenant-General of the Foot, David Leſley Major-General of the Horſe, and Sir Alexander Hamilton General of the Artillery. Several of the Nobility were alſo Commanders in this Army, as the Marqueſs of Argyle, the Earls of Caſſils, Lowdon, Lindſay, Dumfernlin, Lothian and Eglinton, the Lords Maitland, Levingſton, Sinclare, Cowper, Kirkubright, &c. Some of thoſe on the other Side, who proteſted againſt their Proceedings, were the Marqueſs of Huntley, the Earls of Forth, Montroſs, Crawford, Abercorne, Gordon and Traquair, the Lords Aboyn, Ogilby, Hay, Sir Robert Spotſwood, &c.

The Scots Army.

Their Declaration.

Being almoſt ready for their March, they publiſh'd a Manifeſto or Declaration, intentionally to anſwer three Queſtions: ' The Juſtneſs of their Cauſe: The Lawfulneſs of ' their Calling thereunto; and, The Faithfulneſs of their ' Carriage therein. For the firſt, They appeal to the ' great Searcher of all Hearts, who knows, That had not ' the Love of Chriſt, requiring to bear one another's Burthen; and the Law of Nature, challenging their Endeavour to prevent their own Danger, invelop'd with their ' Neighbours, and their Duty of reſcuing the King from ' his pernicious Council, they cou'd with far more Content enjoy'd their dry Morſel, than enter'd into Houſes ' full of Sacrifices with Strife. And they profeſs before ' God, and the World, their Hearts were clean and free ' from any other Intentions, than thoſe expreſs'd in their ' Solemn League and Covenant, namely, Reformation of ' Religion, Honour of the King, and Peace of the Kingdoms. Secondly, as to the Lawfulneſs of their Calling, ' Providence had ſo provided that the Parliament of England had a particular Obligation upon this their Nation, ' for refuſing to countenance a War againſt them in 1640, ' and now deſire their Aſſiſtance to them; and ſo with the

‘the Senſe of Piety, Religion, Honour and Duty, they may not reſiſt their Call to this Expedition. Thirdly, As to the Faithfulneſs of their Carriage, they wou'd order their Army from Inſolencies, Rapines, Plunderings, and other Calamities incident to War. And they freely give the Publick Faith of the Kingdom of Scotland unto the Kingdom of England, that neither their Entrance into, nor Continuance in England, ſhall be made uſe of to other Ends than is expreſs'd in that Covenant, which they will keep inviolable: And they call God to Witneſs, their only Intent of War is to confirm all in Peace, and ſo to return home again.

Another by the Convention of Eſtates of Scotland.

Shortly after, the Convention of Eſtates of Scotland publiſh'd another, and longer Declaration, to juſtify the preſent Expedition; in which they ſaid, ‘It was moſt neceſſary, That every one ſhould be perſuaded of the Lawfulneſs of the Undertaking, and the Goodneſs of the Cauſe; which was no other than the Good of Religion in England, and the Deliverance of their Brethren out of the Depths of Affliction; the Preſervation of their own Religion, and Themſelves, from the Extremity of Miſery, and the Safety of their Native King, and his Kingdoms, from Deſtruction and Deſolation. If any One of which, by all Divine Law, and Human, was too juſt a Cauſe of taking of Arms; how much more, when all of them were joyn'd in One? Therefore let him who withdraws, and hides himſelf, conſider, Whether he be not an Hater of his Brethren, againſt Chriſtian and common Charity; an Hater of himſelf and his Poſterity, againſt the Law and Light of Nature; an Hater of the King and his Kingdoms, againſt Loyalty and common Duty; and an Hater of God, againſt all Religion and Peace. They declar'd, The Queſtion was not, Whether they might Propagate their Religion by Arms; but, Whether they ought to aſſiſt their Brethren in England, who were calling for their Help, and ſhedding their Blood in Defence of that Power, without which, Religion cou'd neither be defended, nor reformed? So that the Queſtion was ſoon reſolv'd, and they concluded, That the Lord would ſave them from the Curſe of Meroz, who came not to help the Lord againſt the Mighty. They ſaid, the Queſtion could not be, as their Enemies would make it, Whether they ſhould lift up Arms againſt their own King, who had promis'd, and done what might ſecure them in their own Religion and Liberties; but, Whether againſt the Popiſh, Prelatical, and Malignant Party, their Adherents prevailing in England and Ireland, they were not bound to provide for their own Preſervation. It was ſufficiently viſible, that they could not long, like Goſhen, enjoy their Light, if Darkneſs ſhould cover the Face of other Reformed Kirks: That Judah could not long continue in Liberty, if Iſrael were led away in Captivity; and that the Condition of the one Kirk and Kingdom, whether in Religion or Peace, muſt be common to both. They further ſaid, The Queſtion was not, Whether they ſhould preſume to be Arbitrators betwixt his Majeſty and the Parliament; but, Whether the Mediation being rejected, it were not their Duty to prevent the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood; or, Whether they ought not to reſcue their Native King, his Crown, and Poſterity, and preſerve his People and Kingdom from Ruin and Deſtruction. If every private Man were bound in Duty to interpoſe Himſelf as a Reconciler between his Neighbours, arm'd to their mutual Deſtruction; if the Son ought to hazard his Life for the Preſervation of his Father and Brother, when at Variance; ſhould a Kingdom ſit ſtill, and ſuffer their own King, and neighbouring Kingdom, to periſh in an unnatural War?

The King's Declaratition concerning the Scots.

With this Divinity, and theſe Arguments, they reſolv'd to invade their Neighbour Nation, and joyn againſt their Native King, in all the bloody Actions, which had been ever practis'd in the moſt calamitous Civil War. But the King, to abate the Malignity of Theirs, publiſh'd a long Declaration of his Own, ‘In which he Hiſtorically recounted the uncommon Conceſſions he had made, with the large Immunities and Privileges, as well as Favours he had granted; ſuch as ſhew'd him a gracious King towards his People, as well as a loving Father towards his Children. But ſince common Duty and Gratitude would not take place, he particularly inſiſted upon that ſolemn Act of Pacification, which expreſly provided, “That the Kingdom of Scotland ſhould not denounce or make War againſt the Kingdom of England, without Conſent of the Parliament of Scotland; all which they had manifeſtly violated, and by this new Invaſion made themſelves Traitors, by the very Words of that Act.” After which he handſomely retorted their own Words and Expreſſions upon themſelves; and in Concluſion declar'd, That he doubted not but the Spirits of all true Engliſhmen would riſe with a juſt Indignation at this unheard-of Inſolence, where nothing was pretended, but a Reſolution to impoſe new Laws upon Them; that they would be united, as one Man, to oppoſe the Pride and Tyranny of this Invaſion, and that they would conclude, That neither Conſcience, nor Brotherly Affection, engag'd them from their own Peace and Quiet in the Ungodly Errand, but a Deſign of making a Conqueſt by their Civil Diſſentions, and of inhabiting their moſt fruitful and pleaſant Places. In a Word, if the Sins of both Nations had prepar'd a Judgment from Heaven, to have them drown'd and confounded in each others Blood; what Portion ſoever He ſhould have in the Calamity, God and Man would bear Witneſs, That He had not been wanting in his Duty to prevent all the following Miſery and Deſolation.

The Scots enter England.

2. But nothing could ſtop the Career of the Scots, who after all Impediments, in a diſmal ſnowy Seaſon, croſs'd the River Tweed at Berwick, on the 15th Day of January; being accompany'd with a ſelect Committee of their own, and met with another from England, who were to conduct and ſupply them in the moſt friendly and faithful Manner. Theſe two being joyn'd, became the general Committee of both Kingdoms, and in effect an united Camp Parliament. Before the further Advance of the Army, they ſent a Letter by a Trumpeter to Sir Thomas Glemham, and the reſt of the Commanders and Gentry of Northumberland, at Alnwick, ‘In which they inſiſted upon the Solemn League and Covenant, and declar'd their well-weigh'd Reſolutions, to prevent that imminent Danger, not only of Corruption, but of Ruin, which they ſaw evidently intended to the true Proteſtant Religion, by the Popiſh and Prelatical Faction; and to reſcue his Majeſty's Perſon and Honour, from the Counſels of thoſe, whoſe Ends are little better than Popery and Tyranny. Therefore they expected the Concurrence of them, and all others; and if they met with any Oppoſition, the Law of Nature, and their own Reaſon, would tell them what they are to expect.’ Together with this Letter, they ſent alſo a Copy of the Scotch Declaration, to give it the greater Force and Authority among the Vulgar.

They write to Sir Thomas Glemham, &c.

The Anſwer to the Letter.

The brave Sir Thomas Glemham, after a ſerious Conſultation with the Officers and Gentry, how moſt to incommode the Enemies March, return'd a ſharp Anſwer, in which He and the reſt declare, ‘That without the ſight of that Letter, they could not have believ'd, That the Scottiſh Nation, or the preſent prevailing Party in that Nation, would have attempted an Invaſion of England; ſo contrary to the Laws of God, of Nations, of both Kingdoms, and eſpecially to the late Act of Pacification; ſo oppoſite to their Allegiance and Gratitude to his Majeſty, to that neighbourly Love they pretend, to that diſcreet Care which they ſhould have of their own Safety. They declare, That no Order of Committees whatever, of Men or Angels, could give Power to make War againſt their natural Sovereign, upon the empty Pretence of nameleſs Evil Counſellors: And for the Engliſh Agents, they could not believe them any Commiſſioners lawfully authoriz'd by the two Houſes of Parliament, or yet by the Houſe of Commons, whence ſo many Members were expell'd by partial Votes, ſo many baniſh'd by Seditious Tumults, ſo many voluntarily abſent out of Conſcience; where Deſperation, Want of Opportunity to depart, or Fear of certain Plunder, were the chief Bonds which held the little Remnant together from Diſſipation; where the venerable Name of PARLIAMENT was made a Stale to countenance the pernicious Counſels and Acts of a CLOSE COMMITTEE. As to the Scots, they declare, That no Covenant whatever could juſtify ſuch Proceedings, begun without any Neceſſity, or ſo much as Provocation. After anſwering their Pretenſions, they deſire them to conſider, That there muſt be an Account given to God of all the Blood which ſhou'd be ſhed in this Quarrel: And ſince their Inſults were ſuch, that a vanquiſh'd Nation would ſcarce endure from their Conquerors, they could not think they were grown ſo tame, as to deſert their Religion, Laws, Liberties and Eſtates, upon Command of Foreigners, and to ſuffer Themſelves and their Poſterity to be made Beggars and Slaves without Oppoſition.

The Scots advance with many Difficulties.

Theſe Paper Skirmiſhes had no other Effect than to gain ſome little Time for Sir Thomas Glemham to draw his Forces and Artillery to Newcaſtle, for Alnwick was not tenible; beſides, he found ſeveral of the Gentlemen of Northumberland, eſpecially ſuch as were ally'd to the Lord Grey of Wark, either out of Fear of the Scots, or Affection to their Cauſe, were very backwards in oppoſing the Enemy. The Scots advanc'd after him by ſlow and difficult Marches, by reaſon of the Snow and Floods, and on the third of February ſummon'd the Town of Newcaſtle; but finding they were not able to take the Place, after three Weeks ſtay, and ſome Skirmiſhes, they paſs'd the River

Tyne on the 28th of February, and on the 4th of March enter'd Sunderland. The Marqueſs of Newcaſtle, General for the King in thoſe Northern Parts, having reinforc'd his Army to about fourteen thouſand Horſe and Foot, attended ſo near upon the Scots Army, and ſo intercepted their Supplies, that ſometimes they had neither Meat nor Drink, and were never poſſeſs'd of above twenty four Hours Proviſion: But they colour'd over this Neceſſity by keeping a ſolemn Faſt, and by preſſing on towards Durham for better Quarters. To ſtop their Advance, on the 23d of March, the Marqueſs drew up his Army at Hilton, on the North of the River Ware, the Scots being drawn up on a Hill Eaſt from them towards the Sea. So the Armies fac'd each other, and skirmiſh'd in Parties; the Field Word given by the Marqueſs being Prophetically enough, Now or Never; and by the Scots, in their aſſuming Way, The Lord of Hoſts is with us. The Marqueſs, not able to force the Scots to a Battel, retreated towards his Quarters at Durham, and the Scots follow'd ſlowly; but could make no conſiderable Advance, till the Lord Fairfax, and the reſt of the Parliament Forces, by a new Diverſion, gave them Opportunity to deſcend into Yorkſhire, as will be mention'd in a more proper Place.

Nantwich relieved by Sir Thomas Fairfax.

3. During theſe Movements of the Scots, there hapned two Actions, which had a contrary Influence upon their Affairs; the one at Nantwich in Cheſhire, and the other at Newark in Nottinghamſhire. The former had in January been beſieg'd for the King, by Sir John Byron, lately made Lord Byron, at the Head of a brave Body of Men, that had been ſent out of Ireland after the Ceſſation, and had carry'd great Terror along with them, by their ſucceſsful Advances. The Town being reduc'd to great Straits, the hardy Sir Thomas Fairfax was order'd to haſten out of Lincolnſhire to relieve it, at a Time when the Beſiegers had little Expectation of Trouble, and too much Confidence in their own Strength. This young Commander, with indefatigable Induſtry, in ſeveral Places gather'd about three thouſand Men, and march'd directly to the Relief of Nantwich, tho' inferior in Number and Goodneſs of Troops to the other Party, who in Aſſurance of their own Power, had kept their Poſts too long: And when they found it neceſſary to draw off, a little River by a ſudden Thaw ſo ſwell'd above its Banks, that the Lord Byron, with the greateſt Part of the Horſe and Foot, lying on one ſide of the Town, were parted from the reſt, and oblig'd to march four or five Miles, to joyn with the other; before which Time, the other Part being charg'd by Sir Thomas Fairfax on one ſide, and from the Town on the other, were broken; and all the chief Officers compell'd to retire into a neighbouring Church, where they were ſurrounded, and the Horſe by reaſon of the Floods and narrow Lanes, not being able to relieve them, were forc'd to yield themſelves Priſoners to thoſe whom they ſo much deſpis'd a few Hours before. Beſides all the chief and conſiderable Officers of Foot, there were taken about fifteen hundred Soldiers, and all their Cannon and Carriages, together with the Lord Byron's Commiſſion; that Lord, with the reſt of his Forces, retiring to Cheſter. This Fight was fought on the twenty-fifth of January, and was as ſharp for the Time it laſted, as any that happen'd before in theſe unhappy Wars; and gave a great Reputation to young Fairfax, who not long after became the Supreme General under the Parliament. Among the Priſoners, was taken the famous Colonel George Monk, who was ſent to London, and continu'd in the Tower for many Years; and after many ſtrange Revolutions, was the great Inſtrument of the Reſtoration.

This Defeat, together with the Terror of the Scotch Army, had ſo let looſe all the King's Enemies in the Northern Parts, which were lately at his Devotion, that his Friends were in great Diſtreſs in many Places before the Seaſon wou'd allow them to take the Field. Newark, an uſeful Garriſon, which not only ſubjected the little County of Nottingham, but had kept a great Part of the large County of Lincoln under Contribution, was now reduc'd to ſo great Straits by the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir John Meldrum, that they were forc'd to beg Relief from the King at Oxford. In theſe Difficulties, the King found it neceſſary to ſend Prince Rupert, with a good Body of choſen Horſe and Dragoons, and ſome Foot, with Orders after he had viſited Shrewsbury and Cheſter, now terrify'd with the Lord Byron's Defeat, and us'd all Endeavours for new Levies, that he wou'd attempt the Relief of Newark; which being loſt, wou'd cut off all poſſible Communication between Oxford and York. In Newark the Garriſon conſiſted of moſt of the Gentry of the Country, and the Inhabitants, ſcarce provided with any Thing againſt a Siege, beſides their ſingular Courage and Affections. The Enemy entrench'd themſelves before the Town, and proceeded by Approach; conceiving they had ſufficient Time, and apprehending no Poſſibility of being diſturb'd: And indeed there was no Hopes of Relief to come, but from Shrewsbury and Cheſter, where Prince Rupert had given ſo much Life, and gather'd ſo conſiderable a Body, that the Enemy found little Advantage by their late Victory, in the Enlargement of their Quarters.

Car. 19.

Newark reliev'd by Prince Rupert.

This intrepid Prince then reſolv'd to try his Fate before Newark, and undertook the Relief before he was ready for it, and by that Means perform'd it. For the Enemy, who had always great Intelligence, was ſo confident that he had no Strength ſufficient to attempt that Work, that he was within Six Miles before they believ'd he had any Thoughts of them; and charging and routing ſome of their Horſe, purſu'd them with that ſtrange Expedition, that he beſieg'd them in their Works with his Horſe, before his Foot came within four Miles of the Place. In that Conſternation, and Belief that he muſt have a vaſt Power and Strength, to bring them to ſuch Straits, He with a Number inferior to the Enemy, and utterly unprovided for a long Action, brought them to accept of Leave to lay down their Arms, and depart without any Carriage or Baggage. Thus on the twenty ſecond of March he reliev'd Newark, and took above four thouſand Arms, eleven Pieces of Braſs Cannon, two Mortar-Pieces, and above fifty Barrels of Powder; which was as unexpected a Victory as any happen'd throughout the War, and had that Effect, that the Garriſons of Gainsborough, Lincoln and Sleeford, were quitted ſoon after by the Parliament Forces, and Sterne Caſtle in Staffordſhire was ſurrender'd to Sir Gilbert Gerard for his Majeſty's Uſe. Thus two contrary Victories in a great Meaſure kept the Ballance even; while the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle was endeavouring to ſtem the grand Northern Inundation.

The King's firſt Expedient againſt the Scots.

II. I. To obviate or leſſen the Miſchiefs threatned from the Invaſion of the Scots, who had particularly reported, That divers of the Nobility had lately deſerted the King, his Majeſty conſider'd of two Expedients in Council. The One was, that all the Peers then in Oxford, or in his Service, might ſubſcribe a Letter to the Council of State in Scotland; by which it wou'd appear, by the very Subſcription, 'That above five Parts in ſix of the whole 'Nobility, and Houſe of Lords, were in the King's Ser'vice, and diſavow'd all thoſe Actions done againſt him 'by the pretended Authority of the two Houſes;' which poſſibly might make ſome Impreſſion upon the People of Scotland, who had been ſo much impos'd upon by their Leaders. A Letter was accordingly prepar'd, expreſſing 'The Foulneſs of the Rebellion in England, under the 'Reputation of the Two Houſes of Parliament, after the 'far Major Part of both Houſes had been forcibly driven 'away, expreſly againſt all the Laws of the Land; re'minding them of their particular Obligations to the King, 'and pathetically concluding, with conjuring them to de'ſiſt from their unjuſt and unwarrantable Purpoſe; ſince 'they cou'd have no Excuſe from the pretended Authori'ty of Parliament.' The Letter was perus'd and debated in the Council, and afterwards in the Preſence of all the Peers; and being generally approv'd, by all but the Earl of Leiceſter, it was order'd to be Sign'd by all thoſe Lords and Privy-Counſellors, who were then in Oxford, and to be ſent to thoſe who were abſent in the Armies, or in the King's Quarters, and to be ſent to the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle; who after he had ſign'd it, with thoſe Peers who were in the North, was to tranſmit it into Scotland by a Trumpet; all which was accordingly perform'd.

His ſecond Expedient.

The other Expedient propos'd was, That ſince the whole Kingdom was miſ-led by the Reverence they had to Parliaments, and believ'd that the Laws and Liberties ſolely depended upon their Authority; and ſince it was of no effect to perſuade Men that what they did was againſt Law, while they believ'd that their very doing it made it Lawful, it wou'd be therefore neceſſary to convince them, 'That they who did thoſe monſtrous Things, were not 'the Parliament, but a Handful of deſperate Perſons, who 'by the Help of the Tumults rais'd in London, had driven 'away the Major Part of the Parliament, and call'd 'Themſelves THE PARLIAMENT; while, in 'reality, they were much the leſs, and the leaſt conſidera'ble Part of it:' All which wou'd manifeſtly appear, if his Majeſty wou'd iſſue out a Proclamation, 'To require 'all the Members who had left the Parliament at Weſt'minſter, to repair to Oxford, by a fix'd Day; where the 'King wou'd be willing to adviſe with them in Matters 'of the greateſt Importance, concerning the Compoſure 'of the Diſtractions of the Nation.' By this Means, in many Things he might ſerve Himſelf by their Aſſiſtance; and it wou'd evidently appear, by the Number of both Houſes, whoſe Names wou'd be quickly publiſh'd, how few remain'd at Weſtminſter, who carry'd on this grievous and devouring War. This, after ſome Debates on both Sides, was reſolv'd upon in Council; and accordingly a Proclamation was iſſu'd out, 'containing the true

He ſummons the Parliament to Oxford.

'Grounds and Motives, and mentioning the League of Scotland to invade the Kingdom, which was univerſally odious; and ſummoning all the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, excepting ſuch as commanded his Majeſty's Forces in the North, and the Weſt, to attend upon his Majeſty at Oxford, upon the twenty ſecond Day of January.

The OXFORD PARLIAMENT.

2. The Court at Oxford was much encreas'd by the Queen's Preſence, and the Neceſſities were increas'd with the Expence. All Correſpondence was now abſolutely cut off with London; the Mony which by particular Perſons had been plentifully ſupply'd in the Beginning of the War, was now near ſpent, and the ſtopping the Intercourſe with London had ſhut the Door againſt farther Supply; ſo that Men were weary of the preſent Condition, and expreſs'd it in Murmurs and Complaints. And all the Hopes of the Royaliſts was in the Convention of the Members of Parliament; which being a new Thing, ſuſpended the preſent Indiſpoſition, and rais'd ſome Expectation, what they who came from all Quarters of the Kingdom, wou'd do. According to the King's Proclamation, the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, who had withdrawn from thoſe at Weſtminſter, appear'd at Oxford at the Day appointed; except many of them, who cou'd not be abſent from their Commands in the Country, where the Armies lay. They appear'd to the Number of forty four Lords and a Hundred and Seventeen Commoners. They were graciouſly and ſolemnly welcom'd by his Majeſty, in the Great Hall at Chriſt-Church, and with that Ceremony which is us'd at the opening of a Parliament; at which Time in a formal Speech he declar'd, 'That he call'd them to be Witneſſes of his Actions, and privy to his Intentions; that he deſir'd to receive any Advice from them, which they thought wou'd be ſuitable to the miſerable and diſtracted Condition of the Kingdom; in preſenting of which, they ſhou'd uſe all that Parliamentary Freedom, which wou'd be due to them if they were with him at Weſtminſter, and which, with all other Privileges, they ſhou'd enjoy at Oxford, tho' they cou'd not in the other Place;' and us'd many Expreſſions of Grace towards them, and Confidence in them.

As ſoon as they had withdrawn to their Places, the Lords to the upper Schools, and the Commons to the Convocation Houſe, both Lords and Commons enter'd upon the Deliberation of all poſſible Expedients in order to Peace; but how to advance to any Formality, that might produce a Diſpoſition to Intercourſe, appear'd very difficult. When they thought of adviſing the King to ſend a gracious Meſſage and Overture to the Houſes, they ſoon remember'd what he had already done that Way, and what Returns they had made to him: That to the two laſt Meſſages he had ſent, they had never return'd Anſwer, and that they ſtill detain'd his laſt Meſſenger in Cuſtody, after they had expos'd him to a Tryal for his Life at a Court of War: That they had prohibited any Kind of Addreſs to be made to them from his Majeſty, except through the Hands of the Earl of Eſſex their General. From hence, they enter'd upon the Diſquiſition, how they might engage his Excellency to the ſame Thoughts and Deſires with them; to which they eaſily believ'd Experience, Obſervation, and Intereſt, wou'd oblige him; and therefore they reſolv'd to write a Letter to the Earl in their own Names, which, with the King's Conſent, was by a Trumpet ſent to him, within four Days after their Meeting, and was to this Effect.

The Letter of both Houſes to the Earl of Eſſex.

'My Lord, His Majeſty having by his Proclamation ſummon'd all the Members of both Houſes of Parliament to attend him here at Oxford, inviting us by theſe gracious Expreſſions: That his Subjects ſhou'd ſee how willing He was to receive Advice for the Preſervation of the Religion, Laws and Safety of the Kingdom; and as far as in Him lay to reſtore its former Peace and Security, his chief and only End, from thoſe whom they had truſted, tho' he cou'd not receive it in the Place where he appointed: All which has been made good to us, and ſeconded with ſuch unqueſtionable Demonſtrations of his Princely Senſe of the Calamities of his poor Subjects in this unnatural War, and his Paſſionate Affection to redeem them from that deplorable Condition by all Ways conſiſtent with his Honour, and Safety of the Kingdom, &c. We being intirely ſatisfy'd of this Truth, and ſenſible of the Deſolations of our Country, and further Dangers threatned from Scotland; and being deſirous to believe your Lordſhip, however engag'd, ſenſibly touch'd with theſe Conſiderations, do invite you to that Part in this bleſſed Work, which is only capable of repairing all our Miſeries, and buoying up the Kingdom from Ruin. We therefore conjure you by all the Obligations of Honour, Conſcience, or Publick Piety, to co-operate with us to its Preſervation, by truly repreſenting to, and promoting with thoſe by whom you are truſted, this our Deſire: That they joining with us, ſome Perſons be appointed on either Part to treat of ſuch a Peace as may redeem it from the Brink of Deſolation. This Addreſs we make, being aſſur'd by his Proclamation of Pardon, that his Mercy and Clemency can tranſcend all former Provocations; and that he has not only made us Witneſſes of his Intentions, but honour'd us alſo with the Name of being Security for them.'

164$\frac{3}{4}$. Car. 19.

This Letter was ſubſcrib'd by his Highneſs the Prince, the Duke of York, Prince Rupert lately made Duke of Cumberland, and two and forty Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, Viſcounts and Barons, with a hundred and eighteen Members of the Houſe of Commons; there being ſuch Expedition us'd in the Diſpatch, that it was not thought fit to be deferr'd for a greater Subſcription; tho' it was known that many Lords and Commoners were upon the Way, who arriv'd within a few Days; and there were at that Time near twenty Peers abſent with his Majeſty's Leave, and employ'd in his Affairs and Armies in the Kingdom, and ten at the ſame time beyond the Seas. Some were alſo under Confinement, ſo that there were no leſs than eighty two Peers abſent from the Parliament at Weſtminſter, which made the Numbers at that Place very thin: For there were not above twenty two Lords, who either ſat in the Parliament, or were ingag'd in their Party; namely, the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Eſſex, Kent, Lincoln, Rutland, Saliſbury, Suffolk, Warwick, Mancheſter, Mulgrave, Denbigh, Stamford, and Bullingbrook; the Lords Say, Dacres, Wharton, Grey of Wark, Willoughby of Parham, Howard of Eſcrick, Rochfort, and Roberts, who were preſent, or had Proxies there.

The Earl of Eſſex's Anſwer to it.

3. The Trumpeter found the Earl of Eſſex at his Houſe at London, where he was detain'd three or four Days; and the firſt Effect of the healing Letter, was to have it cry'd throughout the Streets of London in Scorn, as The Petition of the Prince and Duke of York for Peace. The Earl having conſulted the ſecret Committee, which was choſen out of both Houſes and ſome of the Scotch Nation, return'd this Anſwer to the Earl of Forth, the King's General: 'My Lord, I receiv'd this Day a Letter of the 29th Inſtant, from your Lordſhip, and a Parchment ſubſcrib'd by the Prince, Duke of York, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen; but it neither having Addreſs to the two Houſes of Parliament, nor therein there being any Acknowledgment of them, I could not communicate it to them. My Lord, the Maintenance of the Parliament of England, and of the Privileges thereof, is that for which we are all reſolv'd to ſpend our Blood; as being the Foundation whereupon all our Laws and Liberties are built. I ſend your Lordſhip herewith a National Covenant, ſolemnly enter'd into by both the Kingdoms of England and Scotland, and a Declaration paſs'd by them both together, with another Declaration of the Kingdom of Scotland.

A Declaration of both Kingdoms.

We have already given an Account of the National Covenant, and Declaration of Scotland, and ſhall now take ſome Notice of the Declaration of both Kingdoms, paſs'd about the Time that this very Overture of Peace came from Oxford. It conſiſted much of the ſame Strain of Inſpiration with the Scotch Declaration, and talk'd, 'How clearly the Light of the Goſpel ſhin'd amongſt them; that they plac'd not their Confidence in their own Counſels and Strength, but in God Almighty, the Lord of Hoſts, who wou'd not leave nor forſake his People. It was his own Truth and Cauſe, againſt the Hereſie, Superſtition and Tyranny of Anti-Chriſt; the Glory of his Name, the Exaltation of the Kingdom of his Son, and the Preſervation of his Church was their Aim and End. It was His Covenant, which they had ſolemnly ſworn in both Nations, which he wou'd not have put in their Hearts to do, if he had been minded to deſtroy them. Upon theſe Conſiderations, being confident that this War was of God, they reſolv'd with Courage and Conſtancy to perſevere to the End; and the Lord, who had ſtirr'd up their Spirits, diſplay'd his Banner before them, and given the Allarm, do that which ſeemeth him good. They therefore gave publick Warning to all Men to reſt no longer upon their Neutrality, or Indifferency; but ſpeedily to take the Covenant, and join, with all their Power, in this Cauſe againſt the common Enemy; and by their Zeal to make up what had been wanting through their Lukewarmneſs; otherwiſe they did declare them Publick Enemies to their Religion and Country, and that they were to be puniſh'd as profeſs'd Adverſaries and Malignants. Then they offer'd Pardon to all who ſhou'd deſert the King, adhere to them, and take the Covenant; and concluded, That they made not that Declaration, from any Preſumption or Vain-glorying in the Strength of their Armies, but from the Senſe of their Duty, requir'd from the high Places and publick Relations wherein they ſtood, and from the Aſſurance they had of the Aſſiſtance of God, 164¾. Car. 19.

'by whoſe Providence the Truſt and Safety of thoſe Kingdoms was now put into their Hands; having, after long and grave Conſultation, reſolv'd and decreed never to lay down Arms, till Truth and Peace, by the Bleſſing of God, be ſettled in this Iſland; which, they ſaid, wou'd be eſteem'd of them an abundant Reward of all they cou'd do, or ſuffer in that Cauſe.

Reflections upon it, &c.

This, and the other Declaration of Scotland, will adminiſter ſufficient Occaſion for Cenſure and Reflection; and will ſhew the Power of Enthuſiaſtical Deluſions; that when Men have wantonly broken looſe from all ſettled Rules of Religion, and Obedience to Authority, how ſoon they are captivated by a profane and preſumptuous Entituling themſelves to God's Favour, and uſing his ſacred Name to the Scandal and Amazement of all ſober Chriſtians. As for the Earl of Eſſex, who ſent theſe Declarations and Covenant, by way of Anſwer to an excellent Letter, that might have been the happy Foundation of an Accommodation, it has been juſtly obſerv'd, that after that Time, and the many Laurels he had reap'd, he never perform'd any one proſperous Action, but prov'd unfortunate in all he went about, even to the Day of his Death.

4. This Anſwer was receiv'd with great Indignation at Oxford, but being ſo much in the popular Road, it was thought fit again to let the World ſee, That they did in direct Terms refuſe to admit of any Peace. So the Earl of Forth was adviſ'd to write again to the other General, for a ſafe Conduct for two unexceptionable Gentlemen, to and from Weſtminſter, to be ſent by the King concerning a Treaty of Peace. To this the Earl of Eſſex return'd Anſwer, 'That whenſoever he ſhou'd receive any Directions to thoſe who had entruſted him, he ſhou'd uſe his beſt Endeavours; and when a ſafe Conduct ſhou'd be deſir'd for thoſe Gentlemen, from his Majeſty to the Houſes of Parliament, he wou'd ſhew his Willingneſs to further any Way that might produce that Happineſs, that honeſt Men pray'd for.' This Intimation of his Reſolution of interpoſing, if he had a Letter from the King to the Houſes of Parliament, perſwaded many, that the Earl only wanted an Opportunity to poſſeſs the Houſes with the Overture, and if it were once fairly lodg'd within the Walls, there were ſo many well affected to Peace, that the Propoſition wou'd not be rejected. And therefore at the ſame Time, making all poſſible Preparations for the Field, his Majeſty, with little Expectations of Succeſs, was prevail'd with to ſend the enſuing Meſſage on the third of March, and encloſ'd to the Earl of Eſſex: 'Out of our moſt tender and pious Senſe of the ſad and bleeding Condition of this our Kingdom, and our unwearied Deſires to apply all Remedies, which, by the Bleſſing of God, may recover it from an utter Ruin, by the Advice of the Lords and Commons of Parliament aſſembled at Oxford, We do propound and deſire, That a convenient Number of fit Perſons may be appointed and authoriz'd by you, to meet, with all convenient Speed, at ſuch a Place as you ſhall nominate, with an equal Number of fit Perſons whom we ſhall appoint and authorize, to treat of the Ways and Means to ſettle the preſent Diſtractions of this our Kingdom, and to procure a happy Peace: And particularly, how all the Members of both Houſes may ſecurely meet in a full and free Convention of Parliament, there to treat, conſult, and agree upon ſuch Things, as may conduce to the Maintenance and Defence of the true reformed Proteſtant Religion, &c.

The King's Meſſage to the Houſes at Weſtminſter.

This Meſſage, being ſign'd by the King, was ſuperſcrib'd To the Lords and Commons of Parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter; which occaſion'd ſeveral Debates in both Houſes, in which Mr. Whitelock in a Speech has theſe Expreſſions.----

Mr. Whitelock's Speech upon it.

'God hath given you great Succeſſes in many Places againſt our Enemies, and ſometimes he is pleas'd to give our Enemies Succeſſes againſt us; in all of them, whether of the one or the other Party, the poor Engliſh are ſtill Sufferers. Whoſe Goods are plunder'd? whoſe Houſes are burnt? whoſe Limbs are cut or ſhot off? whoſe Perſons are thrown into loathſome Dungeons? whoſe Blood ſtains the Walls of our Towns, and defiles the Land? Is it not all Engliſh? And is it not then Time for us, who are all Engliſhmen, to uſe our utmoſt Endeavours to put an End to theſe Diſcords? I know, Sir, you are all here of the ſame Opinion in this Point; and that it was an unhappy Miſtake of thoſe who told us in the Beginning of our Warfare, That it wou'd be only to ſhew our ſelves in the Field with a few Forces, and then all wou'd be preſently ended. We have found it otherwiſe; let us now again ſeek to recover theſe Bleſſings of Peace.------ I am perſwaded you can hardly name any Committee, either within or without theſe Walls, but wou'd be ready to take Pains to effect this good Work; unleſs it were thoſe who have ſaid, That if this War be well manag'd, it may laſt twenty Years. But theſe were not Engliſhmen: And although we have Iriſh, French, Dutch and Walloons, as well as other Papiſts, ingag'd for the Settlement of the Proteſtant Religion, and Laws of England; yet I am perſwaded, that his Majeſty and you, mutually indeavouring, none can hinder it. It is true, that theſe Foreigners help to open the Veins wider; but a Peace will rid us of them, and ſtop the Iſſue of Blood; but if it bleed on ſtill, we muſt faint, and perhaps become a Prey to Foreigners.

164¾. Car. 19.

This had no Effect; but after two or three Days Debates, and with the Scotch Commiſſioners, without whoſe Concurrence nothing was tranſacted, they return'd an Anſwer, in which they declare as following: 'That as we have uſ'd all Means for a juſt and ſafe Peace, ſo will we never be wanting to do our utmoſt for the procuring thereof: But when we conſider the Expreſſions in that Letter of your Majeſty's, we have more ſad and deſpairing Thoughts of attaining the ſame than ever; becauſe thereby, thoſe Perſons now aſſembled at Oxford, who contrary to their Duty have deſerted your Parliament, are put into an equal Condition with it. And this preſent Parliament, conven'd according to the known and fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, the Continuance whereof is eſtabliſh'd by a Law conſented to by your Majeſty, is in Effect deny'd to be a Parliament; the Scope and Intention of that Letter being to make Proviſion, how all the Members, as is pretended, of both Houſes, may ſecurely meet in a full and free Convention of Parliament; whereof no other Concluſion can be made, but that this preſent Parliament is not a full, nor free Convention; and that to make it ſo, the Preſence of thoſe is neceſſary, who notwithſtanding that they have deſerted that great Truſt, and do levy War againſt the Parliament, are pretended to be Members of the two Houſes of Parliament. And hereupon we think our ſelves bound to let your Majeſty know, that ſeeing the Continuance of this Parliament is ſettled by a Law (which as other Laws of your Kingdom, your Majeſty hath ſworn to maintain, as we are ſworn to our Allegiance to your Majeſty, theſe Obligations being reciprocal) we muſt in Duty, and accordingly are reſolv'd, with our Lives and Fortunes, to defend and preſerve the juſt Rights and full Power of This Parliament: And do beſeech your Majeſty to be aſſur'd, That your Majeſty's Royal and hearty Concurrence with us herein, will be the moſt effectual and ready Means of procuring a firm and laſting Peace, and begetting a perfect Underſtanding between your Majeſty and your People: Without which, your Majeſty's moſt earneſt Profeſſions, and our moſt real Intentions concerning the ſame, muſt neceſſarily be fruſtrated. And in Caſe your Majeſty's three Kingdoms ſhou'd, by reaſon thereof, remain in this ſad and bleeding Condition, tending by the Continuance of this unnatural War, to their Ruin, your Majeſty cannot be the leaſt, nor the laſt Sufferer.' Then they conclude with propoſing to him, as the laſt Remedy, 'To follow the joint Advice of Both Kingdoms, now happily united in this Cauſe by their late ſolemn League and Covenant.

The Anſwer of the two Houſes to it.

5. All Hopes of Accommodation being at an End, Mony for carrying on the War was one main Conſideration at Oxford, where the Members of the Commons were appointed to bring in the Names of all the Gentlemen of Eſtate, and other Perſons reputed to be rich, within their ſeveral Precincts, and what Sums they might be able to furniſh the King in this Exigency. And then a Form of a Letter was drawn up, which ſhou'd be ſent to every one of them, for ſuch a Sum to be lent; the Letter to be ſubſcrib'd by the two Speakers of the Houſes, that People might know, it was by the Advice of the Members of Parliament aſſembled there. When this Way and Method was approv'd by the Lords, and had his Majeſty's Conſent to it, they, for an Example, began with themſelves, and caus'd Letters to be ſign'd and deliver'd to the ſeveral Members of both Houſes, for ſuch Sums as they were diſpoſ'd to furniſh; which were to that Proportion as gave good Encouragement to others; and ſent the like Letters to all Perſons of Condition who were in the Town. By which a Supply was rais'd in Money and Credit, as ſerv'd many neceſſary Occaſions; there being near a hundred thouſand Pounds, whereof ſome came in every Day, to enable the King to provide for the next Campaign. And becauſe the two Houſes at Weſtminſter had laid an Impoſition, which they call'd an Exciſe upon Wine, Beer, Ale, and other Commodities, this Pattern was conſider'd by the Members at Oxford, and judg'd a good Expedient to be follow'd by the King; and accordingly it was ſettled, govern'd and regulated by Commiſſioners, in the ſame Method it was done at London. So that at Oxford, Briſtol, and other Garriſons, it yielded a reaſonable Supply for the Proviſion of Arms and Ammunition: But both Sides made ample Declarations, with bitter Reproaches upon the Neceſſity that drew on this Impoſition, 'That it ſhou'd be continu'd no longer than to the End of this War, and then laid down, and utterly aboliſh'd;' which few wiſe Men believ'd would ever happen.

Their ſeveral Reſolutions.

The violent Proceedings at Weſtminſter made no Impreſſion upon the Allegiance or Courage of thoſe at Oxford; who when they found the other ſo incredibly averſe to Peace, and intending utter Ruin to the King, the Church, and the Friends to both, they reſolv'd as freely to declare their Reſolutions, that the People might ſee the Iſſue they were at. Accordingly they declar'd and reſolv'd, with ſcarce one diſſenting Voice, 1. 'That all ſuch Subjects of Scotland as had conſented to the Declaration of the Kingdom of Scotland, &c. had thereby denounc'd War againſt the Kingdom of England, and broke the Act of Pacification. 2. That all his Majeſty's Subjects of the Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales, are both by their Allegiance, and the Act of Pacification, bound to reſiſt all thoſe of Scotland as had or ſhou'd enter upon any Part of his Majeſty's Realm and Dominions, as Traytors and Enemies to the State; and that whoſoever ſhould aid, abet, or aſſiſt the Scots in their Invaſion, ſhould be deem'd as Traytors and Enemies to the State. 3. That the Lords and Commons remaining in Weſtminſter, that had conſented to the raiſing of Forces under the Command of the Earl of Eſſex, or had been abetting, or aſſiſting thereto, had levy'd and rais'd War againſt the King, and were therein Guilty of High-Treaſon. 4. That thoſe Lords and Commons remaining in Weſtminſter, who had conſented to the making and uſing a new Great Seal, had thereby counterfeited the King's Great Seal, and therein committed High-Treaſon. 5. That the Lords and Commons remaining in Weſtminſter, who had conſented to the preſent coming in of the Scots in a warlike Manner, had therein committed High-Treaſon: And that in theſe in three laſt Crimes, they had broken the Truſt repos'd in them by their Country, and ought to be proceeded againſt as Traytors to their King and Country. 6. That all the Endeavours and Offers of Peace and Treaty, made by his Majeſty, by the Advice of the Lords and Commons aſſembled at Oxford, have been refus'd and rejected by the Lords and Commons remaining at Weſtminſter.

Their two Declarations

Theſe Reſolutions were compleated on the 12th Day of March; about which time they publiſh'd two long Declarations, of the Grounds and Motives which had forc'd them to leave the Parliament at Weſtminſter; 'In which they Hiſtorically mention'd all the indirect Paſſages, and vile Practices, by which they had been driven thence; the Obligations in Law and Conſcience, to adhere to his Majeſty; and the Miſery which the other Party had already brought upon the Kingdom, and the Deſolation which muſt inevitably follow thoſe Proceedings: And in one of them they conclude, That whoever now conſiders how many have retir'd themſelves from ſeveral Counties, and ſo are abſent from Weſtminſter, and yet cannot without Danger be preſent at Oxford; how many have withdrawn themſelves unto the Parts beyond the Seas; how many of their own principal Inſtruments are voted out of the Houſe by themſelves, as Sir John Hotham, and his Son, Sir Alexander Carew, Mr. Martin, Mr. Fiennes, and many others; how many now are impriſon'd by them; how many Members from the Beginning have been factiouſly kept from the Houſe, upon Queſtions of Election; and how many without any Colour are kept in, by not ſuffering their Elections to be reported; and that there are Thirty Five Members dead, into whoſe Rooms no new Perſons are choſen; how many ſince are become Barons by Deſcent, or Creation, will eaſily conclude how ſmall the Number is which remains, and of thoſe how Few in Truth have Right to ſit there.

The Fight at Alsford.

6. By this Time both Parties had taken the Field in the South, as well as the North, tho' not with their full intended Force. The Lord Hopton, in this hard Winter, by good Management took the ſtrong Caſtle of Arundel in Suſſex; but for want of Unanimity in the Garriſon, it was not long after retaken by Sir William Waller, to the great Diſappointment of the Lord Hopton's Deſigns. This at length occaſion'd a ſharp Encounter between theſe two valiant Commanders at Cheryton-Down near Alsford, not far from Wincheſter; in which Sir William had really the Advantage. The King's Forces conſiſted of about Five Thouſand Foot, and Three Thouſand Horſe; the Parliament Forces were ſomewhat ſuperior; and tho' their Succeſs that Day was rather accompany'd with Marks of Victory, than any real Proofs of it, yet it was of ſo great Advantage to them, that it neceſſitated the King to alter the whole Scheme of his Affairs, and inſtead of an offenſive, to make a defenſive War. The King's Horſe never behav'd themſelves ſo ill, as this Day; yet the Lord Hopton ſecur'd all the Cannon and Ammunition, and that Night retir'd ſafely to Reading. This is call'd the Battel or Fight of Alsford, or Cheryton-Down, which was fought on the 29th Day of March; in which the King loſt two brave Officers, the Lord John Stuart, Brother to the Duke of Richmond, and General of the Horſe; and Sir John Smith, Brother to the Lord Carrington, and Commiſſary-General of the Horſe. The former was a young Gentleman of extraordinary Hopes, little more than Twenty One Years of Age; who being naturally more warm and rough than the other Branches of that Illuſtrious Family, was not delighted with the Softneſſes of the Court, but had before dedicated himſelf to the Profeſſion of Arms; in which he ſo much ſignaliz'd his Courage, eſpecially this Day, that he dy'd univerſally lamented. The other, Sir John Smith, had been train'd up from his Youth in the Wars of Flanders, betook himſelf in the Beginning to the Service of his Prince, by whom he was made Knight Banneret at Edge-Hill, and perform'd many noble Actions of Bravery.

The Death of the Lord John Stuart, and Sir John Smith

Preparations on both Sides

On the other Side, Sir William Waller's Forces were ſo ſhatter'd, that tho' they kept the Field and committed ſome Ravages, they could not purſue their Deſign upon the Weſt, but Sir William was forc'd, for Recruits, to repair himſelf to London; where, on the 9th of April, the two Houſes ſolemniz'd a Thankſgiving for the Victory; and on the ſame Day took Advantage of that Joy to ſend a Committee of Lords and Commons to Guild-Hall, who in ſet Speeches drew in the Citizens to advance Men and Mony for the Cauſe, which, they ſaid, God had ſo proſper'd. The King, in ſome Perplexity, left Oxford for two or three Days, and muſtering his Forces near Marleborough, after all Loſſes, found them to amount to Six Thouſand Foot, and above Four Thouſand Horſe: There it was reſolv'd, That all Opportunities ſhould be taken ſpeedily to fight with Waller's Forces; both to prevent their going into the Weſt, and to regain the Reputation the King's Forces had loſt at Alsford, as well as to hinder new Recruits from London. Being return'd to Oxford, the King found it moſt convenient to prepare Himſelf to take the Field; the two Houſes at London being very buſy in recruiting the Earl of Eſſex's old Army, and in effect in raiſing a new One for their Favourite Waller, out of the Train'd-Bands and Auxiliaries of the City, and neighbouring Counties; Eſſex, with his Army, being deſign'd to take Oxford, and the other to conquer the Weſt; for both theſe they had already ſwallow'd in their Imagination. Theſe Reports, and the ill Aſpect in the North, made the Queen ſo very uneaſy, that being great with Child, ſhe left Oxford, and retir'd to Exeter, to be deliver'd in that City.

The Oxford Parliament's Petition.

At the ſame Time the Lords and Commons at Oxford deſir'd a Receſs from their Parliamentary Attendance: In order to which, they preſented a Petition to his Majeſty, wherein, To ſatisfy all the World, or leave them inexcuſable that will not be ſatisfy'd, they humbly deſire, '1. That his Majeſty will give Directions for the Reprinting his Proteſtation made in the Head of his Army, and his other Declarations for maintaining the Proteſtant Religion. 2. That when there may be a full and free Convention of Parliament, a National Synod may be lawfully call'd, with a Care for the Eaſe of Tender Conſciences. 3. To ſatisfy his Subjects againſt the falſe and malicious Aſperſions, That if his Majeſty prevails, he intends not to uſe the frequent Council of Parliaments. 4. To declare, that the preſent Contributions, Loans and Taxes, ſhall not be drawn into Example. 5. That the Contracts for Contribution may be juſtly obſerv'd, without free Quarter, or other Grievance. And laſtly, That his Majeſty will retain his pious Endeavours to procure the Peace of this languiſhing Kingdom, not to be remov'd or alter'd by Advantages or proſperous Succeſs.' To which his Majeſty gave in Writing a full and compleat Anſwer, and promis'd them exactly to obſerve their ſeveral Petitions, concluding in theſe Words; 'Laſtly, As the Support and Maintenance of the Religion, Laws, and Privileges of Parliament, is (as you well know) the only Argument of our Defenſive Arms; ſo thoſe being ſecur'd, we ſhall with all imaginable Joy lay down thoſe Arms: And as you have been our Witneſſes and Aſſiſtants, in our Deſire of Peace; ſo we promiſe you, we ſhall not only with the ſame Earneſtneſs always embrace it, if it ſhall be offer'd, but purſue and preſs it, upon the leaſt likelyhood of Opportunity; and this our Reſolution, by God's Bleſſing, ſhall never be alter'd by any Advantages, or proſperous Succeſs.'

The King's Anſwer.

He diſmiſſes them with a Speech.

And the next Day, being the 16th of April, the King diſmiſs'd the whole Aſſembly with an obliging Speech; wherein he aſſur'd them, That he could not ſo ſoon have parted with them, if they themſelves had not deſir'd it, out of Zeal and Affection to Him, and his Country. He heartily thank'd them for what they had done, and fully approv'd of what they deſir'd. And becauſe moſt of them were engag'd in his Service, either in a Civil, or a Martial Way, he gave them Directions how to be moſt ſerviceable to him in their reſpective Stations; ending thus: ‘To ‘conclude, my Lords and Gentlemen, I do now again ‘(yet never enough) thank you for your great and unanimous Expreſſions of your Affections to Me, which hath ‘laid an unexpreſſible Obligation upon Me: And be aſſur'd, That there is no Profeſſion, which I have made ‘for the Defence and Maintenance of our Religion, Laws ‘and Liberties, which I will not inviolably obſerve. Now ‘God, who hath bleſſed this Meeting with unexpected ‘Unanimity, (which I eſteem as one not of his leaſt Bleſſings) will, I hope, bring us all ſafe together upon the ‘Eighth Day of October next. In the mean Time I ſhall ‘be ready to receive any Thing from your Committees ‘that ſhall be deſir'd.’ Thus the Oxford Parliament broke up, after it had ſat about Eleven Weeks; which exceeded that other at Weſtminſter both in Number and Figure, and yet did the King and the Nation no great Service: One Reaſon ſeem'd to be, That they were afraid of War and Victory, too inclinable to Peace and Treaty, and not complying enough to vote the Houſes at Weſtminſter to be no Parliament; for which probably they were afterwards call'd by the King, in one of his private Letters to the Queen, His Mungrel Parliament. It is believ'd, that if inſtead of Papers and Propoſals, they had unanimouſly took the Field, and exerted all their Strength for one or two deciſive Blows, they could not have fail'd, humanly ſpeaking, of bringing the other Parliament and Army to much better Terms of Accommodation, than thoſe which by ineffectual Letters and Meſſages they offer'd to them.

Of the Armies in the North.

III. 1. While the Oxford Parliament was ſitting, the Forces in all Parts began to be in Motion, in order to contend for Superiority, and to bring about thoſe bloody Scenes that ſo much diſhonour'd the preſent Year. For the clearer Underſtanding of which, we are ſeparately to take notice of the main Armies; thoſe in the North, under Prince Rupert, the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle, the Earl of Leven, &c. and thoſe in the Weſt, under the King, the Earl of Eſſex, and Sir William Waller. To begin with the Northern Armies; the two Houſes at Weſtminſter knowing that a Defeat of the Scots wou'd be the Ruin of their whole Cauſe, were extreamly ſollicitous for their ſafe Progreſs; and finding the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle to be able to moleſt, and keep them at Bay in the Biſhoprick of Durham, by their Advice the Committee of both Kingdoms, in March, wrote a Letter to the Lord Fairfax ‘To joyn with his Son Sir Thomas Fairfax, and ſo with ‘joynt Forces to keep Intelligence with the Scottiſh Army, ‘and give them the beſt Accommodation and Aſſiſtance ‘they cou'd.’ Accordingly the active Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had been beſieging the Counteſs of Darby in Lathom-Houſe, left Sir William Fairfax, and others, to continue that Siege, and march'd into Yorkſhire with near two Thouſand Horſe.

Sir T. Fairfax's Victory at Selby.

In the mean Time Colonel Bellaſis, Governor of York for the King, was not idle, but drew all his Forces to Selby, to hinder, if poſſible, the Conjunction of the two Fairfaxes; but they joyn'd, notwithſtanding all his Endeavours, and ſoon after fell bravely upon Colonel Bellaſis and his Forces lying at Selby, and obtain'd a compleat Victory over them, on the eleventh Day of April; took the Colonel himſelf Priſoner, many Officers, ſixteen Hundred Soldiers, four Pieces of Cannon, two Thouſand Arms, and above five Hundred Horſe. For which the two Houſes at Weſtminſter appointed a Solemn Thankſgiving on the twenty third Day of April. This Victory gain'd young Fairfax a great Reputation, and put them in great Fear and Diſtraction at York; ſo that they ſpeedily ſent to the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle to haſten to that City, believing that the Victors wou'd in a ſhort Time make an Attempt upon it.

York beſieg'd by three Armies.

The Marqueſs of Newcaſtle now finding that he ſhou'd be kept between two Armies, was reſolv'd to prevent that Danger by marching back to York, to make the better Defence of that important Place; leaving the Scots, who with Cold, and frequent Allarms, had been reduc'd to great Extremity. The Scots followed after him with a double Pleaſure, of ſeeming to purſue their Enemies, and haſtning to joyn their Friends, and accordingly on the twentieth of April they joyn'd with the Engliſh Army under the Lord Fairfax and his Son, and immediately advanc'd to York, and ſhut up the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle, who had juſt enter'd that City, and defended it with great Gallantry for about nine Weeks againſt the united Armies; which on the third of June were further reinforc'd by a very conſiderable Body under the Earl of Mancheſter, who having appear'd before the City of Lincoln, took that Place on the ſixth of May, with Sir Francis Fane the Governor, and ſeven hundred Soldiers, and after that march'd on to the Siege of York without Oppoſition. So that this City was inveſted by three Armies and Generals at once, the Earl of Leven, the Lord Fairfax, and the Earl of Mancheſter; who, with their Forces, ſoon fell into ſuch Diviſions among themſelves, as might have been of ſingular Advantage, if they had been rightly cultivated by the King's Party.

2. Under this Preſſure, the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle and his Garriſon of York depended upon no Hopes of Relief but from Prince Rupert; and notwithſtanding the former Averſion he had to ſerve under him, the Marqueſs wrote to the King, ‘That he hop'd his Majeſty did believe, that ‘he wou'd never make the leaſt Scruple to obey the Grand-‘Child of King James.’ The King being ſollicitous for the Safety of ſo great a Man, and ſo good an Army, order'd Prince Rupert with a numerous Force to march to his Relief. That Prince having with his uſual Intrepidity reliev'd Newark, as is formerly mention'd, march'd North-Weſt into Shropſhire, and took in the Garriſons of Longford near Newport, and of Stopnorth in Cheſhire, and then reliev'd the Heroick Counteſs of Darby in Lathom-Houſe, after ſhe had been long beſieg'd. Bolton daring to defend it ſelf, was ſtorm'd at the ſecond Attack, with the Slaughter of eight Hundred of their Garriſon, moſt of them Townſmen; for relying upon their Numbers and Works, they had not only abus'd the Prince by ſcurrilous Language, but are ſaid to have hang'd one of his Captains they had taken, which occaſion'd this uncommon Severity. This was in the latter End of May; and in the Beginning of June his Highneſs took Leverpool in Lancaſhire, a Town of great Importance and Convenience for landing of Forces from Ireland; and then directed his March with all Expedition to York, where the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle was brought to a Treaty, and to Propoſitions of Surrendering. But on the News of Prince Rupert's Advance, the three Generals, Leven, Fairfax and Mancheſter ingloriouſly rais'd the Siege, and retired, hoping to intercept the Prince in his Way; but he declin'd engaging, and ſafely enter'd York, to the great Joy of that long-diſtreſſed Place.

They quit the Siege.

Prince Rupert reſolves to fight them

The Beſieged, upon the Enemies drawing off, did ſome conſiderable Execution upon their Rear; but being reliev'd and ſecure, had no Inclination to try the preſent Fortune of the War any farther. They had been weary'd with a tedious Siege of nine Weeks; and reaſonably ſuppoſing their Deliverers were alſo tired with their long March, thought it better to leave the Enemy to waſte themſelves with their own Diſſentions, than to occaſion their Uniting, by ſo hazardous an Adventure. But the Prince, warm by Nature, and elevated by Succeſs, reſolv'd to make an Attempt; and not thinking he had done enough in relieving the City if he did not alſo defeat the Scots, the only Obſtacle to the King's Victories, without further Conſultation march'd after the Enemy, and found them drawn up in a Corn Field on the South Side of Marſton-Moor, four Miles from York. Their three Armies, contracted into one, conſiſting of five or ſix and twenty Thouſand Men, was commanded by the three Generals. The two Fairfaxes, Father and Son, had the Right Wing; the Earl of Mancheſter the Left, and the Earl of Leven the Main Body, conſiſting all of Scots; and each Diviſion had his diſtinct Auxiliaries and Reſerves. Prince Rupert, at the Head of near four and twenty Thouſand Men, obſerving the Adverſaries Order, drew up alſo his Army in Battalia; and, reſerving to Himſelf the Left Wing, gave the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle the Right, and entruſted the Command of the Main Battle to Goring, Lucas and Porter. The Field Word given by the Prince was God and the King, and that by the other Party, God with Us; and thus appear'd a threatning Storm of Blood, upon Tueſday the ſecond Day of July.

BATTLE III. at Marſton-Moor.

The great Guns on both Sides began to play about three in the Afternoon, but the Forces did not intirely joyn till ſeven at Night; and as no Field ſince theſe unhappy Wars did produce ſuch numerous Armies, ſo none fought with keener Valour, or more deſperate Courage. Prince Rupert charg'd the Fairfaxes with ſo much Fury and Reſolution, that he broke them, and the Scots their Reſerves; but, to his own Ruin, purſu'd them too far; according to his uſual Fate. The King's Main Battle did alſo repel the Scots; but Affairs ſucceeded otherwiſe in the Right: The Mancheſterians having routed the Royaliſts, and not following them too far, fell upon the Prince's and Goring's diſorder'd Troops, hinder'd them from rallying, and quite diſpers'd them. It is affirm'd that the three Parliament Generals were beaten out of the Field, and Leven, after ten Miles Flight, taken by a Conſtable; ſo that the Honour of the Day fell to Cromwell, Mancheſter's Lieutenant-General, who keeping his great Reſerve of Horſe in a firm Body, followed the Cavaliers ſo cloſe, that he prevented their Embodying, and routed them. The Battle laſted three Hours, till Ten at Night, with great Courage and Slaughter on both Sides; tho' the Victory fell to the Parliamentarians, when they leaſt expected it, as alſo the Cannon and Spoil of the Field. There were two of the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle's Regiments, call'd his Lambs, who being old Soldiers, fell not unreveng'd; for the reſt being fled, by caſting Themſelves into a Ring, did alone reſiſt Cromwell's well's Aſſaults: And tho' they were abandon'd by their Friends, and ſurrounded by their Enemies, they cou'd not be broke, till being ſhot at like Fowls at diſtance, were overwhelm'd with Showers of Bullets; and then not expiring without Slaughter of their Enemies, ſcarce any of theſe miſerable Bravos eſcaped, tho' worthy of a better Fortune. The Number of the Slain were computed at eight Thouſand, tho' Writers differ as to that, and other Particulars. Almoſt all agree as to the Reputation gain'd by Cromwell, but Hollis in his Memoirs denies he had any Part in the Buſineſs, and ſays he in a cowardly Manner retir'd out of the Field, under a Pretence of a Wound, and left the Management, and the Honour of the Fight to Major-General Crawford, a brave Officer under the Earl of Mancheſter.

The ſudden Parting of Prince Rupert and the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle.

The unhappy Attempt of this Battle was immediately ſucceeded by a more unhappy Miſmanagement; which was the ſudden and unaccountable Departure of the King's two Generals, Prince Rupert and the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle, who without any Deliberation left York, and in effect the whole North, to the Mercy of Thoſe, whom they might have wearied out and waſted, if not entirely worſted. For as ſoon as they were refreſh'd with a little Sleep, they almoſt at the ſame Time ſent a Meſſage to each other; the Prince, That he was reſolv'd that Morning to march away with his Horſe, and as many Foot as he had left; and the Marqueſs, That he wou'd in that Inſtant repair to the Coaſts, and tranſport himſelf beyond the Seas; both which they immediately perform'd, to the great Surpriſe both of Friends and Enemies. The Marqueſs, irrecoverably tired and diſcourag'd, haſtned to Scarborough, where in a poor Veſſel he embarqued Himſelf, with his two Sons and Brother, Dr. Bramhall Biſhop of Londonderry, the Lord Falconbridge, the Lord Widdrington, and ſome others, and in four Days Time arriv'd at Hamburgh; and the Marqueſs never ſaw England till ſixteen Years after, at the Reſtoration of King Charles the Second. Prince Rupert with as much Precipitation march'd his Army towards Cheſter; and it is obſervable that thoſe Troops never after did any conſiderable Service to the King, but gradually moulder'd away, and the Officers were kill'd upon beating up of Quarters, and little Actions, inferior to their Quality and Merit. Many Priſoners were taken on the King's Side, as Lieutenant-General Lucas, Major-General Porter, Major-General Tilyard, and the Lord Goring's Son; and ſeveral Perſons of Note ſlain, as the Lord Cary, eldeſt Son to the Earl of Monmouth, and Sir Thomas Methum. On the other Side was kill'd the Lord Diddup a Scotch Lord, obſervable for this, that when it was told the King, That ſuch a Lord was ſlain on the Parliament's Side, he anſwer'd, He had forgot there was ſuch a Lord in Scotland: To which was reply'd, That his Majeſty might well do ſo, ſince the Lord had forgot he had ſuch a King in England.

The Latter leaves the Nation.

3. The Diſſentions among the Northern Generals were very conſiderable both before and after the Battle; and the Scots diſcours'd very much of their returning to their own Country, where the Earl, now Marqueſs of Montroſs had already kindled a Flame, which the Parliament of Edinburgh cou'd not extinguiſh: Then ſuch Quantities of Proviſions had been lately brought into York, that they had little Expectations of renewing the Siege; till the certain Intelligence of the King's two Generals abrupt and final Departure ſo far reconcil'd them, when nothing elſe could, that after two Days they return'd to their Poſts before the Town, which was now left to the ſole Diſcretion of Sir Thomas Glemham. In a few Days they ſo ſtreighten'd the Place, that the Governor, when he had no Hopes of Relief, on Tueſday the 16th of July, was compell'd to deliver it up, upon as good Articles for the Town, the Gentry that were in it, and for Himſelf, and the few Soldiers he had left, as he cou'd reaſonably propoſe: And ſo he march'd with all his Troops to Carliſle, which he afterwards defended with glorious Circumſtances of Courage, Induſtry and Patience. The three Generals went together into the City, directly to the great Cathedral Church, where a Pſalm was ſung, and Thanks return'd to God by the Earl of Leven's Chaplain; and Thurſday following was appointed to be kept ſolemnly by the whole Army as a Day of Thankſgiving.

York ſurrender'd to the Parliament.

The City of York being thus ſurrender'd, the three Armies thought fit to ſeparate, and upon Conſultation between the Generals and the Parliament Commiſſioners, it was agreed, '1. That the Lord Fairfax ſhou'd remain Governour of York, and ſend a thouſand Horſe into Lancaſhire, 'to joyn the Forces in thoſe Parts, to attend the Motions 'of Prince Rupert, and endeavour the reducing of Leverpool, and with the reſt of his Forces to ſecure the County 'of York. 2. That the Scottiſh Army ſhou'd march Northwards, to joyn with the Earl of Calendar, who was advancing with additional Forces, and to reduce Newcaſtle. '3. That the Earl of Mancheſter ſhou'd march towards 'Lincolnſhire, and recruit his Army from his own Aſſociation.' Purſuant to this new Diſpoſition, the Earl of Mancheſter march'd Southwards, and upon the 26th of July took in Tickhill Caſtle, not far from Doncaſter; on the 10th of Auguſt he took the ſtrong Caſtle of Sheffield, and two Days after Colonel Fretchwell's Houſe; and Bolſover Caſtle, Auguſt 14; Wingfield Manor in Derbyſhire, Auguſt 21; and two Days after Welbeck-Houſe in Nottinghamſhire, the Manſion Habitation of the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle, whoſe Daughters, with the Lord Widdrington's Children, and others, were permitted to continue there.

The three Armies divide.

In the mean Time General Leven march'd Northwards, and joyning with the Earl of Calendar, who had enter'd England with ten Thouſand Scots, laid Siege to Newcaſtle on the 10th of Auguſt. The Siege laſted above two Months, and prov'd one of the moſt reſolute in the Kingdom; all ſorts of Policy, of Peace and War; by Treaty, by Mines, by Aſſaults, having been often us'd to little Effect; the Inhabitants reſolving, if poſſible, never to fall into the Hands of Scots. But on Saturday the 19th of October, all the Scotch Army furiouſly ſet upon the Town, and having made three Breaches by their Batteries and Mines, after a tedious and bloody Storm, they at laſt maſter'd it. Sir John Morley, Sir Nicolas Cole and Sir George Barker, got into the Caſtle, where being forc'd by Neceſſity, they came to a Capitulation, and ſurrender'd on the 27th of the ſame Month. The Town being taken by Aſſault, was ſufficiently plunder'd, but the Surrendry prov'd of great Importance to the City of London, where the poorer ſort of People, for the two laſt Years, had been almoſt ſtarv'd for want of Fewel; Coals having riſen to the Price of four Pounds a Chaldron, a Price never known before that Time. Soon after, the Town of Leverpool was alſo ſurrender'd to Sir John Meldrum, ſo that all Things in the North went moſt unhappily againſt the King; and, humanly ſpeaking, occaſion'd principally by the unſeaſonable Tranſports, and unaccountable Proceedings of his chief Commanders.

The Scots ſtorm Newcaſtle.

IV. 1. During theſe Tranſactions in the North, the King's Affairs in the South and Weſt were carry'd on with ſingular Management and Reputation; eſpecially ſince they met with ſuch an unpromiſing Beginning, and ſuch a powerful Oppoſition afterwards. After the Fight at Alsford, and the Receſs of the Oxford Parliament, the King's Army lay about three Weeks at and about Newbury; in which Time their Numbers were no ways encreas'd beyond what the King found them upon their Muſter near Marlborough. But when it was known that both the Parliament Armies were march'd out of London; that under the Earl of Eſſex to Windſor, and that of Sir William Waller between Hertford-Bridge and Baſing, without any Deſign of advancing farther Weſt, the King's Army march'd to Reading, and in three Days they ſlighted and demoliſh'd all the Works of that Garriſon: And then about the middle of May, with the Addition of thoſe Soldiers, which made an Augmentation of twenty five Hundred Men, the Army retir'd to the Quarters about Oxford, where the King reſolv'd to ſtay, till he cou'd get further Information of the Enemy's Deſigns; which was not ſo eaſy now, as formerly. For ſince the Conjunction with the Scotch Commiſſioners in one Council for the carrying on the War, little Buſineſs was brought to the Conſultation of either of the two Houſes, and there was much greater Secrecy than before. He found the Parliament Project was, 'That the two Armies which march'd out 'together, ſhou'd afterwards be diſtinct; and ſhou'd only 'keep together, till it appear'd what Courſe the King 'wou'd take; and if he ſtaid in Oxford, it wou'd be fit for 'both to be at the Siege, the Situation of the Place re'quiring as much.' But if the King march'd out, as they might reaſonably preſume he wou'd, then the Deſign was, 'That the Earl of Eſſex ſhou'd follow the King, which 'they believ'd wou'd be Northwards; and that Waller 'ſhou'd march into the Weſt, and ſubdue that Country.' So that having ſo compleatly provided for the North, by the Scots and the Earl of Mancheſter; and having an Army under the Earl of Eſſex, much ſuperior in Number to any that cou'd attend the King; and the Third, under Waller, at Liberty for the Weſt, they promis'd themſelves, and reaſonably enough, that they ſhou'd make an end of the War that Summer. For the Earl of Eſſex's Army did not amount to leſs than ten Thouſand Horſe and Foot; and that under Waller was little inferior in Numbers to Eſſex, and in Reputation above him.

Of the Armies in the Weſt, &c.

The Deſigns of the Parliament.

When the King's Army retir'd from Reading, the Horſe quarter'd about Wantage and Farrington, and all the Foot were put into Abingdon, with Orders to quit or defend that Town, according to the manner of the Enemy's Approaches; towards which Eſſex advanc'd with his Army, which the Royaliſts were no ſooner adviſ'd of, but the General, early the next Morning, march'd with all the Foot out of Abingdon, the Horſe being come thither in the Night to make good the Retreat: And all this was done before the King had the leaſt Notice or Suſpicion of it. Of which his Majeſty expreſs'd a great Diſlike, and ſent to command the General to ſtay, and not to advance till he came to him; which he made all poſſible Haſte to do. But before the Meſſenger cou'd return, the Army was within Sight of Oxford; and ſo the Foot was drawn through the City, and the Horſe quarter'd in the neighbouring Villages. And thus, without ſtriking one Blow, the Parliament Forces got Poſſeſſion of Reading and Abingdon, and became Maſters of all Berkſhire, and forc'd the King to draw his whole Army of Horſe and Foot on the North Side of Oxford; where they were to feed on his own Quarters, and to conſider how to keep Oxford itſelf from being beſieg'd, and the King from being incloſ'd in it. To this melancholy Condition was the King reduc'd before the End of May; inſomuch that it was generally reported at London, That Oxford was taken, and the King a Priſoner; and others more confidently gave it out, That the King was reſolv'd to come to London: Of which the Parliament was not without ſome Apprehenſion, tho' not ſo much as of the King's throwing Himſelf into the Hands and Protection of the Earl of Eſſex: The Thoughts of which made them ſo exceedingly uneaſy, that the Committee of both Kingdoms wrote this Letter to the Earl. 'We are credibly inform'd that his Majeſty intends to come to London. We deſire you, that you will do your Endeavour to inform yourſelf of the ſame; and if you think that his Majeſty intends at all to come to the Armies, that you acquaint us with the ſame; and do nothing therein, until the Houſes ſhall give Direction.' So much Jealouſy they had of the Earl; and the more, becauſe they ſaw not how the King cou'd do otherwiſe, who cou'd have no reaſonable Expectation of any additional Forces from the North, or from the Weſt; Prince Rupert being then ingag'd in Lancaſhire, and Prince Maurice ſtill taken up in the unfortunate Siege of Lyme in Dorſetſhire. In this Perplexity the King ſent the Lord Hopton to Briſtol, to provide better for the Security of that important City, where Waller had many Friends; and himſelf reſolv'd to ſtay at Oxford, till he ſaw how the two Armies wou'd diſpoſe themſelves; that when they were ſo divided as not immediately to join, he might fight with one of them, which was the greateſt Hope he had now left.

Their Armies gain Reading, Abingdon, &c.

The Attempts of Eſſex and Waller againſt the King in Oxford.

In this Poſture ſome of Waller's Forces attempted to paſs the Iſis at Newbridge; but were repuls'd by the King's Dragoons; but the following Day Eſſex, with his whole Army, got over the Thames at Standford-Ferry, and march'd to Iſlip, where he made his Quarters. The next Morning a ſtrong Party of his Army endeavour'd to paſs the Cherwell, at Goſworth-Bridge, but were with great Loſs repuls'd by the Muſqueteers, and ſo retir'd to their Body. And now the Earl being fix'd with his whole Army on the Eaſt Side of the Cherwell, by which he was diſabled from giving any ſpeedy Aſſiſtance to Waller, the King reſolv'd to attempt Abingdon, and take the Opportunity to fight ſingly with Waller, before he cou'd be reliev'd from the other Army. In order to which, the Foot were all drawn off from the Guard of the Paſſes, and march'd through Oxford in the Night towards Abingdon; and the Earl of Cleveland, a Man of ſingular Courage, and excellent at any bold Enterprize, advanc'd with a Party of a Hundred and Fifty Horſe to the Town itſelf, where Waller had a Thouſand Foot and Four Hundred Horſe, and enter'd the Place, kill'd many, and took ſome Priſoners: But upon the Alarm, he was ſo over-power'd, that he was forc'd to retire, with the Loſs of his Priſoners; and ſo both the Attempt upon Abingdon was laid aſide, and the Deſign of fighting Waller given over, and the Army return'd again to their old Poſt. Sir Jacob Aſtley undertook the Command himſelf at Goſworth-Bridge, where he found the Earl deſign'd to force his Paſſage, and ſoon caſt up Breaſt-works and a Redoubt for the Defence of his Men, and repuls'd the Enemy a ſecond Time with great Bravery; who renew'd their Aſſault two or three Days together, by the Help of Cannon, with new Loſſes and no Succeſs. But on the other Side, Waller's Forces from Abingdon did not find Newbridge ſo well defended; ſo that overpowering the Guards, by the Help of Boats, they got a Paſſage over the River Iſis: By which they might have brought over all their Army, and fallen upon the King's Rear, while he was defending the other Side. In one of theſe Actions, Whitelock tells us of the Courage of Coningham, one of Eſſex's Colonels, who having one Arm ſhot off by a Cannon Ball, undauntedly held up the other, crying out, I have another Arm left to fight for the Parliament! but he dy'd in a ſhort Time after.

It was now high Time for the King to provide for his own Security, and to eſcape the Danger of being ſhut up in Oxford. For Waller loſt no Time, but the next Day paſs'd over five Thouſand Horſe and Foot by Newbridge; and the King's Foot being drawn off from Goſworth-Bridge, Eſſex immediately brought his Men over the Cherwell, and quarter'd that Night at Blechingdon, many of his Horſe advancing as far as Woodſtock. So that the King ſeem'd to be perfectly ſhut up between them, and in human Probability they had Him, his Children, his Army, and the City of Oxford, in their full Power and Poſſeſſion; and his Majeſty's Condition ſeem'd ſo deſperate, that one of his own faithful Counſellors propos'd to him to render Himſelf, upon Conditions, to the Earl of Eſſex; which his Majeſty rejected with great Indignation, yet obligingly conceal'd the Name of the Propoſer, and ſaid, That poſſibly he might be found in the Hands of the Earl of Eſſex, but he wou'd be dead firſt. Word was immediately given for the Horſe to be together at ſuch an Hour, to expect Orders; and a good Body of Foot with Cannon march'd through the Town towards Abingdon, which amus'd the Enemy, and caus'd Waller to draw back over Newbridge; but as ſoon as it was Evening, the King's Forces return'd to their old Poſt on the North Side. In the Interim, his Majeſty, ſolicitous for the Preſervation of this Univerſity and City, where he left his ſecond Son the Duke of York, with moſt of his Council, Nobility, Judges, and other Perſons of Quality, appointed the Lords, and others of the Council, to manage the Civil Affairs, and left the Military Part to Sir Arthur Aſton, then Governour, to whom he join'd as Aſſiſtants, Sir Lewis Dyves, Sir Thomas Lunsford, Colonel Gage, and others; and gave them all Aſſurance, 'That if they ſhou'd be beſieg'd, he wou'd with all Speed, and with all the Force he cou'd make, return to their Relief.'

1614. Car. 17.

The King incloſ'd, and in great Diſtreſs.

The King ſecretly leaves Oxford.

2. The King, having order'd all Things like a wiſe Counſellor, and an experienc'd Commander, on Monday the third of June, about Nine at Night, with the Prince and ſome Perſons of Quality, contrary to Expectation, march'd out of the North-Port, attended by his own Troop, to the Place where his Horſe, and part of his Foot waited to receive him: And from thence, without any Halt, march'd between the Enemy's two Armies, and by Day-break reach'd Hanborough, ſome Miles beyond all their Quarters. But the King reſted not till the Afternoon, when he found Himſelf at Burford; where, concluding he cou'd not be overtaken by an Army attended with Baggage and Artillery, he refreſh'd his Men; yet ſtill fearing he might be follow'd by a Body of the Enemy's Horſe, about nine at Night he continu'd his March over the Cotſwold, and by Midnight reach'd Burton upon the Water, in Gloceſterſhire; where he gave Himſelf, and his wearied Troops, more Reſt and Refreſhment. The Morning after the King left Oxford, the Remainder of the Army, conſiſting of three Thouſand five Hundred Foot, march'd towards Abingdon, again to amuſe the Enemy, and in the Evening return'd to Oxford, where Eſſex believ'd the King had remain'd. Waller had earlier Intelligence of the King's Motion, and ſent after him a good Body of Horſe to retard his March, till he cou'd come up himſelf. The Earl of Eſſex alſo follow'd with his Army, and quarter'd at Chippen-Norton; and Waller's Horſe were as far as Broadway, when the King had reach'd Eveſham in Worceſterſhire; where he deſign'd to reſt, as in a ſecure Place. But upon Intelligence that both Armies follow'd with quick Marches, his Majeſty immediately march'd to Worceſter, where he reſted ſome Days. Thus the King, at the Head of a ſmall Party, was earneſtly purſu'd by two powerful Armies; which caus'd an eminent Writer to obſerve, 'That now the Myſtery of Iniquity appear'd in its proper Colours: For whereas it was formerly given out by the two Houſes of Parliament, That they had undertaken the War for no other Reaſon, but to remove the King from his evil Counſellors; Thoſe pretended Evil Counſellors were left at Oxford unmoleſted, and the King's Perſon only hunted.'

And retires to Worceſter.

The Earl of Eſſex, when he found the King to be two Days March before him, and impoſſible to overtake him, ſo as to bring him into their Power, reſolv'd to purſue him no farther, but to conſult what was elſe to be done; and to that End call'd a Council of all the principal Officers of both Armies to attend him at Burford. Here it was determin'd, 'That Waller, who had the lighter Ordnance and leſs Carriages, with the Addition of ſuch Forces as Maſſey cou'd ſpare out of Gloceſter, ſhou'd purſue and attend the King; and that the Earl, who had the greater Ordnance and heavier Carriages, ſhou'd proſecute the other Deſign of relieving Lyme, and reducing the Weſt to the Obedience of the Parliament.' Waller violently oppos'd this Reſolution; and urg'd an Order and Determination of the Committee of both Kingdoms, 'That the Weſt was aſſign'd to him, as his Province, when the two Armies ſhou'd think fit to ſeperate from each other.' However, Eſſex gave him poſitive Orders, as his Lord and General, Eſſex and Waller divided.

General, to march according to the Advice of the Council of War; which he durſt not diſobey, but ſent heavy Complaints to the Parliament, of the Hardſhips to which he was forc'd to ſubmit. They at Weſtminſter were ſo incens'd againſt their General, that they writ an angry and imperious Letter to him, in which they reproach'd him, 'for not ſubmitting to the Directions they had given, requiring him to obſerve them, and to ſuffer Sir William Waller to attend the Service of the Weſt.' This Letter was brought to him before he had got above two Days March Weſtward; but the Earl, inſtead of Obedience, wrote to them, 'That their Directions had been contrary to the Diſcipline of War, and to Reaſon; and that his Return at this Time wou'd be a great Encouragement to the Enemy in all Places;' and ſubſcrib'd his Letter, Your innocent, though ſuſpected Servant Eſſex; and then proſecuted his Reſolution, and continu'd his March for the Weſt.

Waller purſues the King.

Waller, finding no Remedy, obey'd his Orders with much Diligence and Vigour, and continuing his March towards Worceſter, in his Way, he brought the Garriſon of Sudley Caſtle, the ſtrong Houſe of the Lord Chandois, to deliver up that Place to him; from whence, with great Expedition he march'd to Eveſham, where the Inhabitants willingly receiv'd him. The King reſting ſome Days at Worceſter, was inform'd that Waller was march'd out of Eveſham with his whole Army towards that City, which he wou'd probably beſiege; upon which he remov'd Northwards with his little Army to Bewdley, that he might keep the River Severn between him and the Enemy; the Foot being quarter'd in the Town, and the Horſe by the ſide of the River towards Bridgenorth. This Poſture caus'd Waller to conclude that his Majeſty intended his Courſe to Shrewsbury, and the more Northern Parts; and the King's ſending new Orders that Way, confirm'd him in his former Conjecture, and made him advance with his Army beyond the King, that he might be nearer Shrewsbury than he. Finding Waller ſo far advanc'd, the King, who was under great Difficulties, took the Advantage, and ſuddenly reſolv'd to return with all Expedition to Worceſter, and to haſten to Eveſham; where by breaking down the Bridge over the River Avon, he might be able by quick Marches to join with that Part of his Army he had left at Oxford, and conſequently be in a Condition to fight Waller; or proſecute any other Deſign. Upon this ſound Reſolution, Care was taken for all the Boats to come both from Bridgenorth and Worceſter, that the Foot might with more Speed and Eaſe be carry'd thither, which ſo well ſucceeded, that the next Day the Foot arriv'd ſo ſoon at Worceſter, that they might eaſily have march'd that Night to Eveſham. But many of the Horſe being not come up in Time, it was neceſſary that both Horſe and Foot ſhou'd remain that Night at Worceſter, which they did accordingly.

The King is too quick for him.

The next Morning the King receiv'd Intelligence, that Waller, without knowing any thing of his Motion, remain'd ſtill in his own Quarters, upon which he march'd with all Expedition to Eveſham; where he wou'd make no Stay; but gave Order for the Horſe and Foot immediately to march through the Place; after he had provided for the breaking down the Bridge, and laid a Penalty of two hundred Pounds, and a thouſand Pair of Shoes upon the Inhabitants, for their Readineſs to receive his Enemy Waller. That Night the Army march'd and quarter'd at Broadway; and very early the next Morning, they mounted the Hills near Camden. Here they had Time to breath, and to look with Pleaſure on the Places through which they had march'd; having far enough left Waller, and the troubleſome Ways he was to paſs. Here the King ſent Meſſengers to the Lords of the Council at Oxford, to let them know of his happy Return, 'and that he deſign'd to quarter that Night at Burford, and the next at Whitney; where he expected all his Foot, with their Colours and Cannon to meet him;' which they did with great Tranſports of Joy. So that on Thurſday the twentieth of June, which was ſeventeen Days after he had left Oxford in that diſconſolate Condition, the King found himſelf at the Head of his Army, from which he had been ſever'd, and driven about with ſuch melancholy Perplexities, that ſome thought he might uſe David's Expreſſion, He was hunted as a Partridge upon the Mountains; not knowing whither to reſort, or to what Place to repair for Reſt.

He returns and joins his Army near Oxford.

3. Now the King thought himſelf in a Poſture not only to withſtand Waller, if he approach'd him, but to follow and find him out, if he ſhou'd endeavour to decline fighting with his Majeſty. Therefore as ſoon as he had join'd his Army at Whitney, which now conſiſted of above five thouſand Foot, and near four thouſand Horſe, and a good Train of Artillery, he reſolv'd to leave his own Quarters, which had been too much waſted by Friends and Enemies, and to viſit the Enemy's Country; and accordingly march'd to the Town of Buckingham, where he met with Store of Proviſions, and Goods paſſing from London to Coventry and Warwick. While he ſtaid in this Town, and thought himſelf in a good Condition to meet the Enemy, an unexpected Trouble fell upon him by the ill Humour and Faction in his own Army. Wilmot ſtill continu'd ſullen and perverſe, and daily grew more inſolent, and had contracted ſuch a Spleen againſt the two Lords Digby and Colepepper, that he had perſwaded many Officers, among whom he had a great Influence, to join in a Petition to the King, 'That thoſe two Perſons might be excluded, and be no more preſent at the Councils of War;' which they promis'd to do. Waller's Continuance in Worceſterſhire occaſion'd a new Conſultation, what the King was next to do: Some propos'd, 'the ſpeedy marching into the aſſociated Counties; others to loſe no Time in endeavouring to join with Prince Rupert;' when Wilmot, without any previous acquainting the King, poſitively advis'd, 'That they might immediately march towards London, and now both their Armies were far from them, make Tryal of the true Affections of the City; and when the Army was arriv'd at St. Albans, the King ſhou'd ſend ſuch a gracious Meſſage, both to the Parliament and City, as was moſt like to prevail upon them;' and concluded as if he knew 'That this way of proceeding would be particularly approv'd by the Army.' This extravagant Motion very much troubled the King; yet he did not think fit abſolutely to reject it, leaſt it might promote that Petition, which he knew was framing among the Officers; but wiſh'd them 'To draw up ſuch a Meſſage, which ſhou'd be communicated, together with what concern'd his March to London, to the Lords of the Council at Oxford, that he might receive their Advice in ſo weighty an Affair. To that Purpoſe the two Lords, that were aim'd at, were ſent to Oxford; who after two Days return'd without any Approbation of the March, or the Meſſage. But all that Project and Intrigue fell of itſelf, upon the certain Intelligence that Waller had left Worceſterſhire, and was marching with all Speed to find out his Majeſty.

He ſeeks out Waller.

When the King had ſo dextrouſly eluded him by his quick March to and from Worceſter, Waller, who had no Suſpicion of it, thought it not proper to tire his Army with long Marches to overtake him; but firſt ſhew'd it before the Walls of Worceſter, to terrify that City which had contemn'd his Power a Year before, when it was not ſo well able to reſiſt it. Then he march'd towards Gloceſter, having ſent to Colonel Maſſey to ſend him ſome Men out of that City, which the other, being a Creature of Eſſex's, refus'd to do. Upon which he march'd into Warwickſhire, and appointed his Rendezvous in Keinton Field; where he receiv'd an Addition of ſeven Troops of Horſe, and about ſix hundred Foot, from Warwick and Coventry, with eleven Pieces of Cannon. With which Recruit, he confidently march'd towards the King; who to meet him advanc'd to Brackley: And the Armies coming ſhortly in View of each other, upon an Afternoon, both endeavour'd to poſſeſs a Piece of Ground they well knew to be of Advantage; which being nearer to Waller, and the King to paſs through the Town of Banbury before he cou'd come to it, he had firſt his Men upon it in good Order of Battle, before the King cou'd reach thither. So that the King lay that Night in the Field, half a Mile Eaſt of Banbury, the River Cherwell being between the two Armies.

He meets him near Banbury.

To cauſe Waller to remove from the advantagious Ground, the King march'd away, as if he wou'd enter further into Northamptonſhire; upon which Waller drew off from his Ground, and coaſted on the other Side of the River, but at ſuch a Diſtance as look'd like avoiding an Engagement. To prevent him from taking any Advantage, the King ſent a Party of Dragoons to keep a Paſs call'd Cropredy-Bridge, till his Army had got beyond it. Advice being brought to the King, 'that a Body of three hundred Horſe, marching to join with Waller, might eaſily be cut off, if his Army mended their Pace,' Orders were ſent to the foremoſt Horſe to move faſter, and the Van and Middle to do the ſame, without any Notice given to the Rear. Waller diſcerning the Diſtance between the Body and the Rear, immediately advanc'd with fifteen hundred Horſe, a thouſand Foot, and eleven Pieces of Cannon, to Cropredy-Bridge, which ſoon over-power'd the Dragoons that kept it: So that the Party advanc'd above half a Mile, with Deſign to cut off the King's Rear; to facilitate which Waller had ſent a thouſand Horſe more to paſs a Ford a Mile below Cropredy-Bridge, there to fall upon the utmoſt Part of the Rear. Upon diſcerning of which, the valiant Earl of Cleveland immediately drew up his Brigade, and without waiting for Orders, charg'd with great Fury the Body that had paſs'd the Ford, which ſuſtain'd it not with equal Courage, loſing an Officer, and many Priſoners. This Allarm ſoon reach'd the King, who ſeeing the Enemy ready for a ſecond Charge upon the Earl of Cleveland, ſent the Lord Bernard Stuart, who commanded his own Guard, to haſten to the Aſſiſtance of the Rear, and in his Way charge two Bodies of Horſe which fac'd his Majeſty. He and above a hundred gallant and ſtout Gentlemen haſtned towards thoſe two Bodies of Horſe, who ſeeing the others routed by the Earl of Cleveland, were advancing to charge him in the Flank, as he was following the Execution. But the Preſence of this brave Troop made them change their Minds, and accompany their Fellows in the Flight; which much facilitated the Defeat that ſoon enſued. The Earl of Cleveland, after this ſhort Encounter, made a Stand, not conceiving what the Enemy cou'd mean by advancing ſo faſt, and flying ſo ſoon, when he perceiv'd a Body of ſixteen Troops of Horſe, and as many Companies of Foot, all within the Hedges, within Muſquet Shot of them, and advancing upon him; which he likewiſe did upon them with extraordinary Vigour; and having ſtood their Shot, he charg'd them with that Reſolution and Fury, that he routed both Horſe and Foot, and with Slaughter chas'd them beyond their Cannon: All which, being eleven Pieces, were taken, with two Wooden Barricadoes, drawn upon Wheels, and in each ſeven ſmall Braſs and Leather Guns charg'd with Caſe-Shot. Moſt of the Cannoneers were kill'd; and Weems, General of the Ordnance, taken Priſoner. This Man was a Scot, and ſworn Servant to the King, having been taken into his Favour, and made Maſter-Gunner of England, with a Sallery of three hundred Pounds a Year; and now being brought before the King, had ſtill the Confidence to tell him, notwithſtanding he had receiv'd two thouſand Pounds from the contrary Party, That in geed Faith his Heart was always with his Majeſty. Beſides Weems, there was taken Priſoner Baker, Lieutenant-Colonel to Waller's own Regiment, and five or ſix Lieutenant-Colonels, and Captains, with many Lieutenants, Enſigns, Cornets, Quarter-Maſters, and a hundred Common Soldiers; a greater Number being ſlain in the Charge. Colonel Middleton, Waller's Lieutenant-General, was diſmounted among the King's Forces, of whom one taking him for a Commander of theirs, remounted him, and bid him make haſte and kill a Roundhead, and by that Means eſcap'd. The Earl purſu'd them as far as the Bridge, and clearing that Side of the River, retir'd; having loſt in this memorable Action two Colonels, Sir William Boteler and Sir William Clarke, both Kentiſh Gentlemen, who had rais'd and arm'd their Regiments at their own Charge, with one Captain, and not above fourteen common Soldiers. At the ſame Time, the young Earl of Northampton engag'd that Party that found a Paſſage over the River a Mile below, and entirely repell'd them; and many of them continu'd their Flight ſo far, that they never return'd again to the Army. Such was the Fight at Cropredy-Bridge, which happen'd on the 29th Day of June, when Waller quitted the Place, and drew up his whole Army upon the high Grounds between Cropredy and Hanwell, the Cherwell being between both Armies.

He worſts him at Cropredy-Bridge.

After this Advantage, and upon the Occaſion of the Multitudes that ran away from Waller's Army, the King was prevail'd with to ſend a Meſſage of Grace and Pardon to all the Officers and Soldiers that would immediately lay down their Arms. The Delivery of this Meſſage being very difficult, it was agreed, That Sir Edward Walker, who was both Garter King at Arms, and his Majeſty's Secretary of War, ſhould be ſent ſolemnly to publiſh it. But he wiſely deſir'd, that a Trumpet might be firſt ſent to deſire a ſafe Conduct for a Gentleman, who ſhould deliver a Gracious Meſſage from his Majeſty; all which was done. But after two Hours Conſideration, Waller return'd Anſwer, ‘That he had no Power to receive any Meſſage of Grace from his Majeſty, without the Conſent of the two Houſes of Parliament at Weſtminſter, to whom his Majeſty, if he pleas'd, might make his Addreſſes.’ And as ſoon as the Trumpet was gone, as a Mark of his Reſolution, he caus'd above Twenty Shot of his largeſt Cannon to be made at the King's Army, and as near as they cou'd at his Majeſty's Perſon. But after two Days, both Armies drew off to a greater Diſtance, and never ſaw each other after; and it ſoon appear'd by Waller's Motions, that he had no other Deſign than recruiting his Army; and that the Defeat at Cropredy-Bridge was much greater than it appear'd to be, even to the breaking the Heart of his Army. And it is very probable, that if the King, after convenient Reſt after this hard Duty, had follow'd Waller, he might have deſtroy'd that Army without Fighting; for it appear'd, within Fourteen Days after this Action, that Waller's Army, which before conſiſted of Eight Thouſand, was ſo much waſted, that there remain'd not Half that Number. At which Time he return'd to the City of London for Recruits; where by ſome he was receiv'd as one of the good Inſtruments of Providence; and his zealous Lady, in publick, ſaluted him with this Expreſſion, Thou Man of God, come Kiſs me!

Waller returns to London.

Before which, the King, being remov'd to Eveſham, out of his earneſt Deſire of Peace, ſent a gracious Meſſage to the two Houſes at Weſtminſter, in which he ‘again pathetically urg'd a Treaty of Peace, and that Commiſſioners might be appointed on both Sides to meet and treat upon all Things in Queſtion between them.’ This was dated the 4th of July, two Days after the Battle of Marſton-Moor, but before the King had heard any News from thence; but it arriving at London after the Houſes were elevated with that great Succeſs, it was no ways regarded, or ſo much as anſwer'd.

The King's Meſſage to the Houſes.

V. I. The King now found himſelf ſo much at Liberty from two great Armies, which had ſo ſtreightned him, within little more than a Month, that he had, in effect, defeated one of them, and reduc'd it to a State unable to do him any preſent Damage; yet ſtill he was uneaſy at the Progreſs of the other Army under the Earl of Eſſex, who marching into Dorſetſhire, had Weymouth ſoon deliver'd up to him, and immediately caus'd Prince Maurice to riſe up from before Lyme, after a long and unreputable Siege, and retire to Exeter. The Queen was then at that City, where her Majeſty, on the 16th of June, was deliver'd of her Eighth and Laſt Child, the Princeſs Henrietta, who was afterwards marry'd to the Duke of Orleans. Underſtanding that Eſſex was advancing towards Exeter, her Majeſty ſent a Trumpet to him, to deſire him to forbear from Hoſtility for ſome little Time, till ſhe was recover'd; but ſhe was deny'd. A while after, ſhe ſending again to him for a ſafe Conduct to go to the Bath for the Recovery of her Health, or elſe to Briſtol; he ſullenly refus'd, with this Anſwer, That if ſhe would go to London, where ſhe might be furniſh'd with all Things neceſſary for her Health, he would ſend her a Convoy; but for either of the other Places he would not obey her, without Directions from the Parliament. Whereupon the Queen, not judging her Perſon ſafe at Exeter, as ſoon as ſhe was in any Condition to Travel, remov'd from thence into Cornwall, and on the 14th of July took ſhipping at Falmouth, and ſafely arriv'd at Breſt in France; from whence ſhe repair'd to the French Court, and never after ſaw her Royal Spouſe, nor the Kingdom of England, till after the Reſtoration of her eldeſt Son. In her Paſſage ſhe ran a vaſt Hazard, and receiv'd many Diſcharges of Cannon from the Parliament Ships; which occaſion'd an ingenious French Author to make an unhappy Reflection, and to call it, ‘An Action no Country but England has the Misfortune to be guilty of.

She retires into France.

Before her Majeſty's Eſcape, the King being infinitely fond and fearful of her Perſon, reſolv'd, with all poſſible Expedition, to follow Eſſex, in hopes he ſhould be able to fight him before Waller cou'd be in a Condition to follow him. Of which Reſolution he gave immediate Notice to the Lords of the Council at Oxford, and ſent an Expreſs into the Weſt to inform the Queen of it, who by the Way carry'd Orders to the Lord Hopton, to draw what Men he could out of Wales into Briſtol, that Himſelf might meet his Majeſty with as many as he could draw out of that Garriſon. And thus, without any Delay, the whole Army, with tedious Marches, advanc'd towards the Weſt, over the Cotſwold to Cirenceſter, and ſo to Bath; where he arriv'd on the 15th Day of July, and ſtaid there one whole Day to refreſh his Army, which at that Time exceedingly wanted it. During this March, in which the King was often receiv'd with the People's Acclamations, it hapned that one of the Carriages broke in a long narrow Lane, which they were to paſs, and gave his Majeſty a full Stop, at the time that he was overtaken with an intollerable Shower of Rain. Upon which ſome of his Courtiers and Attendants offer'd to hew him out a Way through the Hedges with their Swords, that he might get ſhelter in ſome of the neighbouring Villages; but he reſolv'd not to forſake his Cannon upon any Occaſion. At which, when ſome about him were ſurpris'd, and admir'd at the Patience which he ſhew'd in that Extremity; his Majeſty lifting up his Hat, made this Heavenly Anſwer, That as God had given him Afflictions to exerciſe his Patience, ſo he had given him Patience to bear his Afflictions. This was juſt at the Time that, after he had been flatter'd with hopeful News from the North, he had receiv'd full Aſſurance of the fatal Defeat of his Forces at Marſton-Moor.

The King marches into the Weſt.

His Patience.

After his Majeſty heard of the Queen's Departure and Safety, he march'd more ſlowly, that he might encreaſe his Army from Briſtol, and other Places; not doubting but he ſhould engage the Earl of Eſſex's Army before he ſhould be able to return to London. That General's good Fortune began now to decline: He had not proceeded with his uſual Skill and Warineſs, but run Himſelf into inextricable Labyrinths. When he had advanc'd towards Exeter, which he had ſome Thoughts of beſieging, without imagining he could find an Enemy to contend with him, he had the

News

Car. 20.

News of the great Diſappointment of Sir William Waller, and that the King was coming with his whole Army in purſuit of him, without being follow'd by Waller, or any Troops to retard his March; which exceedingly perplex'd him, and made him ſuſpect the Parliament it ſelf had betray'd him, and conſpir'd his Ruin. The Jealouſies were now grown very high between them; the Parliament looking upon his March into the Weſt, and leaving the King to Waller's Purſuit, but as a Declaration that he would no more Fight againſt the Perſon of the King; and the Earl on the other Side had well obſerv'd the Difference between the Affection the Parliament had for his Army, and that other under the Earl of Mancheſter; which they ſo highly valu'd, that he believ'd they would not much care for the Succeſs of his. In this Exigency he reſolv'd to return back, and meet and fight the King, either before he enter'd Devonſhire, or elſe in Somerſetſhire; but the Lord Roberts, who was a General Officer in his Army, of an unſociable and impetuous Diſpoſition, full of Contradiction in his Nature, and of Parts ſo much ſuperior to the Company, that he could too well juſtify all thoſe Contradictions, poſitively oppos'd the Return of the Army; but with his uſual Confidence urg'd, ‘That the Army ſhould continue their March into Cornwall; where he undertook to have ſo great an Intereſt, that he queſtion'd not but the Preſence of the Earl of Eſſex, with his Army, would ſo unite that County to the Parliament's Service, that they might ſo defend the Paſſes into the whole County, that the King's Army ſhould never be able to enter into Cornwall, nor to retire out of Devonſhire, without great Loſs, nor before the Parliament would ſend more Forces upon their Backs.’ That Lord having a ſuperior Credit in the Parliament than the Earl himſelf, and having met with the Concurrence of ſome of the Officers, the Earl was content to depart from his own Underſtanding, and comply with the Advice; and accordingly he march'd with all his Army and Cannon into that narrow County, and purſu'd Prince Maurice, and his Forces, which eaſily retir'd Weſtward, till he found Himſelf in Streights, too great to be diſengag'd.

He is perſuaded to March into Cornwall.

The King follows him.

2. In the mean Time, the King having made a ſmall Stay at Exeter, and a little refreſh'd and accommodated his Troops, march'd directly to Cornwall; where he found Eſſex in ſuch a Part of the Country on the Sea-ſide, that he ſoon found Means, by the general Conflux of the People, upon which the Earl had been perſuaded to depend, with very little Fighting, ſo to ſtreighten his Quarters, that there was little Appearance of his marching away with his Army, or compelling the King to a Battle. He was in effect inclos'd in and about Foy, while the King lay encamp'd about Leskard, and no Day paſs'd without ſome Skirmiſhes; in which the Earl was more diſtreſs'd, and many of his principal Officers taken Priſoners.

Here happen'd an Accident that might well have turn'd the King's Fortune, and depriv'd him of his future Advantage. His Majeſty at this Time truſting more to the Judgment of the Lord Digby, and the Maſter of the Rolls, than to the Officers of the Army, Lieutenant-General Wilmot began again to ſhew his Reſentments, who by his hard Drinking, and companiable Wit, had gain'd more Intereſt in the Army than any other Man. This Man hated theſe two Privy-Counſellors, knew the King had no inward Kindneſs for him upon the Account of the Earl of Strafford, and foreſaw he ſhou'd ſoon be overſhadow'd in the War; therefore deſir'd to get free from it by a ſeaſonable Peace; and ſo in all his Diſcourſes urg'd the Neceſſity of it, and that the King ought to ſend Propoſitions to the Parliament for that End; and in his March had proſecuted his former Deſign by ſeveral Cabals among the Officers, diſpoſing them to Petition the King ‘To ſend Offers of Peace to the Parliament, and to remove the Lord Digby, and Colepeper, from the Councils of War;’ implying, ‘That if this might not be granted, they would think of ſome other Way.’ Which Petition, tho' never deliver'd, ſo provok'd the King, that he reſolv'd to take the Opportunity to free Himſelf from his impetuous Humour, and the Lord Digby prevail'd that Goring might be in his ſtead ſent for to attend his Majeſty; who then propos'd to make his Nephew, Prince Rupert, General of the Army, and Goring General of the Horſe. This was the firſt Deſign of the King, which was only to mortify Wilmot, and reduce him to more Subjection; but his violent Humour forc'd his Majeſty to a quicker and rougher Remedy: For during the whole March, he every where diſcours'd, ‘That the King muſt ſend and invite the Earl of Eſſex to join with him, and oblige the Parliament to conſent to a Peace;’ and pretended to have ſo good Intelligence, as to know the Invitation would prove acceptable to the Earl: And he was ſo forward as to deſire a Gentleman, with whom he had no Intimacy, and had a Paſs to go through the Earl's Quarters, That he would give his Service to the Earl, and aſſure him, That the Army ſo much deſir'd Peace, that it ſhould not be in the Power of any about the King to hinder it, if his Lordſhip would treat upon any reaſonable Propoſitions. This ſingular Carriage and Diſcourſes were ſoon repreſented in their full Magnitude to the King; who, in the midſt of his Pride, and at the Head of his Troops, order'd him to be arreſted of High-Treaſon by the Knight-Marſhal, diſmounted and put under a Guard. The ſame Time the King remov'd the Lord Piercy from being General of the Ordnance, a Perſon who had almoſt as much oblig'd the Officers by his Eating, as the other had by his Drinking, and put the Lord Hopton into his Place; and the very next Day after Colonel Goring appear'd, who the Night before waited upon the King, with Letters from Prince Rupert. And then the Army being drawn up, his Majeſty rode to every Diviſion of the Horſe, and there declar'd, ‘That at the Requeſt and Reſignation of his Nephew, he had made Mr. Goring General of the Horſe; and for the Lord Wilmot, tho' he had juſtly reſtrain'd him, he had not taken away his Command in the Army;’ Which Declaration viſibly rais'd the Countenance of the Body of the Horſe; inſomuch, that the very next Day the greateſt Part of the Officers deliver'd a Petition, ‘That his Majeſty would give them ſo much Light into the Lord Wilmot's Crimes, that they might ſee themſelves were not ſuſpected, who had ſo long obey'd and executed his Orders:’ Which ſufficiently ſhew'd the ill Diſpoſition of the Army, even now in view of the Enemy. Wilmot, after he had made ſome Defence, when he ſaw his mortal Enemy Goring made Commander over him, thought himſelf incapable of a full Reparation or Vindication; and therefore deſir'd and obtain'd leave to retire into France; which he did, not without great Murmurings, That he was ſacrific'd to the Intrigues of a Faction.

The King removes him, and others.

He retires to France.

In the mean Time his Majeſty thought he had a happy Opportunity to make Tryal, whether the Earl of Eſſex, from the open Indignities he had receiv'd from the Parliament, or from the preſent ill Condition of Himſelf and his Army, might be induc'd to make a Conjunction with him. For the Lord Beauchamp, eldeſt Son to the Marqueſs of Hertford, had deſir'd leave to go into France, for the Recovery of his Health, and to that End had obtain'd a Paſs from his Uncle, the Earl of Eſſex, for Himſelf, Monſieur Richaute, his former Governour, and two Servants, to embark at Plymouth; and being now with the King, it was neceſſary to paſs through the Earl's Quarters. By him the King vouchſaf'd to write a Letter with his own Hand to the Earl, in which he pathetically mov'd him to a Conjunction, and aſſur'd him, ‘That the Seaſon was now before him, that he had it now in his Power to redeem his Country and the Crown, and to oblige his King in the higheſt Degree; ſuch an Opportunity as perhaps no Subject ever had before, or after ſhou'd have. But becauſe the only Impediment wou'd be the Want of mutual Confidence, he ſolemnly promis'd him, upon the Word of a King, That upon his joyning with him in the Bleſſed Work, he wou'd give both to Him, and his Army, ſuch Eminent Marks of his Confidence and Value, as ſhou'd not leave Room for the leaſt Diſtruſt amongſt them, either in Relation to the Publick, or Himſelf.’ The King alſo deſir'd, that a Paſs might be given to Mr. Harding, one of the Grooms of the Bed-Chamber to the Prince, who before had been of great Converſation with the Earl, and much lov'd by him; and the procuring this Paſs was recommended to Monſieur Richaute, and particular Inſtructions were likewiſe drawn up for Mr. Harding.

The King writes to the Earl of Eſſex.

The Earl of Eſſex receiv'd his Nephew very kindly, and receiv'd the King's Letter from his Hands; and being told by him, That Monſieur Richaute, a Perſon well known to him, had ſomething to ſay to him from his Majeſty, the Earl call'd him into his Chamber, where, in the Preſence only of the Lord Beauchamp, that Gentleman told him, That his principal Buſineſs was to deſire his Permiſſion and Paſs, that Mr. Harding might come to him, who had many Things to offer, which he preſum'd wou'd not be unacceptable to him. The Earl anſwer'd him in ſhort, That he wou'd not permit Mr. Harding to come to him, nor wou'd he have any Treaty with the King, having receiv'd no Warrant for it from the Parliament. Upon which Richaute enlarg'd Himſelf upon ſome Particulars, which Mr. Harding had Inſtructions to urge, ‘of his Majeſty's Deſire of Peace, of the Concurrence of all the Lords, as well thoſe at Oxford, as in the Army, in the ſame Deſire of Preſerving the Kingdom from the Conqueſt of the Scots, and other Diſcourſes to that Purpoſe; and of the King's Readineſs to give him any Security for the Performance of all he had promis'd.’ To all which the Earl ſullenly anſwer'd, That according to the Commiſſion he had receiv'd, he wou'd defend the King's Perſon and Poſterity; and that the beſt Counſel he cou'd give him was to go to his Parliament.

The Earl's Anſwer.

ny of the Officers, eſpecially of the Horſe, were not ſo ſatisfy'd: For ſome of them, who had conferr'd with the Priſoners that were daily taken, and ſome of them Officers of as good Quality as any they had, were perſuaded by them, 'That all the Obſtinacy in the Earl's refuſing to 'treat with the King, proceeded only from his Jealouſy, 'that when the King had got him into his Hands, he wou'd 'take Revenge upon him for all his former Actions againſt 'him; and that if he had any Aſſurance, That what was 'promis'd wou'd be perform'd, he wou'd be ſoon induc'd 'to treat.' Upon this Foundation they preſum'd to prepare a Letter, that ſhou'd be ſubſcrib'd by the General, and all the Superior Officers of the Army; the Beginning of which was, That they had obtain'd Leave of the King to ſend that Letter to him; and in which they propos'd, 'That he with ſix Officers, whom he ſhou'd chuſe, wou'd 'the next Morning meet with their General, and ſix other 'Officers, appointed to attend him; and if he declin'd ap'pearing Himſelf, that then ſix Officers of the King's Ar'my ſhou'd meet with ſix ſuch as he ſhou'd appoint, at any 'Place that ſhou'd be thought fit: And that they, and every 'one of them, who ſubſcrib'd the Letter, wou'd upon the 'Honour and Reputation of Gentlemen and Soldiers, 'with their Lives maintain, That whatſoever his Majeſty 'ſhou'd promiſe, ſhou'd be perform'd; and that it ſhou'd 'not be in the Power of any private Perſon whatſoever, to 'interrupt or hinder the Execution thereof.' Notwithſtanding the Irregularity and Preſumption of this Undertaking, his Majeſty gave way to it, concluding the Letter wou'd find no better Reception than his own, and believing that the Rejecting of it wou'd purge the unruly Spirit out of his Army, and add ſome Reſentment to the Officers, when they ſhou'd ſee how the Earl receiv'd their Application. So the Letter being ſign'd by all the Great Officers, it was ſent by a Trumpet to the Earl, who the next Day return'd an Anſwer in theſe Words: My Lords, in the Beginning of your Letter you expreſs by what Authority you ſend it; I having no Authority from the Parliament, ho have employ'd me, to treat, cannot give way to it without Breach of Truſt. My Lords, I am your humble Servant, Eſſex. Aug. 10th, 1644. This ſhort Anſwer produc'd the deſir'd Effect; they who had been active in contriving the Addreſs, were aſham'd of their Miſtake, and the whole Army ſeem'd well inclin'd to obtain that by their Swords, which they cou'd not by their Pen.

The King ſtreightens him in his Quarters.

3. The King, being now joyn'd with Sir Richard Greenvil, with eighteen hundred Foot, and ſix hundred Horſe, reſolv'd to puſh his Fortune the other Way, and to fight the Enemy as ſoon as was poſſible. On the other Side, tho' Eſſex had but a narrow Compaſs for the Quartering of ſo great an Army of Horſe and Foot, yet he had the good Town of Foy and the Sea to befriend him; ſo that if he preſerv'd his Poſt, which was ſo ſituated that he cou'd not be compell'd to fight without giving him great Advantage, he might well conclude that Waller, or ſome other Parliament Force, wou'd be ſhortly upon the King's Back, as the Other was upon his; which rational Confidence was a great Motive to him to neglect all Overtures. Therefore the King reſolv'd to make his Quarters yet ſtraiter, and to cut off all, or a good Part of his Proviſions by Sea. To effect which, Sir Richard Greenvil poſſeſs'd himſelf of Lanhetherock, a ſtrong Houſe of the Lord Roberts, two Miles Weſt of the King's Quarters, and over the River that runs to Liſtithiel, and thence to Foy, and likewiſe to Reprin-Bridge; by which the Enemy was not only depriv'd of that uſeful Out-let, but a ſafe Communication open'd between him and the King's Army, which before was interrupted. And, which was of greater Importance, on the other Side, Sir Jacob Aſhley, with a good Party of Horſe and Foot, made himſelf Maſter of View-Hall, an Houſe of the Lord Mohun's, over againſt the Town of Foy, and of Pernon-Fort, a Mile below it, at the Mouth of the Haven; ſo that Foy was made of no Uſe to Eſſex, beſides the Quartering his Men; they hindering all Proviſions from being brought to him by Sea. And thus the King had leiſure to ſit ſtill, and to wait for ſome Stratagem the Earl ſhou'd make uſe of, either to attempt his Army, or to make his own Eſcape.

In this Poſture both Armies lay ſtill, without any memorable Action, for the Space of eight or ten Days; when the King finding no better Fruit from all that was done, reſolv'd to draw his whole Army together, and to make his own Quarters ſtill much nearer, and either to Force Eſſex to fight, or to be very uneaſy in his Quarters. With this Reſolution the whole Army advanc'd in ſuch a Manner, that the Enemy was compell'd ſtill to retire before them, and to abandon their Poſts, and among the reſt, a riſing Ground call'd Beacon-Hill; which they no ſooner quitted, than the King poſſeſs'd; and immediately caus'd a Square-Work to be there rais'd, and a Battery made, upon which ſome pieces of Cannon were planted, that ſhot into their Quarters, and did them great Damage. And thus the King's Forces got a full Proſpect over all the other's Quarters, and ſaw how all their Foot and Horſe were diſpos'd, and from whence they receiv'd all their Proviſions; which when clearly view'd and obſerv'd, General Goring was ſent with the greateſt Part of the Horſe, and fifteen hundred Foot, a little Weſtward to St. Blaſe, to force the Enemy yet cloſer together, and to cut off the Proviſions they receiv'd from thence: Which was ſo well executed, that they did not only poſſeſs themſelves of St. Auſtel, and the weſterly Part of St. Blaſe, but likewiſe became Maſters of the Parr near St. Blaſe; by which they depriv'd them of the chief Place of landing the Proviſions which came by Sea. So that the Enemies Horſe were reduc'd to that ſmall Extent of Ground that lies between the River of Foy and that at St. Blaſe, which is not above two Miles in Breadth, and a little more in Length; in which they had for the moſt Part fed ſince they came to Liſtithiel, and therefore it cou'd not now long ſupply them.

The Earl is reduc'd to great Difficulties.

His Horſe break through and eſcape.

And now the Earl began to be very ſenſible of his own ill Condition, and that he cou'd not be able to remain long in that Poſture; beſides he had receiv'd Advice that Lieutenant-General Middleton, who was ſent for his Relief from London, had met with ſuch an Obſtruction in Somerſetſhire, as wou'd much retard his March; ſo that it was neceſſary for him to enter into new Reſolutions. Accordingly it was determin'd that Sir William Balfour ſhou'd reſolutely break through with his whole Body of Horſe, and ſave themſelves the beſt they could; and then that he himſelf wou'd embark his Foot at Foy, and with them eſcape by Sea. And two Foot Soldiers of their Army came over from them, and aſſur'd the King, That they reſolv'd that Night to break through with their Horſe, which were all then drawn on that ſide the River, and Town of Liſtithiel; and that the Foot were to march to Foy, where they were to be embarked. This Intelligence agreed with what they otherwiſe receiv'd, and thereupon Order was given, 'That the Forces under Prince Maurice, as well as thoſe 'under the King's General, ſhou'd ſtand to their Arms all 'that Night; and if the Horſe attempted an Eſcape, to fall 'upon them from both Quarters;' the Paſſage between them, where they muſt go, being but a Muſquet-Shot over, and they could not avoid going near a ſmall Cottage, that was well fortify'd, and lined with fifty Muſqueteers. Advice was ſent to Goring and all the Horſe, and the former Orders renew'd for the breaking down the Bridges, and cutting down the Trees near the High-way, to obſtruct their Paſſage. But the Night growing dark and miſty, about three in the Morning, the whole Body of the Horſe paſs'd with great Silence between the Armies, and within Piſtol Shot of the Cottage, without ſo much as one Muſquet diſcharg'd at them. At Break of Day, they were diſcover'd marching over the Heath, beyond the Reach of the Foot; and only the Earl of Cleveland's Brigade, with ſome other Troop which had taken the Allarm, follow'd them in the Rear, and kill'd and took about a hundred of them; which was the greateſt Damage they ſuſtain'd in their whole March: So that Balfour continu'd his March even to London, with leſs Loſs than cou'd have been imagin'd, to the infinite Reproach of the King's Army, and all his Garriſons in the Way. For the Orders coming to Goring, when he was in one of his jovial Exerciſes, he receiv'd them with Mirth and Contempt of thoſe that ſent them, and continu'd his Pleaſures, till the Enemy's Horſe were paſs'd quite through his Quarters; nor was any Man queſtion'd for this ſupine Neglect; it not being thought fit to inquire ſtrictly into the Behaviour of the reſt, when it was ſo well known, how the ſuperior Officer had fail'd in his Duty.

He embarks and leaves his Foot.

The next Morning, after the Eſcape of the Horſe, the Earl drew all his Foot together, quitted Liſtithiel, and march'd towards Foy; having left Orders for the breaking down that Bridge. But the King himſelf from his new Fort diſcern'd it, and ſent a Company of Muſqueteers, who ſoon beat thoſe that were left, and ſav'd the Bridge; over which his Majeſty immediately march'd to overtake the Rear of the Army, which made ſo much haſte, that they left two Demy-Culverins, and two other good Guns, with ſome Ammunition, to the King's Diſpoſal. That Day was ſpent in ſharp Skirmiſhes, in which many fell; and the Night coming on, the King lay in the Field, his own Quarters being ſo near the Enemy, that many of the Enemies Cannon Shot fell within a few Yards of him, when he was at Supper. Sunday being the next Day, and the firſt of September, Lieutenant-Colonel Butler came from the Earl of Eſſex to deſire a Parley. The Earl had no ſooner ſent him away, but he embark'd himſelf, with the Lord Roberts, and ſuch Officers he beſt lov'd, in a Veſſel at Foy, and ſo eſcap'd to Plymouth; leaving all his Army of Foot, Cannon and Ammunition, to the Care of Major-General Skippon, who was to make as good Conditions for them as he cou'd: And after a very ſhort Stay in Plymouth, he went on board a Ship of the Royal Navy, and was within a few Days deliver'd ſafe at London; where he was receiv'd with all imaginable Marks of outward Reſpect, as if he had not only brought back his Army, but the King himſelf with him.

The King conſented to the Parley; upon which a Ceſſation was concluded, and Hoſtages exchang'd: And then the Enemy ſent ſuch Propoſitions, as upon the Delivery of a ſtrong Town, after a long Defence, are uſually granted. Skippon himſelf offer'd to break through with his Forces, but they ſoon found they were in no Condition for ſuch an Attempt, and that they were look'd on as Men not to expect any conſiderable Articles. And ſo in Concluſion, they were contented to deliver up all their Ordnance; which, with thoſe taken two or three Days before, amounted to thirty eight Pieces of Cannon; together with a hundred Barrels of Powder, with Match and Bullets proportionable, and about ſix thouſand Arms: Which being done, 'the Officers were to have Liberty to wear their 'Swords, and to paſs with their own Mony, and proper 'Goods; and to ſecure them from Plunder, they were to 'have a Convoy to Poole, or Southampton; all their Sick 'and Wounded might ſtay in Foy till they were recover'd, 'and then have Paſſes to Plymouth.' Accordingly, this Agreement was executed, on Monday the ſecond of September, and tho' it was near the Evening before all was finiſh'd, they wou'd march away that Night; and tho' all Care was taken to preſerve them from Violence, yet at Liſtithiel, where they had been long quarter'd, and at other Towns through which they had paſs'd, the Inhabitants, eſpecially the Women, who pretended to ſee their own Goods and Cloaths about them which had been taken from them, treated them very rudely, even to ſtripping ſome of the Soldiers, and more of their Wives, who had very inſolently behav'd themſelves in the March. That Night there came about an hundred of them to the King's Army; and of the ſix thouſand, that march'd out of Foy, not a third Part arriv'd at Southampton, where the King's Convoy left them; to which Skippon himſelf gave an ample Teſtimony under his Hand, 'That they had carry'd themſelves with 'great Civility towards them, and fully comply'd with their 'Obligation.' Thus the Fate of War was chang'd, and the King, who a few Weeks before had two ſuperior Armies to manage, now became victorious; ſo that the Earl of Eſſex own'd it in his Letter To be the greateſt Blow that ever beſel his Party. And notwithſtanding the ſcandalous Neglect of Goring, the King's Part in it was ſo eminently conſpicuous, that Whitelock twice acknowledges, 'That it 'was all done with great Wiſdom and Gallantry.

The King ſends to the Houſes.

4. Upon this glorious Succeſs, his Majeſty, according to his uſual Goodneſs after Victories, ſent from Taveſtock a gracious Meſſage to Weſtminſter, to deſire a Treaty for Peace, dated September the eighth, together with a Duplicate of his former Meſſage from Eveſham: But being directed To the Lords and Commons of Parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the two Houſes voted, 'That theſe Directions, and the Matter in them, did not ſufficiently acknowledge them to be the two Houſes of Parliament 'of England, and therefore wou'd return no Anſwer.' The King deſigning to march Eaſtward, was perſuaded in his Way to look upon Plymouth; and having ſent a Summons to the Town, he receiv'd a rude Anſwer to it: For the Earl of Eſſex had left the Lord Roberts Governor in that Town, a Man of a ſour Temper, and a high Opinion of himſelf, and one who muſt be overcome, before he wou'd believe he cou'd be ſo. The King finding he cou'd not prevail with him, and that the reducing of the Town wou'd require ſome Time, purſu'd his former Reſolution, and march'd away, having committed the Blockade of it to Sir Richard Greenvil, a Man who had been bred a Soldier, and of great Expectation, but of greater Promiſes. The King having ſtaid a Week at Exeter, and took in the Town of Barnſtable, September the ſeventeenth march'd Eaſtward to Chard in Somerſetſhire, where for the Relief of his Army he made a longer Stay. Here, without being diſcourag'd at the Parliament's Neglect of his Meſſage, he publiſh'd a Proclamation, 'declaring his Royal Reſolutions to 'draw towards London, in order to obtain a Treaty for 'Peace, and a good Accommodation, inviting all his loyal 'Subjects to join in his Aſſiſtance for that neceſſary End,' dated September 30. Upon which the Gentry and Freeholders of that County of Somerſet, addreſs'd the King at Sturmiſter, October the ninth, 'for Liberty to wait in Perſon upon his Majeſty nearer London, to become Petitioners to the Lords and Commons at Weſtminſter, to 'embrace his Majeſty's Offers of Peace; and in Caſe of 'Refuſal, to ſpend their Lives in aſſiſting his Majeſty to 'compaſs that by the Sword, which by fair and juſt Ways 'cou'd not be effected.' All which was graciouſly accepted of by his Majeſty.

His Proclamation.

During the King's Stay at Chard, the brave Colonel Gage undertook from Oxford to relieve Baſing-Houſe, a ſtrong Place in Hampſhire, and valiantly defended by the Marqueſs of Wincheſter againſt the Parliament for above three Months; all which he perform'd after a moſt Soldierly Manner, tho' it was near forty Miles from Oxford, and in the midſt of the Enemy's Country. But ſoon after this great Action, the Houſe was again beſieg'd by a more powerful Force than before. Dennington Caſtle near Newbury was likewiſe beſieg'd by another Party of the Parliament Forces; but what was moſt in Danger, was the Caſtle of Banbury, beſieg'd by Colonel John Fiennes, another Son of the Lord Say, with a conſiderable Force, and bravely defended by Sir William Compton, full three Months; but by this Time reduc'd to the utmoſt Extremity. In order to preſerve all theſe, the King came to Salisbury upon the fifteenth of October, where he underſtood 'That Waller lay at Andover 'with his Troops; that the Earl of Mancheſter was advanc'd as far as Reading with five thouſand Horſe and 'Foot, to be follow'd with four Regiments of the Train'd-'Bands of London; and that three thouſand of the Earl of 'Eſſex's Army were near Portſmouth, expecting Orders 'to join with the reſt.' This might very well have diſpos'd his Majeſty to haſten his March to Oxford, and with the Relief of the beſieg'd Places, make a fair Concluſion of the Campaign; but the fearleſs Goring being now poſſeſs'd with great Gayety, earneſtly adviſ'd the King to march with all Secrecy, and beat Waller, who lay at Andover, a good Diſtance from the reſt, with three thouſand Horſe and Dragoons. This was agreed to, but the March was not manag'd with all neceſſary Punctuality by thoſe about the King: Yet they came not within four Miles of Andover, before Waller had Notice of their Motions; who taking a View of their Strength and good Order, durſt not ſtand a Battle, but drew back into the Town; leaving a ſtrong Party of Horſe and Dragoons to make good his Retreat. But the King's Van charg'd, and routed them with conſiderable Execution, purſu'd them through the Town, and ſlew many in the Rear, till the Darkneſs of the Night ſecur'd the Remainder. They were very much ſcatter'd, and the King quarter'd that Night at Andover.

The King comes to Salisbury.

He beats up Waller's Quarters at Andover.

The diſperſing this great Body, and the little Reſiſtance they made, ſo elevated the King's Army, that they deſir'd nothing more than to have a Battel with all the Enemies Forces; which the King deſign'd not to ſeek out, nor to decline fighting if they put themſelves in the Way. And ſo he reſolv'd to raiſe the Siege of Dennington-Caſtle, within a Mile of Newbury, which was now beſieg'd by Colonel Horton, who rais'd a Battery on the Foot of the Hill next Newbury, and ſo ply'd it with his large Cannon, that after twelve Days continual ſhooting, he beat down three Towers, and a Part of the Wall. This he believ'd had ſo humbled the Governour, Colonel Boys, and the Garriſon, that they wou'd be no longer ſtubborn as they had been; and therefore he ſent them another Summons; in which he magnify'd his own Clemency, 'That prevail'd 'with him, now they were at his Mercy, to offer them 'Quarter for their Lives, if they gave up the Caſtle before 'Wedneſday at Ten in the Morning; but if that his Favour was not accepted, he declar'd in the Preſence of 'God, that there ſhou'd not a Man among them have his 'Life ſpar'd.' The Governour made himſelf merry with this menacing Language; and ſent him Word, He wou'd keep the Place, and neither give nor receive Quarter. At this Time the Earl of Mancheſter and his Forces came before the Place, and receiving no expected Anſwer to his Summons, he reſolv'd to ſtorm it the next Day. But his Soldiers knowing the Reſolution of thoſe within, declin'd that hot Service, and ply'd it with their Artillery till the next Night, and then remov'd their Battery to the other Side, and began their Approaches by Saps; when the Governour made a brave Sally, beat them out of their Trenches, kill'd a Lieutenant-Colonel, with many Soldiers, ſhot the chief Cannoneer thro' the Head, brought away their Cannon Baskets and many Arms, and retired with little Loſs: Yet the next Night they finiſh'd their Battery, and continu'd ſome Days their great Shot, till they heard of the King's Army; whereupon they drew off their Ordnance, and their London Train'd-Bands being not arriv'd, the Earl thought fit to march away to a greater Diſtance; there having been above a Thouſand great Shot ſpent upon the Walls, without any other Damage to the Garriſon, than the beating down ſome old Parts of them.

Colonel Boys bravely defends Dennington-Caſtle.

The Governour repair'd to the King at Newbury, where he was Knighted for his great Bravery; and there was then ſo little Fear of the Enemy, that the King thought of delaying his Journey to Oxford, till he had reliev'd both Baſing and Banbury. And now Importunities being ſent from the laſt, which was upon the Point of ſurrendring for want of Victuals, the King was pleas'd, that the Earl of Northampton, the Governour of that Garriſon, who had left his valiant Brother his Lieutenant, ſhou'd attempt the Relief with three Regiments of Horſe; Orders being ſent to Oxford for Colonel Gage to meet him with ſome Forces from thence. This being done, they found a great Superiority of the Enemy's Horſe drawn up in five Bodies, near the Sconce, as if they deſign'd to take the Advantage of that Ground, and fight. But two or three Shots from a couple of Drakes made them ſtagger, and retire from their Ground with great Diſorder; and their Foot, being above ſeven Hundred, ran out of Banbury upon the firſt Advance of the King's Troops. Colonel Gage and the Foot, went to give Liberty to the Caſtle, while the Earl of Northampton follow'd the Horſe, furiouſly charg'd and routed them; and notwithſtanding they had lin'd ſome Hedges with Muſqueteers, purſu'd them till they were totally diſpers'd; their General, young Fiennes, continuing his Flight, till he reach'd Coventry. The Foot, for the moſt part, eſcap'd by the Incloſures, before Colonel Gage cou'd come up. Thus with conſiderable Loſs and Diſgrace to the Enemy, the Siege was rais'd before Banbury, which had continu'd full thirteen Weeks; ſo couragiouſly defended, that tho' the Famine left them but two Horſes uneaten, they had never ſuffer'd a Summons to be ſent to them: And it was now reliev'd the very Day of the Month, the 26th of October, that both Town and Caſtle had been ſurrender'd to the King two Years before.

Mancheſter and Waller joyn againſt the King.

5. The King now ſeem'd reaſonably ſucceſsful, but he ſoon paid dear for the Relief of Banbury, and the very next Day after the Service was perform'd. For Colonel Hurry, a Scotchman, who had formerly ſerv'd the Parliament, and after that done ſignal Service to the King, had, when the King enter'd Cornwall, deſir'd a Paſs from his Majeſty to go beyond the Seas; but inſtead of embarking himſelf, joyn'd with the Earl of Mancheſter's Army, and made a Diſcovery of all he knew of the King's Forces, and a Deſcription of the Perſons and Manners of the principal Commanders: So that as they well knew the Conſtitution and Infirmities of the King's Army, they had alſo Advice of the Earl of Northampton's March with three Regiments of Horſe to the Relief of Banbury. Whereupon, Mancheſter having united all thoſe Forces under Eſſex and Waller, which, with the London Train'd-Bands, compos'd a Body of above eight Thouſand Foot, and about as many Horſe, advanc'd towards the King at Newbury, who had not half the Number before the Departure of the Earl of Northampton, and did not believe that the Enemy cou'd have been joyn'd before the Return of that Earl. The King ſaw it was now too late to make a ſafe Retreat to Oxford, when the whole Body of the Enemy's Army, which had receiv'd poſitive Orders to fight the King, appear'd as near as Thackam: So that his Majeſty reſolv'd to ſtand only upon the Defenſive, hoping that, upon the Advantage he had of the Town of Newbury and the River, the Enemy wou'd not ſpeedily advance; and that by being now compell'd to lye in the Field in this cold Seaſon, while his Army was under Shelter, they might be forced to retire. The King quarter'd in the Town of Newbury, and put ſtrong Guards on the South of the Place; but the greateſt Part of the Army was lodg'd towards the Enemy's Quarters, in a little Village by Shaw, defended by the River that runs under Dennington-Caſtle. Directly North from thence were two open Fields, where moſt of the Horſe ſtood with the Train of Artillery; and about half a Mile Weſt was the Village of Speen, and beyond that a ſmall Heath. In this Village lay all Prince Maurice's Foot, and ſome Horſe; and a Work was caſt up at the Entrance of the Heath, which clear'd that Ground. In this Poſture they had many Skirmiſhes with the Enemy for two Days, without loſing any Ground; in which the Royaliſts had the Advantage.

BATTLE IV. The Second at Newbury.

On Sunday Morning, the 27th of October, by break of Day, a Thouſand of the Earl of Mancheſter's Army, with the London Train'd-Bands, came down the Hill, and paſs'd the River by Shaw; and undiſcover'd forc'd the Guard at a Paſs near the Houſe where Sir Bernard Aſtley lay; who immediately with a good Body of Muſqueteers fell upon the Enemy, routed them, and purſu'd them, ſlew and drowned many in the River, and took above two hundred Arms. The Enemy's Army having almoſt ſurrounded the King's, all that Day there were very warm Skirmiſhes in ſeveral Parts, with no Diſadvantage to the King; till about three in the Afternoon, Waller with his Party fell upon the Quarter at Speen, and paſs'd the River, at a Place ſtrong, but ill guarded, and leaſt ſuſpected at that time of Day. After which they march'd in good Order, with great Bodies of Foot, wing'd with Horſe, towards the Heath; from whence the Remainder of the King's Horſe retir'd, with too little Reſiſtance; being overpower'd, by reaſon the major Part of them were gone to provide Forrage. By which Means the Enemy poſſeſs'd themſelves of the Ordnance there planted, and of the Village of Speen; the Foot which were there, retir'd to a Hedge next the large Field between Speen and Newbury, which they made good. At the ſame Time the Right Wing of the Enemy's Horſe advanc'd under the Hill of Speen, with a hundred Muſqueteers in Front, towards a good Body of the King's Horſe, which at firſt receiv'd them in ſome Diſorder; but Sir John Cansfield, Commander of the Queen's Regiment of Horſe, charg'd them with ſo much Gallantry, that he routed that great Body, and purſu'd the Execution of them for near half a Mile, ſo that the whole Wing rally'd not again that Night. This brave Charge, which gave other Troops Opportunity to charge them in the Flank, ſav'd the King, and many of his Lords, from imminent Danger. At the ſame Time the Left Wing of the Enemy's Horſe advanc'd towards the North Side of the great Field; but before they had gone far, General Goring with the Earl of Cleveland's Brigade ſo furiouſly charg'd them, that he forc'd them over a Hedge in great Confuſion; and following them, was encounter'd by another freſh Body, which he likewiſe defeated; having not only routed and repell'd them, but endur'd the Shot of three Bodies of their Foot in their Purſuit, with no conſiderable Damage, only the Earl of Cleveland's Horſe falling under him, he was taken Priſoner. In the mean Time, on the other Side, twelve Hundred Horſe and three Thouſand Foot of the Earl of Mancheſter's Men, bravely advanc'd upon Shaw-Houſe, and the adjacent Field, which Quarter was defended by Sir Jacob Aſhley and Colonel Liſle, and the Houſe by Lieutenant-Colonel Page. They at firſt drove forty Muſqueteers from a Hedge; but were preſently charg'd by Sir John Brown, with the Prince's Regiment of Horſe, who purſu'd them with Execution, till meeting with another Body of their Horſe, he retir'd to the Foot in Mr. Doleman's Garden, which flank'd that Field. Here firing upon thoſe Horſe, and cauſing them to wheel about, Sir John fell on their Rear, kill'd many, and kept that Ground all the Day; when Colonel Thelwell's Reſerve of Foot gall'd their Foot with ſeveral Vollies, and then fell in with the But-Ends of their Muſquets, till they beat them quite out of the Field; leaving two Drakes, ſome Colours, and many dead Bodies behind them. At this Time a Body of their Foot attempted Doleman's Houſe, but were ſo well and briskly receiv'd by Page, that they were ſoon forc'd to retire with ſuch Confuſion, that they left five Hundred dead upon a little Spot of Ground: So they drew off the two Drakes into the Houſe, the Enemy being beaten off, and retir'd from all that Quarter.

The King retires.

It was now Night, for which neither Party was ſorry; and the King, who had been where the Enemy only prevail'd, imagin'd that his Army had ſuffer'd as much in all other Places. He ſaw they were intirely poſſeſs'd of Speen, and had taken all the Ordnance in that Place; by which it wou'd be eaſy to have ſurrounded him, before the next Morning. Upon which his Majeſty retired with the Prince and his Lords, into the Fields under Dennington-Caſtle; and about ten of the Clock all the Army, Horſe and Foot and Cannon, upon the King's Orders drew out their ſeveral Guards to the Heath about Dennington-Caſtle; in which they left moſt of their wounded Men, with all their Ordnance, Ammunition and Carriages: Then Prince Maurice, and the other Officers, march'd in good Order away to Wallingford; committing the bringing up the Rear to Sir Humphry Bennet, who with his Brigade of Horſe march'd behind without any Moleſtation; and by the Morning, the whole Army arriv'd at Wallingford; and ſo march'd to Oxford, without ſeeing any Party of the Enemy that look'd after them. Such was the Second Battle of Newbury, in which the King's Army was far inferior as to Numbers, and ſo neceſſarily divided, that it may as properly be call'd three Battles as one. As to the Advantage of the Day, many queſtion'd which Party really had it; and neither was ſufficiently ſatisfy'd with their Succeſs. There were certainly very many more kill'd of the Enemy, than of the King's Army; of which were ſlain three Lieutenant-Colonels, St. Leger, Topping and Leak, with not above a Hundred common Soldiers in all Places: More Officers were wounded, who all recover'd. The Officers of the Enemy's Side were never remember'd, being generally of no better Families than the common Soldiers; but it was reaſonably computed, that there cou'd not be ſo few as a Thouſand dead upon the Place: Yet becauſe the King's Army quitted the Field, and march'd away in the Night, the other Side thought themſelves Conquerors; and the Parliament celebrated their Victory with their uſual Triumphs; tho' within a few Days after, they diſcern'd they had little Reaſon for it.

Boys's Bravery.

The next Day, when they knew the King's Army was retir'd, they poſſeſs'd themſelves of Newbury; and then drew up their whole Army before Dennington-Caſtle, and ſummon'd the valiant Governour to deliver it to them, or elſe they wou'd not leave one Stone upon another. To which the Governour briskly reply'd, That he was not bound to repair it, but however, by God's Help, he wou'd keep the Ground afterwards. Seeing his Obſtinacy, they offer'd him to 'march away with the Arms, and all Things belonging 'to the Garriſon;' and when that mov'd not, 'That he 'ſhou'd carry all the Cannon and Ammunition with him:'

To all which he reply'd, That he wonder'd they wou'd not be ſatisfy'd with all the Anſwers he had ſent, and deſir'd them to be aſſur'd, That his Majeſty had entruſted that Place to him, and tho' they wou'd allow him to take whatever was in the Caſtle, and if poſſible the Caſtle it ſelf, yet he wou'd not forſake his Ground; but till his Majeſty ſhou'd command him thence, he wou'd live and dye in the Place. Offended at theſe high Anſwers, they reſolv'd to attack the Place, but the Officer who commanded the Party being kill'd, with ſome of the Soldiers, they retir'd, and never after made any Attempt upon it; but remain'd quietly at Newbury in great Faction among themſelves; every Man taking upon himſelf to cenſure what had been wrong done, or omitted, in the whole Day's Service.

The King reinforces his Army.

6. In the mean Time the King and Prince with three Hundred Horſe repair'd to Bath, where he met with Prince Rupert, and his Forces, together with Colonel Gerrard and Sir Marmaduke Langdale; and us'd all Expedition to joyn thoſe Forces with his own Army, that he might march back to Newbury, and diſengage his Cannon and Carriages. In his Paſſage he met with the Earl of Northampton, and thoſe Regiments that had reliev'd Banbury; and having with indefatigable Diligence caus'd a new Train of Artillery to be form'd, he brought his Army again to a Rendezvous on Bullington-Green; where with the Addition of thoſe Forces, and ſome Foot, which he drew out of Oxford under the Command of Colonel Gage, it made up full ſix Thouſand Foot, and five Thouſand Horſe. With this brave Army he march'd to Wallingford; and within eight Days after he had left Dennington-Caſtle, found himſelf there again, and in ſo good a Poſture, that he determin'd not to decline fighting with the Enemy; but he reſolv'd firſt to be poſſeſs'd of his Cannon, and put ſome Proviſions into the Caſtle; both which he accompliſh'd without any Oppoſition.

He offers the Enemy Battle.

Still the Enemy's Army lay at Newbury, perplex'd with their own Diviſions and Factions, without Notice of the King's Advance, till a Quarter of their Horſe was beaten up. The next Morning the King drew up his Army in Battalia; Prince Rupert, now declar'd General, led the Van, and got Poſſeſſion of the Heath, on the Backſide of the Caſtle, from which a ſmall Party might have kept him. On that Heath the King's Army was drawn up about Noon, being all prepar'd for Battle; and none of the Enemy appearing, they march'd over the River by the Caſtle, and drew into a large Field between Speen and Newbury. In the mean Time the Enemy had drawn a great Body of their Horſe and Foot into the other Field towards Shaw, and had made Breaſt-Works and Batteries on the Back-ſide of Newbury; which Town they reſolv'd to keep, and ſtand upon the Defenſive, as the King had done before. Some light Skirmiſhes paſs'd between the Horſe, but when the King ſaw upon what Diſadvantages he muſt force them to a Battle, he call'd a Council of War, who unanimouſly concluded, 'That ſince he had reliev'd the Caſtle, and 'that it was in his Power to draw off his Ordnance and 'Ammunition, he had compleated his Buſineſs; and if any 'Honour had been loſt the other Day, it was now fully re'gain'd, by paſſing his Army over the River in the Face of 'theirs, and offering them Battle, when they durſt not accept 'of it.' Upon which the King reſolv'd to attempt them no farther, but gave Orders on the 9th of November to retire in their View, with Drums beating, and Trumpets ſounding, the ſame Way he came over the River. This Parting was ſo inglorious to the Parliament Party, that the Earl of Eſſex, who was then at London, ſent Word to General Goring, That if He had been preſent, the King's Forces ſhou'd not have drawn off ſo quietly.

From hence the King march'd to Marlborough; but ſtill his Heart was ſet upon the Relief of Baſing, which after Colonel Gage's Relief of it, was as much diſtreſs'd as before. He once thought to attempt it with his whole Army, and thereby draw the Enemy to a Battle; but upon a full Debate, it was concluded, 'That a Thouſand Horſe ſhou'd 'be drawn out, and every one of them ſhould carry a 'Bag of Corn, or other Proviſions, and march ſo as to be 'at Baſing-Houſe the next Morning, after they parted from 'the Army; and that then every Man was to caſt down 'his Bag, and make his Retreat as well as he could:' And Colonel Gage, who had been ſo ſucceſsful there, was appointed to command this Party. The better to effect it, Hungerford was thought beſt to quarter with the Army, and from thence to diſpatch that Party. So the King march'd back to Hungerford, while the Enemy march'd from Newbury to Baſing, which they concluded would have yielded at the Sight of their Army: But finding the Marqueſs of Wincheſter inviolably reſolute, they quitted the Siege the very Day before the Arrival of Colonel Gage, who eaſily deliver'd his Proviſions, and retir'd ſafe to the King. After which his Majeſty march'd to Farrington, and having conſider'd where to quarter his Horſe, he return'd to Oxford, the 23d Day of November; where he was receiv'd with Univerſal Joy and Applauſes by that Univerſity and City. Thus the King concluded a Six Months Campaign, in which he nobly diſplay'd his Genius, and ſhew'd Himſelf a moſt vigilant and valiant Commander; and notwithſtanding the ſhameful Miſmanagement and Neglect of his great Officers Wilmot and Goring, he overcame mighty Difficulties, and gain'd unexpected Advantages, from the Time he left Oxford in great Diſtreſs, to his preſent ſafe Return.

He returns to Oxford, and concludes the Campaign.

The Miſeries in England,

There were, beſides the greater Affairs of the Campaign, in all Parts of the Nation, many ſmaller Motions, Actions, Skirmiſhes and Encounters, beſides innumerable Ravages, Robberies, Murders and Devaſtations, which like a Deluge overſpread the Nation, and broke down the great Fences of Nature and Humanity, and the Tyes of Amity and Affinity; rendring Mankind more fierce and inexorable than the moſt ſavage of Brute Creatures. Both Parties were deeply involv'd in this General Miſchief; and as to the Parliament Side, Whitelock Himſelf, more than once, complains of the Barbarities of the Soldiers, this particular Year, of the Murdering of Men, the Raviſhing of Women, with innumerable wicked Actions committed by them, to the unſpeakable Miſery of the poor Country. Theſe, as he obſerves, following the Example of their Commanders, it was found high Time to make a Reformation among them. As to Religious Matters, infinite Diſturbances and Diſtractions were caus'd where the Parliament had the Power, by the new Ways of Reformation, the Demoliſhing of all the pretended Monuments of Idolatry, deſtroying all Organs, Rails, Surplices, Superſtitious Veſtments, &c. at the Price of the moſt ſcandalous Sort of Robberies and Sacrilege. Theſe Methods gave Riſe to ſo many Hereſies and Diviſions, that their own Miniſters of the City of London, September the 18th, in a Petition to the Commons, Beg leave to Sigh out their Sorrows, and confeſs, Through many erroneous Opinions, ruinating Schiſms, and damnable Hereſies, unhappily fomented in City and Country, the Orthodox Miniſtry is neglected; the People ſeduced; Congregations torn aſunder; Families diſtracted; Rights and Duties of Relations, National, Civil, and Spiritual, ſcandalouſly violated, the Power of Godlineſs decayed; Parliamentary Authority undermined; fearful Confuſion introduc'd; imminent Deſtruction threatned. &c. So if we look upon poor England, either in its Civil, or Religious Condition, this Year, we find it the moſt perfect Scene of the moſt deplorable Miſery.

And in Scotland,

Then to compleat the Miſeries of all the Britiſh Dominions, there broke out a new Fire in Scotland, where all the Troubles had their Beginning; which rag'd in that Kingdom after an extraordinary Manner. This was occaſion'd by the remarkable Oppoſition of the Royaliſts in thoſe Parts, headed by the famous Marqueſs of Montroſs, who at Thirty Years of Age, having the King's own Encouragement, and the Promiſe of the Aſſiſtance of the Marqueſs of Antrim from Ireland, with incomparable Diligence undertook the Cauſe, and with ſuch ſmall Supports perform'd ſuch valiant Actions, as caus'd all Men equally to admire at the Undertaking, and the Succeſs. With a Handful of Men, and without Arms, he bravely undertook the King's Cauſe, and in a few Months Time gain'd three remarkable Battles, one at Perth, another at Aberdeen, and a Third at Innerlogh. In ſhort, he prevail'd in ſo many Attempts, that in effect he made Himſelf Maſter of the Kingdom, and perform'd all thoſe ſtupendous Acts, which are deſervedly the Subject of a diſtinct Hiſtory; but ſomewhat too foreign to be particulariz'd in This.

Diſtractions in the Parliament.

VI. 1. The Affairs of the Parliament were now attended with great Diſtractions and Emulations; and all perſonal Animoſities began to break out in their Councils, and their Armies. That furious Party, that had at firſt ſeduc'd the Reſt into the War, had been long unſatisfy'd with the Earl of Eſſex, and he no leſs with Them; and both were now more deſirous to ſuppreſs the other, than to deſtroy the King. They well bore the Loſs and Diſhonour he ſuſtain'd in Cornwall, and would have been willing that He and his Army had been both cut off, inſtead of being diſſolv'd; for moſt of his Officers and Soldiers had loſt their Affections towards them, and deſir'd nothing but Peace: For which Reaſon they reſolv'd never more to truſt or employ any of them. But that which more perplex'd them, was, That the Earl of Mancheſter, upon whom they depended as a certain Friend, appear'd now as unmanageable to their Deſigns as the other; and there was an irreconcilable Breach fallen out between Him and the riſing Man Cromwell, which brought ſome precipitated Counſels upon the Stage. Cromwell accus'd the Earl of cowardly betraying the Parliament; 'For that he 'might very eaſily have defeated the King's Army at New'bury, when he drew off his Cannon, if he would have 'permitted him with his own Brigade to have charg'd the 'Army in their Retreat: And that the Earl obſtinately op-

Diſputes between Mancheſter and Cromwell.

'poſ'd all Advice and Importunity; giving no other Reaſon, than That if he did overthrow the King's Army, the King would always have another to keep up the War; but if his Army ſhould be overthrown at that nice Juncture, they ſhould be all Rebels and Traytors, and executed and forfeited by the Law.' This Declaration, what the Law would do againſt them, was heinouſly taken by the Parliament, as if the Earl believ'd the Law to be againſt them, after they had made ſo many Declarations, That the Law was on their Side. The Earl confeſs'd, 'That he had in Effect ſaid, That they ſhould be treated as Traytors, if their Army was defeated, when he miſlik'd the Lieutenant-General's Advice, in expoſing the Army to an unſeaſonable Hazard: And then recriminated upon his Adverſary, That at another Time, Cromwell freely diſcourſing with him of the State of the Kingdom, and propoſing an Expedient, the Earl anſwer'd, That the Parliament would never approve it; to which Cromwell quickly reply'd, My Lord, if you will ſtick firm to honeſt Men, you will find an Army at your Command, that will give the Law to King and Parliament: Which Diſcourſe made a great Impreſſion upon him; and finding him a Man of very deep Deſigns, he was the more careful to preſerve an Army which he thought ſtill faithful to the Parliament.' This was very Startling to thoſe who had always an Averſion to Cromwell, and knew the Fierceneſs of his Nature; therefore they deſir'd this Matter might be thoroughly examin'd, and brought to Judgment. But the other Side laid all Impediments in the Way, and rather choſe to loſe the Advantage they had againſt the Earl of Mancheſter, than to have a Matter examin'd, that would certainly make ſome Diſcoveries that were not yet fit to be produc'd. However, the Animoſities encreas'd, and the Parties openly appear'd againſt each other, to the Dividing of the City, as well as the Parliament; inſomuch, that all ſober Men began to wiſh for Peace, tho' none knew how to get it mov'd or mention'd in the Houſes.

The Scots diſcontented.

The Scotch Commiſſioners were as jealous and diſſatisfy'd as any other Party; and found, ſince the Battle of Marſton-Moor, neither their Army nor Themſelves ſo much conſider'd as formerly, nor Conditions perform'd towards them with any Exactneſs. They long had Jealouſies of Cromwell, and Sir Henry Vane, and all that Party, which they ſaw daily encreaſing, and growing powerful in the Parliament, in the Council, and in the City. Their great Idol, the Covenant, was mention'd with leſs Reverence and Reſpect; and the Independents, which comprehended many Sects in Religion, ſpoke publickly againſt it; of which Party Cromwell and Vane were the Leaders. So that the Scots plainly ſaw, that tho' they had done as much as they deſir'd towards the Overthrow of the Church of England, they ſhould never be able to eſtabliſh their beloved Presbyterian Government; and likewiſe found, that there was a Deſign in this new Party to change the whole Frame of the Government, from a Monarchy, to a Republick; which was as far from the Intention of that Nation, as the Reſtoration of Epiſcopacy. So that they diſcover'd no Way to prevent the impending Confuſion, but by a Peace; which they began heartily to wiſh, and to conſpire with thoſe of that Party that deſir'd moſt to effect it; but ſtill knew not how to ſet a Treaty on Foot. The Houſe of Peers excepting three or four, earneſtly deſir'd it, but had not Power to compaſs it; and in the Houſe of Commons there were enough who would have been very glad to bring it about, but had not the Courage to propoſe it. They who were the moſt real Enemies to it, wrought upon many of the other to believe, 'That they would accept of a Treaty, if the King deſir'd it; but that it would be diſhonourable, and of pernicious Conſequence, if the Parliament firſt propos'd it.' They who deſir'd a Peace try'd their old Friends of the City, and ſet ſome of them to get Hands to a Petition, by which the Parliament ſhou'd be mov'd to ſend to the King to Treat of Peace. But that Deſign was no ſooner known, but others of an oppoſite Party were appointed to ſet a Counter Petition on Foot, by which they ſhould diſclaim any Conſent to, or Approbation of the other Petition. So that they who wiſh'd for a Peace, found the Way to it ſo difficult, and that it was impoſſible to prevail with the two Houſes to propoſe it to the King, that they reſolv'd 'it could only ariſe from his Majeſty; and to that Purpoſe they ſhould all labour with their ſeveral Friends at Oxford, to incline the King to ſend a Meſſage to the Parliament, to offer a Treaty of Peace in any Place where they ſhould appoint; and then they would all run the utmoſt Hazard before it ſhould be rejected.

Several Endeavours for a Peace.

The Parliament ſend their Propoſitions to the King.

But finding that it was much more eaſy to hinder a Peace, than to prevent a Treaty, they at laſt thought fit, by Way of Anſwer to the King's ſeveral Meſſages of Peace, to ſend him their own Terms by Commiſſioners on purpoſe, the Earl of Denbigh and Lord Maynard for the Peers; Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Whitelock, and the Lord Wenman of the Commons; the Lord Maitland, Sir Charles Ereskin, and Mr. Barclay for Scotland. Theſe all arriv'd at Oxford in November, and were very obligingly receiv'd by his Majeſty, who heard the High Propoſitions read by the Earl of Denbigh, with much Patience; and then demanded of the Commiſſioners, If they had Power to Treat? they anſwer'd, No; but their Commiſſion was to receive his Majeſty's Anſwer in Writing. The King reply'd, Then a Letter-Carrier might have done as much as You. Upon which return'd the proud Earl of Denbigh, I ſuppoſe your Majeſty looks upon Us as Perſons of another Condition than Letter-Carriers. The King anſwer'd calmly again, I know your Condition; but I ſay, That your Commiſſion gives you Power to do no more than a Letter-Carrier might have done. The King had ſhortly after an Opportunity of private Diſcourſe with two of the Commiſſioners, Hollis and Whitelock, and had ſuch Confidence in them, and in his own Integrity, that he left it to them two to draw up in Writing what they apprehended might be fit to return in Anſwer to the Meſſage. The Subſtance was, beſides Expreſſions of his Majeſty's Deſire for a Peace, at a Conference of both Houſes, to demand a ſafe Conduct for the Duke of Richmond, and the Earl of Southampton, to come with an Anſwer to their Propoſitions; which, after many Strugglings, was obtain'd at Weſtminſter, and in no long Time brought about the noted Treaty of Uxbridge.

The deep Deſigns of the Independents.

2. In the mean Time the Independent Party, who now began to act under that Denomination, had reſolv'd to have no further Concern with either of their Generals; but how to lay them aſide, was a mighty Difficulty, eſpecially the Earl of Eſſex, who had been ſo much their Founder and Supporter, that it was hard to know which would prove greater, the Ingratitude, or the Danger. Therefore till they could find ſome Expedient to extricate themſelves out of this Labyrinth, they would advance Nothing towards the Recruiting or Supplying their Armies, or the Providing for any Winter Expedition; only they ſent Waller out with ſome Troops that they did not value, and reſolv'd to uſe their Service no more. They knew not how to propoſe to the Parliament the vaſt Alterations they intended; and of all Men they durſt not truſt the Scotch Commiſſioners. But at length they reſolv'd to purſue the grand Method, that had ſo often recover'd and ſecur'd them, which was to plant and ripen Things in the Church, till they might be brought to Maturity in the Parliament. To effect which, they agreed in the Houſes, 'That they would have a ſolemn Faſt Day, in which they would SEEK GOD,' according to the new Phraſe brought from Scotland with the Covenant; and they agreed on the Nomination of the Preachers, who were to perform that Exerciſe, and who were more truſted in the deepeſt Deſigns, than moſt of their Electors: For there was now a Diviſion among their Clergy, as well as the Laity; and the Independents, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, were the bolder, and greater Politicians.

A Faſt procured by Them.

Theſe dark Deſigns being form'd, and the Faſt Day arriv'd, which was the 18th of December, the Preachers, who kept up their Congregation for Eight or Ten Hours together, moſt fervently pray'd, 'That the Parliament might be inſpired with thoſe Thoughts, as might contribute to their Honour and Reputation; and might preſerve that Opinion the Nation had of their Honeſty and Integrity, and be without any ſelfiſh Ends, or ſeeking their own Profit.' After ſuch Preparation by their Prayers, let their Texts be what they wou'd, theſe State Engines told them plainly, 'That it was no Wonder there were ſuch Diviſions in their Counſels, when there was no Union in their Hearts: That the Parliament lay under many Reproaches, not only among their Enemies, but their beſt Friends; who were the more out of Countenance becauſe they found that the Aſperſions thrown upon them by their Enemies, were ſo well grounded, as not to be wip'd off: That there was as great Pride, as great Ambition, as many private Ends, and as little Zeal for the Publick, as they had ever imputed to the Court: That whilſt they pretended, out of the publick Coſt and Purſes of the poor People, to make a general Reformation, their chief Care was to make themſelves Great and Rich, and that all Men took Notice, with great Anxiety of Mind, that all the Offices in the Army, and the profitable Places in the Kingdom, were in the Hands of the Members of Parliament; who while the Nation grew poor, under inſupportable Taxes, grew ſo rich, that they wou'd in a ſhort Time get all the Money in the Kingdom into their Hands; and that it cou'd not be expected, that ſuch Men, who were ſuch unreaſonable Gainers by the Continuance of the War, wou'd heartily endeavour to put an End to that, which muſt put an End to their exorbitant Profit.' When they had as pathetically exaggerated theſe Reproaches as they cou'd, and the Senſe the People had of the Corruption, even to a Deſpair of ever ſeeing an End of the preſent Calamities, or having any Proſpect of that Reformation, they had ſo often promis'd to make, they return'd again to their Prayers, 'That God wou'd take his own Work into his Hands; and if the Inſtruments he had already employ'd, were not worthy to bring ſo glorious a Deſign to a Concluſion, that he wou'd inſpire others more fit, who might perfect what was begun, and bring the Troubles of the Nation to a Godly Period.

1644. Car. 20.

Sir Henry Vane's Speech in the Parliament.

The next Day after theſe fervent Animadverſions, when the two Houſes met, there appear'd another Spirit in the very Looks of many of them. Here the ſubtle Sir Henry Vane told them, 'If ever God had appear'd to them, it was in the Exerciſe of Yeſterday; and that it proceeded from God, was plain, becauſe, as he was inform'd from the Auditors of other Congregations, the ſame Lamentations and Diſcourſes had been made in all other Churches, as the godly Preachers had made before them; which cou'd therefore proceed only from the immediate Spirit of God.' Then he repeated ſome things which had been ſaid, upon which he was beſt prepar'd to enlarge, and beſought them 'To remember God and their Country; and that they wou'd free themſelves from thoſe juſt Reproaches; which cou'd not be otherwiſe done, but by diveſting themſelves of all Offices that might bring in the leaſt Advantage to themſelves: By this only they cou'd make it appear, That they were publick-hearted Men; and as they paid all Taxes with the reſt of the Nation, ſo they gave up all their Time to their Country's Service, without Reward or Gratuity.' He further told them, 'That the Reflections of Yeſterday, of which none had ever enter'd upon his Spirit before, had rais'd a new Reflection, more than had been mention'd; which was, That it had been often complain'd of and objected by the King himſelf, That the Numbers of the Members of Parliament were too few to give Authority to Acts of ſo great Moment, as were tranſacted in their Councils; which, tho' it was not their Faults, who kept their proper Stations, but theirs who deſerted their Places and Truſts; yet in reality, there were too many abſent, tho' in the Service, and by the Appointment of the Houſes: But if all the Members were oblig'd perſonally to attend their Service in Parliament, it wou'd bring great Reputation to their Numbers, and the People wou'd pay more Reverence, and fuller Obedience to their Commands.' After he had carry'd the Point ſo far, he told them by Way of Concluſion, 'That he was ready to accuſe himſelf for one of thoſe who gain'd by an Office he had, in the Treaſurer-ſhip of the Navy; and tho' he was poſſeſs'd of it before the beginning of the Troubles, without owing it to the Favour of the Parliament, yet he was ready to give it up to them, and deſir'd the Profits of it might be apply'd towards the Support of the War.

Cromwell's Speech.

When Sir Henry had ſufficiently open'd the Way, Cromwell, who had not yet gain'd the Faculty of ſpeaking with Decency and Temper, ſtruck in and commended the Preachers, for dealing plainly and impartially, and telling them of their Faults, which they had been ſo unwilling to hear of. He declar'd 'That there were many things, upon which he never reflected before, yet upon Re-conſideration, he cou'd not but own that all was very true; and till there was a Perfect Reformation in thoſe Particulars recommended to them, nothing they took in Hand wou'd proſper: That the Parliament had done wiſely in the beginning of the War, to engage many of their Members in the moſt dangerous Parts of it, that the Nation might ſee they deſign'd not to embark others in Perils, whilſt themſelves ſat ſecurely out of Gun-ſhot, but wou'd march with them where the Danger moſt threatned; and thoſe honourable Perſons, who had thus expos'd themſelves, had merited ſo much of their Country, that their Memories ſhould be held in perpetual Veneration; and whatever ſhou'd be well done after them, wou'd be imputed to their Example. But now God had ſo bleſs'd their Army, that there had grown up with it many excellent Officers, who were fitter for much greater Charges than they now enjoy'd: Therefore he deſired them not to be terrify'd with an Imagination, that they ſhou'd want able Men to fill the greateſt Vacancy; for beſides that it was not good to put ſo much Truſt in any Arm of Fleſh, as to think ſuch a Cauſe as this depended upon any One Man, ſo he aſſur'd them, That they had Officers in their Army, who were fit to be Generals in any Enterprize in Chriſtendom.' He further ſaid, 'He thought nothing ſo neceſſary as to vindicate the Parliament from Partiality towards their own Members,' and made any Offer to lay down his own Commiſſion in the Army, and deſir'd, that an Ordinance might be prepar'd, 'To make it unlawful for any Member of either Houſe to hold any Office in the Army, or any Place in the State;' and ſo concluded with an Enlargement upon the Vices and Corruptions gotten into the Army; and plainly ſaid, 'That till the whole Army were new modell'd, and brought under ſtricter Diſcipline, they muſt not expect any remarkable Succeſs in any thing they undertook.' This Debate ended in appointing a Committee, to prepare an Ordinance for the Excluſion of all Members from the aforeſaid Truſts, which took up much Time and Debate, before it cou'd be brought to a Concluſion; and in the End was call'd The Self-denying Ordinance; the furious driving on of which much encreas'd the Inclination of the other Party to a Peace, as the only viſible Remedy to ſave themſelves, and the Nation.

He propoſes a Self-denying Ordinance.

1644. Car. 20.

3. During the Time of this grand Struggle, the two Houſes thought fit to proceed to the Tryal and Condemnation of ſeveral State Malefactors, as they accounted them; ſo that what Blood was ſpared by the Sword, ſhou'd in ſome Meaſure be deſtroy'd by the Ax and the Gibbet. They began indeed with two Perſons highly obnoxious, and the chief Contrivers of the horrid Conſpiracy and Rebellion in Ireland, the Lord Macguire, and Mac-Mahone Eſquire. Theſe two had been ſeiz'd at Dublin, and in the Year 1642 ſent over into England, and committed to the Tower, from whence this Year they made their Eſcape; but were ſoon after diſcover'd, ſecur'd, and brought to their Tryals in the Month of November. Mac-Mahone was firſt found guilty, receiv'd Judgment as in Caſes of Treaſon, and was accordingly executed at Tyburn; where he refus'd to make any Confeſſion, and being as'd if he deſir'd any to pray for him, he anſwer'd, None but Roman Catholicks. The Lord Macguire, being an Iriſh Baron, pleaded his Peerage, in which he was over-rul'd; and being, after many Struggles, condemn'd as a Traytor, he petition'd to be beheaded; which being likewiſe refus'd, he ſuffer'd the ſame Fate at Tyburn as the other. Both had been tamper'd with to accuſe the King, as an Abetter in this wretched Rebellion, but to no Effect; and particularly Macguire generouſly diſown'd the pretended Commiſſion from the Crown at the very Place of his Execution.

The Condemnation of Macguire, and Mac-Mahone,

The next that follow'd was Sir Alexander Carew, formerly mention'd, one of the Knights of the Shire for Cornwall, a wealthy Gentleman, who from the Beginning had concurr'd with the Parliament in their moſt violent and furious Proceedings; and one ſo deeply involv'd in the Blood of the Earl of Strafford, that he declar'd, If he was ſure to ſuffer next himſelf upon the ſame Scaffold, and with the ſame Axe, he wou'd paſs the Bill againſt him, as is before remember'd. But afterwards finding his Eſtate in Cornwall in Danger, or perhaps ſtricken with Remorſe, he ſeem'd willing to redeem his former Errors, and correſponded with the King's Forces for the ſurrendering of the Fort of Plymouth, where he was Governor. This being manag'd with too little, or rather too nice Caution, his Deſign was diſcover'd, his Perſon ſecur'd, and now try'd by a Court-Martial at Guild-Hall, upon the 19th of November; a Day remarkable for ſome ſtrange Prodigies in the Air, and about the Sun, which were the more obſerv'd, becauſe it was the Anniverſary of the King's Birth-Day. Being condemn'd to be Beheaded, he obtain'd a little above a Month's Reprieve, and at laſt he was brought to the Tower-Hill upon the twenty-third of December, where among his Sins, he eſpecially confeſs'd his Pride and Stout-heartedneſs, and then exactly accompliſh'd his former preſaging Words, by being the very next Man that ſuffer'd upon the ſame Scaffold, and by the ſame Axe, with the great Earl of Strafford.

Of Sir Alexander Carew,

This Execution was ſoon after ſucceeded by another Inſtance of the Divine Vengeance, as it is call'd by the beſt Writers, namely the Fate of the two Hothams, Sir John and his Son; who once had it in their Power to prevent the whole War, by opening the Gates of Hull; when the Father wiſh'd That God wou'd bring Confuſion upon him and his, if he were not a faithful Subject. Theſe two unhappy Gentlemen had been kept long in Cuſtody, and now at laſt call'd to their Tryals by thoſe who reſolv'd to new model the Army. The principal Charge againſt the Father, was his ſuffering the Lord Digby to eſcape, as is formerly mention'd; and a Letter was produc'd, by the Treachery of a Servant, againſt the Son, which he had ſent to the Marqueſs of Newcaſtle. They were both condemn'd by a Court of War to loſe their Heads; and the vile Artifices us'd both before and after their Tryals, were ſo inhumane, as have been rarely practis'd among Chriſtians. The Father was firſt order'd to ſuffer upon an appointed Day, and the Son the Day following: But the very Morning that Sir John was to die, a Reprieve was ſent from the Houſe of Lords to ſuſpend his Execution three Days. The Commons were highly incens'd at this Preſumption, and immediately made an Order, 'to all Sheriffs and Miniſters of Juſtice, That no Reprieve ſhou'd be allow'd for any Perſon, lying under the Sentence of Death, except the ſame had paſs'd and had the Conſent of both Houſes of Parliament; and that if it paſs'd only by the Houſe of Peers, it ſhou'd be look'd upon as invalid and void. By this Accident the Son was firſt brought to his Execution, tion, upon the Day on which he was ſentenc'd to ſuffer; who dy'd with Courage, and reproaching the Ingratitude of the Parliament, and their Continuance of the War, concluded, That as to them he was Innocent, and had never been guilty of Treaſon. The Father was brought to the Scaffold the next Day, by the ſole Authority of the Houſe of Commons, who order'd the Lieutenant of the Tower to execute him two Days before the Lords Reprieve was expired. Whether he had yet ſome Promiſe from his Confeſſor Peters, that he ſhou'd only be ſhew'd to the People and return'd to the Tower, as it was then generally believ'd; or whether he was broken with Deſpair, when he ſaw his Enemies wou'd not permit him to live thoſe two Days the Lords had granted him, certain it is that the poor Gentleman appear'd ſo diſpirited, that he ſpoke but few Words after he came upon the Scaffold, and ſuffer'd Hugh Peters to tell the People, That he had reveal'd himſelf to him, and confeſs'd his Offences againſt the Parliament; and ſo he committed his Head to the Block, upon the ſecond Day of January, 164$\frac{4}{5}$. Such was the dreadful Fate of thoſe two unfortunate Gentlemen; in which there were ſo many uncommon Circumſtances, that the immediate Hand of Heaven cou'd not but appear to all Men who knew their Natures, Humours and Tranſactions.

And of the two Hothams.

4. Thus did the Parliament begin to glut themſelves with the Blood of their Friends and Enemies; but the grand Victim was the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had long felt the Height of their Reſentments, and was now chiefly to fall a Sacrifice to the Kingdom of Scotland, which was reſolv'd to deſtroy both him and Epiſcopacy. After a tedious Impriſonment, in which he met with great Hardſhips, both as to his Perſon and Eſtate, he was brought to his Tryal before the Houſe of Lords, on the twelfth of March, 164$\frac{3}{4}$. where he was impeach'd by the Commons of High-Treaſon, and other great Crimes and Miſdemeanors. Their Managers againſt him were Serjeant Wilde, Mr. Brown, Mr. Maynard, and Mr. Nicolas; and the providing of the Evidence was truſted to his implacable Enemy Mr. Prynne, who was Relator and Prompter, and all; but ſtill aſſiſted by two inferior Perſons, Mr. Grice, and Mr. Beck. The Articles againſt him were twenty four in Number, but reduc'd under four General Heads.

The Tryal of Archbiſhop Laud,

The Charge againſt him.

‘ 1. His traiterous Endeavours to alter and ſubvert God's true Religion, by Law eſtabliſh'd, and inſtead thereof to ſet up Popiſh Superſtition and Idolatry. 2. His traiterous Uſurpation of a Papal and Tyrannical Power in the Church of England, in all Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, to the Prejudice of his Majeſty's Royal Prerogative. 3. His traiterous Attempts to ſubvert the Fundamental Temporal Laws and Liberties of the Realm and Subjects of England, and inſtead thereof to introduce an Arbitrary Government, againſt Law, and the Subject's Liberty. 4. His traiterous Endeavours to ſubvert the Rights of Parliament, and ancient Courſe of Parliamentary Proceedings, and by falſe and malicious Slanders to incenſe his Majeſty againſt them.’ Serjeant Wilde open'd the Charge with a long aggravating Speech, and thus concluded, This Man, my Lords, is like Naaman the Aſſyrian, a great Man, but a Leper. Upon which the Archbiſhop, in another Speech, with great Eloquence and Courage, ſhew'd Himſelf a ſtrict Obſerver of the Laws of the Land, and a true Profeſſor of the eſtabliſh'd Church of England; wip'd off all Aſperſions of Popery, and concluded with the Names of One and Twenty eminent Popiſh Recuſants, whom he by Labour and Perſonal Conference had reduced to the Proteſtant Communion.

This famous Tryal was almoſt five Months depending in the Houſe of Lords, before they came to ſum up his Charge, and conſiſted of Twenty long Days hearing; at which there were never above Fourteen Lords preſent at one Time, uſually not above Eleven or Twelve; and of thoſe, one third Part each Day took Occaſion to retire, before the Charge of the Day was half over. Mr. Prynne made uſe of his Skill and Induſtry, both in producing and tampering with the Witneſſes, as the Archbiſhop complains in his Hiſtory, who reckon'd it a particular Hardſhip that a Man, doubly ſtigmatiz'd, ſhould be truſted with the Witneſſes, and the Evidence againſt him. A large Heap of Crimes and Failings were brought againſt him by his Accuſers, who ſearch'd and examin'd into all the great and all the little Actions of his Life; every perſonal Infirmity, every indiſcreet Action, and every paſſionate Word that could be remember'd, was ſifted and aggravated, and the beſt and nobleſt of his Performances were perverted with all imaginable Spite and Artifice. To all which he made ſuch a ready and admirable Defence, that an Author not thought partial to his Cauſe, ſays, ‘ That the Innocence of this Prelate, and the Malice of his Enemies are hardly to be match'd in any Account of the Primitive Perſecutions.’ Nay, his greateſt Adverſary Mr. Prynne, ſpeaking of his Defence in the Account of his Tryal, ſays, ‘ That he made as full, as gallant, as pithy a Defence, and ſpake as much for Himſelf as was poſſible for the Wit of Man to invent; and that with ſo much Art, Vivacity, Oratory, Audacity and Confidence, that he ſhew'd not the leaſt Acknowledgment of Guilt in any of the Particulars which were charg'd upon him.’ On the 29th of July, the laſt Day of his Hearing before the Lords, he made a Recapitulation of all that had been charg'd upon him, and of all that had been anſwer'd in his own Defence, and thus concluded, Now, my Lords, I do in all Humility lay myſelf low at God's Mercy-Seat, to do with me as he pleaſes; and under God, I ſhall rely upon your Lordſhips Juſtice, Honour, and Clemency, of which I cannot doubt, &c.

His Defence.

When all the Articles, and utmoſt Proof of them by the moſt prejudic'd Perſons, were not likely to prevail with the Lords to find him guilty of the Impeachment, tho' they were generally Enemies to his Perſon and Character; the Commons, by the Inſtigation of the Scots, took the Judicature after the moſt Illegal Manner to Themſelves, and had him ſeveral Days brought to their Bar, where he made a new Defence of Himſelf; and at length on the Sixteenth of November, they paſs'd an Ordinance to make him guilty of High-Treaſon. This being tranſmitted to the Lords, they referr'd themſelves to the Judges, who unanimouſly anſwer'd, ‘ That nothing charg'd againſt the Archbiſhop was Treaſon, by any known and eſtabliſh'd Law of the Land.’ Upon which the Lords, in Conference with the Commons, declar'd to them, ‘ That they had diligently weigh'd all Things that were charg'd againſt Him; but could not by any one of them, or All, find him guilty of Treaſon.’ This occaſion'd the Commons to have recourſe to their old Arts, and bring down one Watkins, with his general Muſter of Subſcriptions, and to put a Petition into his Hands, to be deliver'd by him to the Houſes, wherein, among other Things, it was requir'd, ‘ That they ſhould vigorouſly proceed to the Puniſhment of all Delinquents; and that for the moſt quick Diſpatch of publick Buſineſs of State, the Lords ſhould pleaſe to vote and ſit together with the Commons. And yet not thinking this Contrivance ſufficient to fright their Lordſhips to a preſent Compliance, the furious Mr. Stroud was ſent up with a Meſſage from the Commons, to let them know, ‘ That the London Citizens wou'd ſhortly bring a Petition with Twenty Thouſand Hands, to obtain that Ordinance.’ By which ſtale and common Stratagem, they wrought ſo far on ſome weak Spirits, the reſt withdrawing themſelves, as in the Caſe of the Earl of Strafford, that in a very thin Houſe, not above ſix or ſeven in Number, it was paſſed at laſt, upon the 4th Day of January, 164$\frac{4}{5}$. The Names of Six of the Lords were the Earls of Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Bullingbrook, the Lord North, and the Lord Gray of Wark, the Speaker. This is the firſt Time that ever the two Houſes of Parliament had aſſum'd that Juriſdiction; or, that ever an Ordinance had been made for the taking away a Perſon's Life.

The Houſes make an Ordinance to take his Life.

The Arch-Biſhop receiv'd the News of it with ſo even and ſmooth a Temper, as ſhew'd he neither was aſham'd to live, or afraid to die; but ſtill thought it his Duty to the King and Himſelf, to make uſe of his Majeſty's Pardon, that had been privately ſent him from Oxford. This being pleaded, and produc'd, it was ſoon over-rul'd, and declar'd by the Houſes, That the King could not pardon a Judgment of Parliament; ſo that he had nothing more to do, but to make Preparation for his Death, which was appointed to be on the 10th of January. On the Night before the great Combate, he ſlept ſoundly, till the Time that his Servants were appointed to attend his Riſing; and on the fatal Morning, having apply'd Himſelf to his private Prayers, he mounted the Scaffold with a Courage and Countenance ſo brave, as rather expreſs'd a Triumph than a Victim, and that he came not to die, but to be tranſlated. Here he made his own Funeral-Sermon, beginning with a ſolemn Text of Scripture, Heb. xii. 2. Let us run with Patience the Race that is ſet before us, &c. In which, after ſeveral pious Diſcourſes, he inſiſted upon four Topicks, ‘ 1. He vindicated the King from the Aſperſions of Popery, and declar'd, That he would venture his Life as far, and as freely, for the Proteſtant Religion as any Man in the Kingdom. 2. He lamented the late Cuſtoms in the City, and the popular Cries for Juſtice, which in Courſe would bring the Blood of many innocent Perſons upon their Heads. 3. He lamented the Fate of the poor Church of England, which us'd to be a Shelter for Neighbouring Churches, but now like an Oak cleft to Shivers with Wedges made out of her own Body, and at every Cleft Profaneneſs and Irreligion entring in. 4. He clear'd Himſelf from Popery, and declar'd, He now dy'd in the Boſom of the Church of England; he vindicated Himſelf from all Treaſons, and in the Preſence of God, and his holy Angels, took it upon his Death, that he never endeavour'd the Subverſion of Law or Religion.’ After which he made a ſolemn Prayer, in which he appeal'd to the Omniſcience of God Almighty, in Vindication of his Innocency as to any Treaſons.

His Behaviour.

His laſt Speech.

His Speech and Prayer ended, he gave the Prayer, which he read, into the Hands of his Chaplain Mr. Stern; and ſeeing one Hind, who had been writing his Speech from his Mouth, he deſir'd him Not to do him wrong in publiſhing a falſe or imperfect Copy. This done, he next apply'd Himſelf to the fatal Block; but finding the Scaffold crowded with People, he deſir'd He might have Room to die, beſeeching them to let him have an End of his Miſeries, which he had endured very long. Then calmly approaching the Block, he ſaid, God's Will be done, I am willing to go out of the World, none can be more willing to ſend me. And ſeeing ſome Chinks through the Boards, with People under them, he call'd to the Officer for ſome Duſt to ſtop them, or to remove the People, ſaying, It was no part of his Deſires, that his Blood ſhould fall upon the Heads of the People. Having proceeded thus far, he was rudely interrupted by that Incendiary Sir John Clotworthy, who put ſome impertinent Queſtions to him, which he anſwer'd with all Chriſtian Meekneſs; and then turn'd directly to the Executioner, to whom he gave Mony, and ſaid, Here, honeſt Friend, God forgive Thee, and I do, and do thy Office upon me with Mercy. Then giving him a Sign when the Blow ſhould come, he kneel'd down and made another ſhort Prayer; then laying his Head on the Block, and praying ſilently to himſelf, he cry'd aloud, Lord, receive my Soul! which being the Signal given, his Head was ſever'd from his Body at one Blow. His lifeleſs Body remain'd a Spectacle ſo unpleaſing to moſt of thoſe who deſir'd his Death, that many who came with greedy Eyes to ſee him ſuffer, departed with weeping Eyes when they ſaw him dead.

His Execution and Burial.

His Body, being accompany'd with great Multitudes, was decently interr'd in the Church of Alhallows Barking, by the Office of the Liturgy of the Church of England, which on that very Day was aboliſh'd by an Ordinance of Parliament, and another Thing, call'd The Directory, eſtabliſh'd in the Room of it. Such was the fatal and triumphant End of Dr. William Laud, who dy'd in the 73d Year of his Age, and the 13th of his Archiepiſcopal Tranſlation. Enough hath been ſaid of the Character and Actions of this great Man; therefore I ſhall end all with the Words of the noble Hiſtorian, ‘That his Learning, Piety, and Virtue, have been attain'd by very few, and the greateſt of his Infirmities are common to all, even to the beſt of Men.

The Death and Character of Mr. Chillingworth,

With the Death of this eminent Man we ſhall conclude this Period; and the old Year 1644, with the Deaths and Characters of ſome others that deſerve a Name in Hiſtory; and ſhall begin with his moſt celebrated Convert from the Romiſh Church, Mr. William Chillingworth, who was Chancellor of Saliſbury, and Maſter of Leiceſter-Hoſpital, a moſt noted Philoſopher and Orator, who had ſuch an admirable Faculty in reclaiming Schiſmaticks, and confuting Papiſts, that it became a current Saying in the Univerſity of Oxford, That He, and the Lord Falkland, had ſuch extraordinary clear Reaſon, that if the Great Turk, or Devil, were to be converted, they were able to do it, as was formerly hinted. Upon Waller's retaking of Arundel-Caſtle, in the Beginning of this Year, this worthy Man was taken Priſoner, who out of Reſpect to the Lord Hopton, had accompany'd him in that March; and being indiſpos'd by the exceſſive Coldneſs of that Seaſon, choſe to repoſe himſelf in that Garriſon till the Weather ſhould mend. As ſoon as his Perſon was known, which would have drawn Reverence from any noble Enemy, the Clergy that attended that Army proſecuted him with all imaginable Inhumanity; ſo that by their barbarous Uſage, he dy'd within a few Days, to the Grief of all who throughly knew his Perſon or his Character. They proceeded to inſult his Body, and his Works, to the very Grave; for when his Body was carry'd to be interr'd in the Cloyſter of the Church of Chicheſter, Mr. Cheynell, Miniſter of Petworth, ſtood ready to receive it; and throwing his famous Book againſt the Papiſts inſultingly after the Corps, he cry'd out, Get thee gone, thou curſed Book, which haſt ſeduc'd ſo many precious Souls, thou corrupt rotten Book, Earth to Earth, Duſt to Duſt, get thee gone into the Place of Rottenneſs, that thou may'ſt rot with the Author, and ſee Corruption: An Uſage that needs no Reflection, or Aggravation.

Bp. Weſtfield.

But to proceed to other Perſons, this Year dy'd Dr. Thomas Weſtfield, a Cantabrigian by Education, and made Biſhop of Briſtol, a meek and pious Perſon, of ſingular Learning and Merit; who found greater Favour from the preſent Parliament, than any other of his Order.

Mr Twyne,

The next was Mr. Bryan Twyne, a great and laborious Antiquary of Oxford, a reſerv'd and cynical Perſon, who left many remarkable and excellent Collections behind him, of which ſeveral never yet ſaw the Light.

Judge Banks,

After him we are to mention Sir John Banks, Lord-Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and likewiſe Doctor of the Civil-Law, a worthy Lawyer and Judge; remarkable for his ſingular Modeſty and Integrity, and his deep Knowledge in State-Affairs, as well as in what related to his Profeſſion.

Sir Richard Baker,

Next dy'd Sir Richard Baker, an accompliſh'd Gentleman, well skill'd in various Faculties, eſpecially Divinity and Hiſtory, in the former of which he moſt excell'd; yet at preſent is moſt remember'd for his Chronicle of the Kings of England; an elaborate Work, but more properly, A Methodical Common-Place, than a Regular Hiſtory: After many Cares and Troubles in the World, he dy'd in the Fleet Priſon in London, in the 76th Year of his Age.

Mr. Collet,

Then Mr. William Collet, an excellent Antiquary and Keeper of the Records of the Tower, having no Equal in his Skill and Dexterity in that particular Office; who has been call'd the Caterer to Cotton, Spelman and Selden, in thoſe Feaſts of Rarities, with which they have furniſh'd the Nation.

Dr. Johnſon,

Dr. Thomas Johnſon was a Phyſician of great Eminency, firſt bred an Apothecary in London, where by his indefatigable Labours, improv'd by good natural Parts, he attain'd to be the beſt Herbaliſt in the Age: He being made a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Garriſon of Baſing-Houſe, this Year loſt his Life by a Muſquet Shot; where he gain'd a Name for his Valour and Conduct, as before he had for his Phyſick and Botany.

M. Quarles,

Nor muſt we forget Mr. Francis Quarles, a Gentleman educated both in Cambridge and Lincoln's-Inn; ſometimes Cup-Bearer to the Queen of Bohemia, Secretary to Arch-Biſhop Uſher, and Chronologer to the famous City of London: He was a noted Poet in this Reign, tho' leſs eſteem'd in later Times; who ſucceſsfully mix'd Religion and Fancy together, and with ſo pious a Caution, as never to retrench upon good Manners, or offend againſt the common Duties of a Chriſtian.

Sir Edward Deering,

We ſhall laſtly mention Sir Edward Deering, and Mr. John White the Centuriſt, who both dy'd this Year; the former, a very ingenious Gentleman of Kent, who had ſhewn himſelf an Enemy to Deans and Chapters, and gone great Lengths with the Parliament, yet had the Mortification to have his fine Speeches burnt, and Himſelf expell'd the Houſe, and forc'd to fly to the Refuge of a Prieſt's Coat, and likewiſe to become an earneſt Suitor for the Deanery of Canterbury: But being diſappointed, turn'd again from the King; and being rejected by the other Patry, he ended his Days in Grief and Obſcurity.

And Mr. White.

The other, Mr. White, was a Gentleman of the Middle-Temple, and a Member of the Houſe of Commons, chiefly employ'd as Chairman of a Committee, for ejecting of ſcandalous Miniſters; in which he ſhew'd himſelf a barbarous Perſecuter of the Clergy, both as to their Eſtates, and their Reputations; and at laſt dy'd diſtracted, crying out, How many Clergymen, their Wives and Children, he had undone!

VII. 1. The Beginning of the following Year was much taken up with various Conſultations of the King with his Great Men, and his Preparations for a new Treaty, to which the Parliament now reſolv'd to join. His Majeſty was now attended with a glorious Retinue of Nobility, Gentry, Scholars and Officers; and the Colleges were fill'd with the moſt illuſtrious Ladies in the Kingdom; who, in the midſt of theſe calamitous Times, found Shelter in this loyal Univerſity. In this Place the King was willing to have the particular Advice of that known States-Man Arch-Biſhop Williams; and accordingly wrote to him at Aberconway in Wales to come to Oxford, and to bring with him the beſt Intelligence he cou'd of the Condition of his Affairs in thoſe Parts. The Arch-Biſhop readily waited upon the King, and freely ſpoke his Opinion in ſeveral Matters; but one prophetical Diſcovery he made concerning Cromwell, is worthy of Notice. He declar'd him the moſt dangerous Enemy he had; who, tho' at firſt of mean Rank and Uſe, wou'd ſoon climb higher.

Williams's Opinion of Cromwell.

I knew him, ſaid he, at Buckden, but never knew his Religion; being a common Spokeſman for Sectaries, and maintain'd their Part with Stubbornneſs. He never diſcours'd as if he were pleas'd with your Majeſty, and your great Officers; and indeed he loves none that are more than his Equals. Your Majeſty did him but Juſtice in refuſing his Petition againſt Sir Thomas Steward of the Iſle of Ely; but he takes them all for his Enemies that wou'd not let him undo his beſt Friend; and above all that live, I think he is the moſt mindful of an Injury. He talks openly, ‘That it is fit ſome ſhou'd act more vigorouſly againſt your Forces, and bring your Perſon into the Power of the Parliament.’ He hates the Earl of Eſſex, becauſe he ſays, ‘He is but half an Enemy to your Majeſty, and has done you more Favour than Harm.’ His Fortunes are broken, that it is impoſſible for him to ſubſiſt, much leſs ſatisfy his Ambition, but by your Majeſty's Bounty, or by the Ruin of us all in a common Confuſion. In ſhort, every Beaſt has ſome evil Properties; but Cromwell has the Properties of all evil Beaſts. My humble Motion is, That either you wou'd win him to you by Promiſes of fair Treatment, or catch him by ſome Stratagem, and cut him ſhort. All which the King receiv'd with a gracious Smile, but made no Reply; yet it ſeems this made ſuch an Impreſſion upon him, that he was heard to ſay, I would ſome would do me the good Service to bring Cromwell to me alive or dead, as Biſhop Hacket aſſures us.

Preparations to a Treaty.

But now the chief Thoughts of the King and Court were concerning the deſign'd Treaty, which thoſe about his Majeſty were generally forward to advance. Thoſe in the Parliament were more divided, as to their Intentions that Way: They who deſir'd a Treaty, hop'd by that Means to put an End to the deep Deſign of new modelling the Army, and to prevent the Encreaſe of the innumerable Diviſions, and abominable Factions in Religion. They who were againſt a Treaty, becauſe they were againſt any Peace, plainly diſcern'd, That they ſhou'd not be able to perfect their Deſign upon the Army, and effect many other neceſſary Projects, till this much-deſir'd Treaty were at an End; and therefore they all agreed to give ſome Concluſion to it, and reſolv'd that there ſhould be a Treaty; but under ſtrict Limitations, from which their Commiſſioners ſhould not recede or be diverted. Accordingly they nominated twelve for the two Houſes, and ten for the Parliament of Scotland, and nam'd Uxbridge, a Place within the Parliament Quarters, for the Treaty; which Treaty was to be finiſh'd within twenty Days after the Time it ſhould commence. They appointed the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury and Denbigh, of the Houſe of Peers; and of the Commons, the Lord Wainman, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Hollis, Mr. St. John, Sir Henry Vane Junior, Mr. Whitelock, Mr. Crew, and Mr. Prideaux; and for the Kingdom of Scotland, the Earl of Lowdon, Chancellor of Scotland, the Marqueſs of Argyle, the Lord Maitland, now Earl of Lauderdale, the Lord Balmerino, Sir Archibald Johnſon, Sir Charles Erskin, Sir John Smith, Mr. Dundas, Mr. Kenedy, and Mr. Berclay; together with Mr. Henderſon, in Matters only relating to the Church. For all which they deſir'd a ſafe Conduct of the King, with a certain Retinue, amounting to a Hundred and Eight Perſons, incluſive with Themſelves.

The Parliament Commiſſioners.

To none of theſe the King took any Exception, but ſign'd their Paſs, and ſent Word to the Houſes, that he accepted of the Treaty, and the Place, and ſo nominated, as Commiſſioners for himſelf, the Duke of Richmond, the Marqueſs of Hertford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Kingſton, the Earl of Chicheſter, the Lord Capel, the Lord Seymour, the Lord Hatton Comptroller of the King's Houſhold, the Lord Colepeper Maſter of the Rolls, Sir Edward Hyde Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Nicolas principal Secretary of State, Sir Richard Lane Lord-Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, Sir Thomas Gardiner his Majeſty's Solicitor-General, Sir Orlando Bridgeman Attorney of his Court of Wards, Mr. John Aſhburnham, and Mr. Jeoffry Palmer, together with Dr. Stuart, in Matters relating to Religion, and likewiſe with a Retinue amounting to a Hundred and Eight, the ſame Number of Perſons with the other. In the Retinue on both Sides, there were ſeveral noted Divines, beſides Dr. Stuart and Mr. Henderſon, who were nam'd as Commiſſioners; as on the King's Side, Dr. Sheldon, afterwards Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; Dr. Lany, afterwards Biſhop of Ely; Dr. Fern, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter; Dr. Potter, Dean of Worceſter, and Provoſt of Queens-College Oxon, and the celebrated Dr. Hammond; all Chaplains to his Majeſty. On the Parliament Side, were Mr. Marſhall, a Country Parſon in Eſſex, an eminent Preacher, and chief Chaplain to the Army; Mr. Vines of Warwickſhire, Mr. Cheynel of Suſſex, and two or three more, that bore no Part in the Diſputes. Between both Sides, there was this eſſential Difference; That whereas the King inveſted his Commiſſioners, or any ten of them, with a full Power, not only to Treat, but to Conclude a Peace, obliging himſelf in the Commiſſion to ratify whatſoever they ſhould do; The two Houſes inveſted Theirs with a Power only to Treat, and under the ſevereſt Limitation, reſerving the Concluſion wholly to Themſelves.

The King's Commiſſioners.

TREATY II. at Uxbridge.

2. After ſome Difficulties conquer'd in the Houſes, concerning the Titles of the Royaliſts who were to have their ſafe Conduct, on the 30th Day of January, all the Commiſſioners met at Uxbridge, fifteen Miles from London, with the great Expectations of the whole Kingdom. The Commiſſioners had their ſeveral Quarters; thoſe for the King had all their Retinue on the South Side of the Town, and thoſe for the Parliament on the North Side; the beſt Inn on the one Side was the Rendezvous for the King's Commiſſioners, and the beſt on the other Side of the Street, was for thoſe of the Parliament. There was a good Houſe at the End of the Town, belonging to Sir John Bennet, which was provided for the Treaty, where was a fair Room in the Middle, handſomly fitted up for the Commiſſioners to ſit in; a large ſquare Table being plac'd, with other Conveniences for the Commiſſioners of both Parties; and on either End of this great Room, there were ſeveral other Chambers for thoſe on either Side to retire, and conſult upon all Occaſions: And there being good Stairs at either End of the Houſe, they never went thro' each other's Quarters, nor met but in the great Room. Here they firſt agreed upon ſome certain Rules; as particularly, 'They firſt enter upon the Matter of Religion, and Treat three whole Days upon that Subject, without any other; and if all Differences as to that were not adjuſted in thoſe Days, they ſhould proceed to the next Point, which was the Militia, and obſerve the ſame Method in that; and from thence paſs to the Buſineſs of Ireland; which three Points being ſettled, they believ'd others would be more eaſily compos'd; and after thoſe nine Days were paſs'd, they were to go round again upon the ſeveral Subjects, as long as the twenty Days ſhou'd continue.

164$\frac{4}{5}$. Car. 20.

Rules for the Commiſſioners.

They had ſcarce enter'd upon Buſineſs, when the King's Commiſſioners were diſturb'd and affronted at the ſeditious Behaviour of one Mr. Chriſtopher Love, a young zealous Preacher, who got into the Pulpit on Thurſday the Market Day, where before a great Auditory, he vented ſuch a furious Diſcourſe againſt the King's Commiſſioners, that the next Day they thought themſelves oblig'd to give in a Paper of Complaints, viz. 'That there was yerſterday a Sermon preach'd by one Mr. Love, in which were many Paſſages very ſcandalous to his Majeſty's Perſon, and derogatory to his Honour, ſtirring up the People againſt this Treaty, and incenſing them againſt the Commiſſioners Themſelves, ſaying, That they were not to expect any Good from the Treaty; for that they came from Oxford with Hearts full of Blood, and that there was as great a Difference between this Treaty and Peace, as between Heaven and Hell; and that they only amus'd the People with Expectations of Peace, till they were able to do them ſome fatal Miſchief.' The Parliamen-Commiſſioners anſwer'd, That Mr. Love was none of their Retinue, nor came thither by any Privity of theirs: And upon the Reply of the King's Commiſſioners, that they muſt inſiſt on their former Deſire concerning the Sermon preach'd by Mr. Love, and muſt refer the way of doing Juſtice to their Lordſhips; they made further Anſwer, 'That they wou'd repreſent it to the Lords and Commons at Weſtminſter, who wou'd proceed therein according to Juſtice:' But no Juſtice was ever done in that Matter. This is the ſame Love, who afterwards turn'd againſt the Parliament and Cromwell, and from them receiv'd the due Reward of an ungovernable Spirit, as will appear in its proper Place.

They are diſturb'd by Love a Preacher.

They treat firſt upon Religion.

Upon their Entrance on the firſt Point concerning Religion, the King's Commiſſioners firſt preſented a Paper, acquainting the other, That they were willing to come to theſe following Conceſſions: '1. That Freedom ſhou'd be left to all Perſons of what Opinion ſoever in Matters of Ceremony, and that all the Penalties of the Laws concerning them ſhould be ſuſpended. 2. That the Biſhops ſhould exerciſe no Act of Jurisdiction or Ordination, without the Council and Conſent of the Presbyters, who ſhould be choſen by the learnedeſt and graveſt of the Miniſters of each proper Dioceſe. 3. That the Biſhop ſhould keep his conſtant Reſidence, unleſs his Majeſty's Service, old Age or Infirmities ſhould hinder him, and ſhould preach every Sunday in ſome Church within his Dioceſe. 4. That the Ordination of Miniſters ſhould be publickly, ſolemnly, and ſtrictly obſerv'd, both with Relation to their Sufficiency, and other Qualifications; and that the Biſhop ſhould not receive any into Holy Orders, without the Conſent of the major Part of the Presbyters. 5. That competent Maintenances ſhould be eſtabliſh'd by Parliament to ſuch Vicarages as belong to Biſhops, Deans and Chapters, out of the Impropriations, according to the Value of the ſeveral Pariſhes. 6. That no Man ſhould be capable of two Parſonages, or Vicarages, with Cure of Souls. 7. That towards the ſettling of the publick Peace, a hundred thouſand Pounds ſhould be rais'd by Parliament, out of the Eſtates of Biſhops, Deans, and Chapters, as King and Parliament ſhall think fit; without the Alienation of the ſaid Lands. 8. That the Juriſdiction in Cauſes Teſtamentary, Decimals, and Matrimonials, be ſettled as ſeem'd beſt to King and Parliament: And likewiſe that Acts ſhould be paſs'd for regulating of Viſitations, and againſt immoderate Fees in Eccleſiaſtical Courts, Abuſes by frivolous Excommunications, and all other Abuſes in Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdictions, as ſhou'd be agreed on by King and Parliament. And if the Parliament's Commiſſioners would inſiſt upon any Thing they thought neceſſary for Religion, that the King's Commiſſioners would very willingly apply Themſelves to the Conſideration thereof.

But it was not the Deſign of the Parliament to reform Religion in the Church of England, but wholly to reduce it to their new Model; and therefore their Commiſſioners return'd no Anſwer to this Paper, but put in one of their own, agreeable to the Propoſitions they had preſented to the King in November laſt. The Subſtance of their Demands was, 'That the Bill for taking away all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, &c. be paſs'd, according to the third Propoſition: That the Ordinances concerning the Calling and Sitting of the Aſſembly of Divines, be confirm'd by Act of 164$\frac{4}{5}$. Car. 20.

‘of Parliament: That the Directory for publick Worſhip, already paſs'd by both Houſes, and the Propoſitions concerning Church-Government annex'd, be enacted as Part of Reformation of Religion and Uniformity, according to the firſt Propoſition: That his Majeſty take the Solemn League and Covenant, and that the Covenant be enjoyn'd to be taken, according to the firſt Propoſition.’ And to this Paper they adjoyn'd another with theſe Heads: ‘That the ordinary way of dividing Chriſtians into diſtinct Congregations, and moſt expedient for Edification, is by the reſpective Bonnds of their Dwellings: That the Miniſter, and Church Officers, in each Congregation, ſhould joyn in the Government of the Church, as ſhould be eſtabliſh'd by Parliament: That many particular Congregations ſhould be under one Presbyterial Government: That the Church be govern'd by Congregational, Claſſical, and Synodical Aſſemblies; which laſt ſhould conſiſt both of Provincial and National Aſſemblies, to be eſtabliſh'd by Act of Parliament.

Theſe occaſion'd great Diſputes on both Sides, and ſeveral Queſtions were put by the King's Commiſſioners, to know the Meaning of thoſe new Terms, which were in the Directory, and ſome ambiguous Expreſſions in the Covenant; to which no poſitive Anſwer could be given, becauſe ſome of them had ſeveral Meanings, and were made with a Deſign not to be clearly underſtood. The Point of Epiſcopacy, which the Scots ſo eagerly deſir'd to have aboliſh'd, took up much Time in Debate between the Divines on both Sides, and particularly Dr. Stuart and Mr. Henderſon. Thoſe for the Parliament inſiſted on the Inconveniences that ſort of Government had produc'd in the Nation, and the Neceſſity of removing and deſtroying it at this preſent Juncture of Affairs. The other Side urg'd three Reaſons to the contrary, ‘First, from the Point of Perjury, the King having taken a ſolemn Oath to maintain the Rights of the Church: Next, in Point of Sacrilege, by the Alienation of Things offer'd to God; and Laſtly, from the Point of Divine Right, Epiſcopacy having been accounted an Inſtitution of Chriſt, by the moſt Learned of all Ages.’ And then they put them to prove that it was really unlawful, or Anti-Chriſtian, as their Writers had call'd it; and laſtly deſir'd to know of them, ‘When, and where any National Church, ſince the Apoſtles Time, was ever govern'd without it.’ Impartial Men thought the King's Divines to be ſuperior to the other, both in Argument and Genius; but ſtill no Abatement cou'd be made on the other Side: Only it was diſcover'd, that if the King would ſatisfy the Scots in that Point, they would not concern themſelves in any of the other Demands. Yet after all, the Lord Clarendon ſays, The Parliament took none of the Points in Controverſy leſs to Heart, or were leſs united in any, than in what concern'd the Church.

Secondly, Upon the Militia.

3. The next Subject of the Treaty was the Militia, which began to be debated on the 4th of February, and in which the Parliament Commiſſioners were as high as in the other, receding nothing from the Propoſitions before ſent to the King: For Firſt they demanded, ‘That the Subjects of England and Scotland might be armed, and trained, as the reſpective Parliaments ſhould think fit: That an Act be paſs'd for ſetling the Admiralty and Forces at Sea; and Monies granted for their Maintenance, as the Parliament of each Kingdom ſhould think fit: An Act for ſetling all Forces by Sea and Land, in Commiſſioners to be nam'd by the Parliaments, and ſuch as both Kingdoms might confide in, who were to ſuppreſs all contrary Powers, and act by the Directions of the Parliaments: That the Militia of the City of London, and within the Weekly Bills of Mortality, be in the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council-Men: That the Tower of London may be in the Government of the City, and chief Officers to be nominated and removeable by the Common-Council: Laſtly, That the Citizens, or Forces of London, might not be drawn out of the City, without their own Conſent; and that the Example by them made in theſe diſtracted Times, might be no Precedent for the future.

The King's Commiſſioners made a full Reply to theſe Demands; and when Four of them, who were eminent in the Knowledge of the Law, Lane, Gardiner, Bridgeman, and Palmer, made them appear to be without any Pretence of Law or Juſtice, and aſſerted the Militia to be veſted in the King by Law; they never alledg'd any other Argument, than the poſitive Determination of the Parliament, which had declar'd the Right of it to be in Them, from which they could not recede: Upon which Subject Sir Edward Hyde and Mr. Whitelock had ſome Diſputes, but to no Effect. However, the King's Commiſſioners, to ſhew their Readineſs for an Accommodation, propos'd, ‘That for ſeven Years, the Perſons to be intruſted with the Militia, might be nominated between Them, or an equal Number, the one Half by the King, and the other Half by the Parliament; and all Thoſe to take an Oath for the due Diſcharge of that Truſt; ſo their Security being mutual, neither could be ſuppos'd to violate the Agreement, the whole Kingdom being Eye-Witneſſes of their Failing.’ But theſe met with no better Succeſs, than their Conceſſions concerning the Church and Religion.

Thirdly, Concerning Ireland.

4. The third and laſt Subject of the Treaty was, the Buſineſs of Ireland, upon which they enter'd on the 7th of February; and with great Aſſurance by the Parliament Commiſſioners, who, like the greateſt Part of the Nation, thought the King highly culpable in that Point. They Rhetorically laid open all the Tranſactions of the Iriſh Rebellion, ‘How the King had committed that War to the two Houſes of Parliament, who had levy'd great Sums for that Service; and that he had conſented to an Act for the Encouragement of Adventurers, &c. in which Act he had put it out of his Power to grant any Peace or Ceſſation, or Pardon to thoſe Rebels, without Conſent of Parliament; which caus'd many to bring in conſiderable Sums; and theſe, by the Bleſſing of God, had had ſuch good Effects, that the Rebels were worſted in all Encounters, and probably the Rebellion had been extinguiſh'd before this Time, had not the King, contrary to his Promiſe and Obligation by that Act, made a Ceſſation with thoſe execrable People, when they were not able to continue the War, and had call'd over many of thoſe Forces, which the Houſes had ſent againſt the Iriſh, to return and fight againſt Them: By which Means his Proteſtant Subjects of that Kingdom were in Danger to be deſtroy'd, and the whole Nation to be poſſeſs'd by the Papiſts.’ Upon this Head they expatiated with all the invidious Inſinuations they could invent, to make the People believe, that he had really favour'd that Rebellion; and expreſly demanded, ‘That the King would immediately declare that Ceſſation to be void; that he would proſecute the War with the utmoſt Extremity againſt thoſe Rebels; and that the Act of Parliament for their Reduction might be executed without any Impediment.

This Charge conſiſting of ſuch Particulars, as moſt People believ'd, but few underſtood, Sir Edward Hyde, who knew the Secrets of that Affair, undertook the King's Vindication, and Hiſtorically diſplay'd the ‘Juſtice and Piety of the King's Proceedings, and the inevitable Neceſſity of the Ceſſation; to which his Majeſty had been driven by the utmoſt Injuries and Hardſhips, put upon him by the Parliament; and yet that Ceſſation alone had actually preſerv'd the Proteſtants in Ireland from imminent Ruin.’ He farther inform'd them, ‘That tho' the King had been compell'd to a Ceſſation, he could not be prevail'd with to make a Peace with the Iriſh Rebels, from whom he had admitted of Commiſſioners; but when he found their Propoſitions inconſiſtent with the Security of his Proteſtant Subjects there, he totally rejected them, and diſmiſs'd the Commiſſioners with ſevere Animadverſions. And tho' he had prolong'd the Ceſſation, in hopes of being at laſt able to Chaſtiſe that odious Rebellion; yet, if the Parliament would give him ſufficient Caution, that the War ſhould be vigorouſly proſecuted againſt the Iriſh, by ſending over ſufficient Supplies, he would put an End to that Ceſſation, without declaring it to be void; which otherwiſe he could not do, either with Juſtice, or with any Effect.’ The Conviction that this Apology carry'd along with it, put the Parliament Commiſſioners viſibly out of Countenance, and into a Paſſion; but they made no other Reply, than, ‘That they were ſorry to find that deteſtable Rebellion had receiv'd ſo much Favour, as to have Commiſſioners from it admitted into the King's Preſence; and wonder'd there ſhould be any Scruple made of declaring a Ceſſation void, that was expreſly againſt an Act of Parliament.’ This being urg'd with many pathetical Expreſſions againſt the Murthers and Cruelties in the Beginning of that Rebellion, the King's Commiſſioners were provok'd to a little more Sharpneſs than uſual, and to tell them, ‘That they wiſh'd it were in the King's Power to puniſh all Rebellion, according as it deſerv'd; but ſince it was otherwiſe, he muſt condeſcend to Treaties, and to all other Expedients, neceſſary to reduce his Rebellious Subjects to their Duty and Obedience.

All to no Effect.

5. Thus Nine of the Days limited paſs'd over, and again Nine more, without any Advance on the Parliament Side, or any Ground gain'd, tho' much yielded on the other. Many Speeches were made, many Papers were deliver'd, and mighty Pains taken on both Sides, but all to no Effect; ſo that the Proſpect of Peace was very ſmall, and inconſiderable. As to the preſent Condition of the Parliament, there were many ſtill who deſir'd to have Peace, without any Alteration in the Government, ſo that they might be ſure of Indemnity, and Security for what was paſt: The Scots inſiſted upon the whole Government of the Church, but ſeem'd willing to refer all other Matters to the King: But there was another Party, now encreaſing, that would have no Peace upon any Conditions, but reſolv'd to change the whole Frame of the Government both in State and Church. There was likewiſe very little Truſt and Communication among the Parliament Commiſſioners, a few of them being Sipes upon the reſt; and tho' the Majority of them did heartily deſire a Peace, even upon any Terms, yet none of them had the Courage openly to recede from the moſt extravagant Demand. Beſides, the Lord Clarendon gives us Reaſons to believe, That if the King had yielded to all that was then propos'd, they would likewiſe have inſiſted upon all they had formerly demanded; even the Delivering up to their Mercy a great many of the moſt Noble and Loyal Perſons in the Nation; a Difficulty too great to be conquer'd in the Worſt of Times.

Car. 20.

The Character and Diſpoſition of the Commiſſioners.

But to ſay a Word or two of theſe Commiſſioners, according to the Method of that noble Hiſtorian, who found that they were far from being alike in their Diſpoſitions or Inclinations. The four Lords began now to be ſenſible of their own Ruin, and the Earl of Pembroke, according to his uſual Language, freely call'd the Parliament-Leaders, a Pack of Knaves and Villains, and acknowledg'd his notorious Miſmanagement to Sir Edward Hyde; and joyn'd with others in a Romantick Propoſal, 'That the King ſhould grant all that was demanded of him, and by thoſe Conceſſions diſappoint his Enemies, recover all, and become a greater Monarch than ever.' But this Earl, and the Earl of Salisbury, were ſo totally without Intereſt in the Parliament or Country, that their Diſpoſitions were of no Moment to the Publick; and their Fear of the prevailing Faction was ſo much greater than their Hatred, that tho' they wiſh'd them rather deſtroy'd than the King, they had rather the King, and his Poſterity, ſhould be deſtroy'd, than that Winton ſhould be taken from the One, or Hatfield from the other. The proud Earl of Northumberland could not look upon the Deſtruction of Monarchy, and the approaching Contempt of the Nobility, with any Pleaſure; yet the Repulſe he had once receiv'd from the King, and the Eſcape he had made from the Parliament, had wrought ſo far upon him, that he reſolv'd no more to depend upon the one, or provoke the other; and was willing to ſee the King's Power ſo much reſtrain'd, as not to do him any Harm. The Earl of Denbigh, a Perſon of deeper Parts, who ſaw farther into the Deſigns of the prevailing Party, than either of the other Three, and as much as any deteſted thoſe Deſigns; yet the Pride of his Nature, not inferior to the Proudeſt; and the Conſciouſneſs of his Ingratitude to the King, in ſome Reſpects ſuperior to the moſt oblig'd Perſons, kept him from quitting the Company with whom he had convers'd ſo long. Tho' he had receiv'd the moſt ſignal Affronts from them, and knew he ſhould never be more employ'd by them, yet he look'd upon the King's Condition to be utterly deſperate, and that he would be compell'd at laſt to ſubmit to worſe Conditions than any yet offer'd to him.

As to the Commiſſioners of the Houſe of Commons; Sir Harry Vane, Mr. Saint John, and Mr. Prideaux, were all three mortal Enemies to a Peace, and were no better than Spies upon the reſt, who did in their Hearts deſire a Peace, and upon better Conditions than they durſt own: Yet ſtill there were not Two of them who had intire Confidence in each other, or who durſt communicate their Thoughts together. The Debate in the Houſe concerning the Self-denying Ordinance had rais'd ſo many Jealouſies, that they ſcarce knew what any Man deſign'd to do. Hollis, who was the freeſt among them in owning his Hatred to the Independent Party, and no otherwiſe lov'd the Presbyterians, than as they conſtituted a Party ſufficient to oppoſe the other, did foreſee that many of thoſe who appear'd moſt reſolute to joyn with him, would gradually fail him purely for want of Courage, in which he Himſelf abounded. Whitelock, who had generally concurr'd with them, without any Inclinations to the Perſons, or their Principles, had the ſame Reaſon ſtill not to ſeparate from them. His Eſtate lay all in their Quarters, and he could not bear the Thoughts of being undone; tho' to his Friends, who were the King's Commiſſioners, he ſhew'd his old Openneſs, and his Deteſtation of all the Proceedings of his Party, yet could not leave them. Pierpoint and Crew, who were both Men of great Fortunes, and had always been more moderate, and very inclinable to a Peace, appear'd now to have contracted more Sourneſs than formerly; and were more reſerv'd towards the King's Commiſſioners than was expected; and in all Conferences poſitively inſiſted, 'That the King muſt yield to whatſoever was required in the three Demands.' They all valu'd Themſelves for procuring a Treaty againſt ſo much Oppoſition, and ſeem'd to believe, That the King's Commiſſioners would yield upon the very ſame Argument, and Expectation, that had been offer'd by the Earl of Pembroke.

164$\frac{4}{5}$.
Car. 20.

6. After eighteen Days had been ſpent in the three grand Propoſitions, in which Space the King loſt the important Town of Shrewsbury, and the Treaty being limited to twenty Days; the King's Commiſſioners deſir'd to ſpend the two remaining Days in giving fuller Satisfaction upon thoſe Heads, and in treating for an Expedient of Peace, by disbanding all Armies, and by his Majeſty's going in Perſon to Weſtminſter: And for that End they earneſtly urg'd, 'That the Time of Treaty might be prolong'd.' To which the Parliament Commiſſioners gave in their Anſwer, 'That till they had Satisfaction in their three Demands, concerning Religion, the Militia, and Ireland, they cou'd receive no Propoſition from his Majeſty, nor give any Addition of Time.' By the Papers in this Treaty it manifeſtly appears, that the King's Commiſſioners, tho' they cou'd not go into the literal Demands on the other Side, yet they made as many Conceſſions towards granting ſome Equivalent, or other Expedient, as cou'd be expected from Reaſon or Honour: But the Parliament Commiſſioners were ty'd up to rigid Rules, and ſeem'd to have no Power of receding from the very Letter of the Propoſitions they brought along with them: As if they were only Meſſengers to report the Senſe, and the very Words of them that ſent them, rather than Commiſſioners to argue and determine upon the Arguments of others, and their own Judgments upon them. So that when the King's Commiſſioners complain'd of great Hardſhip, for want of Time allow'd them to finiſh the Work, they declar'd, 'That no good Iſſue cou'd be expected from the Treaty, or Inducement for the Parliament to grant longer Time, when not one of the Parliament's Propoſitions was granted by the King during the whole Time of the Treaty.

The Concluſion of the Treaty.

The whole concluded with the Delivery of a Paper by the King's Commiſſioners, which contain'd the Subſtance of all that had been tranſacted in the Treaty, and cloſely obſerved, 'That after an inteſtine War of ſo many Years, begun, as was pretended, for the Defence and Vindication of the Laws of the Land, and the Liberty of the Subject, in a Treaty of twenty Days, they had not made one ſingle Demand, that, by the Laws of the Land, they had the leaſt Title to make; but only inſiſted on ſuch Particulars as were directly againſt Law, and the eſtabliſh'd Government of the Kingdom: And that on the other Side, much more had been offer'd to them for the obtaining of Peace, than they cou'd require either with Juſtice or Reaſon:' With which they were ſo offended, that for ſome time they refus'd to receive the Paper, upon Pretence, That the Time for the Treaty was expired, it being then after twelve of the Clock at Night of the laſt Day: But finding it wou'd be no leſs publick, and be a Reflection upon them if rejected, they were content to receive it; and ſo parted a little before the break of Day. Thus ended the famous Treaty of Uxbridge, which had been to the infinite Fatigue of the King's Commiſſioners; the Particulars of which were ſhortly after publiſh'd in Print by the King's Command, and never contradicted by the Parliament. This was immediately ſucceeded by another Treatiſe call'd Conſiderations touching the late Treaty, and publiſh'd by the King's Printer; in which was prov'd that the Parliament never deſign'd a Peace, from theſe four Particulars: 'Firſt, their Indiſpoſition and Averſion from treating: Secondly, their impotent and imperfect Qualification of their Commiſſioners to treat: Thirdly, their inſolent Expoſtulations and Demands in the Treaty: And Fourthly, their inexorable Deafneſs, againſt all Enlargement, Prorogation, or Reviving of the Treaty.

Cenſures upon it.

There have been various Reflections and Opinions, as to the Breaking up of this unſucceſsful Treaty; and a late ingenious Writer of Memoirs relates it as a Secret in Hiſtory, that the Occaſion of it was a fatal Letter from the Marqueſs of Montroſs in Scotland, who, as is before hinted, had in the Beginning of this Month intirely defeated the Marqueſs of Argyle, and the next Day ſent an Expreſs of it to the King; wherein he declar'd his utter Averſion to all Treaties with his Rebel Parliament in England; and among other Things aſſur'd him, That he ſhould be able within a few Months to march into England, to his Majeſty's Aſſiſtance, with a brave Army. This is ſuppos'd to have changed the King's Intentions of complying with the hard Demands of his Parliament; and the Story has been credited by many Perſons, who ſeem too ready to enquire and ſearch into Secrets. But without examining the Inconſiſtency of it with the Account of this Treaty given by the Lord Clarendon, and the beſt Writers; we ſhall return an Anſwer in the Words of the Author of The Compleat Hiſtory of England, whoſe Opinion may have the more Weight, becauſe never thought partial to the King's Cauſe. 'Suppoſing ſuch a Letter was written, tho' this Relator pretends to have ſeen nothing but a Copy under another Hand; yet it ſeems to be no Inference that the King himſelf was the Cauſe of the breaking off the ‘ Treaty, when the Denial of the leaſt Conceſſions, and e‘ven of a few farther Days, was the ſole Act of the Parlia‘ment Commiſſioners. And yet had the Rupture been made ‘ſolely at the King's Command, he wou'd have ſtood juſtify‘ed by all the Laws of Conſcience and Honour. For, to ‘have yielded to all their Propoſitions, as they inſiſted, with‘out the leaſt Mitigation of them, wou'd as effectually have ‘diveſted him of his Crown and Dignity, as they did after‘wards deprive him of his Liberty and Life.’ And he thus concludes, ‘ It had been more glorious in him to reſolve, ‘ That Monarchy ſhou'd not be murder'd, before the King.

The State of the King's Affairs.

VIII. 1. The King's Affairs had now a very unpleaſing Aſpect, eſpecially ſince the Loſs of Shrewsbury, which was by Treachery deliver'd up to Colonel Langhorn and Mitton, before the breaking up of this Treaty; by which the King's former Intercourſe with his Loyal Subjects of North-Wales was not only hinder'd, but a preſent Stop was put to an Aſſociation, then near finiſhing, between the Counties of Salop, Flint, Cheſter, Worceſter, &c. to the great Prejudice of his Majeſty's Cauſe in thoſe Parts of the Kingdom. But to make ſome little Recompence for this great Loſs, about the Beginning of March, Pomfret Caſtle in Yorkſhire was reliev'd by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who there defeated the Lord Fairfax's Forces that lay before it; and in his March thither he defeated a great Party of the Parliament Forces commanded by Colonel Roſſiter, near Melton Mowbray in Leiceſterſhire; in both which Actions he ſhew'd himſelf a valiant Commander.

He ſends the Prince of Wales into the Weſt.

The King having now conſider'd his own Condition, and the Danger of having himſelf and his Heir embark'd any longer in the ſame Bottom, thought fit to ſend the Prince of Wales into the Weſt, to perfect the Aſſociation which had been begun in the End of the laſt Summer; and in thoſe Counties to advance ſuch further Forces, as might not only ſerve for the Defence of themſelves, but give alſo ſome reaſonable Increaſe to his own Army. So that on the fifth of March he ſet forwards towards the City of Briſtol, accompany'd by the Lord Colepeper and Sir Edward Hyde, as his principal Counſellors, and ſome of the chief Gentry of the Weſt, who were of greateſt Authority in thoſe Parts. And now the King, having adviſ'd with ſuch of the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, as had aſſembled at Oxford, from the laſt Meeting in November after their Prorogation, to the tenth of March, and being reſolv'd for Action, diſmiſs'd them to their ſeveral Counties.

The Independents Proceedings in the Houſe of Commons.

2. The melancholy Concern that poſſeſs'd the Court and King's Party at Oxford, was conſiderably reliev'd by the great Diſcontents and Animoſities that reign'd in the Houſes at Weſtminſter; which much retarded the Advantages they had receiv'd from united Counſels. As ſoon as the Commiſſioners were return'd from Uxbridge, the Independent Party moſt vigorouſly preſs'd on the Self-denying Ordinance, ſo that they might proceed towards modelling their new Army, by removing all their old Officers; during the Suſpenſion of which, no Care was taken for providing for the Troops they had, or making Recruits, which wou'd be neceſſary for taking the Field. They were now enter'd into the Month of March, which was us'd as a ſtrong Argument by both Parties; the one urging, from the Seaſon of the Year, ‘ The Neceſſity of haſtening their Re‘ſolution for the paſſing the Ordinance, that the Army ‘might be ready for marching;’ the other preſſing, ‘ That ‘ſo vaſt an Alteration ought not to be attempted, when ‘there was ſo ſhort a Time to compleat it: That there ‘wou'd be apparent Danger, that the Enemy wou'd find ‘them without any Army fit to take the Field;’ and therefore deſir'd, ‘ That all Things might ſtand as they were ‘till the End of next Campaign; when they might re‘ſume the Expedient, if they ſaw Cauſe.’ The other Party cry'd loud againſt the Delay; and declar'd, ‘ That that ‘was the Way to make the War laſt; for if manag'd as it ‘had been, they ſhou'd be found at the End of the next ‘Campaign in the ſame Condition as at preſent; whereas, ‘if the Ordinance was paſs'd, they doubted not but they ‘ſhou'd proceed ſo vigorouſly, that the next Campaign ‘ſhou'd put an End to the War.’ The Debate continu'd many Days in the Houſe of Commons with great Paſſion and ſharp Reflections upon Things and Perſons, whilſt the Peers poorly look'd on, and attended the Reſolution below. Of the Presbyterian Party, which warmly oppos'd the Ordinance, the chief were Hollis, Stapleton, Glyn, Waller, Long, and others, who believ'd their Party much ſuperior in Number; as the Independent Party was led by Nathaniel Fiennes, Vane, Cromwell, Haſlerig, Martin, and others, who ſpoke more and warmer than they that oppos'd them. Of the Houſe of Peers, there were none thought to be of this laſt Party, but the inveterate Lord Say; all the reſt being ſuppos'd to be of the Earl of Eſſex's Party; and ſo it was judg'd impoſſible that the Ordinance ſhou'd ever paſs the Houſe of Lords, tho' it ſhou'd be carry'd by the Commons: But they were in this, as in many other Things, miſtaken and diſappointed; for many, who had ſat ſilent, and been thought to have been of one Party, appear'd to be of the other.

164$\frac{4}{5}$.
Car. 20.

When the Debate grew ripe, and a Report was call'd for, Mr. Tate the Chair-man aroſe with a great Bundle of Papers in his Hand, who being a zealous Presbyterian, little ſuſpected the Buſineſs wou'd turn to the Ruin of his Party: Therefore deſiring firſt to ſpeak a few Words, deliver'd a Parable, ‘ concerning a Man over-run with Botches and ‘Boils, in ſeveral Parts of his Body, who conſulting with ‘a Phyſician for Cure, his Doctor told him, He could give ‘him Plaiſters to cure any one Part of his Body; but what‘ſoever was heal'd in one Member, would break out in ano‘ther, for the whole Habit of the Body was corrupted; and ‘that if he expected Recovery, he muſt procure a better Ha‘bit, by much purging, and new Diet, and then the Ulcers ‘would be heal'd of themſelves.’ Upon which other Members, who had prepar'd themſelves, declar'd, ‘ That ‘Abroad all their ill Succeſſes were imputed to the Ab‘ſence of Members from Parliament;’ and Saint John, Pierpoint, Whitelock and Crew, who had been thought of the Earl of Eſſex's Party, appear'd for the Ordinance, declaring, ‘ That they diſcover'd by what they heard A‘broad, and the governing Spirit in the City, that there ‘would be a general Diſſatisfaction in the People, if this ‘Ordinance were not paſs'd.’ Then they flew into a high Admiration of the Earl of Eſſex, extoll'd his great Merit, and ſeem'd to fear, ‘ That the War would never be ſo hap‘pily manag'd as under him; or if it were, the Succeſs muſt ‘ſtill be imputed to his forming the Armies, and teaching ‘them to fight.’ By this kind of Rhetorick, and profeſſing to give up their own Wiſhes and Inclinations, purely for Peace and Unity, they ſo far prevail'd, that the Ordinance was paſs'd the Houſe of Commons, and tranſmitted to the Peers for their Conſent; where ſcarce any believ'd it wou'd be obtain'd.

The Self-Denying Ordinance paſs'd there

Car. 21.

3. Whatever Expectation there was, that this famous Ordinance, which ſo much affected the Lords, ſhould have been rejected and thrown out by the Peers, it did not take up ſo long a Debate in that Houſe. The Marqueſs of Argyle was now arriv'd from Scotland, and ſat with the Commiſſioners of that Kingdom, over whom he had a powerful Aſcendent. He was in Matters of Religion, and the Church, purely Presbyterian; but in Matters of State, and the preſent War, perfectly Independent: He abhorr'd all Thoughts of Peace, and that the King ſhould ever more have the Government, againſt whoſe Perſon, in ſpight of all Obligations, he always retain'd an inveterate Malice. He had founded a cloſe Friendſhip with Sir Harry Vane, during his late Stay in Scotland; and they both lik'd each others Principles in Government. From the Time of his Arrival at London, the Scotch Commiſſioners grew leſs zealous in obſtructing the Ordinance, or new modelling the Army: So that after it was brought into the Houſe of Peers, tho' the four ruling Earls, Eſſex, Mancheſter, Warwick and Denbigh were to be remov'd by that Ordinance, and no Peer of England capable of any Employment, either Military or Civil, yet it found little Oppoſition. So much did the old and ſtale Argument prevail, That it would be of miſchievous Conſequence to diſſent from what the Houſe of Commons thought neceſſary, that upon the third Day of April it paſs'd the Houſe of Peers: And there remain'd nothing to be done, but the Earl of Eſſex's Surrender of his Commiſſion into the Hands of the Parliament, from whom he had receiv'd it; which was thought neceſſary to be done with the ſame Formality in which he had been inveſted with it. Sir Thomas Fairfax was now nominated, and declar'd General, tho' the Earl of Eſſex made no Haſte to ſurrender his Commiſſion; but at length he did it at a Conference of both Houſes in the Painted-Chamber, and withal deliver'd to them a Paper, in which he declar'd, ‘ With what ‘Affection and Fidelity he had ſerv'd them, and as he had ‘often ventur'd his Life for them, ſo he would willingly ‘have loſt it in their Service; and ſince they believ'd that ‘what they had more to do, would be better perform'd by ‘another Man, he ſubmitted to their Judgment, and re‘ſtored their Commiſſion to them, hoping they would find ‘an abler Servant.’ Concluding with ſome Expreſſions which apparently ſhew'd that he did not think he had been well us'd, or that they would be the better for the Change. Thus he left them, and return'd to his own Houſe; whither both Houſes, the next Day, went to attend him, and to return their Thanks for the great Services he had done the Kingdom; which they acknowledg'd with all the Encomiums, and flattering Attributes, that were moſt agreeable to his unfortunate Ambition.

And alſo in the Houſe of Lords.

Thus paſs'd the famous Self-Denying Ordinance, by which they did not only caſt off their great Founder, or rather Inſtrument, the Earl of Eſſex, but likewiſe the Earl of Man-

Many of the Parliaments loſe their Places.

cheſter, the Earl of Denbigh, the Earl of Warwick, Sir William Waller, Lord Gray of Grooby, Major-General Maſſy, &c. and in a word, all that whole Body of Men, that firſt began the Rebellion, and Civil Wars in the Kingdom. Cromwell himſelf was likewiſe to have loſt his Command; but as ſoon as the Ordinance was paſs'd, and before the Reſignation of the Earl of Eſſex, the Ruling Party had caus'd him to be ſent with a Body of Horſe into the Weſt, to relieve Taunton, that he might be abſent at the Time when the other Officers deliver'd up their Commiſſions. This was quickly obſerv'd; and thereupon Orders were given to require his preſent Attendance in Parliament, and that their new General ſhould ſend ſome Officers to enter upon that Service, which was pretended to be done; and the very Day nam'd by which it was averr'd that he would be in the Houſe. A Rendezvous was then appointed, for the new General to take a View of their Troops, that he might appoint Officers to ſucceed thoſe who had left their Commands by Virtue of this Ordinance; and likewiſe in their Places who gave up their Commands, and refus'd to ſerve in this new Model, who were a great Number of their beſt Commanders. From this Rendezvous the General ſent to the Parliament, 'That they would give 'Leave to Lieutenant-General Cromwell to ſtay with him 'for ſome Days, for his better Information, without which 'he ſhould not be able to perform what they expected from 'him.' The Requeſt appearing ſo reaſonable, and being for ſo ſhort a Time, little Oppoſition was made to it: And ſhortly after, by another Letter, he with very much Earneſtneſs deſired, 'That they would allow Cromwell to 'ſerve for that Campaign.' Thus they compaſs'd their whole Deſign, by being freed from all thoſe whoſe Affections they knew were not agreeable to theirs, and keeping Cromwell in Command; who, in the Name of Fairfax, modell'd the Army, and plac'd ſuch Officers as were well known to him, and to no body elſe, and indeed abſolutely govern'd the whole Martial Affairs, as was ſoon known to all Men. And here, as Whitelock obſerves, ended the firſt Scene of our Tragick Civil Wars, in the Exit of the brave Earl of Eſſex, and many gallant Officers with him; and the King's Party look'd upon the new Army and new Officers with ſuch Contempt, that the New Model was by them in Scorn commonly call'd The New Noddle.

Cromwell ſecur'd in his.

The New Model.

This new modell'd Army was to conſiſt in the whole of twenty one Thouſand Men, namely, of ſix Thouſand Horſe, a Thouſand Dragoons, and fourteen Thouſand Foot: That the Horſe ſhould be divided into ten Regiments, the Dragoons into ten ſingle Troops, and every Regiment of Foot at leaſt to conſiſt of twelve hundred Men; and the whole Charge of the Army to be near forty five Thouſand Pounds a Month, to be rais'd by a proportionable Aſſeſſment throughout the Kingdom. Sir Thomas Fairfax being conſtituted General, and being upon his Arrival at London conducted to the Houſe of Commons, the Speaker told him, 'That that Houſe, out of the great Experience and 'Confidence they had of his Valour, Conduct and 'Fidelity, had thought fit to confer upon him the great 'Truſt of commanding their Armies in chief;' and giving him Thanks, in the Name of the Houſe, for his many and great Services paſt, encourag'd him 'to go on as he had 'begun, aſſuring him of the Care and Protection of the 'Parliament in the Diſcharge of that weighty Truſt the 'Kingdom had repos'd in him'. In the paſſing his Commiſſion, they made the firſt plain Diſcovery of their Intentions concerning the Perſon of the King: For with great Earneſtneſs and Violence they preſs'd it, and carry'd it, 'That the Care of the Preſervation of his Perſon ſhould be 'left out, and that this Army ſhould go out in the Name 'of the Parliament alone, and not of King and Parliament, 'as it was before under the Earl of Eſſex:' So that now the Juggle and Maſk being remov'd, they appear'd without their former Arts of Diſſimulation. As to the General himſelf, he was a Man whom both Parties did the more readily agree in, becauſe he was known to be of ſufficient Perſonal Valour, and of no private Deſigns, or deep Foreſight; obſtinate by a natural Melancholy, rather than pertinacious in any Intereſt, and rather free from Baſeneſs, than ambitious of Vain-glory: By all which Qualities, they juſtly believ'd he would be obedient to the Reſolves of his Maſters. The chief Officers under him were Lieutenant-General Cromwell, Major-General Skippon, and Commiſſary-General Ireton: The Colonels of the Horſe were Middleton, Sidney, Graves, Sheffield, Vermuden, Whaley, Sir Mich. Liveſey, Fleetwood, Roſſiter, and Sir Robert Pye: Thoſe of the Foot were Crayford, Berkley, Aldridge, Holborn, Forteſcue, Ingoldsby, Montague, Pickering, Welden, and Rainsborow. Theſe, and other Subalterns, who in new Elections became more degenerate, are complain'd of by Hollis, as if all of them were not able to make a Thouſand Pounds a Year in Land; moſt of the Officers of this Army being mean Tradeſmen, Brewers, Taylors, Silver-Smiths, Shoe-makers, and ſuch like Profeſſions. Such were the Men that brought greater Miſeries and Confuſions into the Nation, than ever were felt before.

Crom-well's Succeſs at Iſlip-Bridge.

4. The new Model being thus effected, General Fairfax began his March from Windſor on the 30th of April, by Orders of the Committees of both Kingdoms, to the Relief of Taunton, which had been long beſieg'd by the King's Forces, and reduc'd to great Extremity. But they hearing of the Prince's Advance towards Oxford, order'd him to ſtop his March; and by a new Ordinance appointed him to ſend a Party of three Thouſand Foot and fifteen Hundred Horſe to Taunton; and that he, and the reſt of his Army, ſhould march back to joyn Cromwell and Brown, and attend the King's Motions with their united Forces. In the mean Time Cromwell had been ſent from Windſor with a ſtrong Party, to diſturb the King's Preparations about Oxford. He defeated a Brigade of two Thouſand Horſe at Iſlip-Bridge, kill'd ſeveral, and took four Hundred Horſes, as alſo two Thouſand Priſoners, with the Queen's Standard. He purſu'd many of them to Blenchington-Houſe, four Miles from Oxford, where Colonel Windebank commanded; who being ſummon'd with all the Threats of a victorious Party, and over-rul'd by his beautiful young Bride, and ſome Ladies that were Viſitants, he deliver'd the Place, with all the Arms and Ammunition, for which, the hopeful young Gentleman, notwithſtanding the Prayers of his Lady, and the Services of his Father, was ſhot to Death againſt Merton-College-Wall in Oxford; to the great Regret of the King, when he underſtood the Buſineſs, for which he was highly diſpleas'd with Prince Rupert.

Goring comes to the King.

The King and he divide the Army.

About the ſame Time General Goring, now call'd Lord Goring, was ſent for by the King out of the Weſt, where he had been very riotous, and ungracious to the Inhabitants. He very unwillingly left that Country, but march'd ſo expeditiouſly with his Horſe and Dragoons, that the Night before he got to the King at Woodſtock, he ſurpris'd a Horſe Quarter of Cromwell's, and another Party of Fairfax's Horſe, and broke and defeated them with great Slaughter; which gave him great Reputation, and made him exceeding Welcome to the King. The next Day after his Arrival, the King's Army was drawn to a Rendezvous, and conſiſted then of five Thouſand Foot, and above ſix Thouſand Horſe. The King, induc'd by the Perſuaſions of Prince Rupert and others, had deſign'd to march Northwards, and fall upon the Scotch Army; but after Goring's Conjunction with him, the general Opinion of his Counſellors was for his March into the Weſt, as having a much better Proſpect of Succeſs. Goring was fond of marching into the Weſt, but did not like the Company and Authority of Prince Rupert; and that Prince, being ſpurr'd on by the Northern Horſe, was deſirous to march the other Way, and no leſs willing to part from Goring; who was to take with him two Thouſand five Hundred Horſe under his Command, which were the beſt in the Army, and with them and the Forces about Taunton, hinder the Relief of that Place. This was fatally concluded on the Place, and immediately put in Execution, and the Army divided, contrary to the Senſe of all about the King, except the Prince, and the Northern Officers. Thus an unfortunate Diviſion hapned, when the new Model might probably have been cruſh'd in its Infancy; for if the State of Affairs could have been fully weigh'd, without the leaſt Faction, a Neceſſity lay on the King to have kept all his Forces together, or ſo near, as might have made one Day the Decider of the whole Controverſy: But his Party, wanting Union, and Reſolution, choſe rather to die of a Hectick, than of an Acute Fever.

The King's March.

He goes towards Cheſter.

5. Upon this moſt unfortunate Separation, the King advanc'd firſt to Eveſham, and in his Way drew out his Garriſon from Camden-Houſe, which had brought no other Benefit to the Publick, than the enriching the licentious Governour, who tyrannically treated the whole Country, and took his Leave of it in wantonly burning that noble Fabrick, which not many Years before had coſt above thirty Thouſand Pounds the building. Within a few Days after the King had left Eveſham, it was ſurpris'd by the Enemy, or rather ſtorm'd and taken for want of Men to defend the Works, and the Governour, and all the little Garriſon, made Priſoners. The Loſs of this Place did in Effect cut off all Intercourſe between Worceſter and Oxford: Nor was it repair'd by the taking of Hawkesby-Houſe in Worceſterſhire, which the Parliamentarians had ſtrongly fortify'd, and which the King's Army took in two Days, and therein the Governour, and a Hundred and twenty Priſoners, who ſerv'd to redeem thoſe who were loſt at Eveſham. And ſo by ſlow and eaſy Marches the Army proſecuted their Way to Cheſter. But in Staffordſhire, the Lord Byron, who was Governour of Cheſter, met the King, and inform'd him, That the Enemy, upon the Noiſe of his Majeſty's Advance, were drawn off; and ſo there was no more to be done, but to proſecute the Northern Deſign. This was now intended, and the Army upon its March accordingly, when Intelligence was brought the King, That Fairfax, having ſent a ſtrong Party to relieve Taunton, was himſelf with his Army ſat down before Oxford. This News prov'd a little ſhocking, and alter'd his Majeſty's Counſels; but at laſt it was concluded, That the beſt way to draw Fairfax from thence, would be to fall upon ſome conſiderable Place poſſeſs'd by the Parliament.

He falls upon Leiceſter,

Leiceſter was a Place of the greateſt Moment in thoſe Parts, in which there was a good Garriſon under the Command of Sir Robert Pye; and Prince Rupert, who was always pleas'd with any brave Attempt, chearfully joyn'd in the Deſign, and ſent Sir Marmaduke Langdale immediately to inveſt it with his Horſe. The next Day, being the laſt of May, the whole Army was drawn about the Town, which was of no great Extent, and the Prince having taken a View of it, order'd a Battery to be forthwith rais'd againſt an old high Stone Wall on the South Side of the Place; which, by his own continu'd Preſence, was finiſh'd with ſurpriſing Diligence. Having ſummon'd the Governour in vain, the Battery began to play, and in the Space of four Hours made ſuch a Breach, that it was thought adviſable the ſame Night to make a general Aſſault in ſeveral Places, but principally at this Breach; which was defended with mighty Courage and Reſolution, inſomuch that the King's Forces were repell'd twice with great Loſs and Slaughter, and were reduc'd almoſt to Deſpair: When another Party, on the other Side of the Town, under the Command of Colonel Page, ſeconded by a Body of Horſe that came that Day from Newark, who putting themſelves on Foot, advanc'd among the reſt with their Swords and Piſtols, enter'd the Town, and made way for their Fellows to follow them: So that, the Aſſault being continu'd all Night, by Break of Day, all the King's Army enter'd the Line. Upon which the Governor, and all the Officers and Soldiers, to the Number of twelve Hundred, threw down their Arms, and became Priſoners of War; while the Conquerors purſu'd their Advantage with the uſual Liberty of Rapine and Plunder, and miſerably ſack'd the whole Town, without any Diſtinction of Perſons or Places; Churches and Hoſpitals, as well as other Houſes, were made a Prey to the enrag'd and greedy Soldier, to the exceeding Regret of the King, who could by no means ſtem this overflowing Torrent. Tho' the Place was well won, becauſe ſo little Time had been ſpent in the gaining it, yet it was not without conſiderable Loſs on the King's Side; there being near two Hundred Soldiers dead upon the Places of Aſſault, particularly Colonel Saint George, and others of Note, beſides many more wounded and maimed.

And ſtorms it.

The taking of ſo conſiderable a Place as Leiceſter, and in that manner, purely by an Act of great Courage, gave the King's Army a mighty Reputation, and made a terrible Impreſſion upon the Hearts of thoſe at Weſtminſter. Great Fears and Diſtruſts aroſe in the Houſes; and ſeveral Members were heard to ſay in their Paſſage, That there was no Hopes but in the King's Mercy, and that the ſpeedieſt Recourſe to it wou'd be the ſafeſt Expedient. The Royal Party ſeem'd as good as ſure, That the Day was their own; which they made appear, even in London, by all publick Signs and Diſcourſes. And the King himſelf, deceiv'd alſo with this Lightning before his Ruin, was much of the ſame Opinion; as appear'd in a Letter written to the Queen a few Days after, in which he us'd this Expreſſion; I may, without being too ſanguine, affirm, That ſince this Rebellion, my Affairs were never in ſo hopeful a Way.

The Royaliſts triumph.

6. As the gaining of Leiceſter render'd the King and his Army very formidable, ſo the Uſe that was made of it, together with the Conſequence, turn'd all to his Ruin; for inſtead of either retiring towards Worceſter to joyn with General Gerrard, who had Three Thouſand Horſe and Foot; or ſtaying for the Arrival of the Lord Goring, now ſent for by the King, or of marching Northwards with the Terror of a victorious Army; they unfortunately turn'd towards Oxford, which was thought by ſome to be in Diſtreſs. Prince Rupert was againſt this March, but now yielded to the Importunity of thoſe, who poſſibly cover'd their private Deſigns under the Care of preſerving the Duke of York, the Council, Magazine, and all the fair Ladies at Oxford; who likewiſe had too violent Apprehenſions of their Dangers, and earneſtly by Letters ſollicited Prince Rupert to their Reſcue. Five Days after the Taking of Leiceſter, the King appointed the Rendezvous for his Army; which, by Reaſon of this laſt Service, Deſertion, and other Accidents, now conſiſted of no more than Three Thouſand Five Hundred Foot; and then all the Northern Horſe, who had promis'd themſelves, and were promis'd by the King, that they ſhould go into their own Country, were ſo diſoblig'd, that they were with great Difficulty reſtrain'd from Disbanding: And tho' they were at laſt prevail'd with to March, were not ſufficiently recover'd to be depended on in any ſudden Action. Notwithſtanding all this, the March was continu'd, and the next Day, at Harborough, Intelligence came, 'That Fairfax was drawn off from Oxford, without having diſcharg'd one Piece of Cannon againſt it; that he had been beaten off with Loſs at Borſtall-Houſe; and that he was march'd with his whole Army to Buckingham.' This kindled a greater Appetite to find him out, than there was before: So the King's Army march'd to Daintry in Northamptonſhire; where, for want of knowing where the Enemy was, or what he deſign'd to do, his Majeſty remain'd in a quiet Poſture for the Space of five Days.

The King marches towards Oxford.

Fairfax advances towards him.

But upon the 13th of June, the King receiv'd Advice, That Fairfax was advanc'd to Northampton, with an Army ſuperior to all former Reports; which caus'd his Majeſty to retire the next Day to Harborough; and deſign'd to have return'd to Leiceſter, and continue upon the Defenſive, till the other Forces he expected could come up. But that very Night, upon an Allarm that Fairfax was quarter'd within Six Miles of Harborough, a Council was call'd, the former Reſolution of Retiring laid aſide, and another of Fighting as quickly aſſum'd. And ſo early in the Morning, June the 14th, all the Army was drawn up on an advantageous riſing Ground, about a Mile South from Harborough. The main Body of the Foot was led by Sir Jacob, now Lord Aſtley, being about Two Thouſand Five Hundred Men; the Right Wing of the Horſe, conſiſting of Two Thouſand, was led by Prince Rupert; the Left Wing, conſiſting of the Northern Horſe, with thoſe from Newark, amounting to Sixteen Hundred, was commanded by Sir Marmaduke Langdale: In the Reſerve, were the King's Life-Guard, under the Earl of Lindſey, with Prince Rupert's Regiment of Foot, both conſiſting of about Eight Hundred; together with the King's Horſe Guards, under the Lord Bernard Stuart, now Earl of Litchfield, which made about Five Hundred in Number. The Army thus diſpos'd in excellent Order, they receiv'd a falſe Intelligence that the Enemy was retir'd; which occaſion'd Prince Rupert, with great Impatience, to draw out a Party of Horſe, and Muſqueteers, both to diſcover and engage them, leaving the Army in that Place and Poſture. But he had not march'd above a Mile, before he had certain Notice of their Advance, and ſaw their Van; upon which he ſent back to order the Army to march up to him; and either ſuppoſing by their Motion, or being flatter'd into an Opinion they were upon a Retreat, he deſir'd they ſhould make haſte. This made them unhappily quit their Ground of Advantage, and to advance as well as they could. After a Mile and a Half's March, they diſcern'd the Enemies Horſe ſtanding upon a high Ground about Naſeby; whence ſeeing the Manner of the King's March, in a full Campaign, they had Leiſure and Opportunity to place themſelves with all the Advantages they could deſire. The Prince's natural Heat and Impatience could never bear an Enemy long in View, nor let them believe they were able to endure his Charge; ſo that the Army was drawn into a Battle before the Cannon was turn'd, or the Ground laid out upon which they were to fight.

The King prepares to receive him.

BATTLE V.
At Naſeby.

All Mens Eyes and Attentions were taken up with the Expectation of the Event of this deciſive Day; and Vows had been ſent up to Heaven, at Oxford, and at London, for the Succeſs of it, the Fate of the Kingdom depending upon it; and the Famous William Lilly told Mr. Whitelock, That if the Armies engag'd not before the Eleventh of this Month, the Parliament would have the greateſt Victory that they ever yet had. The Parliament Army being drawn up with all Advantage under Fairfax, Cromwell, Ireton, Skippon, &c. at Ten in the Morning the Battle began with more than Civil Rage; the Royaliſt's Word being God and Queen Mary! and the others, God with us! The firſt Charge was given by Prince Rupert, and his Party, who with their uſual Vigour and Intrepidity bore down all before them, overthrew Ireton's Troops, endanger'd his Life, took him Priſoner, and took ſix Pieces of the Enemies beſt Cannon. The Lord Aſtley, with his Foot, bravely advanc'd upon their Foot, and after one Volley, his Men, according to the uſual Cuſtom, fell in with their Swords, and the Butt-Ends of their Muſkets, with which they put the Enemy into great Diſorder and Confuſion. The Left Wing, with the Northern Horſe, had not the ſame Succeſs; but advancing in five Bodies, was encounter'd by Cromwell, with ſeven Bodies, greater and more numerous than either of the other, and with all the Advantage of Ground: Yet they did their Duty as well as the Place, and their Numbers would permit; but being flank'd on both Sides, and preſs'd hard before they could reach the Top of the Hill, they gave back, and fled farther and faſter than was expected. Four of the Enemies Bodies, cloſe and in good Order, follow'd them, that they might not rally again; and the reſt ſucceſsfully charg'd the King's Foot, who till then had ſo much Advantage over theirs. In this Action Cromwell, as was obſerv'd, loſt his Head-Piece for a Time; but haſtily catching it up, clapt it on the wrong Way, and ſo bravely fought with it the reſt of the Day. In the mean Time the King's Reſerve of Horſe, being his Guards, and Himſelf at the Head of them, were ready to Charge thoſe Horſe who purſu'd his Left Wing, which might have recover'd the Misfortune, when ſuddenly ſuch a Pannick Fear ſeiz'd on them, that they all ran near a Quarter of a Mile without ſtopping; which hapned upon an uncommon Accident: For the Scotch Earl of Carnewarth, who rod next the King, on a ſudden laid his Hand on the other's Bridle, crying out with two or three Oaths, Will you go upon your Death in an Inſtant? And before the King underſtood what he would have, turn'd his Horſe round: Upon which a Word ran through the Troops, March to the Right; which unfortunately led them both from charging the Enemy, and aſſiſting their own Men; and caus'd them all to turn their Horſes, and ride upon the Spur, as if every Man was to ſhift for Himſelf. By this Time Prince Rupert was return'd with a good Body from his unfortunate Purſuit; but his Horſe could not be brought to rally, or to charge the Enemy; tho' the King, with the greateſt Hazard and Magnanimity, did all that was poſſible to encourage them, crying out, One Charge more, and we recover the Day! The King gained nothing but the Characters of Courage and Conduct from all his Enemies; but not being able to prevail with his Troops, he retreated as well as he could, and left Fairfax entire Maſter of the Field.

The King's Courage.

The fatal Effects of the Battel.

Thus ended the fatal Battle of Naſeby, in which the King's Loſs was irreparable; for beſides that there fell above a Hundred and Fifty Officers, and Gentlemen of Quality, as Sir Thomas Daliſon, Sir Richard Cave, Sir Peter Brown, Colonel Thomas, Lieutenant-Colonel Davies, &c. moſt of his Foot were taken Priſoners, with all his Cannon and Baggage, Eight Thouſand Arms, and other rich Booty. The Enemy avoided no Manner of Cruelty that Day; and in the Purſuit kill'd above a Hundred Women, of which ſome were the Wives of the Officers of Quality. Among the Booty was the King's own Cabinet, where were lodg'd his moſt ſecret Papers, and Letters between Him and his Queen; of which they ſoon after made a moſt barbarous Uſe, and publiſh'd them in Print, with the ſevereſt Comments; that is, ſo much of them as they thought would Aſperſe either of their Majeſties, and encreaſe the Prejudice they had rais'd againſt them, and conceal'd other Parts, which would have vindicated them from many Particulars charg'd againſt them. Among the Papers conceal'd, the Loſs of which troubled the King more than all the reſt, were his Majeſty's Divine Meditations, which, with ſome Additions, afterwards compos'd that famous and controverted Book, call'd 'ΕΙΚΩ`Ν ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ'. Which tho' not mention'd by the Lord Clarendon, is inconteſtably prov'd by a Cloud of Witneſſes, both of Friends and Enemies, in Mr. Wagſtaffe's third Edition of his Vindication of King Charles.

The Treachery of a Spy.

IX. 1. From this great Period, the King's whole Party began to fall into Convulſive Fits; and if they made any ſtrong Motions, they were ſtill but the Indications of a Conſumptive and Expiring Body. The Fatality of this Battle was the more remarkable, becauſe it depended ſo much upon the Treachery of a ſingle Perſon, as we have it from Sprigge, and other Writers, who inform us, That a ſubtle Agent of Watſon's, the Scout-Maſter-General, upon Fairfax's raiſing the Siege before Oxford, ſtole into the Place ſome Time before, and told the Secretary, Sir Edward Nicolas, ſome Particulars of the King's Progreſs, as alſo a true Account of the deſign'd Removal of the Camp and Siege; both which gain'd him ſo much Credit, that he was employ'd, tho' with ſome ſeeming Reluctancy, to go into the Weſt. At Bath he met with the Prince of Wales, and bringing joyful News to him of the Siege of Oxford being rais'd, he receiv'd him graciouſly, and ſent him further to the Lord Goring, then lying before Taunton; who alſo ſpeedily return'd him to the King, with a Pacquet of Letters, in which he gave Aſſurance, That within three Weeks Time he ſhould take Taunton, and make his Majeſty Maſter of the Weſt; and humbly adviſ'd him to keep on the Defenſive, and by no Means to engage till he had joyn'd him with his Army. The Man, with new Appearance of Difficulty, receiv'd the Pacquet, but brought them to General Fairfax fairly ſeal'd up. Cromwell and Ireton prevail'd with the unwilling General to open thoſe Letters, which if the King had receiv'd, it is more than probable, that his Majeſty had declin'd Fighting when he did. But as the Want of this Intelligence was ſo fatal to the King, ſo the Notice of it quicken'd Fairfax to march towards the Relief of Taunton: Yet being ſo near Leiceſter, and at the Head of a victorious Army, he advanc'd to that Place, and became Maſter of it without any conſiderable Oppoſition; and then bent his March towards the Weſt.

The King's March.

The King, and Prince Rupert, in the mean Time, march'd with the broken Troops to Aſhby-de-la-Zouch, and from thence the next Day to Lichfield, and in two Days more to Bewdley in Worceſterſhire, where he reſted one Day. Then, upon Advice, the King reſolv'd for Hereford, and ſo for Wales, concluding he ſhould, with the Forces of General Gerrard, and ſome new deſign'd Levies in thoſe Counties, be able to form a new Army; which Project was thought to have excluded a better, which had been to have made for the Weſt, to have joyn'd with Lord Goring, and with an Army doubly encreas'd by Gerrard, and Him, have try'd the Fortune of a ſecond Day. At Hereford, the Manner and Number of the Levies upon thoſe Parts, and South Wales, which ſhould have made up Five Thouſand Foot, was reduc'd to ſome Method; but before it was compleated, Prince Rupert, deſigning to preſerve Briſtol, went thither, leaving this Affair too much confus'd and in Diſorder. From Hereford, where Gerrard joyn'd the King with Two Thouſand Horſe and Foot, his Majeſty march'd to Abergavenny, where he was met by the Commiſſioners of the Welſh Counties, who by their Promiſes gave him very great Hopes and Incouragement. From thence he went to Ragland-Caſtle, the noble Houſe of the Old Marqueſs of Worceſter; a Place well fortify'd and garriſon'd by the Owner, where he reſolv'd to ſtay till he ſaw the Effect of the mighty Promiſes that were made to him.

He is entertain'd by the Marqueſs of Worceſter.

Here his Majeſty was for three Weeks entertain'd with extraordinary Greatneſs and Freedom by the Old Marqueſs, who receiv'd and diverted Him with a facetious Pleaſantry peculiar to Himſelf. The King acknowledg'd to Him, That no Man would truſt him with ſo much Money as he had done; and return'd him his particular Thanks. To which the other quickly reply'd, Sir, I had your Word for my Money, but I never thought I ſhou'd be ſoon repay'd; for now you have given me your Thanks, I have all I expected. While he continu'd here, ſome Informations were given of certain Country Gentlemen, who had done ill Offices to him by obſtructing his Levies, and other Means: Theſe being ſecured and brought before his Majeſty, one of them with Tears proteſted his Innocence; which ſo affected the good-natur'd King, that he order'd him forthwith to be releas'd, and the reſt to be gently treated, notwithſtanding many Accuſations againſt them. This being told the Marqueſs, he took the Liberty to blame his Majeſty's too great Lenity, and to let him know, That he ſhould have firſt heard their Accuſations, and then ſhewn what Mercy he pleas'd. The King told him, He heard they were accus'd by a contrary Faction, who would be apt to charge them with more than the Nature of their Offences had deſerv'd; to which the Marqueſs made this ſhrewd Return, Well, Sir, this Forgiving Temper may chance to gain you the Kingdom of Heaven; but if ever you gain the Kingdom of England by theſe Means, I'll be your Bondman.

2. After ſome Reſt, the King was awaken'd with the News of Fairfax's Defeating of the Lord Goring at Langport, upon the 10th of July; which broke the Deſign of a new Army, moſt of General Gerrard's Foot, and ſuch as were levy'd upon this Occaſion, being by Prince Rupert drawn to reinforce the Garriſons of Briſtol and Bridgewater; and upon that, the Scots advanc'd as far as Worceſter, took a little Garriſon between that and Hereford, and put all to the Sword. This forc'd the King to new Counſels, which were, that he ſhould ſpeedily paſs over to Briſtol, and that all the Horſe under Gerrard and Langdale, by a Journey about, ſhould make their Way over the Severn, and joyn the reſt as ſoon as they could. This Reſolution was ſo near executed, as that the King was at the Water-ſide near Chepſtow, where Prince Rupert, from Briſtol, met him, being well ſatisfy'd that the King ſhould come over, tho' he had not courted him to it. But whether upon Apprehenſions of ſome about the King, or Miſunderſtandings between them and Prince Rupert, the Deſign was ſuddenly chang'd, and the King repair'd to Cardiffe. Here he was inform'd of the Taking of Bridgewater by General Fairfax, on the 23d of July; and likewiſe of the Loſs of Pontfract-Caſtle in Yorkſhire. The former was thought almoſt impregnable, and Windham the Governor had often aſſur'd the King, That it was not to be taken; therefore the Loſs of it made a ſtrong Impreſſion ſion upon the King, and ſo terrify'd the City of Bath, that it ſurrender'd without any great Reſiſtance, on the 29th of July. Notwithſtanding theſe great Advantages, many of the Royaliſts ſtill entertain'd themſelves with the vain Hopes of a Peace; and Prince Rupert himſelf writ his Advice to that Purpoſe, to the Duke of Richmond, to be preſented to the King. This occaſion'd his Majeſty to write a long Letter to the Prince, in which he has theſe remarkable Words: If I had any Quarrel but the Defence of my Religion, Crown, and Friends, you had full Reaſon for your Advice: For I confeſs, that ſpeaking either as a meer Soldier, or Stateſman, I muſt ſay, there is no Probability but of Ruin; but as a Chriſtian, I muſt tell you, that God will not ſuffer Rebels to proſper, or his Cauſe to be overthrown: And whatſoever perſonal Puniſhment it ſhall pleaſe him to inflict on Me, muſt not make me repine, much leſs to give over this Quarrel; for I know my Obligations to be both in Conſcience and Honour, neither to abandon God's Cauſe, injure my Succeſſors, nor forſake my Friends. As for the Iriſh, I aſſure you, they ſhall not cheat Me; but it is poſſible they may cozen Themſelves: For be aſſur'd, what I have refus'd to the Engliſh, I will not grant to the Iriſh Rebels.

His Letter to Prince Rupert.

Complaints of the Welſh.

General Gerrard made a Lord.

By this Time the Scots were ſet down before Hereford, which moſt concluded they wou'd certainly carry, therefore it was neceſſary for the King either to endeavour to raiſe the Siege, or to think of his own Security: The firſt was thought practicable, to which End Warrants were directed to the Sheriffs of the Welſh Counties to raiſe the Poſſe Comitatus, and to be ready at a Day prefix'd to join with the King's Horſe to undertake it. But it was ſoon diſcover'd that this Expedient had rais'd an unruly Spirit, that cou'd not eaſily be laid; for the diſcontented Gentry of thoſe Parts, having legally got the People together, poſſeſs'd them, 'That now the King was there, it was fit 'they ſhou'd deſire Redreſs of their Grievances; as to 'have their Contributions abated, and the Power of the 'Counties put into ſuch Hands as they ſhou'd nominate.' Theſe, and other Requeſts, with numerous Complaints againſt General Gerrard and his Officers, kept them many Days in a Body of three or four thouſand Men; and at laſt the King was compell'd to grant them their Petitions, tho' in ſuch a Manner as they believ'd it was extorted; and farther to ſatisfie them, he remov'd General Gerrard, and made the Lord Aſtley Commander of all thoſe Counties. But the King, knowing Gerrard to be a Man of Power, and of a Nature too impetuous to ſubmit to any Thing for Conſcience or Duty, reſolv'd to make him a Baron; which gave a new Diſſatisfaction to the Gentry in thoſe Parts. At the ſame Time that gallant Gentleman, Sir Thomas Glemham, came to the King with two hundred Foot, which he had brought with him out of the Garriſon of Carliſle; which Place he had gloriouſly defended for eleven Months againſt David Leſley, till all the Horſes in the Garriſon were eaten, and then had yielded upon as honourable Conditions as had been given upon any Surrender. And it is obſervable, that within three Days after his Arrival, General Gerrard was made Lord Gerrard of Brandon in Suffolk, a Town in which Sir Thomas Glemham had both Intereſt, and an Inheritance of the Family of Brandon, by which Name the other affected to be call'd. This wou'd have been ill reſented by any Man, who was leſs than Sir Thomas Glemham.

The King's farther March.

The Deſign of raiſing the Siege of Hereford being now found impracticable, it was full Time for the King to conſider of his own Security, being environ'd with Danger, and but two Ways to chuſe, either to imbark and paſs the Severne into Devonſhire, where the Prince of Wales and Goring's Army then was, or elſe to endeavour to make his Way towards the victorious Montroſs in the North. Several Objections being made againſt the firſt, the ſecond was embrac'd; and in the Beginning of Auguſt, the King's Forces left Cardiffe, and croſſing the Mountains by Brecknock and Radnor, came in three Days to Ludlow; having by that Time paſs'd the Scotch Quarters, before they had Notice of their March. Thence by quick Marches through Part of Worceſter, Stafford and Darbyſhire, they arriv'd at Welbeck in Nottinghamſhire; whither all the Yorkſhire Gentlemen that had been in Pontfract Caſtle came and attended the King, as did Sir Richard Willis, Governor of Newark, with the Commiſſioners of Lincoln and Nottingham. Here the Deſign of haſtning to Montroſs receiv'd a Delay; till under the Countenance of ſome Forces drawn out of Newark and Welbeck, with the Aſſiſtance of the Yorkſhire Gentlemen, they might raiſe a Body of Foot, which they believ'd might eaſily be done. To which End the King march'd to Doncaſter, where the Gentlemen put this Deſign in Execution, and brought it to that Perfection, that in three Days there was a viſible Appearance of three thouſand Men, that wou'd have been ready arm'd the next Day. But having receiv'd certain Intelligence that David Leſley by a ſhorter Way was got to Rotheram, within ten Miles, with all the Scottiſh Horſe, they found it not only impracticable to advance, but unſafe to ſtay there; and ſo leaving many a poor Man, who had been ready to ſerve the King, to the Mercy of the Enemy, they retreated, to the great Satiſfaction of Leſley, who might thereby ſecurely attempt Montroſs, as he afterwards did.

He gets to Oxford.

Lord Littleton's Death.

From Doncaſter, the King with his Forces came to Newark in two Days, and in two more to Stanford, with Deſign for Oxford, there to refreſh their Men and Horſes. But having Notice of ſome new-rais'd Troops of Norfolk being about Huntingdon, for the augmenting Roſſiter's Force in Lincolnſhire, it was propos'd to ſurpriſe them by a quick March, which was put in ſudden Execution: For the next Day two or three Troops were intercepted by the Way about Stilton; and after ſome ſmall Reſiſtance at and about Huntingdon, the Town was forc'd; their Scotch Commander, and ſome others taken Priſoners, and the reſt fled in Diſorder to Cambridge and towards London. The Houſes of thoſe that fled were plunder'd without Diſtinction, being judg'd as Favourers of the Enemy. Here the King ſtay'd two Days, and made a Shew of fortifying the Place, calling the Country to a Rendezvous, who out of Love or Fear ſeem'd very forward to his Service. But the King hearing the ill News of the taking of Sherburn Caſtle, and apprehending that Fairfax wou'd beſiege Briſtol, laid aſide the Thoughts of this Place; and ſo paſſing by Cambridge, which he look'd upon with a Benign Eye, as being the Seat of Learning and the Muſes, he haſtned towards Oxford; at which Place he arriv'd on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt; having by his great Celerity baffled all the Induſtry of his Followers. On the ſame Day dy'd the Lord Littleton, Lord-Keeper of the great Seal, of whom much has been ſaid; who was untimely ſnatcht away in the fifty-ſixth Year of his Age, to the particular Grief of the King himſelf, who immediately conferr'd that Honour upon the worthy Sir Richard Lane, Lord-Chief-Baron of the Exchequer.

The King goes to Worceſter and Hereford.

3. The King ſtay'd but two Days in Oxford, the Lords and Ladies there being well ſatisfy'd with his Departure, fearing his Preſence wou'd cauſe a Siege; ſo on the laſt of Auguſt he began his March towards Worceſter, his preſent Deſign being to raiſe the Siege of Hereford, which appear'd the more eaſie, becauſe the Scots had ſent away their Horſe towards the North, as was before hinted. Arriving at Worceſter, he was certainly inform'd, That Fairfax had actually beſieg'd Briſtol; which gave more Satisfaction than Trouble, all looking upon it as a Place ſo well fortify'd and provided, and likely to be ſo well defended, as might prove the Ruin of his Army; eſpecially ſince Prince Rupert wrote to the King, That he wou'd undertake to defend it full four Months. Therefore the King purſu'd his former Deſign of Relieving Hereford; and being upon the March thither, he underſtood 'That the Scotch Army was 'that Morning riſen in great Confuſion, and reſolv'd to 'make their Retreat ſo as to paſs through Gloceſter.' This News was ſo grateful, and the King's Reception ſo joyful at Hereford, that he ſlip'd the Opportunity he then had of diſcommoding, if not ruining, the Scotch Army; which now paſs'd through a ſtrange Country, and diſſatisfy'd with their whole Nation: Inſomuch that the Governor of Gloceſter wou'd not allow them Shelter in that Garriſon, till they ſent him Word, If they might not enter that Town, they knew they ſhou'd be welcome at the King's Garriſon at Worceſter; by which he was ſo convinc'd, as to permit them to paſs through the Town, and ſo to proſecute their March to the North.

He hears of the Loſs of Briſtol.

But the King's Heart was wholly ſet upon the Relief of Briſtol; and thereupon, going a ſecond Time to Ragland, he ſent a Scheme to Prince Rupert, 'That he wou'd ſend 'ſpeedy Orders to General Goring to draw what Force 'he cou'd out of the Weſt, and to haſten it on that Side; 'and on the other, he deſign'd to draw at leaſt three 'thouſand Foot out of his Garriſons, to paſs them over 'the Severne about Beachley, and at the ſame Time to 'ford that River with above three thouſand Horſe, near 'Gloceſter, join the Foot, and ſo on both ſides fall on 'Fairfax's Quarters.' But before this hopeful Project cou'd be brought to any Maturity, the King receiv'd the aſtoniſhing News of the Surrender of Briſtol, upon the 11th of September. By which his Majeſty loſt all his chief Magazines and Warlike Proviſions, and conſequently in a ſhort Time South Wales, and all the Weſt of England. This melancholy Account immediately brought the King back to Hereford, and caus'd a Revocation of the Lord Gerrard with his Horſe from Shropſhire, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale and Sir Thomas Glemham from Cardiffe; and from hence the King wrote a ſharp Letter to Prince Rupert, in which he ſays, I muſt remember you of Yours of the 12*th of* Auguſt, whereby you aſſur'd me, That if no Mutiny hapned, you wou'd keep Briſtol for four Months. Did you keep it four Days? Was there any thing like a Mutiny? — My Concluſion is, to deſire you to ſeek your Subſiſtance, untill it ſhall pleaſe God to determine of my Condition, ſomewhere beyond Seas; to which end I ſend you herewith a Paſs, &c. With this Letter he ſent to the Lords at Oxford, where the Prince was arriv'd, with Orders to demand his Commiſſion, and withal a Paſs for him to depart the Kingdom; and with farther Directions to commit his Friend Colonel Legg, the Governor of that City, and to deprive him of his Command, deſigning Sir Thomas Glemham for his Succeſſor.

He diſcharges Prince Rupert.

The King and his Council remain'd about a Week in great Perplexity and Irreſolution, neither knowing how to govern Themſelves or their Affairs; ſometimes they reſolv'd for Worceſter, then again for other Places, till at laſt Neceſſity made ſome Reſolutions to be taken. They were aſſur'd, 'That the whole Strength in the North was 'gather'd together under Major-General Pointz; and that 'he was already come between Hereford and Worceſter, 'with above three Thouſand Horſe and Dragoons, ſolely 'to attend the King's Motions:' So that it would be very difficult to gain Worceſter, whither the King's Deſign of going was, upon a new Reſolution taken to march into Scotland, and joyn with the Succeſsful Montroſs. This being the only Intention, it was thought beſt, 'not to proſecute that March by Worceſter, which might hazard an 'Engagement with Pointz; but rather to take a more ſafe 'Paſſage through North-Wales to Cheſter, and ſo through 'Lancaſhire and Cumberland to find an unobſtructed Way 'into Scotland.' Thus within four Days, through diſmal incommodious Ways, the King arriv'd within half a Day's Journey of Cheſter, which he found in more Danger than he ſuſpected: For within three Days before, the Enemy, from their Neighbouring Garriſons, had ſurpris'd both the Outworks and Suburbs, and had made ſome Attempt upon the City, to the great Terror and Conſternation of the Inhabitants.

The King goes to Cheſter.

The Beſiegers look'd upon themſelves as loſt; and the better to ſecure them, Sir Marmaduke Langdale was ſent with moſt of the Horſe over Holt-Bridge, to lye on the Eaſt Side of the River Dee; and the King, with his Guards, and the reſt of the Horſe, march'd directly into Cheſter, reſolving early the next Morning to ſally out upon the Enemy, while Sir Marmaduke was to fall upon the Back of them, and ſo incloſe them. But Sir Marmaduke, being that Night drawn on Routon-Heath, two Miles from Cheſter, had intercepted a Letter from Pointz to the Commander before Cheſter, informing him, 'That he was come to their Reſcue, and 'deſiring to have ſome Foot ſent to him, to aſſiſt him againſt the King's Horſe:' And the very next Morning he appear'd, and was ſo charg'd by Langdale, as he retir'd with Loſs; but ſtill kept at ſuch Diſtance, that the Foot before Cheſter might come to him. The Beſiegers began to withdraw from the Suburbs in ſuch Haſte, that thoſe in the City believ'd they were upon their Flight, and ſo moſt of the Horſe and Foot in the Place iſſu'd out to purſue them. But their Haſte was to joyn with Pointz, which they quickly effected; and then they charg'd Langdale, who was routed, and purſu'd by the united Parties to the Walls of Cheſter. There the Earl of Litchfield with the King's Guards, and the Lord Gerrard with the reſt of the Horſe, bravely charg'd Pointz and the reſt, and forc'd them to retire. But the Diſorder of thoſe Horſe that firſt fled, had ſo fill'd the narrow Ways, which were unfit for them to fight in, that at laſt the Enemy's Muſqueteers compell'd the King's Horſe to turn, and to rout one another, and to bear down their own Officers. The King, from the Walls of Cheſter, was a ſad Spectator of this Tragical Confuſion; in which fell many Gentlemen and Officers, with the brave Earl of Litchfield; who was the third Brother of that illuſtrious Family of the Stuarts, that ſacrific'd their Lives in this Conteſt; a faultleſs young Gentleman, of a moſt courteous and affable Diſpoſition, and an invincible Spirit and Courage; whoſe Loſs was exceedingly lamented by all Men, and by the King born with unexpreſſible Grief. This Defeat hapned on the 26th of September, and broke all the Body of Horſe, that attended the King from the Battel of Naſeby, and now fled all the Country to ſave themſelves, and were as much diſpers'd, as the greateſt Misfortune cou'd produce.

His Forces defeated at Routon-Heath.

The Earl of Litchfield's Death.

4. This Defeat utterly broke the Deſign at that Time for Scotland; which was happy for him in one Reſpect, for about that Time Montroſs was defeated by David Leſley; ſo that if the King had been farther advanc'd, he cou'd never have ſafely retreated. He ſtaid in Cheſter only one Night after this Blow, but return'd to the ſtrong Caſtle of Denbigh in North-Wales, attended only with five hundred Horſe; where he ſtaid three Days to refreſh himſelf, and to rally ſuch of his Troops as cou'd be got together. So that in a ſhort Time he had four and twenty hundred Horſe in View; but whither to go with them was ſtill the difficult Queſtion. Some propos'd the Iſle of Angleſey as a Place both of Safety and Conveniency, and from whence he might eaſily be tranſported into Ireland or Scotland. Others objected againſt this, and propos'd that he might commodiouſly make his Winter Quarters at Worceſter, and by lying upon the Severne, between Bridgenorth and Worceſter, ſtand there upon his Guard; and by the Acceſs of ſome other Forces be able to fight with Pointz, whoſe near Approaches to him had now made his March more difficult. But there was ſo little Choice, that it was immediately undertaken, and with that dextrous Management, that Pointz was left a full Day's Journey behind. Here Prince Maurice waited on his Majeſty with eight hundred Horſe, part of which was of Prince Rupert's Regiment that came out of Briſtol. And now being thus ſtrengthen'd, they leſs apprehended the Enemy; yet continu'd their March without reſting, till by fording the Severne, they arriv'd at Bridgenorth, the Place firſt deſign'd.

He retires to Bridgenorth.

Now all expected, that they ſhou'd go immediately to Worceſter, and take up their Winter Quarters; but upon the unpleaſing News of the Surrender of Berkley-Caſtle in Glouceſterſhire, and of the Deviſes in Wiltſhire, two ſtrong Garriſons of the King's, it was warmly urg'd, That Worceſter wou'd not be a good Place for the King's Winter Reſidence, and Newark was propos'd as a Place of greater Security. This laſt Advice was owing to the private Intereſt of the volatile Lord Digby, who chiefly governing the King's Counſels, had been the main Cauſe of Revoking Prince Rupert's Commiſſion, and now found that the Odium of that Action was like to fall upon himſelf, and that the Prince reſolv'd not to quit the Kingdom, before he had ſeen his Majeſty, and juſtify'd his late Proceedings. Wherefore this Lord, to prevent the breaking of that Cloud that threatned his Ruin; and conſidering it was not only accompanied with the Anger of Prince Rupert and his Brother, but with the Hatred of the Lord Gerrard, he prevail'd with his Majeſty, againſt the Opinion of all about him, to undertake the Journey for Newark; hoping by Time and the Difficulty of Prince Rupert's coming thither, to abate the Fury of the Storm, which was juſt falling upon him; it being much eaſier for Prince Rupert to come from Oxford to Worceſter, where his Brother Maurice was alſo Governour, than to any conſiderable Place in the King's Power. And ſo the King, having ſent Sir Thomas Glemham to receive the Government of Oxford, march'd to Litchfield, and ſo to Newark, with that Speed, that the Governor had ſcarce Notice of his coming. In this Manner, and in this Perplexity, was the King compell'd to ſubmit to the private Humours and Paſſions of other Men.

And ſo to Newark.

The King being in a manner ſettled at Newark, and having regulated the Diſorders in that Garriſon, in the Beginning of October, was reviv'd by new Reports, That Montroſs, ſince his Defeat, had given a like Blow to David Leſley, and was with a powerful Force on the Borders. And therefore his Majeſty was perſwaded the third time to endeavour the joining with him; for tho' he had engag'd himſelf the contrary at Bridgenorth, yet the Lord Digby, finding himſelf now purſu'd by Prince Rupert and his Brother, and not being able to ſuſtain the Rencounter, again prevail'd ſo far as to draw the King Northwards, only under the Pretence of gaining a Day or two's March to meet the Confirmation of this good News, or elſe to return to Newark. Accordingly he advanc'd to Tuxford, and ſo to Welbeck; where a Council being call'd, the King was prevail'd with to declare, 'That he wou'd not 'have the Queſtion to be, Whether he ſhou'd advance or 'retire, but concerning the Manner of his advancing; 'which in this Extremity he muſt either do, or be brought 'to a worſe Condition.' This Declaration left very little to be conſulted upon; but before any thing cou'd be fully determin'd, the King unexpectedly receiv'd an Account from a faithful Hand, 'That Montroſs was then retreating towards the North, that David Leſley was on 'the South Side of Edinburgh, and the Scotch Army between Northallerton and Newcaſtle.' This put all the Council into a Maze, and caus'd the Lord Digby himſelf to declare, that now he thought it not fit for his Majeſty to advance, but to retire to Newark; and ſo immediately, to the general Satisfaction, Order was accordingly given.

The Lord Digby's Deſigns.

But it ſeems that Lord had ſtill another Game to play; for on the next Morning, when all the Horſe were drawn out, with Expectation to march back, the King ſuddenly declar'd, 'That tho' it was not fit for him to march Northwards, yet he thought it neceſſary that Sir Marmaduke 'Langdale, and the Northern Horſe, ſhould make an Attempt to join with the Marqueſs of Montroſs.' Sir Marmaduke immediately embrac'd the Propoſition, and unexpectedly deſir'd, That the Lord Digby might go and command in Chief. This was chearfully accepted of by that Lord; and without Delay a ſhort Commiſſion was drawn on the Place to make him Lieutenant-General of all the Forces on the North of Trent. So taking with him Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and Sir Richard Hutton, High-Sheriff of Yorkſhire, together with the Earls of Carnewarth and Niddiſdale, and ſeveral other Scotch Gentlemen, he march'd away at the Head of fifteen hundred Horſe, to Doncaſter ; and ſo in a Moment became a General, as well as a Secretary of State. The next Day in his March, there being about a thouſand Foot to paſs by Sherborne to Cawood, he march'd towards them, and eaſily defeated them, they all laying down their Arms. Then drawing into Sherborne to refreſh his Troops, he had ſudden Notice of the Advance of ſome Horſe towards him, under Colonel Copley; upon which he immediately drew out of the Town as many Troops as he cou'd, and bravely charg'd and routed moſt of the Enemy's Bodies, and drove them through the Town: Thoſe of his own Party, who were making ready in the Town, ſeeing the Enemies Flight, unfortunately imagin'd it had been their Fellows, and ſo fled with great Confuſion: By which means he loſt the Opportunity of gaining ſuch a Victory, as in Conjunction might have made him Maſter of York and the whole North. But inſtead of that, by means of a Troop of the Enemy, that remain'd unbroken, he was compell'd to make an inglorious Retreat to Skipton, with the Loſs of his own Baggage. From whence he march'd through Weſtmorland and Cumberland as far as Dumfreeze in Scotland; where Mutiny, and Loſs of Hopes of joyning with Montroſs, caus'd his Lordſhip, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, the two Earls, and moſt of the Officers to ſhip themſelves for the Iſle of Man, leaving their Troops to ſhift for Themſelves: And ſo thoſe fifteen Hundred Horſe were in a few Days reduc'd to Nothing, and the Lord Digby's Command brought to a ſudden Period.

His Troops routed and diſpers'd.

His Letters, &c. taken.

In this Lord's Baggage, was taken his Cabinet of ſecret Papers and Letters, of which they made the ſame ungenerous Uſe as they did of the King's Letters taken at Naſeby; printing ſome that they thought to the Diſadvantage of the King and his Party, and concealing others that were either to his Honour or for his Vindication. Among the Letters conceal'd, Dr. Nalſon has recover'd one out of the Paper Office, which had been voted Needleſs to be printed, and written by this Lord on the firſt of Auguſt laſt, to the Popiſh Lords and Gentlemen in Ireland. In which are theſe remarkable Words: I am commanded by his Majeſty to declare to you, That were the Condition of his Affairs much more deſperate than it is, he wou'd never redeem them, by any Conceſſion of ſo much Wrong both to his Honour and Conſcience: It is for the Defence of his Religion principally, that he hath undergone the Extremities of War here, and he will never redeem his Crown by ſacrificing it There.----If nothing will content you, but what muſt wound his Honour and Conſcience, you muſt expect, That how low ſoever his Condition is, and how deteſtable ſoever the Rebels of this Kingdom are to him, he will in That Point joyn with Them, the Scots, or with any of the Proteſtant Profeſſion, rather than do the leaſt Act, that may hazard that Religion, in which and for which he will live and die.

5. The King had ſpeedy Notice of this Misfortune at Newark, and then concluded it was not ſafe to ſtay there any longer: For by this Time Pointz was come with all his Force to Nottingham, and Roſſiter with his Lincolnſhire Troops to Grantham, and the King's remaining Power was not ſufficient to oppoſe either of them; ſo that nothing was left but to watch an Opportunity, by the Darkneſs of the Nights to ſteal from thence to Worceſter, or Oxford. In the mean Time Prince Rupert got to Belvoir-Caſtle, with much Hazard; breaking through Roſſiter's Quarters, with his Brother Maurice, and a Hundred and twenty Officers and Gentlemen in his Company; whither the King wrote him a Letter, commanding him to ſtay there till farther Order, and intimating his Diſpleaſure in not giving Obedience to his former Command. Notwithſtanding this Command, he came the next Day to Newark, and was met by the Lord Gerrard, and Sir Richard Willis Governor of the Town, with a Hundred Horſe, two Miles in his Way. About an Hour after, he came to the Court with his Train; and without Ceremony told his Majeſty, That he came to render an Account of the Loſs of Briſtol, and to clear Himſelf of all that had been caſt upon Him. The King made him little Anſwer at that Time; but after a few Days Debate about that Affair, his Majeſty, by the Advice of the Lords then preſent, caus'd a ſhort Declaration to be drawn up, by which he clear'd Prince Rupert of any Diſloyalty or Treaſon, in rendering of that Place, but not of Indiſcretion, as may be ſeen in the printed Paper: And ſo to the Satisfaction of Prince Rupert all Things were ſettled, and he reſtor'd to the Favour of his Prince, who at the ſame Time expected that he ſhou'd have immediately departed the Town.

The Change of the Poſture of the Enemy, caus'd his Majeſty to reſolve to begin his Retreat on Sunday Night, the twentieth of October; which he imparted to none but two or three of the neareſt Truſt. But before he went, having obſerv'd the Differences between the Governor, Sir Richard Willis, and the Commiſſioners there reſident, and that it wou'd be deſtructive to his Service ſtill to continue him Governor, He reſolv'd to remove him, and prefer him to be Captain of his Horſe-Guard in the Place of the late Earl of Litchfield, and ſo to leave the Lord Bellaſis Governor. This was propos'd by the King on Sunday, with all the Courtly Civility that cou'd be imagin'd; but Sir Richard appear'd deeply concern'd, and declar'd, That his Enemies wou'd triumph at his Removal. To whoſe Objections the King gave obliging Anſwers, and ſo went to Church, leaving it to his Conſideration till his Return; at which Time Sir Richard, accompany'd with both the Princes, the Lord Gerrard, and about twenty Officers of the Garriſon, addreſs'd himſelf to the King, and told him, That what he had ſaid to him in private, was now the publick Talk of the Town, and much to his Diſhonour. Prince Rupert ſaid, That Sir Richard Willis was to be remov'd, only becauſe he was his Friend; and the Lord Gerrard added, That it was the Plot of the Lord Digby, who was a Traytor, and he wou'd prove him ſo. The King being thus ſurpris'd, wou'd have drawn Sir Richard into his Bed-Chamber, as a Place of more Privacy; but he refus'd, ſaying aloud, He had receiv'd a publick Injury, therefore expected a publick Satisfaction. This ſo rous'd his Majeſty's Courage, that he commanded them to depart, in ſuch a Manner as much confounded them. Immediately they ſounded to Horſe, intending to be gone immediately; by which Time ſeveral Lords and Gentlemen repair'd to the King, with all the Expreſſions of Concern and Duty; where the Queſtion being put, what was to be done, his Majeſty reſolv'd to leave them to Themſelves and their own Reflections, and preſently declar'd the Lord Bellaſis Governor of the Town. Towards Night they ſent a Remonſtrance or Petition, ſign'd by about four and twenty of them, deſiring his Majeſty, ‘ That Sir Richard Willis might receive a Tryal by a Court of War, and if they judg'd him faulty, then to be diſmiſs'd his Charge; or elſe Paſſes for Themſelves, and as many Horſe as wou'd go with them; and withal hoping his Majeſty wou'd not eſteem this Action of theirs to be Mutiny.’ To the laſt, the King ſaid, He wou'd not Chriſten it, tho' it look'd very like one: As for a Court of War, He wou'd not make that a Judge of his Actions; but as to Paſſes, They ſhou'd have as many as they deſir'd. Accordingly the next Day they left the Town, to the Number of two Hundred Horſe, and repair'd to Belvoir-Caſtle, and from thence ſent one of their Number to Weſtminſter, to deſire Leave and Paſſes to go beyond the Seas.

A great Diſturbance there.

Beſides the ſenſible Affliction the King receiv'd from this Action of his Nephew's, it had near broke the Deſign he had for his preſent Eſcape, which was not to be executed at this Time; and Pointz and Roſſiter drew nearer every Day, believing they had ſo effectually ſurrounded him, that it was not poſſible for him to get from their Hands. They had ſecur'd Shetford Houſe, and kept ſtrong Guards between that and Belvoir, and ſtronger towards Litchfield, which they moſt ſuſpected; ſo that it look'd as if nothing but a Miracle cou'd conduct him out of that Labyrinth. The King wou'd not deſpair, but ſent a truſty Meſſenger to Oxford, to give private Directions for the Horſe there to attend him on a certain Day, between Banbury and Daventree : And on Monday the third of November, he privately ſent a Gentleman to Belvoir-Caſtle, to underſtand the State of the Enemies Quarters, and inform the Governor of that Garriſon of the King's Deſign to march thither that Night, with Order for his Troops and Guides to be ready; but with expreſs Charge, ‘ not to acquaint the two Princes, and their Company, with the Deſign.’ About eleven a

Clock, in a dark Night, the King march'd out of Newark, with a Body of between four and five Hundred Horſe; and arriv'd at Belvoir about three in the Morning, without any Interruption or Allarm. There the Governor, with his Troop and good Guides were ready, and attended the King, till break of Day, without the leaſt Notice to thoſe within: But ſtill he was to paſs between the Enemy's Garriſons; and therefore without Delay march'd all that Day; and paſſing near Burleigh on the Hill, one of their Garriſons, from thence ſome Horſe, and from Rockingham-Caſtle, follow'd in the Rear, and took and ſlew ſome Straglers, and others whoſe Horſes were tir'd. Towards the Evening the King was ſo exceeding weary, that he was forc'd to reſt and ſleep for four Hours, in a Village within eight Miles of Northampton. At ten that Night they began to march again, and were before Day next Morning paſs'd Daventree, and before Noon at Banbury; where the Oxford Horſe met the King, and that Day conducted him ſafe to Oxford. Thus he finiſh'd the moſt tedious and grievous March that ever had afflicted him; having been almoſt in perpetual Motion from the Loſs of the Battle of Naſeby to this Hour, with ſuch an Accumulation of diſmal Accidents, as muſt have broken the Spirits of any Man not truly magnanimous. And now being entertain'd with ſorrowful Countenances, and a melancholy Account of Affairs, he reply'd with ſingular Courage, That three Years ago he had been yet in a lower Condition than at preſent: The ſame God, who from ſuch deſpicable Beginnings, had render'd him Great and Formidable, did live and reign ſtill; to whoſe Goodneſs he alſo recommended the Care of his preſent abject Condition.

His Saying.

His low Condition.

X. 1. The King being now ſafe at Oxford, and at Eaſe from grievous Marches, and inſolent Provocations, had Time to breath, and to look about him; and with fuller, and more faithful Councils, to conſider both his preſent Condition, and what Remedies to apply for his future Preſervation. For upon his Return he found Wincheſter and Baſing-Houſe were lately taken by Cromwell, and the Marqueſs of Wincheſter made Priſoner, who being a Papiſt, glory'd in his Loyalty, which he kept untainted to extreme old Age, being ready to ſeal it with his Blood. All South-Wales, but Ragland-Caſtle, was loſt, Shelford and Weyrton were taken, the Scots were advancing to beſiege Newark, Belvoir-Caſtle was blockt up, the Enemy ſtill cloſe about Cheſter, and Fairfax with a victorious Army daily gaining Ground in the Weſt. To oppoſe all which, the King had now no Army left, but in the Weſt, ſome Troops under the Lord Aſtley, and the Forces of ſome few Garriſons about Oxford and Worceſter.

His Affairs in the Weſt.

Govern'd by Goring and Greenvil.

The Weſt was the Reſidence of the Prince of Wales, where there was once a very conſiderable Army, which if actuated by united Counſels, might have made a brave Stand, if not turn'd the Scale; but the King's Affairs there were not only diſturb'd, but made deſperate, by the Jealouſies and Animoſities of particular Perſons, and indeed by the intolerable Pride of incorrigible Faction. The Sentiments of Loyalty, Honour and Gratitude, daily leſſen'd and ſunk into private Projects and ſeparate Intereſts; and the Power and Authority of the Prince was by no means regarded as it ought to have been, but almoſt all would ſhew their Obedience according to their own way. A falſe Honour was ſet up, inſtead of a true one; and when Officers were not willing to ſubmit to what they were enjoyn'd, they uſually alledg'd, That it was againſt their Honour, that their Honour would not ſuffer them to do this or that: But the inviolable Lord Hopton, when he was put upon a deſperate Attempt, told the Prince, That ſince his Highneſs thought it neceſſary to command him, he was ready to obey him with the Loſs of his Honour. All the Affairs of theſe Parts were too much under the Influence and Sway of two Men, the Lord Goring, and Sir Richard Greenvil; Perſons moſt exorbitant in their Practices, tho' very different in their Diſpoſitions. The former ſhew'd an extravagant Ambition to be Lieutenant-General of all the Weſt, ſpoke deſpicably of the Prince and his Council, and ſometimes of the King Himſelf, led a moſt riotous and ſcandalous Life amidſt the greateſt Dangers, encourag'd the moſt abominable Licentiouſneſs among his Horſe, who in all Places committed ſuch intolerable Inſolences and Diſorders, as alienated the Hearts of thoſe who were beſt affected to the King's Service. The other, Sir Richard Greenvil, was the moſt violent Oppreſſor, and Tyrannical Governor, that ever had been felt in thoſe Parts, ſeizing the Eſtates, and impriſoning and hanging up the Perſons of Delinquents, without any Proceſs or Regard to Juſtice; and tho', contrary to Goring, he reſtrain'd his Soldiers from plundering, yet he himſelf was the greateſt Plunderer in the War; having gain'd more by his Contributions, and his other Arts and Extortions, than the King had beſtow'd upon all his General Commanders of Armies, and upon all his Officers of State, ſince the Beginning of the Rebellion to that Time.

The Club-Men.

Goring retires into France.

The inſufferable Rapines and Violence practis'd by the King's Forces in theſe Parts, gave Occaſion to the Riſing of a third ſort of an Army, which ſuddenly ſtarted up in ſeveral Counties, and gather'd together, to the Number of five or ſix Thouſand of the middle Sort of Men, in a ſhort Time call'd by the Name of Club-Men. Theſe likewiſe receiv'd Encouragement from many Gentlemen of the Country, who entertain'd particular Hopes from this Inſurrection: which, as Mr. Locke intimates, was wholly form'd by the active and prolifick Head of Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper; a Perſon highly applauded by that Writer for the great Good he deſign'd to the Nation, but much blam'd by the Lord Clarendon for his Flexibility and Inſtability; who being remov'd from the Government of Weymouth, quitted his Party, and gave himſelf intirely to the Service of the Parliament, with implacable Animoſity againſt the Royal Intereſt. This Third Army of Club-Men, for a while became very formidable to both Parties, which endeavoured to court their Compliance and Aſſiſtance; but after ſome Months ſtanding upon their own Defence, and moleſting of both Armies, they were defeated and diſpers'd by the Parliament Forces under Cromwell; who together with Fairfax daily gain'd Ground in thoſe Counties. Theſe Succeſſes had ſuch an Influence, that on a ſudden, the Lord Goring himſelf, in the Month of November, unhandſomly left his Army and retir'd into France, leaving this general Reflection upon his Memory, 'That comparing his Words, 'and his Actions, his Ill Doing, and his Not Doing, together, if he had been Confederate with the Enemy, and 'corrupted to betray the Weſt, he could not have done 'more towards it than he did.' Such was the Exit of that brave and valiant, that witty and ſociable, that deceitful and profligate Commander; who afterwards, as Sir William Dugdale was inform'd, took upon him the Habit of a Dominican Fryer in Spain, and dy'd without Iſſue, before his Father the Earl of Norwich.

The Deſigns of the Leaders in Parliament.

The King ſends ſeveral Meſſages to them.

2. The mighty Alterations occaſion'd by the New Model, were now viſible to all ſenſible Men: Till that was made, both Sides had made War with Deſign to carry it on, as it were, to a certain Gage or Pitch, each propoſing to reduce, not to deſtroy his Eenmy; which nice Medium had oftentimes cool'd the Heat of War, render'd Actions leſs vigorous, and caus'd the miſſing of ſome Opportunities that might have decided it. But now the Methods were chang'd in the Parliament Forces, as having new modell'd their Projects; the preſent Leaders knew nothing of that Moderation, and their End being the Subverſion of Kingly Government, and the levelling the Nobility, their Buſineſs was now to have no more Regard to his Majeſty, but to endeavour the Deſtruction of Him, and all his Adherents. This Deſign becoming more and more apparent, the King was driven to try the old and ever-failing Remedy, becauſe no other could be found out; which was, to ſend new Meſſages to the Parliament for an Accommodation. But before this was determin'd, his Majeſty wrote two Letters to the Prince his Son, ordering him to take the firſt Opportunity of tranſporting himſelf into Denmark: In the latter of which he inform'd him of his Intention to propoſe a Perſonal Treaty at London, and let him know, 'That his Abſence in another Country would be a real Security to 'Himſelf, and make the Rebels hearken and yield to Reaſon.' This done, the King ſent two ſeveral Meſſages to the Houſes at Weſtminſter, one of the firſt, and the other of the fifth of December; which, tho' Gracious and Reaſonable, were not thought worthy of an Anſwer.

Their Anſwer.

Upon this the King conſulted with his Council, deſiring them 'to propoſe any Expedient, and prepare any Meſſage 'they would adviſe him to ſend to the Parliament.' When they conſider'd that the Overtures already made were ſo ample, that they knew not how to add to them, they concluded, 'That the next Meſſage ſhould only contain a Reſentment of the other, and a Demand of an Anſwer to 'thoſe formerly ſent.' This Meſſage met with the ſame Reception; but thoſe who wiſh'd well to it in the Houſes, found Means to ſend their Advice to Oxford, 'That the 'King ſhould not give over that Importunity;' and many were ſtill of Opinion, 'That the neglecting thoſe gracious 'Invitations, would ſhortly make the Parliament ſo odious, that they would not dare long to continue in that 'Obſtinacy.' The Scots were griev'd and enrag'd, to ſee their Idol Presbytery ſo undervalu'd and contemn'd, that beſides the Independents Power in the City, their very Aſſembly of Divines daily loſt Credit and Authority to ſupport it; and therefore deſir'd nothing more than a Treaty for Peace. And many others, who had moſt contributed to a Diminution of the Regal Power, were now more afraid of their own Army, than ever they had been of the King's Authority; and ſtill believ'd, that if a Treaty were once ſet on Foot, it would not be in the Power of the moſt Violent to make it ineffectual; and whatever they believ'd themſelves, they ſent it to the King, as the concurrent Advice of all Well-wiſhers to a Peace. After the King had long expected an Anſwer, induc'd by theſe and the like Reaſons, he ſent again to the Parliament, 'That they would ſend a 'ſafe Conduct for the Duke of Richmond, and the Earl of 'Southampton, Mr. Aſhburnham and Mr. Palmer, by whom 'he would make ſuch particular Propoſitions to them, as 'he hop'd would produce a Peace.' To this they ſubmitted to return an Anſwer, in which they declar'd, 'It 'would be inconvenient, and might be of dangerous Conſequence, to admit thoſe Lords and Gentlemen into 'their Quarters; but that they were preparing ſome Propoſitions, which, when finiſh'd, ſhould be ſent to his 'Majeſty in Bills, to be ſign'd by him, which would be 'the only way to produce a Peace.

1645. Car. 21.

The King well knew what ſuch Bills wou'd contain, and that when he had granted them, he ſhou'd have nothing more to deny; therefore he reſolv'd to try another Way, which having been never propos'd, he believ'd they cou'd not deny; and if granted, what Danger ſoever ſhou'd happen to his Perſon, he ſhou'd diſcover, Whether he had ſo many Friends in the Parliament and City, as many Men had perſuaded him; and whether the Scots, after all their Pretences, had ever a real Thought of doing him any Service. He ſent to them, towards the End of December, ‘ That ſince all other Overtures had prov'd ineffectual, he deſir'd to enter into a Perſonal Treaty with the two Houſes of Parliament at Weſtminſter, and the Commiſſioners of the Parliament of Scotland, upon all Matters which might conduce to the Peace and Happineſs of the Diſtracted Kingdoms; and to that Purpoſe his Majeſty wou'd come to London, or Weſtminſter, with ſuch of his Servants as now attended Him, and their Followers, not exceeding the Number of three Hundred Perſons, if he might have the Engagement of the two Houſes of Parliament, the Commiſſioners of Scotland, of the chief Commanders in Sir Thomas Fairfax's Army, and thoſe of the Scotch Army, for his free and ſafe coming to, and Abode in London or Weſtminſter, for the Space of forty Days; and after that Time, for his free and ſafe Repair to Oxford, Worceſter, or Newark, if a Peace ſhou'd not be concluded: And for their better Encouragement to hope well from this Treaty, his Majeſty offer'd to ſettle the Militia in ſuch Perſons as ſhou'd be acceptable to Them.

He propoſes a Perſonal Treaty.

3. They were indeed awaken'd by this Meſſage, and began to fear that the Royaliſts hop'd to find a Party in their own Quarters; and they concluded that if they ſhou'd neglect to ſend an Anſwer to this Meſſage, their Silence might be miſinterpreted, and that they ſhou'd ſoon hear of the King's Arrival at London; the Thoughts of which they cou'd not bear. They therefore made more than uſual Haſte to let his Majeſty know, ‘ That there had been no Delay on their Parts; but for the Perſonal Treaty deſir'd by his Majeſty, after ſo much innocent Blood ſhed in the War, by his Commands, and Commiſſioners, &c. they conceiv'd, That until Satisfaction and Security were given to both Kingdoms, his Majeſty's coming thither cou'd not be convenient, nor by them aſſented to; nor did they apprehend it a Means conducing to Peace, to accept of a Treaty for a few Days, with any Thoughts or Intentions of returning to Hoſtility again.’ They further obſerv'd, ‘ That his Majeſty deſir'd the Engagement, not only of the Parliament, but of the Chief Commanders in Sir Thomas Fairfax's Army, and thoſe of the Scotch Army; which, they ſaid, was againſt the Privilege and Honour of Parliament, to have thoſe joyn'd with them, who were ſubject and Subordinate to their Authority.’ Then they renew'd what they had ſaid in their laſt Anſwer, ‘ That they wou'd ſhortly ſend ſome Bills to his Majeſty, the ſigning of which wou'd be the beſt Way to procure a good and ſafe Peace.

Which is deny'd to him.

The King's further Offers.

Tho' his Majeſty was not willing to acquieſce with this obſtinate Rejection, but ſtill ſent Meſſage after Meſſage to them, and at laſt offer'd ‘ To diſmantle all his Garriſons, and ſo come to and reſide with his Parliament, if all his Adherents might be free to live in their own Houſes, and to enjoy their own Eſtates, without being oblig'd to any Oaths but what were enjoin'd by Law;’ yet he cou'd never procure any other Anſwer from them. And leſt they ſhould be defective in their Affronts, they publiſh'd a particular Ordinance, ‘ That if the King ſhou'd, contrary to the Advice of the Parliament already given to him, come, or attempt to come within the Lines of Communication, the Committee of the Militia ſhou'd raiſe ſuch Forces as they ſhou'd think fit, to prevent any Tumult that might ariſe by his Coming, and to ſuppreſs any that ſhould happen; and to apprehend any that ſhould come with him, or reſort to him; and to ſecure his Perſon from Danger: Which laſt was an Expreſſion they always us'd, when no Danger threaten'd Him, but what aroſe from Themſelves. To this their Ordinance, they added another Injunction, ‘ That all who had ever born Arms for his Majeſty, ſhou'd immediately depart, and go out of London, upon Penalty of being proceeded againſt as Spies;’ which was the greater Hardſhip, becauſe very many upon the Surrender of Garriſons, were come thither upon the Liberty granted to them by their Articles of Surrendry. So that all Doors being obſtinately ſhut againſt a Treaty, all Thoughts of That, at leaſt with Reference to the Parliament, were laid aſide; and all Endeavours us'd to get ſuch a Power together, as might make Them ſee that the King's Cauſe was not beyond all Poſſibility of Defence.

Their Obſtinacy.

In this unhappy State of Affairs we ſhall conclude the old Year 1645, with the Deaths of ſome eminent Men that were not taken off by this miſerable War, beſides the Lord-Keeper Littleton: As firſt, Lyonel Cranfield, Earl of Middleſex, of whom Mention is made in the former Volume of this Hiſtory; who being Lord-High-Treaſurer, in King James's Reign, by the Means of the Duke of Buckingham, with the Countenance of Prince Charles, felt the heavy Weight of the Commons Impeachment, ſo as to be ſeverely Fin'd, and Impriſon'd, and in Effect to loſe the Benefit of his Peerage. Yet he recover'd himſelf ſo far as to lead an honourable and hoſpitable Life for many Years at Copt-Hall in Eſſex, and to leave behind him the noble Character of a great and wiſe Man. After him dy'd Mr. William Strode, a Member of Parliament, and particularly noted for being one of the Five, whom the King had unfortunately impeach'd of High-Treaſon, a warm and furious Man, who had been deeply ingag'd in the Miſeries and Calamities of the Nation, the End of which he cou'd not foreſee; for which he was ſo much reſpected, that the whole Houſe of Commons attended his Funeral, appointed him to be laid in Weſtminſter Abby by the Body of Mr. Pym, and order'd a handſome Sum of Mony to be paid to his Executors. Beſides theſe two, there dy'd four memorable Divines, two Church-men, and two Puritans: The Church-men were Dr. Daniel Featly, and Dr. Walter Balconquall. The Former was a profound Divine, who had gain'd great Reputation in France, during King James's Reign, ſo as to be call'd The Honour of the Proteſtant Religion, and the Engliſh Nation; being eſteem'd a great Scourge to the Romaniſts, and other Separatiſts, a Compendium of the Learned Tongues, and of all the Liberal Arts and Sciences. Having been Miniſter of Lambeth and Acton, and Provoſt of Chelſea-College, he loſt his Preferments, and became a great Sufferer from the preſent Powers, till this Year he departed this Life with the moſt pious Reſignations, having a great Multitude of Perſons of Honour and Quality attending his Funeral. The Other, Dr. Balconquall, was a very learned Scotch Divine, Dean of the Church of Durham, and Maſter of the Savoy, who had the Honour to be ſent by King James to the Synod of Dort, to repreſent the Church of Scotland, and to be employ'd by the preſent King, in drawing up his Long Declaration againſt the Scots; and now having been ſequeſter'd, plunder'd and purſu'd, he retir'd with great Difficulty, and dy'd obſcurely in Denbighſhire in Wales. The Puritan Divines were Dr. William Twiſſe and Mr. John Dod: The Former had been a Chaplain to the Queen of Bohemia in Germany, where he extreamly improv'd himſelf by the Converſation of the German Divines, till he became the profoundeſt Writer in the Anti-Arminian Cauſe, and the moſt powerful Champion of the rigid Calviniſts and Supralapſarians: He was Miniſter of Newberry in Berks, refus'd all other Preferments, ſided with the Presbyterians, and became Prolocutor to The Aſſembly of Divines; in which Poſt he dy'd, leaving the Name of the moſt acute and ſubtle Divine of the Age. The other, Mr. Dod, was originally a Cantabrigian of Jeſus-College, and after that Miniſter of Fauſley in Northamptonſhire, a learned Decalogiſt, an exquiſite Hebrician, and a moſt pious and hoſpitable Divine, highly valu'd by all good Men: He left the World in the eighty ſeventh Year of his Age, with whom the old Puritan ſeem'd to expire, and in his Grave to be interr'd. Beſides theſe Divines, we ought to take Notice of the Death of William Burton, Eſq; a noted Lawyer of Staffordſhire, but chiefly celebrated for his laborious Studies in Heraldry, Genealogies, and Antiquities; for which he has been deſervedly diſtinguiſh'd, and for his Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, and accounted The great Ornament of his Country. Laſtly, that we may omit none excelling in any Profeſſion, we ſhall mention Mr. William Laws, the moſt extraordinary Muſician and Compoſer in this Time, educated under the great Italian Maſter Giovanni Coperario, and highly reſpected among the Nobility and Clergy: He loſt his Life this Year at the Siege of Cheſter, to the great Concern of the King himſelf, who uſually call'd him The Father of Muſick.

XI. 1. The King's Condition being now almoſt at the loweſt Ebb, and no Hopes left of any Treaty, without yielding to ſuch Propoſitions as no King cou'd be ſuppos'd to grant, he us'd ſeveral Endeavours to gain, or to divide the Independent Party, which govern'd the Army, that began to govern the Parliament. But he could not meet with that Succeſs as had been promis'd to him; for that Party, tho' numerous and encreaſing, were ſtill under the Influence and Government of three Men, Cromwell, Vane, and Ireton, whoſe ſubtle Intriegues and dark Deſigns cou'd not then by any Mortal be fathom'd. The King's Fortunes were too low to gratify the Ambition of ſeveral among them; and the Amity and Aſſiſtance of the Scots began to be neglected and deſpis'd; ſo that when their Commiſſioners preſs'd for a Treaty, they flatly refus'd their Interceſſion, alledging, ‘ That there was a great Interruption in their Affairs, by the Delays and Difficulties the joint Councils of both Kingdoms produc'd.’ And there-therefore they voted, 'That the King's Anſwer ſhall be 'deſir'd to their Propoſitions, without a Treaty.' And being indeed weary of the Scots, they alſo voted, 'That 'they do intend to carry on the War of Ireland with the 'Forces of England, and that the Scots Forces ſhould be 'call'd away.' In the Debate about the Propoſitions to be ſent to the King, they diſcover'd ſomething of their Inclinations, and voted, 'That Sir Thomas Fairfax be made 'a Baron, with five thouſand Pounds a Year ſettled upon 'him; and that his Father be made an Earl: That Lieutenant-General Cromwell be made a Baron, and to have 'two thouſand five hundred Pounds per Annum: That 'the Earls of Northumberland, Eſſex, Warwick and Pembroke, be made Dukes; and the Earls of Salisbury and 'Mancheſter, be made Marqueſſes: That the Lords Roberts, Say, Willoughby of Parham, Wharton, and Howard, 'be made Earls: That Mr. Hollis be made a Viſcount. 'That Sir William Waller be made a Baron, and to have 'two thouſand five hundred Pounds per Annum: That 'Sir Arthur Haſlerigg be made a Baron, and to have two 'thouſand Pounds per Annum: That Sir Henry Vane 'Senior be made a Baron: That Sir Philip Stapleton be 'made a Baron, with two thouſand Pounds per Annum: 'That Sir William Brereton have fifteen hundred Pounds 'per Annum: And that Major-General Skippon have a 'thouſand Pounds per Annum.' Even the infamous Harry Martin, who had been expell'd the Houſe for his Inſolence to the Royal Family, was by means of Vane now reſtor'd, and receiv'd into Favour; which, as Whitelock obſerves, gave Occaſion to ſome to believe, that the Houſe began to be more averſe from the King.

The Votes of Honour and Profits.

The Lord Hopton routed by Fairfax.

Fairfax's Opinion of him.

Thus they were dividing the Spoil, and ſharing the Honours, while their Armies were ſucceſsfully cutting out their Fortunes with the Sword, and Fairfax was daily reaping freſh Laurels from the Blood of his Fellow-Subjects. That General, in the Beginning of the new Year, rais'd the Siege of Plymouth, and immediately after took Dartmouth by Storm; after which he cloſely block'd up the City of Exeter, leaving the Command of that Siege to Sir Hardreſs Waller, while he himſelf, with the reſt of his Army, march'd off to attend the Motions of the Lord Hopton, who being Commander in Chief under the Prince of Wales, had march'd to Torrington with near four thouſand Horſe, and three thouſand Foot, there expecting ſome new Recruits from Barnſtable. Here, having an Army inferior to the Enemy, and debauch'd by his Predeceſſor Goring, he was ingag'd by Fairfax, and totally defeated, and almoſt deſerted, upon the 14th Day of February Fairfax, without loſing Time, purſu'd the only Remains of the Royal Army into Cornwall, where the Prince had his own Regiment, and other Corniſh Troops, that compos'd a Body of about five thouſand Horſe, and one thouſand Foot: But unable to make a Stand againſt the Multitudes that Fairfax was pouring in upon him, the Prince embark'd with the Lords Capel and Colepeper, Sir Edward Hyde, and others, and found Refuge in the Iſle of Scilly. The Royal Army was left under the Command of the Lord Hopton, but now ſo enervated and ungovernable, that being purſu'd and preſs'd upon by Fairfax, that brave Man was forc'd to ſubmit, enter into a Treaty, and accept of Articles for diſbanding all his Forces, upon the fourteenth of March. Whatever Failings were juſtly charg'd upon the Army, the General's Reputation remain'd unblemiſh'd; and Fairfax himſelf was ſo ſenſible of that, that among his Propoſitions to him, he had theſe Words; Laſtly, for your ſelf, beſides what is implied to you in common with others, you may be aſſur'd of ſuch Mediation in the Parliament on your Behalf, both from my ſelf and others; as for one, whom for Perſonal Worth, and many Virtues, but eſpecially for your Care of, and Moderation towards the Country, we honour and eſteem above any other of your Party; -----whoſe Happineſs, ſo far as is conſiſtent with the Publick Welfare, we ſhould delight in, more than in your leaſt Suffering.

The Royal Cauſe was equally ſuffering and expiring in all other Parts of England; the Spirits of all Men began to fail, their Vigour to decline, and the Senſe of Duty and Loyalty to languiſh, and ſink into nothing. The City of Hereford, that had ſuſtain'd and eſcap'd a Siege from the Scots, was ſurpris'd by a Stratagem under the Conduct of Colonel Morgan and Colonel Birch; and the important City of Cheſter was deliver'd up by the Lord Byron into the Parliament's Hands; and Newark it ſelf was cloſely beſieg'd by the Scots Army. Still the King hop'd to draw out of his few Garriſons, ſuch a Body of Horſe and Foot, as might enable him to take the Field early in the Spring, tho' without any fix'd Deſign. But this was daſh'd in the very Beginning, by the fatal Defeat of the Lord Aſtley; who being upon his March from Worceſter towards Oxford, with two thouſand Horſe and Foot, and the King having appointed to meet him with another Body of fifteen hundred Horſe and Foot, Letters and Orders were unfortunately intercepted; by which the Enemy came to have Notice of the Reſolutions, and drew a much greater Strength from their Garriſons of Gloceſter, Warwick, Coventry and Eveſham. So that the Lord Aſtley was no ſooner upon the March, but they follow'd him; and the ſecond Day, after he had march'd all Night, and believ'd he had eſcap'd all their Quarters, they fell upon his wearied Troops; which, after a glorious Reſiſtance were totally defeated, and moſt of the Officers, who were not kill'd, taken Priſoners. The brave old General being one, was ſo ſenſible of the Conſequences of this Defeat, that he knew nothing more was to be expected; and he ſaid to one of Brereton's Officers, You have now done your Work, and may go to Play, unleſs you will fall out among your ſelves.

A Breach between the Parliament and the Scots.

2. As the King's Cauſe and Condition declin'd and became lower, ſo the Breaches between the Parliament and the Scots increas'd and grew wider; and as the Occaſion they had for that Nation's Aſſiſtance became leſs, ſo the Neglect, and even Contempt of them, and their Religion, appear'd more viſible every Day. They frequently exclaim'd againſt the unheard-of Oppreſſions which the Country ſuſtain'd from their Forces and Armies; which Hollis ſays was occaſion'd by their want of Pay, cunningly detain'd from them purely to give Riſe to ſuch Complaints. The Committee of the two Kingdoms, who for a long Time had all the Truſt, Power and Authority, both in Matters of War and Peace, was now in Effect laid aſide; and their General Fairfax was diſcharg'd of his Subordination to them, and left to do as he ſaw Cauſe with his Army. When the two Houſes had, after ſeveral Months Conſideration, drawn up Propoſitions to be ſent to the King touching Peace, the Scotch Commiſſioners made ſeveral Exceptions and Proteſtations againſt theſe Propoſitions, and did in Effect appeal to the People by printing four large Papers concerning their Diſſent. At which the Houſes were ſo incens'd, that they concurr'd in a joint Vote, 'That the Matter contain'd in the ſaid Papers was 'falſe and ſcandalous againſt the Parliament and Kingdom 'of England: That they ſhou'd be burnt by the Common 'Hangman; and that a Declaration ſhou'd be drawn up, 'which ſhou'd hold forth to the whole World the Untruths therein contain'd, and the Innocency and Integrity 'of the Parliament, &c.' Which ſevere Proceeding was ſuch a Breach of the Union between the two Covenanting Nations, that it was believ'd, That nothing but the Trading for the Perſon of the King cou'd have made them Friends.

The Scots Papers order'd to be burnt.

Theſe Animoſities, and the Scots Pretenſions of having a Right in their King, were thought very advantagious to his Majeſty's ſinking Cauſe; and there ſeem'd to be ſome Life in it; the more becauſe their Agent at Paris had, in the Beginning of this Year, there given Encouragement to the Queen of England to hope, that the Scotch Nation wou'd return to their Duty. Cardinal Mazarin, who govern'd all, and grew apprehenſive of the over-grown Power of the Engliſh Parliament, now appear'd willing to do ſome ſubſtantial Service to their King, and conſented that the Queen-Regent of France ſhou'd ſend over Monſieur Montrevil into England, with Credentials to the King, as well as the Parliament; by which the Queen of England had Opportunity to ſend her Advice to the King her Husband, and this Envoy had Authority 'To engage the Faith of 'France, as well that the Scots ſhou'd perform whatever 'they promis'd to the King, as that the King ſhou'd make 'good whatever he undertook to them.' This was the Foundation of a ſecret Negotiation, little known at that Time. This Miniſter arriving with ſuch ample Powers, the King was at firſt made, or was willing, to believe his ſpecious Promiſes, 'That France was now become really 'kind to him, and wou'd do its utmoſt to ſerve him; and 'that the Cardinal was ſatisfy'd of the Honeſty of the 'Scots Intentions.' But the firſt Information he receiv'd from him, after he conferr'd with their Commiſſioners, was, 'That they peremptorily inſiſted upon a Promiſe to 'be made by his Majeſty, for the Eſtabliſhment of the 'Presbyterian Government in England, as it was in Scotland; without which there was no Hope that they wou'd 'ever join with him;' and therefore he earneſtly preſs'd his Majeſty 'To give them Satisfaction in that Point, as the 'Advice of the Queen-Regent, and the Cardinal, and 'likewiſe of the Queen his Wife.' Beſides which, the Scots confidently alledg'd, that the Queen had expreſly promis'd to Sir Robert Moray, a ſubtle Agent of theirs, That his Majeſty ſhou'd conſent to that Propoſition; and farther they produc'd a Writing ſign'd by the Queen, and deliver'd to the ſaid Moray, wherein were ſuch Expreſſions concerning Religion, as exceedingly troubled the King, and made him look upon the whole Negotiation, more like a Conſpiracy between the Papiſts and Presbyterians againſt the Church, than any Expedient for his Reſtoration, or Preſervation.

Monſieur Montrevil's Negotiation with the King.

The King's Anſwer to him.

Upon theſe Informations, the King let Monſieur Montrevil know, ' That the propos'd Alteration in Church-Government was expreſsly againſt his Conſcience, and that he cou'd never conſent to it; and that what had ſeem'd to have been promis'd by his Queen, proceeded from her not being well inform'd of the Conſtitution of the Government of England, which cou'd not conſiſt with ſuch a Change.' But then he offer'd ' to give all imaginable Aſſurance, That the Maintenance and Support of the Epiſcopal Government in England, ſhou'd not bring the leaſt Prejudice to that Government that was then ſetled in Scotland;' and farther offer'd, ' That if the Scots ſhou'd deſire to have free Exerciſe of their Religion, according to their own Way, while they ſhou'd be any Time in England, he wou'd aſſign them convenient Places in London, or any other Part of the Kingdom, as they deſir'd.' This was all that the King wou'd ever grant, notwithſtanding the frequent Importunities and Arguments ſent from Montrevil, who inform'd him ' of the Diſſatisfaction both the Scotch Commiſſioners and the London Presbyterians had in his Majeſty's Reſolution in not gratifying him in a Point, which they ever had inſiſted, and wou'd inſiſt upon; and that the Scots were reſolv'd to have no more to do with his Majeſty, but to agree with the Independents, from whom they cou'd have better Conditions than from him; and he fear'd ſuch an Agreement was already too far advanc'd.' Many Anſwers and Replies paſs'd between the King and this Envoy, and with all imaginable Secrecy; but ſtill his Majeſty was inviolably ſteady: Which caus'd the other to uſe all Arguments to perſuade the Scots to be contented with the King's free Offers, and to convince them, ' That their own Preſervation, and that of their Nation, depended upon the Preſervation of their King, and the Support of his Regal Authority.' And it is very memorable, that in one of the King's Anſwers to Montrevil, who among other Arguments to perſuade his Majeſty to a Compliance, had aſſur'd him, ' That the Engliſh Presbyterians and the Scots were fully agreed, the Scots having declar'd, That they wou'd never urge for any other Church-Government than was now practis'd in London,' and likewiſe inſiſted upon the many Succeſſes they had at that time obtain'd; the King us'd theſe remarkable Words, Let them never flatter themſelves ſo with their good Succeſſes: Without pretending to Prophecy, I will foretel their Ruin, except they agree with Me; however it ſhall pleaſe God to diſpoſe of Me: Which they had afterwards great Reaſon to remember.

3. Monſieur Montrevil being deſirous to finiſh his Negotiation with Succeſs, or Reputation, reſolv'd to diſcover whether the ſame rigid Spirit that govern'd the Scots Commiſſioners, had poſſeſs'd the chief Officers of their Army before Newark, and that Committee of State that remain'd with them. In his Paſſage to Newark, he waited upon the King at Oxford; where he was confirm'd in his Majeſty's Reſolution of adhering to Epiſcopacy in England; but as to any other Conceſſions that might ſatisfy the Ambition or Profit of an aſpiring Party, he had full Commiſſion to comply with the moſt extravagant Demands from Perſons likely to make good their Promiſes; except ſuch as might be diſhonourable as to the Marqueſs of Montroſs and his Party.

Montrevil repairs to the Scotch Army.

With theſe Powers, and Directions to ſome prevailing Perſons, he repair'd to the Army; where after he had endeavour'd to rectifie the common old Error, that had made them believe That an obſtinate inſiſting upon the Alteration of Church-Government, wou'd at laſt prevail over the King's Spirit, as it had done in Scotland, he found the Governours in the Army much more moderate than he expected, and the preſiding Committee of State rather inventing Expedients how they might handſomely recede from the Rigour of their former Demands, than poſitively to adhere to them. They declar'd Themſelves highly pleas'd That the King deſir'd to come to them, and remain in the Army with them, if he might be ſecur'd of a good Reception for Himſelf, his Servants and Friends; and the chief Officers of the Army ſpoke of That, as a Thing ſo much deſir'd, that it cou'd not be in the Power of any to hinder it, if they ſhou'd attempt it. Even they who had the greateſt Influence in the moſt ſecret Counſels, endeavour'd to be thought to have much freer Reſolutions in that Particular, than they judg'd ſeaſonable to expreſs in direct Undertakings; and employ'd their known Friends, and ſome whom the King had recommended to Montrevil, to aſſure him, ' That he might ſafely adviſe his Majeſty to repair to the Army upon his own Terms; and that they wou'd ſend a good Body of their Horſe, to meet and conduct him from any Place he ſhou'd appoint.

He ſigns a Paper to the King.

Upon this Incouragement, Montrevil prepar'd a Paper, which, after it had the Approbation of thoſe of the greateſt Intereſt and Power in the Army, was ſign'd by Himſelf the firſt Day of April, and ſent to the King. It contain'd theſe Words: I do promiſe in the Name of the King and Queen Regent, my Maſter and Miſtreſs, &c. That if the King of Great Britain will put Himſelf into the Scots Army, he ſhall be there receiv'd as their Natural Sovereign; and that he ſhall be with them in all Freedom of his Conſcience and Honour, and that all ſuch of his Subjects and Servants as ſhall be there with him, ſhall be ſafely and honourably protected in their Perſons; and that the ſaid Scots will really and effectually joyn with the ſaid King of Great Britain.----That they ſhall protect all his Majeſty's Party to the utmoſt of their Power;---and that they ſhall employ their Armies and Forces, to aſſiſt his Majeſty in the procuring a happy and well-grounded Peace, for the Good of his Majeſty, and the ſaid Kingdoms, and in Recovery of his Majeſty's juſt Rights. Thus the King's Affairs ſeem'd very promiſing, and the King gave an Account of this hopeful Project to the Marqueſs of Ormond in Ireland. But within a few Days, Montrevil found ſuch an unaccountable Uneaſineſs and Backwardneſs, in ſome of thoſe he had treated with, One denying what he had ſaid to him, and another diſclaiming what he had order'd another to ſay, that he thought Himſelf oblig'd with all Speed to adviſe the King of this foul Change, and to diſſwade him from truſting his Perſon among ſuch variable Men: But the Meſſenger who carry'd that Letter was taken Priſoner; and tho' he made his Eſcape, and preſerv'd his Letter, he cou'd not proceed in his Journey, but was compell'd to return to Him who ſent him.

The Scots Promiſes.

In the mean Time this Envoy inform'd the Committee, what he had done to clear Himſelf from being made a Property to betray the King, and highly reſented the Injury done to the King his Maſter, and Himſelf, in receding from what they had ſo ſolemnly promis'd. Upon which they appear'd of another Temper, and again deſir'd the King's Preſence in the Army; and to that purpoſe, they promis'd, as an unanimous Reſolution, ' That they wou'd ſend a good Body of Horſe to meet his Majeſty at Burton upon Trent; and ſince they cou'd not advance farther with the whole Party, ſome Horſe ſhou'd be ſent to wait upon him as far as Boſworth, whither they hop'd his own Horſe wou'd be able to convey him ſecurely; and they deſir'd the King to appoint the Day, and they wou'd not fail to be there.' They likewiſe deſir'd, ' That when their Troops ſhou'd meet his Majeſty, he wou'd tell them, He was going to Scotland; which wou'd put an Obligation upon them to attend him into their Army, without diſcovering any Thing of a Treaty; which at preſent ought to be kept ſecret from the Parliament.' Of all which Montrevil gave the King a full and plain Narration, together with what he had written before by his Letter to Secretary Nicholas, of the fifteenth of April; in which he inform'd his Majeſty, ' That they wou'd have none of thoſe that had follow'd the King's Party to joyn with them, nor ſo much as thoſe Horſe that accompany'd his Majeſty, to remain in their Army: That they had with Difficulty allow'd, That the two Princes, lately reconcil'd to his Majeſty, might come with the King, with ſuch others of his Servants as were not excepted from Pardon;' concerning whom they made ſome Proviſions. But as to the Marqueſs of Montroſs, ' They cou'd conſent to no better Terms, than to have him ſent Ambaſſador into any Foreign Country, except France.' Then he mentions their inſiſting upon the King's ſettling the Presbyterian Government, and concludes with theſe Words, ' If his Majeſty has any other Refuge, or Means to make better Conditions, I think he ought not to accept of Theſe: but if he ſees all Things deſperate every where elſe, and that He and his Servants cannot be ſecure with his Parliament, I dare yet aſſure him, That tho' He and his Servants may not be here with all that Satisfaction he might deſire, yet He eſpecially ſhall be as ſecure as poſſible.' In another Letter, the Day after, to the ſame Secretary, he has theſe Words; ' I have Orders from the Deputies of Scotland to aſſure you, That they will not herein fail, as ſoon as they ſhall know the Day; and that the King ſhall be receiv'd into the Army as has been promis'd, and that his Conſcience ſhall not be forc'd.' And in the laſt Letter which the King or his Secretary receiv'd from him, dated the twentieth of April, after ſome Cautions given to his Majeſty, he has theſe Words, ' The Diſpoſition of the Chiefs of the Scots Army is ſuch as the King can deſire; they begin to draw off their Troops towards Burton, and the Hindering of his Majeſty from falling into the Hands of the Engliſh is of ſo great Importance to Them, that it cannot be believ'd but That they will do all that lies in their Power to prevent it.

4. Such was the ſecret Negotiation of Monſieur Montrevil, who has been highly condemned by ſome for the fatal

The King in great Perplexity.

Effects it produc'd; but yet his ſeveral Cautions to the King wou'd have diverted him from ſuch an Enterprize, if his Majeſty had diſcover'd any other Courſe preferrable even to the Hazard he ſaw he muſt undergo with the Scots. But he was wholly deſtitute of any other Refuge, every Day brought the melancholy News of the Loſs of ſome Garriſon, and as Oxford it ſelf was already block'd up at a Diſtance, by thoſe Horſe which Fairfax had ſent out of the Weſt, purpoſely to wait upon the King and purſue him, if he ſhou'd remove out of that City; ſo he ſoon reduc'd the important Garriſon of Exeter, and ſome others in Devonſhire. The Governors, at this Time, when there was ſuch ſlender Hope of being reliev'd, thought that they might deliver up their Garriſons before they were preſs'd with the laſt Extremity, that they might obtain the better Conditions. And yet it was generally obſerv'd, That more honourable Conditions were not given to any, than to thoſe who kept the Places intruſted to them, till they had not one Day's Proviſion left. By this Means Fairfax was within three Days of Oxford before the King left it, or fully reſolv'd what to do. His Majeſty had before ſent to two eminent Commanders, who had block'd up the Place at a Diſtance, That if they wou'd paſs their Words, That they wou'd immediately conduct him to the Parliament, he wou'd put himſelf into their Hands: For he was yet perſuaded to think ſo well of the City of London, that he wou'd not have been unwilling to have found himſelf there. But thoſe Officers wou'd comply with no ſuch Engagement; and extraordinary Care was taken to have ſtrict Guards round about London, that he might not get to that City. Still there was one Thing moſt formidable to the King, which he was reſolv'd to avoid, which was, to be inclos'd in Oxford, and ſo, when the Place ſhou'd be ſurrender'd, to be given up, or taken as a Priſoner to the Independents Army; which, as he was adviſ'd from all Hands, wou'd treat him very barbarouſly.

He makes a remarkable Vow.

In the Midſt of uncommon Difficulties, the pious King, as it were, reflecting upon his Conceſſions relating to the Churches of Scotland and England, and being extremely tender in Caſe of Sacrilegious Incroachments, wrote and ſign'd this extraordinary Vow, which was never yet publiſh'd: 'I do here Promiſe and ſolemnly Vow, in the Preſence and for the Service of Almighty God, That, if it ſhall pleaſe the Divine Majeſty, of his infinite Goodneſs, to reſtore me to my juſt Kingly Rights, and to re-eſtabliſh me in my Throne, I will wholly give back to his Church all thoſe Impropriations, which are now held by the Crown; and what Lands ſoever, I do now, or ſhou'd enjoy, which have been taken away, either from any Epiſcopal See, or any Cathedral or Collegiate Church, from any Abby, or other Religious Houſe. I likewiſe promiſe for hereafter to hold them from the Church, under ſuch reaſonable Fines and Rents, as ſhall be ſet down by ſome Conſcientious Perſons, whom I propoſe to chuſe with all Uprightneſs of Heart, to direct me in this Particular. And I moſt humbly beſeech God to accept of this my Vow, and to bleſs me in the Deſign I have now in Hand, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen.

He leaves Oxford in Diſguiſe.

After great Conſideration, and in much Perplexity, the poor King choſe rather to commit Himſelf to the Scots Army; which yet he wou'd not truſt ſo far as to give them Notice of his Journey, by ſending for a Party of their Horſe to meet him, as they had proffer'd; but very early in the Morning, upon Monday the 27th of April, he went out of the City in Diſguiſe, in Company only of Dr. Hudſon, a Divine and a ſkilful Guide, and Mr. John Aſhburnham, and rod as a Servant to the latter, with a Cloak-Bag behind him: And the more to conceal which Way he deſign'd to take, Orders were ſaid to be given, That three other Perſons ſhou'd about the ſame Hour go out of each of the other Gates of the City. In this Equipage he departed from Oxford, leaving thoſe of his Council there, who were Privy to his going out, not inform'd whether he ſhould repair to the Scots Army, or get privately into London, and lie there conceal'd till he might chuſe that which was beſt; and it was generally believ'd, that he had not at that Time fully reſolv'd what he would do; which was the more credited, becauſe it was nine Days after his leaving Oxford, before it was known where the King was. This private Departure fill'd all Peoples Heads with ſtrange and various Imaginations, and occaſion'd a thouſand vain Conjectures: But the general Belief, and the dreadful Apprehenſion of his Arrival at London, ſo allarm'd the two Houſes of Parliament, that they immediately cauſ'd an Order to be publiſh'd throughout London and Weſtminſter, by Beat of Drum and Sound of Trumpet, 'That what Perſon ſoever ſhall harbour and conceal, or know of the harbouring and concealing of the King's Perſon, and ſhall not reveal it immediately to the Speakers of both Houſes, ſhall be proceeded againſt as a Traytor to the Common-wealth, and dye without Mercy.

The King's Journey.

As to the Courſe of his Majeſty's difficult Journey, in which much Time was purpoſely ſpent to get Information of the Marqueſs of Montroſs, Dr. Hudſon upon Examination afterwards gave this Account of it: That the three diſguis'd Perſons went from Oxford to Henley, Brentford, and Harrow on the Hill, where the King ſtay'd ſome Time: From whence he went towards St. Albans, and was upon the Road overtaken by a drunken Man well Hors'd, and riding furiouſly; which put the King, and the two Gentlemen with him, into ſome Apprehenſions that they were diſcover'd and purſu'd. But that Fear being ſoon over, they turn'd paſt St. Albans out of the common Road; and the moſt remarkable Place they ſtay'd at next, was Harborough in Leiceſterſhire, where they expected Monſieur Montrevil, or ſome Horſe to meet and conduct his Majeſty to the Scots Army, as had been formerly deſign'd: But failing in this, they went to Stamford, where the King lay one Night, and from thence paſs'd the Fens to Downham in Norfolk, where he lay four Days, from the laſt of April to the fourth of May. During which Stay, he ſent Dr. Hudſon to Monſieur Montrevil, to know the Reaſon why he did not meet him at Harborough, and to adviſe with him what was now to be done. At Downham his Majeſty going to be trimm'd, the Barber found great Fault with the Unevenneſs of his Hair, which had been cut to prevent his being diſcover'd, and told him, The Barber that laſt trimm'd him, was much to blame for it. Upon Dr. Hudſon's Return, his Majeſty repair'd directly to Monſieur Montrevil, who lay at Southam, and from thence ſent to General Leven, and was conducted by a Troop of Horſe to the Quarters of Lieutenant-General Leſley at Kellam, and ſo brought to the General himſelf, upon Tueſday the fifth of May. Thus after ſeveral Years innumerable Struggles and Difficulties, the King was ſtrangely led into a Labyrinth, out of which he could never extricate Himſelf. And for a Concluſion of this Series and Accumulation of Misfortunes, Sir Edward Walker obſerves, That if from the Month of May 1645, to the ſame Time this Year, his Majeſty had been but Succeſsful in any one of his Undertakings, or had acted the contrary to what he did, he had either been Maſter of all, or at leaſt had kept himſelf in a ſafe Condition for a much longer Time.

He arrives at the Scotch Army.

XII. 1. The King's Cauſe was now languiſhing and expiring, and haſtning to its loweſt Ebb, and his Perſon in a worſe Condition than either He or his Friends did then imagine; being in Effect enter'd upon a State of Captivity, in which he met with variety of Uſage, Priſons and Goalers, till the Day of his Death. At firſt he receiv'd the moſt civil Uſage from the Scots, who ſeem'd extreamly ſurpris'd and confounded at his Arrival in their Army, and ſent diſſembling Letters to the Committee of both Kingdoms at Weſtminſter, to inform them 'of the ſtrange Providence with which they are now ſurpriſed, the King coming into their Army yeſterday in ſo private a Way, that after they had made Search for him, they could not find him out in ſundry Houſes: A Matter of much Aſtoniſhment to them, ſeeing they did not expect he would have come in any Place under their Power.' And to give them fuller Satisfaction, 'they did ingenuouſly declare, That there had been no Treaty, nor Capitulation between his Majeſty and Them, nor any in their Names.' Notwithſtanding this poſitive Declaration, beſides Montrevil's Aſſurance, Biſhop Guthry expreſly informs us, That ſome Days before, the Lord Balmerino arriving at Edinburgh from London, reported to both the Committees of the States and the Church, That they had handled the Matter ſo skilfully, and with that Succeſs, that he was confident the next Advertiſement would give an Account of his Majeſty's being with the Scotch Army.

The Scot's Diſſimulation.

The two Houſes at Weſtminſter were ſo diſorder'd at this extraordinary News, that at firſt they reſolv'd to command their General to raiſe the Siege before Oxford, and to march with all Expedition to Newark; and they made a ſtrange Vote, 'That the King, by going to the Scots Army, did prolong the War againſt the Parliament, and foment the Diſcord between the two Nations.' But they were ſoon diverted and eas'd by the Scotch Commiſſioners at London, who aſſur'd them,

'That

‘ That all their Orders would meet with an abſolute Obedi‑‘ ence in their Army.’ Upon which they made a ſhort Diſpatch to them, in which it was apparent that they believ'd the King had acted wholly by Invitation, and not out of his own free Choice; and implying, ‘ That they ſhould ſhortly re‑‘ ceive farther Direction from them,’ and in the mean Time, ‘ That they ſhould carefully watch that his Majeſty ‘ did not diſpoſe of Himſelf ſome other way.’ And ſoon after they voted, ‘ That his Majeſty's Perſon ſhould be ‘ diſpos'd of as both Houſes ſhould deſire and direct; and ‘ particularly be ſent to Warwick-Caſtle.

Newark deliver'd up.

The Scots march with the King to Newcaſtle.

But the Scots, being apprehenſive of this or the like Order, were deſirous to remove Northwards with all Expedition. In this the King readily comply'd with them; for tho' he lik'd not the Treatment he receiv'd, yet fearing that Fairfax might be appointed to quit all other Enterprizes, and march towards the Scots Army, he immediately gave Order to the Lord Bellaſis to ſurrender Newark, that the Scots might freely march away; and he giving up that Place upon honourable Conditions, which might have held out ſeveral Months longer, the Scots Army, before they could receive any Orders from the Parliament, with uncommon Expedition march'd towards Newcaſtle. The King was pleas'd with this, tho' their Behaviour to him was ſtill the ſame; and, with their outward Reſpect, great Strictneſs was us'd that he might not confer with any Man not well known to them, much leſs receive Letters from any. It was now obſerv'd, that the firſt publiſhing of extraordinary News was from the Pulpit; and by the Preacher's Text, and Sermon, the Auditors might commonly foreſee what was next to be done in Parliament or Council of State: So the firſt Sermon preach'd before the King, after they left Newark, was upon the three laſt Verſes of the 19th of the ſecond Book of Samuel, which repreſents the Conteſt between the Men of Iſrael and Judah, concerning the Right they had in their King. Upon which Subject the Preacher gave Men Cauſe to believe, that now they had gotten their King, they reſolv'd to keep him, and adhere to him. But his Majeſty came no ſooner to Newcaſtle, where he was receiv'd with all outward Pomp, than Monſieur Montrevil was reſtrain'd from having any Conference with him, and Mr. Aſhburnham was advis'd to ſhift for himſelf, or elſe he ſhould be deliver'd up to the Parliament. However Montrevil ſhew'd a brave Reſentment, and ſufficiently declar'd what had paſs'd between them, and all the ſolemn Promiſes they had made; and ſo, with Mr. Aſhburnham, left the Nation, and repair'd to Paris, where the Prince of Wales arriv'd ſoon after. This Miniſter, to prevent any great Diſcoveries, was reſtrain'd from coming to the Court, forbid to remain in Paris, and laid under a form'd, declar'd Diſlike till his Death; which with Grief of Mind not long after enſu'd: So ſubtle and ſecret was the Cardinal in his Negotiations with England or Scotland.

The King's Meſſages.

2. The King was now ſettled at Newcaſtle, where he continu'd near eight Months, under the Power of the Scots; who very artfully behav'd themſelves in this Juncture, and in ſuch a manner, that moſt Men believ'd they would never have parted with him, till a full Peace had been made. The Parliament made many ſharp Inſtances, that the King might be deliver'd into their Hands; and that the Scots Army would return into their own Country, having done what they were ſent for, and the War being at an End. To which the Council of Scotland anſwer'd with Briskneſs and Courage, and bravely inſiſted on thoſe Arguments of the King's Legal Rights, which in all his Majeſty's Declarations had been unanſwerably urg'd againſt the Proceedings of the Parliament, and as much condemn'd them, as the other. The King, in a ſhort Time, ſent a Meſſage to the two Houſes at Weſtminſter, ‘ offering all poſſible Con‑‘ ceſſions, and deſiring to return to his Parliament, for his ‘ and their mutual Comfort;’ and the next Day a Letter to the City of London, expreſſing his Integrity and full Reſolution ‘ to comply with his Parliament in every Thing for ‘ ſettling Truth and Peace, that his Return to that his an‑‘ cient City may be to the Satisfaction of his Parliament, ‘ the good Liking of his Citizens, and all his good People, ‘ and to his own greater Joy and Comfort’ And again, not long after, he ſent another Meſſage to both Houſes, propoſing, ‘ That he might come to London, with Safety, ‘ Freedom and Honour, where he reſolves to comply with ‘ his Houſes of Parliament in every Thing, which may be ‘ moſt for the Good of his Subjects.’ But this unfortunate Prince was now in ſuch helpleſs State, that the Scots would neither deliver him, nor the Engliſh Parliament receive him, but as a Victim to their mutual Deſigns of Avarice and Empire.

In the mean Time, tho' the King receiv'd all outward Reſpect, yet he really remain'd in the Condition of a Priſoner, and no confiding Servant was ſuffer'd to come to him; and tho' many Perſons of Quality of his Party, when they ſaw the Scots reſolute Anſwers, That they neither wou'd nor cou'd compel his Majeſty to return to the Parliament, againſt his Will, repair'd to Newcaſtle, yet none of them were ſuffer'd to ſpeak with their Maſter, nor cou'd he receive or ſend any Letters, without the Knowledge of the Leaders. Yet ſtill the Scots obſerv'd all Diſtances, and perform'd all Ceremonies, as if they had really treated him as their King; and likewiſe made as great Profeſſion to him of their Duty and good Intentions, ‘ Which they ſaid they ‘ wou'd manifeſt as ſoon as it ſhou'd be ſeaſonable; and ‘ then his Servants and Friends ſhou'd repair to him with ‘ all Freedom:’ And as they endeavour'd to perſuade the King to expect all this, ſo they prevail'd with many Officers, and ſome of the Nobility, to believe that they meant well, but that it was not yet Time to diſcover their Intentions: But in ſhort, their whole Proceedings ſhew'd, That they were willing to receive all Advantages from the King, but to grant none to him. Thus they prevail'd with him to ſend his poſitive Orders to the Marqueſs of Montroſs, who had done ſuch Wonders, to lay down his Arms, and leave the Kingdom. That gallant Man anſwer'd, That as he had propos'd nothing to himſelf, in all he had done, but his Majeſty's Service, ſo he was not now to diſpute his Commands. But ſtill he propos'd in Writing, That if the Command had been extorted from his Majeſty, he wou'd keep up his Army, and hop'd to force them, in whoſe Hands he was, to do their Duty. But the King earneſtly inſiſted upon his disbanding, leaſt they ſhould make it a Pretext for the undoing him; and ſo the Marqueſs obey'd, without further Heſitation, and tranſported himſelf into France.

Oxford ſurrenders to Fairfax.

Having gain'd this Point, they advis'd the King, and prevail'd with him to ſend Orders to Sir Thomas Glemham, the Governour of Oxford, to make Conditions, and to ſurrender that Place into the Hands of Sir Thomas Fairfax, who with his Army then beſieg'd it; and beſides that to publiſh a General Order, which they caus'd to be printed, ‘ That ‘ all Governours of any Garriſons for his Majeſty, ſhould ‘ immediately deliver them up to the Parliament upon ho‑‘ nourable Conditions, ſince his Majeſty reſolv'd in all Things ‘ to be advis'd by his Parliament: And till this was done, they alledg'd, ‘ They could not declare themſelves ſo effe‑‘ ctually for his Majeſty's Service and Intereſt, as they re‑‘ ſolv'd to do; becauſe they were oblig'd by their Treaty ‘ and Confederacy, to ſerve the Parliament as they ſhould ‘ direct, until the War ſhould be ended; which being once ‘ effected, they had no more Obligations to the Parliament: ‘ And whenever his Majeſty had no more Forces in Being, ‘ nor Garriſons which held out for him, it could not be ‘ deny'd but that the War was at an End; and then they ‘ could ſpeak and expoſtulate with Freedom.’ Oxford, which had been the Royal City all this War, began to capitulate, and enter'd on a Treaty, which continu'd from the latter End of May to the 24th Day of June, without any Ceſſation of Arms; when it was deliver'd up upon ſolemn and honourable Conditions, too long to be enumerated, and too advantageous to be well obſerv'd by a new growing Faction. The whole Number of the Garriſon amounted to about ſeven thouſand Soldiers and Scholars in Pay, who all march'd out; but many of the Nobility and Gentry had leave to tarry for Paſſes; among whom were the King's Son the Duke of York, the Princes Rupert and Maurice, the Earls of Dorſet, Hertford and Southampton, the Lords Cottington, Lane, Dunſmore, and ſeveral others, beſides many Knights, Gentlemen and Officers. The Duke of York was convey'd to London, and at St. James's committed, with the reſt of the Royal Children, to the Tuition and Care of the Earl of Northumberland and his Lady. The two Princes, Rupert and Maurice, had Paſſes granted them to go beyond the Seas; but before their Departure, by the Parliament's Leave, had a Viſit forc'd upon them by their Elder Brother, the Prince Elector, all this Time joyning with the Parliament; which they receiv'd with Scorn. Upon the Surrendry of Oxford, all the Seals of the State were ſent up by the General to the two Houſes at Weſtminſter, namely the Great Seal of England, the Privy-Seal Signet, the King's-Bench, Exchequer, Court of Wards, Admiralty, and Navy Seals, together with the Sword. The Seals were immediately voted to be broken in Pieces; which was accordingly perform'd by a Smith in the Houſe of Lords, in the Preſence of the Commons, and the broken Silver given as a Reward to the two Speakers; but the Sword was laid up ſafe in the Wardrobe.

All other Places deliver'd up.

Oxford prov'd a leading Example to the reſt of the King's Garriſons, which in a few Months Time were all deliver'd up to the Parliament; as Farringdon, Litchfield, Worceſter, Wallingford, and ſeveral ſtrong Caſtles, of which ſome ſurrender'd with leſs Reſiſtance than they might have made, agreeable to the King's general Order, and the little Hopes they had of Relief. But others defended themſelves with ſignal Bravery to the laſt, to the great Damage of the Enemy, and hindering the Army from uniting together, and carrying on their grand Deſigns; which was one Cauſe of prolonging the Treaty with the Scots, and the preſerving ſo long the Credit and Authority of the Presbyterians. This was the Caſe of Ragland and Pendennis Caſtles; which endured the longeſt Sieges, and held out almoſt the laſt of any Forts or Caſtles in England; being valiantly defended by two Perſons of very great Age, and were at length deliver'd up within a Day or two of each other, in the latter End of Auguſt. Ragland was maintain'd with wonderful Courage by the old Marqueſs of Worceſter, againſt Fairſax himſelf, till it was reduc'd to the utmoſt Extremity, and ſurrender'd upon honourable Conditions. Pendennis, under the brave John Arundel and his Son Richard, refus'd all Summons, and admitted of no Treaty, till they were reduc'd to the moſt ſtarving Circumſtances; and then gain'd as good Conditions as any Garriſon in England had obtain'd. So that now no Garriſons remain'd unreduc'd to the Parliament, but thoſe in the North, which continu'd in the Hands of the Scots; and the victorious General Fairfax return'd to London in the Beginning of November, where he was receiv'd both by the Parliament and City in a moſt ſolemn and triumphant manner, and complimented as one that had glorioſly put an End to the Miſeries of the Kingdom.

Fairfax's Reception at London.

3. In the Time of theſe Tranſactions, the two Houſes at Weſtminſter thought their only Buſineſs was now to get Poſſeſſion of the King's Perſon, and to free themſelves from the Army of the Scots, with whom they were highly offended for not ſending the King to Warwick, according to their firſt Order. Therefore they enter'd into many Conferences with the Commiſſioners for the Kingdom of Scotland, and at the End of June came to an Agreement with them upon what they call'd Propoſitions of Peace. On the ſame Day General Leven and his Officers preſented a mock Petition to the King, 'Praying his Majeſty to compaſſionate the diſtreſſed Condition of his Kingdoms, 'groaning under the heavy Preſſures of manifold Calamities, occaſion'd by the Continuance of this unnatural 'War; and to comply with the Counſels of his Parliament.' To which the King return'd Anſwer, 'That he 'came into the Scottiſh Army with full Intent of ſettling 'an happy Peace, and to ſatisfy the juſt Deſires of his 'good Subjects, and to comply with his Parliaments in 'all Things which ſhall be for the good of Religion, and 'the Happineſs of his People.' The Commons were more and more apprehenſive of the good Intentions of the Scots, therefore boldly voted in the Beginning of July, 'That 'this Kingdom hath no farther Need of the Scotch Army, 'and is unable to pay them longer; and that therefore a 'Letter ſhould be ſent from both Houſes to the Commiſſioners of Scotland, to deſire them to withdraw their Army into Scotland.

The Parliament prepare Propoſitions for the King.

There was a long Conteſt and Struggle in the Houſes, concerning the Propoſitions that were to be ſent to the King: Vane, Cromwell, and their Party were for making the Demands as extravagant as poſſible, only without expreſſing the King's Depoſition or Death; while the Party of the Earl of Eſſex, who dy'd ſhortly after, and the Scots, endeavour'd to mollify the Articles, ſo as to make them paſs with his Majeſty. But the Independents had in ſeveral Things the Aſcendant, and at length, after ſeveral Months Formation, they compleated the Propoſitions about the Middle of July; and order'd them to be carry'd to the King at Newcaſtle by the Earls of Pembroke and Suffolk, of the Peers; and Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Hipperſley, Robert Goodwin, and Luke Robinſon, Eſquires, for the Commons; Mr. Marſhall attending them as Chaplain. The Propoſitions were nineteen in Number, and too long to be recited here: In Subſtance they were, 'Firſt to annul 'all Oaths, Declarations and Proclamations, againſt the 'Houſes of Parliament, who had been neceſſitated to undertake the War; and next for the King to ſwear and ſign the 'Solemn League and Covenant, and to join in the utter 'aboliſhing of all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans and Chapters, &c. and that the Ordinance for the Aſſembly of 'Divines, and Reformation of Religion be confirmed, and 'that both Nations be brought to Uniformity of Religion, 'according to the Covenant.' Beſides theſe Particulars, the Propoſitions did in Effect require his Majeſty 'To diveſt himſelf of all Power to protect his People, by putting the Militia into the Hands of the Houſes; and that 'he ſhould betray the greateſt Part of the Nobility and Gentry, which had adher'd to him in the War, to inevitable 'Ruin: Some of which were to be excluded from all 'Hope of Pardon, as to the ſaving of their Lives, others 'to forfeit their Eſtates, and loſe their Liberties; the Clergy to remain under Sequeſtration, and the Lawyers of 'both Sorts to be diſabled from the uſe of their Callings.' Demands of ſuch a horrid and deſtructive Nature, as would, if granted, have render'd the King and his Memory inglorious and deſpicable both at Home and Abroad.

The Subſtance of them.

Hamilton and Argyle wait upon the King.

The King had firſt Notice of theſe Propoſitions by the Duke of Hamilton, who had been ſet at Liberty by the Reduction of Cornwall, had been with the Scotch Commiſſioners at London, and now arriv'd at Newcaſtle on the 17th of July. It was obſerv'd, that at the very Moment that he kiſs'd his Majeſty's Hand, there hapned a dreadful Storm of Thunder and Lightning, without any preceding Appearance in the midſt of a fair Day: Which hapning ſoon after, and exactly in the ſame manner, when the Marqueſs of Argyle receiv'd the ſame Favour, many believ'd it proceeded more from an ominous than a natural Cauſe. Theſe two endeavour'd to perſuade his Majeſty to a Compliance with his Parliament; who was now particularly engag'd with the famous Mr. Henderſon, who came provided with Books and all other Helps to induce the King to aboliſh Epiſcopacy in England, as he had done in Scotland. Several Papers paſs'd between the King and Him, which have been often publiſh'd in Print; by which it appears that if his Majeſty's Arms had been as ſtrong as his Arguments, he had been every way invincible: And ſince theſe Anſwers were made without the Aſſiſtance of Books or Men, it was wonderful to ſee a Prince able to outrun ſo great a Theologue, in a Controverſy which had exercis'd his Thoughts and Studies for ſo many Years. The old Man departed with great Sorrow to Edinburgh, and ſo far convinc'd and converted, that he had a very deep Senſe of the Miſchief of which he had been the Author or Abettor; and not only lamented to his Friends and Confidents, but upon his Death Bed ſhortly after, publiſh'd a ſolemn Declaration to the Parliament and Synod of England: In which he own'd, 'That they had been abus'd with moſt 'falſe Aſperſions againſt his Majeſty; and declares that they 'ought to reſtore him to his juſt Rights, Royal Throne 'and Dignity, leaſt an indelible Character of Ingratitude 'lye upon them, that may turn to their Ruin.' As to the Character of the King himſelf, beſides mentioning his Juſtice, his Magnanimity, his Sobriety, his Chaſtity and other Virtues, he has theſe Words: I do declare before God and the World, whether in Relation to Kirk or State, I found his Majeſty the moſt intelligent Man that ever I ſpoke with; as far beyond my Expreſſion, as Expectation.-----I profeſs, that I was oftentimes aſtoniſh'd with the Solidity and Quickneſs of his Reaſons and Replies, wonder'd how He, ſpending his Time in Sports and Recreations, cou'd have attained to ſo great Knowledge; and muſt confeſs, that I was convinc'd in Conſcience, and knew not how to give him any reaſonable Satisfaction; yet the Sweetneſs of his Diſpoſition is ſuch, that whatſoever I ſaid, was well taken: I muſt ſay that I never met with any Diſputant of that mild and calm Temper, which convinc'd me that ſuch Wiſdom and Moderation cou'd not be without an extraordinary Meaſure of the Divine Grace.-----I dare ſay, if his Advice had been follow'd, all the Blood that is ſhed, and all the Rapine that is committed, ſhou'd have been prevented. I have been inform'd that this Character has been adjudg'd ſpurious; but I cannot find Authority ſufficient to ſupport ſuch an Aſſertion.

The King's Diſpute with Henderſon.

Henderſon's Character of the King.

The King had juſt defeated this great Man, when he was attack'd by Bellievre the French Ambaſſador, who came over with great Promiſes of Aſſiſtance from the Court of France; and, after he had much convers'd with the Scots and Presbyterian Party at London, waited upon his Majeſty at Newcaſtle. Here the main Part of his Buſineſs was to inform the King, 'That nothing cou'd be done for him, 'except he wou'd give up the Church, extirpate Epiſcopacy, and give up all the Lands belonging to Cathedral 'Churches according as the Parliament ſhou'd adviſe;' and therefore he earneſtly preſs'd him to that Condeſcenſion. But beſides the Matter propos'd, in which the King was not to be mov'd, he had little Regard to the Promiſes of the Ambaſſador, having too late diſcover'd the ſmall Affection of the French Cardinal, by the unfortunate Event of Montrevil's Negotiation. This Ambaſſador ſoon inform'd the Cardinal, 'That the King was too reſerv'd in 'giving the Parliament Satisfaction, and deſir'd that ſome 'more prevailing Perſon might be ſent to perſuade him to 'what was neceſſary to his Service.' Upon which the Queen, who valu'd not Epiſcopacy, nor underſtood her Husband's true Intereſt, ſent over the famous Poet Laureat, Sir William Davenant, a Perſon, tho' honeſt and faithful to the King, yet who did not think the Church of that Importance, as to weigh down the Benefit that might attend the Conceſſion. But the King treated him with unuſual Sharpneſs, and ſent him back to France much dejected, and out of all Hopes of prevailing in this Point. The French Writers magnify the Pains taken by the Ambaſſador Bellievre, and own that the King became a Martyr to the Church of England, and that it was the only Point that decided his Fate. And indeed it was generally and rationally believ'd, That if the Scots and the Presbyterians cou'd have gain'd that Point, there wou'd have appear'd a ſufficient Party in the Parliament and elſewhere, who wou'd have join'd with the Royaliſts for their Maſter's Defence. So that the King's Behaviour in this, and in rejecting the Parliament's Propoſitions, is by his Enemies call'd an obſtinate Stiffneſs, and by his Friends an inviolable Steadineſs.

Mon. Bellievre's Negotiation with the King.

The Parliament's Propoſitions brought to the King.

4. In the mean Time the fore-mention'd Propoſitions were brought to the King, on the 24th of July, by the Parliament Commiſſioners, who all kiſs'd his Majeſty's Hand. The King firſt demanded of them, If they had any Power to treat? To which they anſwering in the Negative; his Majeſty reply'd, Then, ſaving the Honour of the Buſineſs, an honeſt Trumpeter might have done as much. Then Mr. Goodwin read the Propoſitions, to which his Majeſty was patiently attentive, and in the Concluſion only ſaid, Gentlemen, I hope you do not expect a ſpeedy Anſwer, becauſe the Buſineſs is of high Concernment. The Earl of Pembroke anſwer'd, That they were limited not to ſtay above ten Days after their coming to that Town, and muſt then return. His Majeſty reply'd, That he wou'd diſpatch them in a convenient Time; and ſo for the preſent diſmiſs'd them. After this the King told them, He knew not what Anſwer to make to them, till he ſhou'd be inform'd what Power or Authority they had left to Him, and his Heirs, when he had given up all that which they deſired. But after a full Conſideration, and much Oppoſition, he deliver'd his Anſwer in Writing to the Commiſſioners; in which he told the two Houſes, ‘That the Propoſitions tender'd to him did import ſo great Alterations in the Government, both in the Church and Kingdom, that it was difficult to return a particular and poſitive Anſwer before a full Debate: To which End his Majeſty deſired and propos'd to come to London, or any of his Houſes thereabouts; where by his Perſonal Preſence he may not only raiſe a mutual Confidence betwixt him and his People, but alſo have thoſe Doubts cleared, and thoſe Difficulties explain'd to him, which he now conceives to be deſtructive to his juſt Regal Power, if he ſhall give a full Conſent to theſe Propoſitions, as they now ſtand.’

The King's Anſwer to them.

In the mean Time the Scots us'd all Importunity, and even Threats to his Majeſty, to perſuade him to comply with theſe Propoſitions; tho' they confeſs'd, ‘That they were higher in many Things than they approv'd of, yet they ſaw no other Means for him to cloſe with his Parliament, than by granting their Demands.’ The Duke of Hamilton preſs'd him earneſtly to yield to them, and the Chancellor Lowdon told him plainly and with great Vehemency, ‘That the Conſequence of his Anſwer to the Propoſitions, was as great, as the Ruin or Preſervation of his Crown or Kingdoms: That the Parliament, after many bloody Battles, had got the ſtrong Holds and Forts of the Kingdom into their Hands: That they had his Revenue, Exciſe, Aſſeſſments, Sequeſtrations, and Power to raiſe all the Men and Money in the Kingdom: That they had conquer'd all, and had a ſtrong Army to maintain what they had got; ſo they might do what they wou'd with Church and State: That they deſir'd neither him, nor any of his Race, longer to reign over them; and had ſent theſe Propoſitions to him, without the granting of which, the Kingdom and his People cou'd not be in Safety: That if he refus'd his Conſent, he wou'd loſe all his Friends in Parliament, loſe the City, and loſe the Country; and that all England wou'd join againſt him as one Man, to deprive him, and ſet up another Government; and ſo both Kingdoms, for either's Safety, wou'd agree to ſettle Religion and Peace without him, to the Ruin of his Perſon and Poſterity: And concluded, That if he left England, he wou'd not be admitted to come and Reign in Scotland.’ Theſe ſort of Arguments did rather provoke than perſuade the King, who reply'd with great Reſolution and Magnanimity, ‘That no Condition they cou'd reduce him to, cou'd be half ſo miſerable and grievous to him, as that to which they wou'd perſuade him to reduce himſelf; and therefore bad them proceed their own Way, and that tho' they had all forſaken him, God had not.

Lowdon's Speech to the King.

His great Steadineſs.

This was his Majeſty's full Reſolution, which ſome call an unſeaſonable Stiffneſs: Yet others are of Opinion, that he wou'd ſtill have comply'd, had he not been deluded by the Independent Leaders; and particularly we are told by one Colonel Bamfield in his Apology, That Cromwell, Ireton, and their Party, impos'd a Belief upon ſome of the greateſt and beſt of the King's Friends, that the Army wou'd reſtore him upon the rejecting the Parliament's Propoſitions. And that they might poſſeſs his Majeſty with the ſame Opinion, they conniv'd at the Eſcape of a Clergy-Man out of the Tower, who was a known Friend to the King, and a profeſs'd Enemy to the Presbyterians and Scots; which Clergy-Man, having Inſtructions from ſome of the beſt of the King's Friends, that were impos'd upon by Cromwell, came ſecretly to his Majeſty at Newcaſtle, prevail'd with him to reject the Propoſitions, and poſſeſs'd him with Hopes of being reſtor'd by the Army. And the Colonel ſays farther, That he was ſo ſenſible of the Cheat, thus contriv'd by Cromwell and his Party, that he diſcover'd it to the Marqueſs of Hartford; but that noble Man was himſelf ſo far deluded by Cromwell's falſe Promiſes, that he adviſ'd the Colonel to forbear oppoſing it, and told him he was ſuſpected to favour the Presbyterians, more than the King. As to this Story, it is not improbable that Cromwell and his Party might incourage the King to reject the Propoſitions, as being ſo likely to promote their ſecret Deſigns; but for his Majeſty's Intention of complying with them, before he receiv'd ſuch Incouragement, as it is rather ſuppos'd than prov'd, ſo it anſwers not fully the reſt of the King's Hiſtory, or his Character: Only, thus much is juſtly believ'd, That he was more ready to hearken to the Promiſes of the Independents, than prov'd agreeable to his future Intereſt or Safety.

Bamfield's Account of this Affair.

5. The King's Anſwer being brought to the Houſes at Weſtminſter, it was receiv'd both with Joy and Sorrow, according to the Inclinations of the ſeveral Parties: The Independents fear'd nothing ſo much as the King's granting the Propoſitions, knowing in that Caſe, there cou'd be no Colour for keeping up the Army; and in the Houſe of Commons, when Thanks were voted to the Commiſſioners that had been with the King, one Member whiſper'd to another, That they ow'd more Thanks to the King than to any Body; and in another Corner, an honeſt Member ſaying to another, What ſhall become of us, ſince the King refuſes the Propoſitions? the other anſwer'd, Nay, what had become of us if he had granted them? Therefore new Counſels were taken how to bring the King into ſafer Cuſtody, and how to ſend the Scots ſpeedily into their own Country. Accordingly the Houſe of Commons, upon Conſideration of a Paper deliver'd by the Scotch Commiſſioners, voted ‘That the Sum of a hundred thouſand Pounds ſhou'd be provided for the Advance of the Scots Army in Scotland. And did farther Reſolve, ‘That the Houſe do well and thankfully approve of their good Affections and Zeal to this Kingdom, and their Offer to deliver up our Garriſons and depart the Kingdom: That their Arrears ſhall be audited, and in convenient Time paid.’ So they proceeded to a particular Reckoning with them: The Scots demanded two Millions of Money from January 1643, to September 1646. The Parliament accounted for one million four hundred thouſand Pounds already paid; but the Scots excepted to ſeveral Particulars in the Account, and offer'd to accept of a Sum in groſs for a full Diſcharge of their Arrears, to be agreed on by Commiſſioners; who concluded on four hundred thouſand Pounds, of which one Moiety was to be paid before their leaving the Kingdom, and the other within ſtated Terms. But the delivering up of the King was a tacit Condition of this Agreement, as it appear'd afterwards.

The Parliament reckon with the Scots.

In the mean Time, juſt after the Departure of the Engliſh Commiſſioners from Newcaſtle, the Chancellor Lowdon, the Marqueſs of Argyle, and the Earl of Dumfermling, offer'd to his Majeſty to go up and treat with the Parliament for a Mitigation of the Propoſitions; and accordingly repair'd to London. What his Majeſty expected from theſe ſubtle Managers, is uncertain; but the Royaliſts, who knew them, took the Liberty to ſay, That their Treating wou'd end in a Bargain. They at firſt appear'd very much for the King; and when the Parliament made an expreſs Vote, ‘That his Majeſty ſhall be diſpos'd of as both their own Houſes ſhould think fit;’ they put in their Claim to a joint Right of diſpoſing of his Majeſty's Perſon; and the Chancellor Lowdon made ſeveral Speeches to the Houſes, and talk'd high of the indelible Character of Diſgrace and Infamy, which muſt be for ever imprinted on them, if they yielded to it. The Scotch Commiſſioners deliver'd in ſeveral Papers, in which they particularly inſiſted, ‘That their Army by the Oath of Allegiance, their Committee of Eſtates by their Commiſſion, and their Officers by their Military Oath, ought all to defend the King from Harms and Prejudices: Often affirming, That the King came to their Army for Shelter; adding, That it was the Law and Practice of all Nations, not to deliver the meaneſt Subject fled to them, tho' for the higheſt Crimes; and if the meaneſt were not to be deliver'd, how would the World condemn them, for ſo baſe and diſhonourable an Act! The King having caſt himſelf into their Hands.’ They likewiſe argu'd, ‘If the Scotch Army was invited into the Kingdom by both Houſes of Parliament, in a Treaty for proſecuting the Ends of the Solemn League and Covenant; whereof one Article is to preſerve and defend his Majeſty's Perſon; there can be no Doubt concerning this Exerciſe of that Right and Intereſt in this Kingdom.’ And therefore wonder'd, ‘That when upon Invitation they were come into England, as for other Ends, ſo to defend his Majeſty's Perſon, their being in England ſhou'd be us'd as an Argument Why they ſhou'd deliver up the King to be diſpos'd of as both their own Houſes ſhou'd think fit.’ The Engliſh Parliament reply'd, ‘That the Scotch Army came in hither as Auxiliaries, under Pay; and therefore they ought not to capitulate at all in this Matter;’ and at length came to this poſitive Aſſertion, ‘We do affirm, that the Kingdom of Scotland hath no Right

Lowdon's and the Scots Claim to their King.

The Parliament's Reply.

Car. 22.

‘ of joint Exerciſe of Intereſt in diſpoſing of the Perſon of ‘ the King, in the Kingdom of England.’ In ſum, they adhered and truſted to this one Argument, That the Scots Army wou'd not carry away the King, to loſe their four hundred thouſand Pounds Contract; and that they ſhou'd receive no Part of it, without delivering up their Security, the King's Perſon. However, by Loan from the City, upon the Credit of a Sale of Church-Lands, the Sum of two hundred thouſand Pounds was ready at Gold-Smiths-Hall by the End of November; and being ſoon after ſent into the North, it was quickly gueſs'd that the Perſon of the King was to be given for a Scotch Acquittance to the Engliſh.

The Deſigns of the Independents.

During theſe artful Proceedings, the Independents, fearing a Settlement might follow, betook Themſelves to ſtrange Methods to obſtruct it; and gave the King Hopes ‘ That they wou'd be willing to diſpenſe with the Impoſing of the Covenant, and conſent to a Toleration of Epiſcopacy and the Liturgy, if they might be ſatisfy'd in other Points.’ While the King ſeem'd inclining to theſe People, the Earl of Lauderdale continu'd to write from London to him, aſſuring his Majeſty, ‘ That he knew their ‘ Deſigns were the Ruin of Monarchy, and the Deſtruction of his Perſon and Poſterity; and tho' they might cajole his Majeſty with ſmooth Propoſitions, they only ‘ meant to divide him from his Parliaments, and ſo more ‘ effectually ruin him. But if he wou'd now conſent to ‘ the Propoſitions, all wou'd go right, and in ſpight of the ‘ Devil and Independents both, he wou'd be quickly on his ‘ Throne: But Delays were dangerous, for they that wiſh'd ‘ well to the King, became daily more heartleſs, while the ‘ other Party grew more inſolent; and the Death of the ‘ Earl of Eſſex at that Time, had given the greateſt Blow ‘ to the King's Affairs they cou'd have met with.’ Theſe different Promiſes and Aſſurances did more and more perplex the King, who ſeem'd moſt to hearken to his old falſe Friend William Murray of the Bed-Chamber, who privately propos'd an Eſcape, and offer'd to make his Way, and to have a Ship in Readineſs to tranſport his Majeſty beyond Sea. The Project appear'd plauſible, and the King had diſguis'd himſelf for it, but was diſcover'd in the Attempt: Whether he was faithful to the King in this Point, it is uncertain, ſince Sir Robert Murray was concern'd in it; but Biſhop Guthry ſays the Matter was divulg'd before the ſet Time, ſo that there was no other Diſcourſe throughout the Army, but of Murray's Plot to carry away the King. Thereupon a Guard of Soldiers was immediately planted at his Chamber Door, both within and without; by which his Majeſty was not only depriv'd of Liberty, but alſo of Quiet and Retirement; and having an Antipathy againſt Tobacco, was much diſturb'd by their bold and continual Smoaking by Him.

The King deſigns an Eſcape.

The Scotch Parliament.

6. In the mean Time, on the third of November, the Scotch Parliament met at Edinburgh, where had been great Debates concerning their Armies, and the King's Perſon, both in the Committee of the Eſtates, and of the Kirk; all which were artfully ſuſpended till the Meeting of this Parliament. Here the Intereſt and Grandeur of the Duke of Hamilton ſufficiently appear'd; and Biſhop Guthry tells us That the Royaliſts ſoon dealt with his Grace, That he would be pleas'd to bring in the main Buſineſs, concerning the Owning of the King: And in particular the Lord Innepeffer, having ſounded moſt of the Commiſſioners, and found them true to his Majeſty, went and beſought the Duke to ſuffer no Delay, aſſuring him ‘ It wou'd now go ‘ for the King by thirty Voices; but if protracted, the Argylians and Kirk Commiſſioners were ſo induſtrious, ‘ that in Time they wou'd draw over ſo many, as to loſe ‘ the Cauſe.’ The Duke thank'd Him for his Affection to the King, but deſir'd, He wou'd leave the Timeing of the Buſineſs to Him, who knew beſt to take the Opportunity. Likewiſe a Week after, the ſame Lord, finding a great Change in the Commiſſioners, ſent to the Duke to ſhew ‘ That by Reaſon of Men's Inconſtancy, they now cou'd ‘ carry it only by fifteen Voices,’ and earneſtly preſs'd for Expedition. His Grace return'd the ſame Anſwer; and indeed it was the fifteenth of December before he made any publick Mention of the Buſineſs: At which Time there came Letters from the Commiſſioners at London, ſhewing, ‘ That they were ſo far advanc'd in Agreeing with the Parliament of England, as they ſhou'd receive two Hundred ‘ Thouſand Pounds in Hand; and as much more at ſet ‘ Terms, on Condition, They retir'd their Army, and ſurrender'd the King, without any Conditions for Him.’ Since the Duke, on whom the Royaliſts depended, had deferr'd this Buſineſs till the Arrival of theſe Letters, they concluded he was ingag'd with the reſt, and therefore the moſt Part reſolv'd to comply, leaſt they ſhou'd draw down the Indignation of an increaſing Faction. And that the Parliament Commiſſioners might proceed more unanimouſly, Thoſe of the Kirk publiſh'd a Warning, exhorting all to cloſe with the Parliament of England, and not to ſuffer the King to come into Scotland, without firſt taking the Covenant, and ſigning the Parliament's Propoſitions.

The King's Meſſage to both Kingdoms.

The Scotch Commiſſioners leave London.

In Concluſion they agreed ‘ To ſend once more to his ‘ Majeſty, to deſire him to grant the whole Propoſitions; ‘ and in Caſe of Refuſal, they wou'd withdraw their Army, and leave him to the Engliſh Parliament. This being urg'd to the ſame Effect by the two Houſes at Weſtminſter, his Majeſty ſent his laſt Meſſage both to London and Edinburgh, earneſtly preſſing for a Perſonal Treaty with his Parliament of England, and concluding with theſe Words: It is your King who deſires to be heard (the which if refus'd to a Subject by a King, he wou'd be thought a Tyrant for it) and for that End which all Men profeſs to deſire. Wherefore his Majeſty conjures you, as you deſire to ſhew your ſelves really what you profeſs, even as you are good Chriſtians and Subjects, that you will accept this his Offer, which he is confident God will ſo bleſs, that it will be the readieſt Means by which theſe Kingdoms may again become a Comfort to their Friends, and a Terror to their Enemies. This was receiv'd at Weſtminſter without any Regard to it, where the next Debate was about the King's Perſon; and the mildeſt Opinion was, That he ſhou'd be kept Priſoner, ſome being for the utter Excluding him from the Government; and for the Place of his Reſtraint, it was carry'd that he ſhou'd go to Holmby-Houſe in Northamptonſhire. But when he was order'd to be kept in Safety for his Perſon, Harry Martin objected, That the King had broken the Peace, and why muſt the Parliament bind for his Safety? but however it was carry'd to preſerve his Perſon according to the Covenant, which was now thought a great Point. Thus they took their Leaves of the Scotch Commiſſioners, who departed from London in the End of December; when it was mov'd in the Commons to return them the Thanks of the Houſe for their Civilities and good Offices: The Independents argued againſt that of Good Offices, and recounted many bad ones ſince the King went to Newcaſtle; and it was carry'd by twenty four Votes to daſh out Good Offices, and only thank them for their Civilities. And ſo all thoſe glorious Characters they us'd to give the Scotch Commiſſioners, upon every Occaſion, now concluded in this, That they were well-bred Gentlemen.

The Scotch Parliament give up the King.

7. About the Beginning of January, the Commiſſioners from the Scotch Parliament arriv'd at Newcaſtle, who urg'd his Majeſty to a final and ſatisfactory Anſwer to the Propoſitions, declaring, It wou'd be receiv'd with more Joy, than had been ever ſeen at any Coronation in England. But the King deſir'd to be reſolv'd in two Things before he cou'd give his Anſwer: The Firſt was, Whether he was a free Man, or a Priſoner? Adding, That if he were a Priſoner, it was the Opinion of many Divines, that Promiſes, in that Caſe, did not oblige; tho' he did not aſſert that to be his own Senſe. The next was, Whether he might go to Scotland, with Honour, Freedom and Safety, or not? They did not give a direct Anſwer to the Firſt, but as to the Second, they intimated, ‘ That without his Majeſty's full ‘ Compliance, they muſt follow the Reſolutions of the ‘ Parliament of England.’ The King refuſing ſuch a Compliance, on the ſixteenth of January, it was debated by the Scotch Parliament, what ſhou'd be done with his Majeſty's Perſon; and at length, according to Biſhop Guthry, it was voted in theſe Words, ‘ That, according to the Agree‘ment of the Commiſſioners above, the Army ſhou'd re‘tire, and the King be left to the Engliſh, without any ‘ Conditions for him, or our Intereſt in Him.’ Of this Vote, both Duke Hamilton and his Brother Lanrick were warm Oppoſers, and ſtrenuouſly exerted Themſelves; but ſtill they cou'd not preſerve their Reputation, in regard all their Friends and Followers voted the other Way. Thus, after eight Months Treating, or rather Bargaining, the King's Fate was determin'd by thoſe, on whom he thought he had laid an Obligation beyond all former Engagements.

Cenſures upon the Fact.

This Fact had an Appearance ſo infamous and diſhonourable, that it ſoon became the Matter of Diſcourſe and Cenſure of all Chriſtendom; and indeed the Diſgrace of it fell very heavy upon the whole Kingdom of Scotland. Many Writers have endeavour'd to mollify and palliate this Action, and indeed to repreſent it only as a fair Treaty; and particularly the Publiſher of Ruſhworth's two laſt Volumes, for which he inſiſts upon Hollis's Memoirs, and ſome Particulars in the Treaty. But the moſt material Apology we find in the Memoirs of Biſhop Guthry, who tells us, That the Guilt and Shame due to this Fact, ſhou'd not with Reaſon be imputed to the Generality of the Scotch Nation, in regard, Firſt, Of the Nobility, the Liſt of whom if it be compared with the Sederunt of Parliament, it will appear that the Third Part of them were not preſent; many having been Secluded for their known Affection, and others upon various Pretexts, and ſome withdrawing, to preſerve their Eſtates from Danger. Secondly, As for the Gentry, Burghs and Commonalty throughout the Land, there were an Hundred to one that abhorr'd the Fact; and wou'd have inſtructed their Commiſſioners that Way, who were likewiſe over-aw'd in their Votes. And Thirdly, as for the Miniſtry, tho' the Majority of thoſe in this pack'd Aſſembly were for it, yet throughout the Kingdom, the far greater Part diſallow'd of it; only Fear of Deprivation reſtrain'd them from giving their Teſtimony againſt it. However it was, ſeveral were highly rewarded ſoon after; and of the Engliſh Money, the Parliament gave the Marqueſs of Argyle thirty Thouſand Pounds Sterling, and fifteen Thouſand more to his Friends. Several of the Kirk Miniſters were inrich'd; Sir Archibald Johnſton had three Thouſand Pounds given him as a Reward for his Service; and Duke Hamilton himſelf had thirty Thouſand Pounds given him in Conſideration of his late Loſſes, eſpecially when the Marqueſs of Montroſs lay at Bothwell.

English Commiſſioners arrive to receive the King.

While Matters were concerted in Scotland, the Commiſſioners of both Houſes at Weſtminſter were nam'd to go down to receive the King from the Scots, and to bring him to Holmby; of the Lords, the Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Denbigh, and Lord Montague; of the Commons, Sir John Holland, Sir Walter Earle, Sir James Harrington, Sir John Cook, Mr. John Crew, and Major-General Brown; together with ſome private Gentlemen, and two of their Chaplains, Mr. Marſhal and Mr. Caryl. Theſe arriv'd at Newcaſtle on the 23d of January; and having kiſs'd the King's Hand, the Earl of Pembroke told his Majeſty, That they were commanded by both Houſes of Parliament to attend him to Holmby. The King betray'd no ill Reſentment or Surpriſe, but courteouſly told them, They were welcome, and that none of them were Strangers to him; and particularly apply'd himſelf to the old Earl of Pembroke, whom he was glad to ſee perform ſuch a Journey among ſuch Youthful Company. Yet he could not but reſent the unexpected Dealings of the Scots, and took Occaſion to tell their chief Leaders, That he had often deſir'd to go into Scotland; that he came into their Army for Protection, but now perceiv'd they were not willing he ſhould go with them: He deſir'd to know how they would diſpoſe of him, and to whom they would deliver him? After they had withdrawn, they came and declar'd to his Majeſty, 'They had conſider'd of his Speech, and ſince his Majeſty had refus'd to 'take the Covenant, and ſign the Propoſitions, they were 'to deliver him to the Commiſſioners of both Houſes of 'the Parliament of England, who were come to attend 'him to Holmby.

The King deliver'd to them.

The Civil War ended.

So on Saturday, the 30th of January, a Day of the King's Impriſonment and Martyrdom, they deliver'd up their Native Prince, and left the Town of Newcaſtle; and quitting the other Garriſons, they march'd over the Tweed on the 11th of February, after they had continu'd a little above three Years in the Kingdom; leaving the Northern Counties miſerably beggar'd by many grievous Taxes impos'd on them by their Army, and moſt deplorable Oppreſſions by Free-Quarter. They enter'd the Kingdom contrary to all Faith and Gratitude, as well as Loyalty and Obedience, and at laſt quitted it with Ignominy and Diſhonour: Never were People more complimented at their Arrival, more oblig'd while they were wanted, or more contemn'd at their Departure. They departed with a Reward, but likewiſe with a Curſe, as many obſerve; for from that Time, they never flouriſh'd, or proſper'd in any one Undertaking. They who in this and the laſt Reign had all the Power, Riches, Offices, Marriages, Wealth and Greatneſs, within their Command in both Kindoms, were afterwards ruin'd at home, both in Kirk and State, by thoſe they had aſſiſted and rais'd; and beſides a new ſucceeding Scene of Blood and Miſery, they became the moſt deſpicable conquer'd People, upon the Face of the whole Earth. Their Departure may be call'd the Concluſion of the firſt Civil War of England; which continu'd near four Years and a half, with the Expence of many Millions of Mony, above two Hundred Thouſand Lives with the nobleſt Blood in the Kingdom, the Ruin of Thouſands of the moſt worthy Men and Families, and in ſhort, with all the deplorable Miſeries and Calamities, that had ever puniſh'd and tormented a ſinful Nation.

The Period concluded,

8. At the Concluſion of this Period, we may very properly reconſider and admire the wonderful Fate of this unhappy Monarch, with the Variety of ſtrange Accidents and Diſappointments that ſo frequently attended him; how often his Affairs promis'd him Succeſs, and then defeated his moſt hopeful Projects and Deſigns; all which ſerv'd but to lengthen out the Miſeries, and to puniſh the Sins of the Nation. To add to the former Accounts, we ſhall now ſubjoin ſome curious Particulars which were never yet publiſh'd, out of a Manuſcript Narrative written by Sir Gilbert Talbot; which Particulars might have been interſpers'd in this Hiſtory, but we have reſerv'd them for one View, at once to deliver them in the Words of the Author. Only firſt the Reader is to remember, That before the Applications, mention'd in the Narrative, were made to Foreign Courts, the Parliamentarians had firſt call'd in the Scots, us'd what Foreign Aſſiſtance they cou'd gain, and ſeiz'd upon all the Engliſh Shipping, whether Friends or otherwiſe; ſo that the King, tho' formerly reſtrain'd by his Declarations, was now left at full Liberty to uſe all equivalent Methods to recover his former State and Condition. The Narrative is in theſe Words.

With a curious Narrative of the King's Diſappointments,

Being employ'd in the Service of King Charles the Firſt at Venice, in the Beginning of the Rebellion, I obſerv'd that the Venetian Ambaſſador, who reſided altogether in London, gave ſuch weekly Account of the Affairs of England, and of the various Succeſſes of the War, as came to him from the partial Relation of the Rebels; and ſo great Credit was given to his Diſpatches, that it was not eaſie for me to gain any Belief in the Contradiction of his apparent Miſtakes: Whereof I gave Account to the King my Maſter. To the End therefore, that I might with more Confidence and Aſſiſtance aver Matters of Fact, his Majeſty gave Command to both his Secretaries of State (altho' it was the Province but of one) to give me weekly a true, impartial Account of all that happen'd in the War, as well to his Damage as Advantage, with Order to me to communicate it to the Venetians; becauſe all the London Narratives leſſen'd his Majeſty's Victories and magnify'd his Loſſes.

Within a ſhort Time after I had begun this Method, I was advertiz'd of the unfortunate Battel of Marſton-Moor, wherein his Majeſty's Army receiv'd a very great Loſs. Hereof I gave an early Account to the Doge, Franciſco Erizzo, who was ſo much diſcompos'd by my Relation, that the good old Man ſhed ſome Tears, ſaying, That it was pity ſo virtuous and worthy a Prince ſhould receive ſuch hard Meaſure from his own Subjects; of whoſe Misfortune, he added, the Republick was ſo deeply ſenſible, that they would readily aſſiſt his Majeſty in ſo juſt a Cauſe, with Men, Mony, Arms or Ammunition, whenever he pleas'd to make uſe of them. I return'd Thanks in his Majeſty's Name for that Princely Offer; but knowing it was not in the Power of the Doge to make ſo large an Engagement for the Republick, without expreſs Leave from the Senate, I told his Serenity, That I would not fail to give his Majeſty an Account of his proffer'd Kindneſs; but that it might go to his Majeſty with greater Authority, I humbly deſir'd his Serenity, That he would vouchſafe me his Words in Writing, leſt I might unhappily miſtake his Expreſſions. To this he reply'd, That he would Aſſemble an extraordinary PREGADI that Night; and I ſhould have the Reſult of it the next Morning; which he doubted not but would be to my Satisfaction. I was accordingly the next Morning ſent for to the College, and a Vote of the Senate deliver'd to me in as large Terms as the Doge had, the Day before, expreſs'd himſelf. This I ſent away by an Expreſs the ſame Day into England; and leſt the Secretary might not underſtand the Importance of it, being written in a rude Venetian Dialect, I ſent it likewiſe tranſlated into Engliſh; and it was deliver'd to Secretary Nicholas at Oxford.

The King was then gone to Ragland-Caſtle, and no preſent Anſwer could be return'd to the Paper; nor had I ſo much as a Direction from the Secretary to entertain the Venetians with Thanks, till his Majeſty's Pleaſure might be known. But when ſo much Time was elaps'd as might conveniently have brought the Anſwer, leſt the Senate might think their Compliment neglected, I pretended, That I had receiv'd Command from the King my Maſter, to let the Republick know, That his Majeſty was highly ſenſible of their kind and generous Offer, which deſerv'd the fulleſt Expreſſion of his Thanks: But that he was not without Hope to compoſe the Diſorders, without giving any Trouble to ſo good an Ally: But if he ſhould be put to the laſt Extremity, he was glad to know where he might fix upon ſo ſure a Friend, as their voluntary Generoſity had ſhewn them to be. But his Majeſty being at laſt reduc'd to very great Streights, and no Notice taken all that while of the Venetian Civility, I knew not what Conſtruction to make of it: I began to ſuſpect the Sincerity of the Secretary; for I was altogether a Stranger to him. To clear this Matter, and withal to procure ſome Settlement for my future Subſiſtance in that Employment, which I had till then defray'd upon my own Purſe and Credit, I ask'd Leave to return into England; and his Majeſty gave me Leave for ſix Months.

When I came to Oxford, the King was in great Want, and the Lord Cottington, Secretary Nicholas, Sir Edward Hyde, and Mr. Jo. Aſhburnham were in Conſultation which way to procure a Subſiſtance for the Houſhold, which for ſome Weeks had been ſupported by the Sundays Offerings. I had at that Time Occaſion to ſpeak with Sir E. Hyde; and ſending my Name to him, he call'd for me in, and ſaid to the reſt in his merry Way, Poſſibly this Foreign Miniſter may acquaint us with ſome Foreign Project to get Mony when we want; and deſir'd me to impart my Skill.

I

I told him He had not ill addreſs'd to me, for I had been a long Practitioner in that Art; yet I knew but one Way, which was, when we have not of our Own, we muſt borrow of our Friends. He reply'd, My Invention was dull, for they had try'd all their Friends already. I aſk'd Leave to differ from him in Opinion, For I was well aſſur'd they had not try'd the Venetians; he ſaid, Becauſe we do not take them to be ſo much our Friends, as to lend us Mony. That's your own Fault, ſaid I; Sir Edward Nicholas can give you a better Character of them. No, believe me, ſaid he, not I: Do you keep any Copies of Diſpatches by you, ſaid I? and I deſir'd him to examine my Letters of ſuch a Month: He went to his Office, and immediately return'd with the Original Order of the Senate. They all cry'd out upon him; and he defended himſelf by the Hurry and Confuſion of Marches, which caus'd his Forgetfulneſs. Mr. Aſhburnham ran to the King with this Matter, and I was immediately ſent for: His Majeſty aſk'd me Why he was not made acquainted with this Affair ſooner? I anſwer'd, I preſum'd it had been imparted to him, when I tranſmitted it firſt to his Secretary. I further added, That I was put to great Loſs for want of Directions of what Return I ſhould make to the Venetians; and told his Majeſty what Meſſage I had fram'd and deliver'd in his Name; and begg'd his Majeſty's Pardon That I had done it without his Commiſſion: He reply'd, You have your Pardon, for you ought not to have done leſs. He then commanded me to put my ſelf in Readineſs, For he would within three Days ſend me back to Venice. I took the Boldneſs to ſay, It would not misbecome the greateſt Subject that his Majeſty had to go upon the Meſſage; and I thought the Venetians would expect to be courted out of their Mony: Yet this I ſaid not to decline the Journey, for I was ready to obey his Majeſty's Commands. His Majeſty took me at my Word, and would have none elſe go.

Firſt at Venice,

As ſoon as my Credentials and Inſtructions were finiſh'd, his Majeſty was pleas'd to give me the Honour of Knighthood, caus'd me to be ſworn Gentleman in Ordinary of his Privy-Chamber, and raiſed my Character to Envoy Extraordinary. I kiſs'd his Majeſty's Hand, and began my Journey with auſpicious Circumſtances; but it did not end with the like Succeſs: I fell into a Party of three Hundred of Maſſy's Horſe, and eſcap'd them miraculouſly; and endured no ſmall Storm upon the Rocky Coaſt of Lower-Britanny. When I came to Paris, I met with ſeveral Packets from my Secretary, whom I left at Venice, mentioning the firſt Rupture between the Turk and the Venetians, and the daily Increaſe of the Appearance of War; from whence I began ſtrongly to ſuſpect the Diſappointment of all my Hopes; yet reſolv'd to proceed upon my Journey, in Expectation that thoſe Differences might be happily accommodated by the Venetian Prudence. But when I arriv'd at Venice, I found Matters ſo irreconcilably exaſperated, that I held it very improper to preſs the Venetians to the Performance of their Promiſe to his Majeſty: And therefore I turn'd my Diſcourſe, and told the Doge, That his Majeſty had remanded me expreſly to return his more ſolemn Thanks for their generous Offer of Aſſiſtance to him in his Domeſtick Troubles, wherewith (altho' not yet quieted) he was not more perplex'd, than for that they hinder'd him from being in a Condition to ſend them Aid againſt their dreadful Enemies: And ſince he was not able to ſerve them that Way, he would ſend Command to his Ambaſſador at the Ottoman Court, to endeavour to do all the good Offices of a Mediator, to procure their Peace with that Emperor. Having paſs'd this Compliment, I had no more to do at Venice, and had his Majeſty's Leave to return for England, without any formal Letters of Revocation, whenever I ſhould find it expedient.

But being diſquieted beyond Meaſure with the Diſappointment of my Hopes, it came into my Head to write to Sir Sackvil Crow, then Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, both to acquaint him with the Miſcarriage of my Buſineſs, and to adviſe him to try, 'Whether the Grand Signior might not 'be prevail'd with to eſpouſe his Majeſty's Cauſe againſt 'his Rebels, as it was the Intereſt of all Princes to do, 'leſt their own Subjects might take Example from a proſperous Rebellion, to throw off all Obedience; and if 'he diſcover'd any Appearance, that by bribing of the 'Grand Vizier, or otherwiſe, it might be effected, upon 'the Intimation of it to me in Cypher, I would procure 'his Majeſty's Authority for him to proceed in it.' Having ſent away this Propoſal, I return'd back for England; and coming into the Weſt, was by the Commiſſion of the Prince of Wales, made Governor of Tiverton; which Command, upon the March of General Fairfax into the Weſt, was abandon'd by the former Governour, Colonel Amias Pollard. The Place being not long after attack'd by Major-General Maſſy, who was happily repuls'd, and then beſieg'd by General Fairfax, and every Hour in Danger to be loſt, (for my Horſe were mutinous, and I had but two Hundred Foot in Garriſon, and ſome of my chief Officers unfaithful, and the Enemy without twenty two Hundred ſtrong) therefore apprehending the worſt, I burnt all my Papers, and amongſt the reſt my Cypher with Sir Sackvil Crow. I was ſoon ſtorm'd, and, a main Poſt being betray'd by Major Sadler, taken and ſent away Priſoner to Lime, and thence to Weymouth; where obtaining my Liberty upon Exchange, I went to the King to Oxford; which was the firſt Time I ſaw his Majeſty after my Return from Italy.

I there gave him a more particular Account of my unſucceſsful Journey to Venice, and acquainted him with what Propoſal I had made to Sir Sackvil Crow, whereof his Majeſty was pleas'd to approve. I ſtood in daily Expectation of Sir Sackvil's Anſwer; which at length came to me in Cypher, but I had burnt my Key to it at Tiverton. I went immediately to his Majeſty, and told him, That I had now receiv'd a Letter from Conſtantinople, but knew not what it contain'd, in regard that it was written in Cypher, and I had burnt my Key. This was about twelve of the Clock, and his Majeſty took the Letter, and commanded me to attend him at three in the Afternoon: When I came I found the Letter uncypher'd by Prince Rupert, which gave all fair Hopes of the Deſign. By which Letter it appear'd that the Propoſal was, 'That ſince the Engliſh Rebels had got Poſſeſſion of all the Revenues of the 'Crown into their Hands, the Grand Seignior would give 'Leave to the King's Ambaſſador to confiſcate and ſeize 'all the Engliſh Merchants Effects, throughout his Dominions, for his Majeſty's Service; whereunto the Grand 'Signior had condeſcended.

Next at Conſtantinople.

The great Conſideration now was, which way this might beſt be effected: That the Grand Vizier was to be brib'd, no Man queſtion'd; but I took the Boldneſs to ſpeak my Fear to his Majeſty, That when the Merchants ſhould perceive their Danger, they would outbribe the Ambaſſador, and reverſe the Order for Confiſcation: I therefore humbly propos'd, That his Majeſty ſhould borrow a conſiderable Sum of that Emperor, and impawn his Subjects Effects for Reimburſement; and his Majeſty approv'd of what I offer'd. But Sir Edward Hyde, who could not brook to have his Method diſlik'd, eſpecially by a Perſon unqualify'd to adviſe, us'd many Arguments to prove the Caution unneceſſary; and ſo the Order went to Sir Sackvil as he had firſt drawn it up; and that Ambaſſador, when he was impower'd, proceeded to Sequeſtration. Thereupon the Factors meeting in a general Conſultation, concluded, That there was no Way for them to avoid this Ruin, but, as I had before conjectur'd, by Over-bribing. And therein they were ſo Succeſsful, that they not only revers'd the Order for Sequeſtration, repreſenting to the Grand Signior, 'That 'if it proceeded, it would deſtroy the Cloth Trade for 'ever, and diminiſh his Cuſtoms;' but prevail'd with him to deliver up the Engliſh Ambaſſador, to be ſent home to the Parliament: Which, as the Narrative concludes, prov'd the Ruin of his Fortune, and the Loſs of a Deſign, which might otherwiſe, in all Probability, have ſecured the Crown and Life of the beſt of Kings.

The Death of the Earl of Eſſex,

For a Concluſion of this Period, and the old Year 1646, we ſhall take Notice of the Deaths of ſeveral Men of great Diſtinction, which hapned in the ſaid Year: And Firſt of the Earl of Eſſex, once the Idol of the Presbyterians, who being diſgracefully laid aſide, as is remember'd, retir'd from Buſineſs, and in a melancholy and diſcontented manner departed this Life, on the 14th of September, in the 56th Year of his Age. Yet ſtill he dy'd in a Time when he might have been able to have undone much of that Miſchef he had formerly done; to which he had great Inclinations, and likewiſe Provocations from an ungrateful Parliament, as well as a plain Foreſight of the diſmal Ruin of King and Kingdom. And it is probable, he might ſtill have given ſome Check to the Rage and Fury that then prevail'd; but, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, God would not ſuffer a Man, who out of the Pride and Vanity of his Nature, rather than the Wickedneſs of his Heart, had been made an Inſtrument of ſo much Miſery, to have any Share in ſo glorious a Work. He ſeem'd to languiſh away the latter Part of his Life; and by reaſon of the Title, of which he was ambitious, he was in Deriſion call'd his OCCELLENCY; but dying without being ſenſible of Sickneſs, it was loudly diſcours'd by many of his Friends, that he was poyſon'd. However the two Houſes reſolv'd to aſſiſt at the Celebration of his Funeral, towards which they order'd five Thouſand Pounds to be paid to his Executors for defraying the Charges; which was ſolemniz'd with extraordinary Pomp on the 22d of October, in Weſtminſter-Abby, and his Funeral Sermon preach'd by the noted Mr. Vines. In him ended the Name and Honour of that Houſe; and, as if they deſign'd to deface his Memory alſo, when his Funeral Herſe was erected, ſome Perſons at Night moſt ſhamefully treated his Effigies, broke off his Head, tore away his Sword and Spurs, and rent down his Arms and Eſcutcheons. Whoever were thus malicious, it is certain that Cromwell and his Party were wonderfully exalted at his Death, he being the only Man whoſe Credit and Intereſt they fear'd, without any Eſteem of his Perſon.

Judge Bramſton,

Sir John Pennington,

Sir Henry Killigrew,

Mr. Lydyat,

Dr. Raleigh,

Mr. Gregory,

And Sir Francis Windebank.

As to other great Men that dy'd this Year, we are firſt to mention that eminent Judge, Sir John Bramſton, Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, a Lawyer of deep Learning, ſolid Judgment, Integrity of Life, and Gravity of Behaviour: In King James's Time he was accounted the beſt Lawyer and faireſt Pleader in Weſtminſter-Hall, and afterwards a moſt righteous and uncorrupt Judge; yet his Memory ſtill ſuffers for his learned Speech he made in Favour of the Ship-Mony. Next was Sir John Pennington, the famous Sea Commander, who for his Valour and other Qualifications, had been made Admiral of the King's Navy belonging to the Narrow Seas; but being diſabled by means of the preſent Powers, he ſtill led a Life of Grandeur, and refuſing all Overtures from the Parliament, he dy'd in Peace at Briſtol. Next we are to mention another great Royaliſt, Sir Henry Killigrew, a very gallant Gentleman, of a noble Extraction, and a fair Revenue of Land in Cornwall, and of excellent Parts and Courage; who dy'd of an accidental Wound given him by the Splinter of a Carrabine, to the mighty Affliction of the Lord Hopton, the Lord Capel, Sir Edward Hyde, and all the ſignal loyal Men in thoſe Parts, who infinitely lov'd his Spirit and Sincerity. Beſides theſe, there dy'd three other Perſons, eminent for their Worth and Learning, as Mr. Thomas Lydyat, Rector of Okerton in Oxfordſhire, a Perſon poor in Eſtate, and contemptible as to Stature and Figure, yet of a great Soul and incomparable Learning, as well Mathematicks and Antiquities, as Languages and Divinity; being a Match for the mighty Scaliger and Selden, admir'd by Archbiſhop Uſher, and the greateſt Scholars of the Age, and by the Foreign Vertuoſi rank'd with the Lord Bacon and Mr. Joſeph Mede, who reflected upon the Engliſh Nation for ſuffering ſuch learned Men to be ſo meanly rewarded. Next was Dr. Walter Raleigh, Dean of Wells, and Nephew to the famous Sir Walter Raleigh, a Divine of a very ſtrong Head, and an excellent Diſputant, whoſe fine Parts and genteel Behaviour gain'd him the Love and Eſteem of the three great Men of the Age, the Lord Falkland, Dr. Hammond, and Mr. Chillingworth: Being plunder'd and impriſon'd, he was this Year ſtabb'd by his Keeper, for refuſing to ſhew a Letter writ to his Wife, of which Wound he dy'd ſix Weeks after. Laſtly, Mr. John Gregory, of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, the Miracle of the Age for critical and curious Learning, who by his indefatigable Labours attain'd to a Maſterſhip in an incredible Number of Languages, in all Parts of Philoſophy and Mathematicks, in the Jewiſh Rabines, ancient Fathers, modern Criticks, &c. and being at laſt ſtripp'd of his Preferments, he dy'd very poor, in the thirty ninth Year of his Age. After all dy'd Sir Francis Windebank, of whom mention has been made more than once, who, together with his Father, had ſerv'd the Crown fourſcore Years; and being himſelf made Secretary of State by Biſhop Laud's Intereſt, he became highly obnoxious to the prevailing Powers for his great Indulgence to Romiſh Prieſts and Jeſuits; ſo that this unfortunate Stateſman became an Exile, and dy'd at Paris, ſome ſay in the Boſom of the Church of Rome.

CHAP. V.

The CAPTIVITY of the King:

From the Return of the Scots into their own Country, and the Concluſion of the War, to the Day of his Majeſty's Death.

Containing the Space of juſt two Years.

A Reflection upon the King's Condition.

I. 1. THE King's Government was now at an End; and we are arriv'd at the Fifth and Laſt Stage of his Life; conſiſting of a State of Captivity for two Years, which were ſpent in Variety of Priſons and Treaties, beſides the unheard-of Tryal which brought him to his Death: In which we may worthily obſerve not only the Fate of Himſelf, but of the firſt Promoters of the Rebellion, whether they were the innovating Lords and Gentry, or the Presbyterian Miniſters, or the Aſſembly of Divines, or the City of London, or the chief Perſons in Eſſex's Army; or even thoſe Servants of his own, who had been Spies upon him, and betray'd him while they were in his Service; and at laſt alſo the inſpired Seraphick Independent: And after his Death, how the Divine Judgment ran into Scotland and Ireland, and fell upon the Betrayers of their Maſter, and upon the Invaders of the Conſtitution of the Government in both thoſe Kingdoms; nay at laſt how it reach'd the Army it ſelf. And thus how all their ſeveral Treaſons and Infidelities brought upon them and their Party a viſible Diſappointment and Vengeance from Heaven, as fully appear'd in Proceſs of Time.

He is carry'd to Holmby.

His Confinement.

The King himſelf was now deliver'd into the ſole Power of the Parliament, and was receiv'd with the ſame Formality of Reſpect as he had been treated by the Scots; and with the ſame Strictneſs they reſtrain'd all Reſort of thoſe to him, who were of doubtful Affection to them, or their Cauſe. Commiſſioners formerly mention'd, and Servants were particularly appointed by them alone, to attend upon him, as they thought fit; among whom they preferr'd thoſe who had moſt faithfully adhered to them againſt their Maſter. And in this Diſtribution, the Presbyterian Party in the Houſes commanded with ſuch little Oppoſition, that they ſeem'd to govern all; the crafty Independents letting them enjoy that Belief of their Power, till they had totally clear'd the Kingdom of their Northern Friends. In this Manner, and with this Attendance, his Majeſty was conducted from Newcaſtle, being met in all Places by Multitudes of People, who brought their Sick to be touch'd by him, and attended with Acclamations of Joy and Prayers for his Preſervation, till he arriv'd at Holdenby, or Holmby-Houſe in Northamptonſhire; a very ſtately Houſe built by the Lord Chancellor Hatton, and in King James's Reign purchas'd by the Queen for her ſecond Son, then Duke of York, not then foreſeeing that he ſhou'd make it both a Royal Palace and Priſon. Here he was kept rather as their Priſoner, than their Prince, and was not allow'd the Attendance of his own Domeſtick Servants, or Chaplains, or the Liturgy of the Church; under all which he carry'd himſelf with an unconcern'd and Majeſtick Deportment, as being above Complaints or Bewailings, as he was pleas'd to expreſs himſelf to a Friend. Only the Want of his Chaplains was a ſenſible Concern to him; which occaſion'd him to write a Letter to the Houſe of Peers, in which he ſent the Names of thirteen, any two of which he deſir'd might have Liberty to attend him for his Devotion. To which, after a tedious Conſideration, they return'd this Anſwer, 'That 'all thoſe Chaplains were diſaffected to the preſent Go'vernment of the Church, and had not taken the Cove'nant; but there were others who had, who ſhou'd be 'ſent to him, if he pleas'd.' Upon which Anſwer, he reſolv'd to give them no further Trouble; but in his Divine Meditations he thus complains. If I had ask'd my Revenues, my Power of the Militia, or any one of my Kingdoms, it had been no Wonder to have been deny'd,------But to deny me the Ghoſtly Comfort of my Chaplains, ſeems a greater Rigour and Barbarity than is ever us'd by Chriſtians to the meaneſt Priſoners, and greateſt Malefactors.

His Courſe of Life at Holmby.

The King continu'd near four Months in this Retirement, with great Patience and Calmneſs, and ſingular good Humour towards all that were about him; and tho' he had from the Commiſſioners who attended him, a Reſpect which exceeded not his preſent Condition, yet he handſomly paſs'd it by; however he diſtinguiſh'd the Duty of Sir John Holland, Sir John Cook, and Major-General Brown from thoſe, who leſs obſerv'd him. And for their two Divines, Mr. Marſhal and Mr. Caryl, the King treated them very civilly, and convers'd with them freely, as private Men; but wou'd not allow them ſo much as to ſay Grace to him, ſince they refus'd to officiate to him by the Liturgy. Upon Sundays, when thoſe Miniſters preach'd in the Chappel, Forenoon and Afternoon by Turns, the King allow'd his Servants to go if they pleas'd; and carefully ſequeſter'd himſelf to his own private Devotion. On Week Days his Majeſty conſtantly ſpent two or three Hours in Prayer, and Reading; and wou'd after Meals play a Game at Cheſs, and often walk in the Gardens: And there being no Bowling-Green at Holmby, he wou'd ſometimes, under ſufficient Guard, ride to Harrowden and to Althrop, where were good Greens well kept. In going once to Harrowden, Major Boſvile, ſtanding on a Bridge diſguis'd like a labouring Man, gave his Majeſty a Packet from the Queen. The King told the Commiſſioners it was to obtain his Leave for the Prince to accompany Monſieur that Campaign in the French Army; upon which the Commiſſioners ſeem'd content to diſmiſs the Perſon in Diſguiſe; but notwithſtanding that, he was ſent up to the Parliament, and committed to Newgate. This Accident being reported to the two Houſes, they ſent down Orders to have a ſtricter Eye upon his Majeſty's Perſon, and to diſcharge thoſe Servants that were ſuſpected. The Commiſſioners ſoon ſhew'd theſe Inſtructions to the King, who with great Expoſtulation for the Severity of them, was forc'd to diſmiſs all his old Attendance, except Mr. James Maxwell and Mr. Patrick Mawl, Grooms of the Bed-Chamber, to whom the King was willing to join Mr. Thomas Herbert and Mr. Harrington. It was obſerv'd by the former of theſe two, that in all the Time of his Majeſty's Reſtraint and Solitude, he never was ſick, or ask'd for a Phyſician; which was attributed to his quiet Diſpoſition, and unparallel'd Patience, to his moderate Exerciſe, and more moderate Diet; eating but of a ſew Diſhes, and drinking but twice at Dinner or Supper, once of Small Beer, and once of Wine and Water mix'd, or after Fiſh of pure Wine; ſeldom or never eating or drinking before Dinner, or between Meals. Thus he continu'd with as much Sedateneſs, and perhaps with as much Innocence, as is conſiſtent with this State of Life.

2. On the latter End of April, the Commiſſioners at Holmby by Letters acquainted the Houſe of Commons with the great Reſort of People to his Majeſty, to be touch'd for the King's-Evil: Upon which the Houſe order'd a Declaration to be drawn up, to inform the People of the fond Superſtition of being touch'd by the King for the Evil; and renew'd their Orders for the ſtricter Cuſtody of his Perſon. Under this Reſtraint his Majeſty told the Commiſſioners about him, that he had long waited for Propoſitions from London, but not receiving them, he had now prepar'd an Anſwer to thoſe Propoſitions deliver'd at Newcaſtle, which, not being allow'd a Secretary, he muſt ſcribble over himſelf. His Majeſty ſent his Anſwer to the two Houſes about the middle of May; in which he conſented to ſome of the Propoſitions in whole, to others in part; and gave his Reaſons for his Diſſent to others. He declar'd, 'He was willing to have the Presbyterial Govern- ' ment ſettled for three Years; and conſented to ratify the ' Aſſembly of Divines, propoſing ſome other Miniſters to ' be join'd with them; the King and his Houſhold only ' having Liberty to uſe the Common-Prayer Book. As to ' the Militia, he wou'd yield it up for ten Years, provided ' it might then be reſtored to him and his Heirs. As to the ' Covenant, he cou'd not be ſatiſfy'd; but deſired ſome of ' his own Divines might be ſent to reſolve his Scruples ' therein. The Great Seal he wou'd ratify, if put into his ' own Diſpoſal. To the City of London he wou'd grant ' the Tower and all that is deſired. He wou'd conſent to ' the Bills againſt Popery; and wou'd paſs a general Act of ' Oblivion and Free Pardon on all Sides.' For all which Purpoſes his Majeſty deſir'd to come to his Parliament, and confer and agree with them. They gave no Anſwer to theſe; but often exclaim'd, That his Majeſty was averſe to Peace, and never yet accepted of any Tender, fit for them to make; nor offer any fit for them to receive: Their Preachers were ſtill taught to pray, That God wou'd incline the King's Heart, to comply with his Parliament; and they acted as tho' they had a ſure and laſting Poſſeſſion of his Majeſty's Perſon.

His Conceſſions to the Parliament.

The Behaviour of the Independents, and the Army.

But their Dominion was neither great nor laſting; the main they cou'd effect was, to diſtribute large Donatives among their Members and Friends, which they did to the Sum of about ninety thouſand Pounds, in Conſideration of their ſeveral Services. The greater Number being Presbyterians, they began to graſp at the whole Power, and to give Orders for the leſſening their great Charge by disbanding ſome Troops of their Army, and ſending others for Ireland, to reduce that Kingdom; and declar'd, 'That they ' wou'd then disband all Armies, that all might be go- ' vern'd by the known Laws of the Land.' But this rais'd a new and ungovernable Spirit in the Army; which neither lik'd the Presbyterian Government, nor that the Parliament ſhou'd abſolutely diſpoſe of them, who had help'd them to all their Power and Grandeur; and Cromwell had ſuch an Influence, as to cauſe them to petition againſt any thing done contrary to his Opinion. He himſelf, and his Officers, aſſum'd the Office of Preaching and Praying publickly to their Troops; admitted of ſcarce any Chaplains in the Army, but ſuch as exclaim'd againſt Presbytery, as more Tyrannical than Epiſcopacy; and the Common Soldiers alſo did not only pray and preach among themſelves, but did the ſame in all Churches to the People, who ſoon became inſpired with the ſame Spirit. Women alſo undertook the ſame Office, and ſuch Confuſions there were in Religious Matters, that ſcarce any were ſuffer'd to be call'd in Queſtion for delivering any Opinion, how profane, heretical, or blaſphemous ſoever it was; which they ſaid, was to reſtrain the Spirit. Liberty of Conſcience was now the common Argument and Quarrel, while the Presbyterians proceeded with equal Virulence againſt the ſeveral Sects, as Enemies to all Godlineſs, as they had done againſt the Prelatical Party; and finding themſelves ſuperior in the two Houſes, they cou'd not doubt, but by their Authority and Power to be able to reform the Army, and to new model it as they pleas'd.

But the Army, that they might more effectually enter into Diſpute and Competition with them, and ſhare with them in the ſettling of the Kingdom, erected a kind of a Parliament among Themſelves. After they had defeated the King's Party, and left no Enemy to contend with them, in the Field, and after they had purg'd off all thoſe inconvenient Officers who wou'd not intirely ſubmit to their Dictates, they in Effect ſet aſide their Self-Denying Ordinance, and procured their principal Officers, and other of their ſure Friends, to be elected Members of the Houſe of Commons, in the Places of thoſe that were dead, or expell'd for adhering to the King. By which Means Fairfax himſelf, Ireton, Harriſon, and many other of the Independents, Officers and Gentlemen, who were tranſported with Enthuſiaſtical Fancies, and now call'd by a new Name Fanaticks, ſat in the Houſe of Commons; notwithſtanding all which, the Presbyterians ſtill carry'd it. But that they might ſtill be upon a nearer Level with the Parliament, the Army made Choice of a ſet Number of Officers, which they call'd The General's Council of Officers; and the Common Soldiers made Choice of three or four of each Regiment, moſtly Corporals and Serjeants, who were call'd by the Name of Agitators, and were to be as a Houſe of Commons to the Council of Officers. Theſe two Repreſentatives ſeverally met, and conſider'd of all the Parliament's Orders and Acts towards ſettling the Kingdom, or towards managing of the Army; and upon mutual Meſſages and Conferences, they firſt Reſolv'd and Declar'd, 'That they wou'd ' neither be divided, nor disbanded, till their full Arrears ' were paid, and full Proviſion made for Liberty of Con- ' ſcience, the Want of which had caus'd the Loſs of ſo ' many of their Friends Lives, and the Blood of their own ' Bodies; and that hitherto there was ſo little done in that ' Point, that there was a greater Perſecution againſt Reli- ' gious and Godly Men, than ever had been when the Bi- ' ſhops were Judges. They farther alledg'd, that they did ' not look upon themſelves as a Band of Janizaries, hired ' only to fight their Battles, but as Volunteers for the Li- ' berty and Defence of the Nation, of which they were a ' Part; and before they laid down their Arms, they wou'd ' ſee thoſe Ends ſo well ſecur'd, that the People might not ' again meet with thoſe Grievances they formerly ſuffer'd. ' They complain'd that ſome Members of the Army had ' been ſent for by the Parliament, and committed to Priſon, ' which was againſt their Privilege, ſince all Soldiers ought ' to be try'd by a Council of War, and not by any other ' Judicatory; and therefore they deſir'd that ſuch as were ' in any Cuſtody, might be forthwith ſet at Liberty; with- ' out which they cou'd not think Themſelves juſtly dealt ' with:' And with this Declaration and Addreſs, they ſent three Agitators to the Houſe of Commons, who deliver'd it at the Bar with unuſual Confidence; and when ſome Queſtions were put to them by the Speaker, They ſaid, They were employ'd by the Army, and cou'd not anſwer any Thing, without Leave from thence. At which the Houſe ſhew'd great Reſentments, and ſome menacing Expreſſions; which occaſion'd Cromwell to whiſper Ludlow in the Ear, That theſe Men will never leave, till the Army pull them out by the Ears. Not long before he ſaid to the ſame Perſon, That it was a miſerable Thing to ſerve a Parliament, to whom let a Man be never ſo faithful, if one pragmatical Fellow among them riſe up and aſperſe him, he ſhall never wipe it off: But when one ſerves under a General, he may do as much Service, and yet be free from all Blame and Envy.

They ſet up Agitators.

They make a Declaration,

And a Vindication.

The Soldiers publiſh'd a Vindication of their Proceedings and Reſolutions, and directed it to their General; in which they complain'd of a Deſign to disband and new model the Army, which they declar'd 'To be a Plot contriv'd by ' ſome Men who had lately taſted of Sovereignty, who be- ' ing elevated above Servants, endeavour'd to become Ma- ' ſters, and were degenerated into Tyrants:' And farther declar'd, 'That they wou'd neither be employ'd in Ireland, ' nor be disbanded, till their Deſires were granted, and the ' Rights and Liberties of the Subjects vindicated and main- ' tain'd.' This Vindication being Sign'd by many inferior Officers, the Parliament declar'd them 'To be Enemies ' of the State;' and caus'd the moſt Turbulent of them to be impriſon'd. This produc'd a new Addreſs to their General; in which they loudly exclaim'd againſt 'the diſdain- ' ful Uſage they receiv'd from the Parliament, for whom ' they had ventur'd their Lives, and loſt their Blood:' Expoſtulating, 'That the Privileges which were due to Them, ' as Soldiers and Subjects, were taken from them; and ' when they complain'd of Injuries, they were abus'd, bea- ' ten, and dragg'd into Goals.' The General likewiſe was prevail'd upon to write a Letter to a Member of Parliament, and to be ſhewn to the Houſe; in which he took Notice of ſeveral Petitions, prepar'd in London and ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom, againſt the Army; and particularly, 'That it was look'd upon as very ſtrange, that the Officers ' of the Army might not be permitted to petition, when ſo ' many Petitions were receiv'd againſt them; and that he ' much doubted that the Army might draw to a Rendez- ' vous, and think of ſome other Way for their own Vindi- ' cation.

3. The Difference and Emulation which at this Time aroſe between the very Conquerors, who had ended the War, ſhew'd that the Nation was far from Peace: And this manner of Proceeding by the Soldiers, but eſpecially the ſeeming Concurrence of the General, prov'd extreamly uneaſy to the Parliament; who yet reſolv'd not to ſuffer their Counſels to be cenſur'd, or their Actions controll'd, by thoſe who liv'd upon their Pay. And therefore after many high Expreſſions againſt the Preſumption of ſeveral Officers and Soldiers, they declar'd 'That whoſoever ſhou'd refuſe, after Command, to engage himſelf in the Service of Ireland, ſhou'd be disbanded.' But the Army reſolv'd not to be repell'd from their firſt declar'd Reſolution, and ſo fell into an open Mutiny, and furiouſly call'd for their Arrears of Pay, which, they ſaid, 'They knew how to levy for Themſelves.' They were not the leaſt appeas'd, till the Parliament's Declaration againſt them was raſed out of the Journal Book of both Houſes, and a Month's Pay ſent to them; nor were they ſatisfy'd with this Condeſcenſion, but loudly declar'd, They knew how to make themſelves as conſiderable as the Parliament, and where to have their Service better rewarded; which ſo terrify'd the two Houſes, that they appointed a Committee of Lords and Commons, of which ſome were very acceptable to the Army, to go and treat with another Committee of the Officers of the Army, upon the beſt Expedients for the Compoſing theſe new Diſtempers. So that now the Army judg'd it ſelf upon a Level with the Parliament, as having a Committee of the One authoriz'd to treat with a Committee of the Other; which likewiſe elevated Fairfax Himſelf, who had never thought of diſobeying the Parliament, and diſpos'd him more to incline to the impetuous Humour of the Army, when he ſaw ſo general a Compliance and Submiſſion to it. Here Hollis violently exclaims againſt the Inſolence of the Army, and the Cowardice of the Parliament; not remembring that He himſelf had formerly too much encourag'd the like Practices, the awing of the Parliament by a City Rabble, tho' not by a ſtanding Army.

They bring themſelves upon a level with the Parliament.

Cromwell's Diſſimulation.

Cromwell hitherto had ſo well exerted his Talent of Diſſimulation, that he ſeem'd highly incens'd againſt this Inſolence of the Soldiers; was ſtill in the Houſe of Commons when thoſe Addreſſes were made, cry'd out againſt their Preſumption, and had been the Cauſe of the Commitment of ſome of them. He propos'd to have the General ſent to the Army, Who, he ſaid, wou'd ſoon conjure down this mutinous Spirit; and was ſo eaſily believ'd, that he Himſelf was ſent once or twice to compoſe the Army; where after a ſhort Stay, he wou'd again return to the Houſe, and heavily complain of the great Licence got into the Army, That for his own Part, by the Artifice of his Enemies, and ſuch as thirſted after Blood, he was render'd ſo odious to them, that they had deſign'd to kill him, if he had not happily eſcap'd out of their Hands. And in theſe and the like Topicks, when he ſpoke of the Nation's being to be involv'd in new Miſeries, he wou'd weep plentifully, and appear the moſt diſconſolate of Men, at the very Proſpect of the enſuing Calamities. But as many of the wiſer ſort had long ſeen into his dark Intentions, ſo his Hypocriſy cou'd not always be conceal'd; for the moſt active Officers and Agitators were known to be his Creatures, and to ſtand and move according to his Directions. So that it was privately reſolv'd by the chief of the Houſe of Commons, that when he came the next Day to the Houſe, they wou'd ſend him to the Tower; preſuming that if he was once parted from the Army, they ſhou'd eaſily reduce it to its former Temper and Obedience: For they had not the leaſt Jealouſy of Fairfax their General, whom they knew to be Presbyterian in his Judgment; and that Cromwell had gain'd the Aſcendant over him purely by his Diſſimulation, and his Pretence of Conſcience and Sincerity.

He countermines his Oppoſers.

This well-form'd Deſign was not ſo ſecretly manag'd, but Cromwell had Notice of it; and the very next Morning after he had lamented his Misfortune of being ſo much in Danger from the Army, when the Houſe impatiently expected his Preſence, they were inform'd that he was met out of Town by break of Day, with only one Servant, on the Way to the Army, where he had appointed a Rendezvous of ſome Regiments of Horſe: From whence he artfully wrote to the Houſe of Commons, 'That having the Night before receiv'd a Letter from ſome Officers of his own Regiment, That the Jealouſy and Hatred of the Troops againſt him was ſo much abated, that if he was quickly preſent with them, they wou'd in a ſhort Time by his Advice be reclaim'd, upon which he had made all the Haſte he cou'd; and did now find that the Soldiers had been abus'd by Miſinformation, and he hop'd to diſcover the bottom of the Deſign: And in the mean Time he deſir'd That the General, and the other Officers in the Houſe, with ſuch as were about the Town, might be immediately ſent to their Quarters, in Order to the Suppreſſion of the late Diſtempers, and for the Prevention of future Miſchiefs: That there might be a general Rendezvous of the Army; of which the General wou'd beſt conſider, when he came down.' They now found it to no Effect to diſcover their former Deſign, or that they had any Jealouſy of a Perſon who was out of their Power, but waited for a better Conjuncture: And in a few Days after, the General and the other Officers left the Town, and repair'd to their Quarters.

The Boldneſs of the Independents.

4. At this Time the grand Struggle between the Presbyterians and Independents came to a Criſis; and the Latter, reſolving to make a bold Puſh for Superiority, by Cromwell's ſecret Contrivance, order'd one of their Agitators, Cornet Joyce a Taylor, to go with a ſelect Squadron of Horſe, and ſeize upon the King's Perſon at Holmby, and bring him to the Army. This ſtrange Attempt was manag'd with the utmoſt Privacy; and on the fourth of June about Midnight, the Cornet unexpectedly drew up his Horſe before the King's Lodgings, and demanded Entrance. Colonel Graves and Major-General Brown, who upon this Allarm immediately doubled the Guards, ask'd him his Name and Buſineſs. He told him his Name was Joyce, a Cornet in Colonel Whaley's Regiment, and his Buſineſs was to ſpeak with the King. Being ask'd from whom, he ſaid directly from my Self, my Errand is to the King, I muſt and will ſpeak with him. Graves and Brown bid the Soldiers within to ſtand to their Arms, and be ready to fire at the Word given; but they finding them to be their Fellow-Soldiers of the ſame Army, open'd the Gates, and receiv'd them as old Friends. Joyce ſet his Centinels at the Chamber Doors of the Commiſſioners; and by the back Stairs went himſelf directly to the King's Bed-Chamber, and knock'd at the Door with a Piſtol cock'd in his Hand. The four Grooms were amaz'd at this Rudeneſs, and deſir'd Joyce to lay aſide his Arms, and to forbear giving Diſturbance, aſſuring him, That the next Morning he ſhou'd have his Majeſty's Anſwer to his Errand. The Cornet with Sword and Piſtol inſiſted to have the Door open'd, with ſo much Noiſe, that it wak'd the King, who mildly ſent him Word, He wou'd not riſe to ſpeak with him till the Morning; upon which the Cornet huff'd, but retired for a few Hours.

The King roſe early in the Morning, and after his Devotions, ſent for Joyce, who enter'd with great Confidence, and told his Majeſty He had Commands to remove him to the Army. The King deſir'd the Commiſſioners might be ſent for; but Joyce told him The Commiſſioners had nothing to do, but to return back to the Parliament. The King demanded by whoſe Appointment? but receiving no Anſwer, deſir'd that they might have their Liberty, and ask'd for a Sight of his Inſtructions. Joyce ſaid he ſhou'd ſee them preſently; and ſo drawing up his Troop in the Inner Court, Theſe, Sir, ſaid the Cornet, are my Inſtructions. The King taking a View of them, and finding them tall Men, well mounted and arm'd, ſmilingly told the Cornet, His Inſtructions were in fair Characters, legible without Spelling. The Cornet then preſs'd his Majeſty to go along with him, no Prejudice being intended, but rather Satisfaction; but He told him, he wou'd not ſtir, unleſs the Commiſſioners went along with them; to which the other reply'd, for his Part he was indifferent in that Matter. The Commiſſioners ask'd ſeveral Queſtions of Joyce, as Whether he had any Orders from the Parliament, and Whether he was ſent by the General; to which he anſwer'd in the Negative. So at laſt, at the King's Deſire, the Keepers of his Perſon, being now Themſelves made Priſoners, went along with Him, being very much dejected and afflicted; while his Majeſty, who at firſt was very apprehenſive, appear'd the leaſt concern'd in the Company. He had ſufficiently felt the unrelenting Power and Stiffneſs of the Presbyterian Party, and was not without Hopes of Relief from, or rather had too much Confidence in, the oppoſite Intereſt of the Independents, and the Army, who now became his Maſters.

They ſeize upon the King's Perſon.

A Reflection upon the great Turn of Affairs.

This Moment gave a ſudden and wonderful Turn, which put an irrecoverable Period to the over-ruling Authority of the Presbyterians; a Party, who after the Redreſs of all Grievances, had from both Nations embroyl'd England firſt into Tumults, and then to a deſtructive War; in which more noble Houſes were plunder'd and demoliſh'd, more Churches ſacrilegiouſly profan'd and ſpoil'd, and more Blood ſpilt like Water, within the Space of four Years, than had hapned in the long Wars between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter. A Party that had been victorious in all Reſpects againſt the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Power, againſt Monarchy and Epiſcopacy, againſt the King's Armies and his Perſon: And yet after all their Triumphs, their Spoil and publick Ruin, they purchas'd to themſelves nothing but Misfortune and Infamy, and loſt a Power and Intereſt that never cou'd be recover'd to this Day. Scots who had an unreaſonable Share in the Places and Preferments, and likewiſe in the illegal Patents and Monopolies of the Kingdom, now loſt all their Profits and their Hopes, and liv'd to ſee their Idol Covenant deſpis'd and trampled upon. The Engliſh Puritans, who had driven out the greateſt Part of the Regular Clergy, and in Imagination devour'd the Church Lands by parcelling them into Augmentations, were defeated by the Sale of them for the Payment of the publick Debts; nor did they ever ſee their dear Presbytery ſetled, or their Lay-Elders fix'd in any one Pariſh in the Kingdom. Nor did it ſucceed better with the great Politicians of the Popular Party, who employ'd the Presbyterians as their Tools to work out a new and unheard-of Common-Wealth; the Honours and Offices of which, they had diſtributed among Themſelves and their Friends. But having, by other Hands, brought the King to the End they aim'd at, and now dividing the rich Prey among themſelves, obliging each other with large Sums of Mony, growing fat with Crown and Church Revenues, and guarded as they imagin'd with invincible Armies, they were ſuddenly ſcatter'd like Duſt before the Wind, turn'd out of all, and expos'd to publick Contempt and Scorn. And what was wonderful, and like the peculiar Hand of Heaven, all this was done ſo eaſily, and with ſo little Noiſe, that the Loſs of that exorbitant Power did not coſt ſo much as a broken Head, or a bloody Noſe; in purchaſing of which they had waſted ſo many Millions of Treaſure, and pour'd out ſuch Oceans of Blood.

The King remov'd to Hinchingbrook,

II. 1. The King being now in Effect under the Power of the Army, and not without Hopes of a more agreeable Treatment, freely follow'd his Guide the confident Cornet, and arriv'd that Night at Hinchingbrook by Huntingdon, the Houſe of Colonel Edward Mountague; where his Majeſty, as well as the Commiſſioners, was treated with Honour and Satisfaction. At the ſame Time Fairfax the General diſpatch'd Colonel Whaley with two Regiments of Horſe, who acquainted his Majeſty, ‘ He was ſent by the General ‘ to let him know how much he was concern'd at thoſe ‘ great Inſolencies that had been committed ſo near his ‘ Perſon; and as he had not the leaſt Knowledge of them ‘ before they were done, ſo he had omitted no Time in endeavouring to remove that Force, which he had Orders ‘ from him to ſee done:’ And therefore deſir'd his Majeſty, ‘ That he would be pleas'd to return again to Holmby, ‘ where all Things ſhould be ſettled again in as much Order and Quietneſs as they were before.’ He likewiſe deſir'd the Commiſſioners to reaſſume their Charge, as the Parliament had directed them, which he ſaid was alſo the Deſire of the General. But the King refus'd to return, and the Commiſſioners to act; upon which Whaley declar'd, ‘ He had an expreſs Command to ſee all Things well ſettled ‘ again about his Majeſty; which could not be done but by ‘ his returning again to Holmby.’ The King ſaid poſitively He would not do it; ſo the Colonel deſiſted from preſſing him any farther. Cornet Joyce being told that the General was diſpleas'd with him for bringing the King from Holmby, he anſwer'd, That Lieutenant-General Cromwell had given him Orders at London to do all that he had done.

To Childerly,

From Hinchingbrook the King went next Day to Childerly, a Houſe of Sir John Cutts, about four Miles from Cambridge; where during his Majeſty's three Days Stay, many Maſters, Fellows and Scholars of that Univerſity repair'd, to moſt of which the King was graciouſly pleas'd to give his Hand to kiſs; for which Honour they return'd their humbleſt Thanks of Congratulation. To that Place alſo came General Fairfax, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, Commiſſary-General Ireton, Major-General Skippon, Lieutenant-General Hammond, Colonel Lambert, Colonel Rich, and ſeveral other Field and Commiſſion Officers, as alſo ſeveral of their Chaplains, Peters, Dell, Sedgewick, and others; ſeveral of which kiſs'd his Majeſty's Hand with great Reſpect. The King put the Queſtion to Fairfax and Cromwell, whether it was by their, or either of their Authority that he was thus brought from Holmby; and they both diſowning it, he reply'd, That unleſs you hang up Joyce, I will not believe what you ſay. Both Fairfax and Cromwell made large Profeſſions of their Fidelity to Him; but the former urg'd the Commiſſioners to act according to the Power given them by the Parliament, which they alſo refus'd to do. This General conferr'd with his Majeſty in private, and in a particular manner offer'd him his Service; but as he took his Leave of him, the King ſaid, Sir, I have as good Intereſt in the Army as you. Which Anſwer, the General ſaid, was more ſhocking, and gave him more Grief and Vexation, than all the Troubles and Fatigues he had met withal in the whole War; as a Kinſman of His has often told Me, having had it from the General's Mouth.

(where Fairfax and Cromwell careſs him)

He ſeem'd now to be ſenſible of his declining Authority; and when he call'd for a Council of War to proceed againſt Joyce for this high Offence, he found ſuch a Spirit in the Army, as render'd his Endeavours ineffectual. This proceeded from the increaſing Power and Influence of Cromwell, who now promis'd his Majeſty, That if he and his Party would ſit ſtill, and neither act or declare againſt the Army, they would reſtore him, and make him the moſt glorious Prince in Chriſtendom. Yet privately among his Friends he bragg'd, That now he had got the King into his Hands, he had the Parliament in his Pocket. As to Fairfax, he by the firſt Opportunity wrote a plauſible Letter to the two Houſes, by which he inform'd them, ‘ That the ‘ Soldiers at Holmby had brought the King from thence; ‘ and that his Majeſty lay the next Night at Colonel Mountague's Houſe, and would be the next Day at New-Market: That the Ground of all this, was from an Apprehenſion of ſome Strength gather'd to force the King from ‘ thence; whereupon he had ſent Colonel Whaley's Regiment to meet the King. He proteſted, that his Remove ‘ was without his Conſent, or of the Officers about him, ‘ or of the Body of the Army, and without their Deſire or ‘ Privity: That he would take care for the Security of ‘ his Majeſty's Perſon from Danger; and aſſur'd them, that ‘ the whole Army endeavour'd Peace; and were far from ‘ oppoſing Presbytery, or affecting Independency, or from ‘ any Purpoſe of maintaining a Licentious Freedom in Religion, or the Intereſt of any particular Party, but were ‘ reſolv'd to leave the abſolute Determination of all to the ‘ Parliament.

And ſo to New-Market, where he has great Liberty.

The King, immediately after, remov'd from Childerly to a ſmall Houſe of his own at New-Market, where he was ſuffer'd to divert himſelf as he pleas'd upon the Heath, ſometimes in his Coach, but oftner on Horſe-Back. Great Numbers of the Gentry and others repair'd from moſt Parts of Cambridgeſhire, Suffolk and Eſſex, and other Neighbouring Counties, to ſee his Majeſty; ſo that the Preſence-Chamber was conſtantly throng'd with People, eſpecially at Dinner and Supper; who when they ſaw the King withdraw, ever ſent out their Prayers and loud Acclamations. The King was highly ſatisfy'd with the Appearance of ſo many Friends, and well pleas'd with the Civilities and Reſpect ſhewn him by the Officers of the Army, who gave him great Hopes and Promiſes of his Reſtoration. Cromwell was more than ordinary Civil, and as an Earneſt of his Intentions, preſently gave Leave that ſeveral of the King's faithful Servants and Chaplains ſhould have Liberty to come to him, and ſerve him in their reſpective Places: All which had been deny'd him, not only by the Scots, when he had fled to them from Oxford, but alſo by the Parliament when they had confin'd him at Holmby: And accordingly four of his Chaplains, Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Morley, Dr. Sanderſon, and Dr. Hammond, with divers of his Servants, appear'd, and gave their Attendance, without any Reſtraint. Many old Officers that had ſerv'd the King were civilly receiv'd by the Army, and liv'd quietly in their Quarters; all which rais'd a great Reputation to the Army, and caſt as much Reproach upon the Parliament.

The Parliament in a Conſternation.

2. During theſe Tranſactions, the Parliament receiv'd the News of the King's Removal from Holmby with the utmoſt Conſternation; and they who had deſpis'd all Oppoſition, now found all their Meaſures broke by which they had form'd their deep Counſels. And as the Letter from the General gave too much Cauſe of Jealouſy of what was to ſucceed, ſo a poſitive Information about the ſame Time by many Officers, confirm'd by a Letter to the Lord-Mayor, ‘ That the whole Army was upon its March, ‘ and would be in London the next Day by Noon,’ ſo confounded and diſtracted them, that they appear'd beſides Themſelves. However they voted, ‘ That the Houſes ‘ ſhould ſit all the next Day, being Sunday; and that Mr. ‘ Marſhall ſhould pray, That God would be pleas'd to give ‘ them one Heart and Mind, in carrying on the great Work ‘ of the Lord: That the Committee of Safety ſhould ſit ‘ up all Night to conſider what was to be done: That the ‘ Lines of Communication ſhould be ſtrongly guarded, ‘ and all the Train-Bands of London drawn together upon ‘ pain of Death.’ All Shops were ſhut up, and ſuch a general Terror and Confuſion appear'd in the Faces of all Men, as if the Army had already enter'd the City. The Parliament writ a Letter to the General, deſiring him, ‘ That no Part of his Army might come within five and ‘ twenty Miles of London; and that the King's Perſon ‘ might be deliver'd to the former Commiſſioners, that had ‘ attended at Holmby; and that Colonel Roſſiter, and his ‘ Regiment, might be appointed for the Guard of his Perſon:’ Together with which they ſent ten thouſand Pounds to the Army. The General return'd Anſwer, ‘ That the Army was come to St. Albans before this Deſire of the Parliament came to his Hands; but that, in ‘ Obedience to their Commands, he would advance no farther; and deſir'd that a Month's Pay might be immediately ſent for the Army.’ In which they made all Haſte to gratify them; tho' as to the Delivery of the King to the former Commiſſioners, no other Anſwer was return'd, than, ‘ That they might reſt aſſur’d, that all Care ſhould ‘ be taken for his Majeſty’s Security.’ In theſe Matters Cromwell ſtill carry’d himſelf with that Niceneſs and appearing Fidelity, that ſome of the Commons thought ſo well of his Services, that they declar’d, He deſerv’d to have a Statue in Gold: Yet at the ſame Time He and Ireton were concern’d in all the Meſſages and Declarations of the Army.

Their Declaration,

And Addreſs to the King.

The Parliament having recover’d its Spirits, by the Army’s not advancing, the Leaders began to proceed with Vigour againſt the principal Officers who contriv’d all theſe Proceedings: And they publiſh’d Declarations to the Kingdom, ‘ That they deſir’d to bring the King in Honour to ‘ his Parliament, as they deſign’d from the Beginning; and ‘ that he was detain’d Priſoner againſt his Will in the Ar‘ my, and that they had reaſon to apprehend the Safety of his ‘ Perſon.’ On the other Side, the Army declar’d, ‘ That ‘ his Majeſty was neither Priſoner, nor detain’d againſt his ‘ Will; and appeal’d to the King Himſelf, and all his ‘ Friends, who daily convers’d with him, Whether he had ‘ not more Liberty, and more Reſpect ſhewn him, ſince he ‘ came to the Army, than ever he had under their Juriſ‘ diction at Holmby.’ The Citizens ſeem’d very zealous for the Parliament, and were raiſing new Forces for their Defence; but their Preparations were tumultuous and full of Diſtraction, as is uſual in unexpected Occurrences. And now the Diſſentions between the Presbyterians and Independents growing to a Height, they attack’d each other with the ſame Method and Arts, with which they had formerly tormented the King: Petitions were ſuborn’d on both Sides, and nothing more frequent than tumultuous Reſorts to the Parliament Doors: And it is obſervable that none did ſo much fear, or more condemn theſe ſeditious Concourſes, than thoſe who had formerly blown up and fomented the like againſt the King. The Houſes dreaded nothing ſo much, as that the Army ſhould unite with the King and his Party; and therefore they ſent a Committee to his Majeſty, with an Addreſs of another Style than they had lately us’d, in which they made many Profeſſions of Duty, and declar’d, ‘ That if his Majeſty was not in all ‘ Reſpects treated as he ought to be, and as he deſired, it ‘ was not their Fault, who deſir’d he might be at full Li‘ berty, and do what he would;’ hoping that the King would have been induc’d to move for his coming to London, and to complain of the Army’s detaining of him. In all this Matter the King behav’d himſelf with great Caution between both Parties; and tho’ he knew himſelf to be a real Priſoner, how kindly ſoever he was treated, yet he would not complain of his Uſage: But deſir’d, ‘ That both Par‘ ties would haſten their Conſultations, that the Kingdom ‘ might enjoy Peace and Happineſs, in which he ſhould ‘ not be without a Share; and he would pray to God to ‘ bring it to paſs as ſoon as poſſible.

The Repreſentation of the Army.

When the Parliament found that the King would not move to be out of the Hands of the Army, they voted for his coming to his Houſe at Richmond. But in Anſwer to this Vote the Army deſir’d, ‘ That no Place might be ‘ propos’d for his Majeſty’s Reſidence nearer to London, ‘ than where they would allow the Quarters of the Army.’ And ſhortly after, on the 21ſt of June, a formidable Paper was ſent to the two Houſes, intituled, The Repreſentation of the Army, in which, after a ſpecial Declaration of their real Intentions for the Good and Safety of the Kingdom, &c. they laid down ſeveral Propoſitions, grounded upon theſe poſitive Articles: ‘ That the Houſes might be ‘ ſpeedily purged of ſuch as ought not to ſit there: That ‘ ſuch as abuſed the Parliament and Army, and endanger’d ‘ the Kingdom, may be ſpeedily diſabled from doing the ‘ like or worſe; That ſome determinate Period of Time ‘ might be ſet to this and future Parliaments, according to ‘ the Intent of the Bill for Triennial Parliaments; That the ‘ Parliaments may not be adjournable or diſſolvable by any ‘ Power, but by their own Conſent during their reſpective ‘ Period, and then to determine Themſelves; That the ‘ Freedom of the People to preſent Grievances by Peti‘ tion to Parliaments, may be vindicated; That the exorbi‘ tant Power of Country Committees may be taken away; ‘ That the Kingdom may be ſatisfy’d in the Parliament’s ‘ Accounts for their vaſt Sums receiv’d, and in divers other ‘ Things in which the Common-wealth has been abuſed; ‘ That after Delinquents have paid their Compoſitions, an ‘ Act of Indemnity might be paſs’d.’ This unexpected Preſumption put the Presbyterian Party upon ſummoning and collecting all their Powers, and to try the Experiment of one ſtrong Blaſt: Whereupon they voted, That the Army ſhould remove forty Miles from London.

This couragious Vote made but little Impreſſion; for they had reſolv’d upon greater Deſigns, and to free themſelves from the Servitude of the Parliament. They had no Apprehenſions from the Houſe of Peers, which ſince the Earl of Eſſex’s Death ſunk both in Number and Credit. They found that the Houſe of Commons was now govern’d by ten or twelve Members, as Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Maynard, Sir John Clotworthy, and Mr. Recorder Glyn, who had been very popular and active from the very Beginning; and by Sir William Waller, Major-General Maſſey, Colonel Long, Colonel Harley, and Mr. Nichols, of which, four had perform’d great Service in the Army under the Earl of Eſſex. Theſe were Men of Parts, Intereſt, and ſignal Courage, who formerly had rais’d ſuch Storms againſt the King and his Party, and were now levelling their Forces againſt Cromwell and the Army, whoſe Riſe was firſt owing to the Influence and Power of them, and others that were deceas’d. They declar’d their Animoſities againſt the Perſons of the moſt conſiderable Officers; as Hollis, once upon a hot Debate in the Houſe, and ſome rude Expreſſions from Ireton, had perſwaded him out of the Houſe, and challeng’d him to croſs the Water and fight him: Ireton replying, His Conſcience would not ſuffer him to fight a Duel; the other, in a Fury, pull’d him by the Noſe, and told him, If his Conſcience kept him from giving Men Satisfaction, it ſhould keep him from provoking them. This Affront to the third Perſon of the Army, and of the moſt violent and revengeful Temper of the whole Party, ſo incens’d them all, that they reſolv’d to be freed from Him, and the reſt of the Leaders that had ſo long commanded the Houſe of Commons.

Their Deſign againſt the chief of the Commons.

They Impeach Eleven Members, who, upon that, retire.

They had therefore Recourſe to an Expedient, which, they had obſerv’d by the Conduct of theſe very Leaders, had been ſucceſsful in all that they deſir’d; and in a General Council of Officers prepar’d an Impeachment of High Treaſon in general Terms againſt Mr. Hollis and the foremention’d Perſons, to the Number of eleven Members of the Houſe of Commons. This Impeachment was preſented to the Houſe by four Colonels, Scroop, Okey, Hewſon and Pride, two Lieutenant-Colonels, Bowen and Goffe, Major Deſborough, and five Captains, Berry, Clarke, Carter, Rolph and Sexby: And within a few Days after, when they ſaw the ſame Members ſtill arraign their Proceedings, the General and Officers wrote to the Houſe, ‘ That they wou’d appoint fit Perſons to make good the ‘ Charge againſt the Members they had accuſed; and that ‘ they deſired that thoſe Impeach’d Members might be ‘ forthwith ſuſpended from ſitting in the Houſe; ſince it ‘ cou’d not be thought fit that the ſame Perſons who ‘ had ſo much injured the Army, ſhou’d ſit Judges of ‘ their own Actions.’ This was extreamly ſhocking to the Commons; and tho’ they were inexpreſſibly terrify’d with this Preſumption, they poſitively anſwer’d, ‘ That by ‘ Law no Judgment cou’d be given to ſuſpend thoſe Mem‘ bers, till Proof were made of ſuch Particulars as might ‘ render them guilty.’ To this the Officers of the Army ſharply retorted upon them, ‘ That they cou’d prove them ‘ guilty of ſuch Practices, that it wou’d be juſt in the ‘ Houſe to ſuſpend them: That by the Laws of the Land, ‘ and the Precedents of Parliament, in the Caſes of the ‘ Earl of Strafford, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the ‘ Lord-Keeper Finch, they might be ſuſpended the Houſe ‘ upon a General Accuſation: Therefore they muſt ſtill ‘ inſiſt upon their Suſpenſion at leaſt; without which they ‘ ſaid the Army wou’d not be ſatisfy’d.’ How reſolute ſoever the Houſe of Commons ſeem’d, the accuſed Members themſelves, who beſt knew the Soldiers Temper, thought it ſafeſt for them to retire, and by forbearing to appear in the Houſe, to allay the Heat and Fury of the preſent Conteſt. This was a mighty Blow to the Presbyterian Party; for it loſt them not only theſe leading Men, but a far greater Number that ſtaid; ſome falling from them under Colour of Clearer Illumination; and ſome others were ſo diſmay’d, that they loſt all their former Courage: But upon the Retiring of theſe Eleven Members, their Charge was no further proſecuted.

The Popularity of the Independents.

3. The Independents having gain’d this Point, they daily got more into the Eſteem of the People, who now more freely made Complaints of their Preſſures and Grievances, and began to make Addreſſes to the Army as their only Saviours; Reſtorers of their Laws, Liberties and Properties; Settlers of Religion, and Preſervers of all juſt Intereſts: They having from the Preſs and the Pulpit pretended ‘ to eſtabliſh the King in his juſt Rights and Prero‘ gatives; to uphold the Privilege of Parliament; to re‘ form and bring to Account all Committees, Sequeſtrators ‘ and Others, who had defiled their Fingers with the ‘ Publick Monies; and to free the People from Exciſe, and ‘ other Taxes and Oppreſſions.’ As to London itſelf, tho’ the City ſeem’d to be wholly Presbyterian, yet Cromwell and Ireton well knew that the common Multitude were at their Diſpoſal, and wou’d appear upon any Occaſion; and that many Aldermen and ſubſtantial Citizens reſted without oppoſing the Presbyterians, only by their Directions, and wou'd be ready upon their Call. And now when they ſaw theſe Leaders purg'd out of the Houſe, great Numbers of the moſt inferior People tumultuouſly flock'd to the Parliament with Petitions of ſeveral Natures, relating both to Religion and the Civil Government; with the Noiſe and Clamour of which the Parliament was ſo offended, that they made an Ordinance, ‘ That it ſhou'd be Criminal to gather and ſolicite the Subſcription of Hands to Petitions:’ So that the ſame Multitude that were formerly their Support, became now their Grievance and Puniſhment. But this Order ſo provok'd all Parties, that within two Days they were compell'd to revoke it, and to leave all Men again to their natural Liberty.

While this Confuſion continu'd in the City and Parliament, the Commiſſioners ſent to treat with the Army had no better Succeſs, but return'd with the poſitive Reſolution of the Officers, ‘ That a Declaration ſhou'd be publiſh'd by the Parliament againſt the coming in of Foreign Force:’ For they fear'd, or were willing that the People ſhou'd fear, a new Combination by the Scots: ‘ That the Pay of the Army ſhou'd be put into a conſtant Courſe, and all Receivers of Money call'd to an Account: That the Militia of London return into former Hands that were well affected: That all Perſons impriſon'd for pretended Miſdemeanors, by Order of Parliament, or their Committee, be ſet at Liberty; and, if found innocent upon Tryal, have good Reparation:’ And they particularly mention'd John Lilburn, Overton, and other Fanaticks whom the Parliament had committed for their inſolent Actions, and ſeditious Meetings under the Pretence of Exerciſe of their Religion. Upon the Report of theſe Demands, the Parliament grew more inrag'd, and voted, ‘ That the yielding to the Army in theſe Demands, wou'd be againſt their Honour and their Intereſt, deſtructive to their Privileges;’ with many Expreſſions againſt their Boldneſs and Preſumption. Yet when a new Rabble of Petitioners, with loud Cries demanded moſt of the ſame Things, they were willing to compound with them, and conſented, That the Militia of London ſhou'd be put into ſuch Hands as the Army deſir'd. The City Militia had, on the 4th of May, by the Deſire of the Common-Council, been ſettled by Ordinance of Parliament in the Hands of ſuch as were generally Presbyterians; but now, when upon the Demands of the Army, they ſaw the Ordinance revers'd, and without ſo much as conſulting the Common-Council, the City was extreamly ſtartled, and cry'd out ‘ That if the Command of the Army cou'd cauſe the Parliament to reverſe ſuch an Ordinance as that of the Militia, they had Reaſon to fear they might as well repeal the other Ordinances for the Security of Mony, or for the Purchaſe of Biſhops and Church-Lands, or whatever elſe was the proper Security of the Subject.’ And therefore they caus'd a Petition to be prepared in the Name of the City; but before they were ready to deliver it, many thouſands of Apprentices and young Citizens brought Petitions to the Parliament, claiming and declaring, ‘ That the Command of the Militia was the Birth-right of the City, belonging to them by ſeveral Charters confirm'd in Parliament; for the Defence of which, they had ventur'd their Lives as far and as frankly as the Army had done; and therefore they deſir'd that the Ordinance of Parliament of the 4th of May, which had paſs'd with their Conſent, might ſtand inviolable.’ They firſt preſented their Petition to the Houſe of Peers, who out of Fear revok'd their late Ordinance, and confirm'd their former of May, and ſent it down to the Houſe of Commons for their Conſent; who after that durſt not deny their Concurrence; for the Apprentices carry'd themſelves ſo inſolently, that they wou'd ſcarce ſuffer the Door of the Houſe to be ſhut, and ſome were ſo bold as to go into the Houſe, till the Cauſe was obtain'd.

The City diſguſted.

The Parliament's Compliance.

They are threatned by the Army.

Thus the Ordinance made at the Deſire of the Army, was revers'd on Monday the 26th of July; upon which the Houſes adjourn'd to Friday, that they might have two or three Days to conſider of the preſent Difficulties, and to prevent the like Violences hereafter. The Army having quick Notice of theſe uncommon Proceedings, the General writ a ſharp Letter to the Parliament from Bedford, in which he let them know, ‘ How civilly the Army had comply'd with their Deſire of Removing to a greater Diſtance, upon Preſumption their own Authority wou'd have been able to have ſecur'd them from any Rudeneſs and Violence of the People; the contrary to which was evident by the unparallel'd Violation of their Privileges, on the Monday before, by a Multitude encourag'd by ſeveral Common-Council Men, and other Citizens in Authority; which was an Act ſo prodigious and horrid, as muſt diſſolve all Government, if not ſeverely and exemplarily chaſtis'd: That the Army look'd upon themſelves as accountable to the Kingdom, if this unheard-of Outrage, by which the Settlement of the Nation, and the Relief of Ireland, had been ſo notoriouſly interrupted, ſhould not be ſtrictly examin'd, and Juſtice ſpeedily done upon the Offenders.’ Upon Friday the Members came together, in as full Numbers as they us'd to meet, there being about a hundred and forty of the Houſe of Commons; but after they had ſat ſome Time in Expectation of their Speaker, they were ſurpris'd with the News, That he was gone out of Town early that Morning; and they obſerv'd that Sir Henry Vane, and ſome other Members of his neareſt Acquaintance, were likewiſe abſent. The Houſe of Peers likewiſe found that the Earl of Mancheſter their Speaker had withdrawn himſelf, together with the Earl of Northumberland, and eight other Lords; but the Major Part ſtill remain'd there, ſwell'd with Indignation againſt the abſent Peers, who they underſtood were gone to the Army: All which ſudden Turn is attributed to the profound Subtlety of Mr. Solicitor St. John. Hereupon both Houſes choſe new Speakers, the Lord Willoughby of Parham for the Peers, and Mr. Pelham of Lincoln's-Inn for the Commons; and the latter immediately voted, ‘ That the Eleven Members impeached by the Army, who had abſented themſelves, ſhou'd preſently appear and take their Places.’ They further made an Ordinance of Parliament, by which a Committee of Safety was appointed to join with the City Militia, and had Authority to raiſe Men for the Defence of the Parliament; in which they appear'd ſo vigorous, that no Man in the Houſes, or in the City, ſeem'd to deſign any thing leſs than a brave and valiant Reſiſtance.

Many of both Houſes fly to the Army.

Their good Reception.

The News of theſe Proceedings rous'd up the Army, and the General ſent a good Body of Horſe to Windſor, and march'd himſelf to Uxbridge, and appointed a general Rendezvous of the whole upon Hounſlow-Heath, within two Days; when and where there appear'd an Army of twenty thouſand Foot and Horſe, with a Train of Artillery, and other ſuitable Proviſions. Here the Speakers of both Houſes, who had privately before met with the chief Officers of the Army, appear'd at the Rendezvous with their Maces, and above fifty of their Members, complaining to the General, ‘ That they had not Freedom at Weſtminſter, but were in danger of their Lives by the Tumults; and appeal'd to the Army for their Protection.’ This look'd like an Act of Providence to vindicate the Army; and conſidering the different Perſons concern'd in it, it cou'd hardly be otherwiſe judg'd, than that they deſign'd to have their particular Shares in the Treaty, which they believ'd the Army had near concluded with the King. The chief Officers receiv'd the two Speakers, and the attending Members, as ſo many Angels ſent from Heaven for their Happineſs, paid them all imaginable Reſpect, profeſs'd all Submiſſion to them, as THE PARLIAMENT OF ENGLAND, and declar'd, That they wou'd re-eſtabliſh them in their full Power, or periſh in the Attempt: took very particular Care for their Accommodations, before the General, and aſſign'd a Guard to attend them for their Security, acquainted them with all their Conſultations, and wou'd not preſume to reſolve any thing without their Approbation. And now the common Soldiers were taught, with great Shouts and Acclamations, to cry out Lords and Commons! and a Free Parliament!

The Citizens Submiſſion to the General.

This formidable Union, as it was believ'd at London, rais'd ſuch diſmal Apprehenſions in the City, of Plunder, and other kinds of Puniſhment, that they ſent ſix Aldermen, and ſix Commoners to the General, who lamented and complain'd, ‘ That the City was ſuſpected, but yet innocent from acting againſt the Army; and therefore ſent theſe their Members, to be added to their Committee attending the Council of the Army, and pray the General to forbear the Miſchief of a new War.’ But the General little conſidering the Meſſage, and leſs the Meſſengers, and continuing his ſlow Marches towards the City, they ſent a more humble Meſſage to him, ‘ That finding his Deſign of marching ſo near was, to ſettle the Members of the Lords and Commons in their Privileges of Parliament, the City wou'd contribute all their Power and Service to it; and praying with all Submiſſion, that he wou'd be pleas'd to ſend ſuch a Guard as might conduct them to the Parliament in Safety, and that the Paſſes and Ports ſhou'd be ſet open for them, and they wou'd do what elſe his Excellency ſhou'd command.’ In the mean Time ſome Regiments of the Army under Rainsborough, Hewſon, Pride and Thiſtlewell, croſſing over Kingſton-Bridge, march'd without Oppoſition into Southwark, as far as London-Bridge Gate, which they found ſhut, and the Portcullis let down; therefore having planted two Guns on the one Side, and made a Stand, Hewſon march'd into St. George's Fields, and ſummon'd the great Fort in Lambeth High-Way, which was immediately ſurrender'd to him. The General coming on ſlowly on the other Side of the City, on the 4th of Auguſt demanded all the Forts on the Weſt Side of the City to be ſurrender'd to him: To which Summons the Common-Council, then ſitting, return'd Anſwer, 'That they humbly ſubmitted to 'his Excellency's Commands, profeſſing their Readineſs 'to comply with the Army; and that now, under Almighty God, they did rely only upon his Excellency's 'honourable Word for their Safety and Protection.

They meet him at Hyde-Park.

At Hyde-Park the Lord Mayor and Aldermen met his Excellency, and humbly congratulated his Excellency's Arrival; 'and beſought his Excellency to excuſe what 'they had, out of their good Meaning and Deſire of Peace, 'done amiſs;' and as a Teſtimony of their Affection and Duty, the Mayor, on the Behalf of the City, preſented him with a large Gold Cup; which he ſullenly refus'd, and with as little Ceremony diſmiſs'd them. He himſelf waited upon the two Speakers, and conducted them and their ſeveral Members to their Places in Parliament, which they aſſum'd as tho' there had been no Separation. The firſt Thing they did was the Calling in the General into both Houſes, and making large Acknowledgments in the Name of each Houſe, they ſolemnly thank'd him, 'for 'the Protection he had given to their Perſons, and his 'Vindication of the Privileges of Parliament.' Then they voted, 'That all that had been done by Themſelves in go'ing to, and reſiding in the Army, and all that had been 'done by the Army, to be Well and Legal;' as ſome Time after they voted, 'That all that had been done in the 'Houſes ſince their Departure, was againſt Law, and Pri'vilege of Parliament, invalid and void.' The next Day the whole Army, Horſe, Foot and Cannon, march'd through the City, in a triumphant Manner, with Laurels upon their Hats, as if they had obtain'd ſome ſignal Victory: A Month's Pay was advanc'd and paid to them, and the Parliament beſtow'd a Donative of fifty thouſand Pounds upon their Deliverers; who caus'd all the Works, that had been rais'd againſt the King, to be demoliſh'd, to prevent new Rebellions againſt themſelves. As to his Excellency, he was made ſtill more excellent, and from being General of the Parliament Army, was voted Generaliſſimo, and Commander in Chief of all the Forces and Forts throughout England and Wales, and Conſtable of the Tower of London; of which laſt Place he made Colonel Titchborn his Lieutenant, contrary to the Requeſt of the Lord Mayor and Citizens. A Day of Thanſgiving was likewiſe appointed, in which Mr. Marſhal from the Pulpit made the Deliverance to be greater than that of Gun-Powder Treaſon. Nor did they reſt here, but fell to Impeaching ſix or ſeven Lords, as the Earls of Suffolk, Middleſex and Lincoln; the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Hunſdon, Maynard and Berkly; and the Lord Mayor, with many of the principal Citizens were likewiſe committed to the Tower. The Eleven Members all retir'd, moſt beyond the Seas; and that courageous and governing Man, Sir Philip Stapleton, meeting with the Plague on Shipboard, dy'd in a Ditch near Calais, to the great Terror of his Collegues. Thus the Army ſubdued, purg'd and reduc'd the City and the Parliament to their own Model and Deſign; and here, ſays Hollis, was an End of the Glory of both.

He is thank'd by the Parliament.

The Army enters the City and reduces it.

The King's Removals.

4. During all theſe Tranſactions, the King was oblig'd to make his Progreſs according to the ſeveral Motions of the Army: From New-market he was brought to his Houſe at Royſton, June 24th, and after a Stay of two Days was carry'd to Hatfield, a noble Houſe belonging to the Earl of Saliſbury, where he ſtay'd till the firſt of July: Then he was hurried to Windſor, and two Days after to Caverſham; where the Elector Palatine, many of the Nobility, General Fairfax, and ſeveral of the chief Officers waited on him; and what was much more comfortable, his own Children were here allow'd to come and ſee him. From hence, in the middle of July, he was remov'd to Maidenhead, on the Twentieth to Woborne; then next to Latimers in Buckinghamſhire, hence to New-Park, and ſo to Stoke; on the Fourteenth of Auguſt to Oatlands, a fine Palace of the Queen's upon the River Thames, and two Days after was laſt of all brought to Hampton-Court; after a various Progreſs of almoſt Ten Weeks, from the Time of his being taken from Holmby. Here His Majeſty continu'd in State and Luſtre for near Three Months; while the Army, which had troubled both City and Parliament, was one Part quarter'd in Weſtminſter, to guard the Parliament, and the reſt between Hampton-Court and London, to take care of the King; and the Council of Officers and Agitators ſat conſtantly at Fulham and Putney, to ſee that no Settlement ſhould be made for the Government of the Kingdom, without their Approbation.

He is fix'd at Hampton-Court.

The Liberty the King had of ſeeing his Friends, during theſe Removals, occaſion'd the Arrival of Sir John Berkley from France, and ſhortly after him Mr. John Aſhburnham: The former was ſent by the Queen, and both came upon the ſame Buſineſs; being full of Hopes, from their general Acquaintance with the Officers of the Army, and the good Diſpoſition of ſome of them, that they might do ſome ſignal Service to his Majeſty by treating with the Army. The King was acquainted with Mr. Aſhburnham, but had but little Knowledge, nor no great Opinion of Sir John Berkley: yet he was willing to make uſe of both their Services, and wiſh'd them 'to correſpond with 'each other, and converſe with his ſeveral Friends, who 'did not yet reſort to him, and to receive their Ad'vice; to diſcover the Intentions of both Parties, and im'part what was fit to Him, till upon farther Diſcovery he 'might better judge what to do.' Theſe two were the Chief Agents, upon whoſe Information and Advice his Majeſty principally depended: They were both very ſanguine, truſting to their own, and undervaluing each other's Opinion; and their Acquaintance with the Officers not being generally with the ſame Men, their Informations and Advices were often very different, and often more perplex'd than inform'd the King's Judgment. The Army was now chiefly govern'd by Cromwell and his Son-in-law Ireton, who, tho' infinitely ſecret in their Deſigns, were open in their Enmity to the Presbyterian Party; and accordingly pretended, at leaſt, to be great Friends to the King's Cauſe, of the Advancement of which many of the Officers were really deſirous. Ireton expreſs'd in Major Huntington's Preſence an entire Affection to the King, and a hearty Senſe of his patient Sufferings and unparallel'd Condeſcenſions; and declar'd, That rather than his Majeſty ſhould continue thus enſlav'd by that vile Presbyterian Party, if but five Men would join with him, he would venture his Life in order to his Redemption. Shortly after Cromwell, at Putney, ſolemnly declar'd, That upon the ſame Score, if ten Men would but ſtick to him, he would hazard his Life and Fortune for the King. They ſeem'd very ſuſpicious of the King's hearkening to ſome ſecret Propoſitions of the Presbyterians; and Ireton, at Windſor, plainly told Him, Sir, you have an Intention to be the Arbitrator between the Parliament and Us, and We deſign to be the ſame between your Majeſty and the Parliament.

Sir John Berkley's and Mr. Aſhburnham's Negotiations with the Army.

To theſe two Leaders and ſome others Sir John Berkley apply'd Himſelf, having firſt receiv'd this Caution from Sir Allen Apſley, That he was to deal with ſubtle Men, that govern'd themſelves by other Maxims than the reſt of the World. He met with both civil Treatment, and good Incouragement; and Cromwell at firſt told him, That He and his Friends thought no Men cou'd enjoy their Lives and Eſtates quietly, without the King had his Right, which they had already declar'd in general Terms to the World, and wou'd more particularly very ſpeedily, wherein they wou'd comprize the ſeveral Intereſts of the Royal, Presbyterian and Independent Parties, as far as they were conſiſting with each other; all which were deſign'd to be drawn into Propoſitions. Not long after meeting with Cromwell at Reading, as he was coming from the King at Caverſham, He told Sir John, That he had lately ſeen the tendereſt Sight that ever his Eyes beheld, which was the Interview between the King and his Children; and wept plentifully at the Remembrance of it, ſaying, That never Man was ſo abus'd as He in his ſiniſter Opinions of the Army, who now he thought was the uprighteſt and moſt conſcientious Man of his three Kingdoms: That they of the Independent Party had infinite Obligations to him for not conſenting to the Propoſitions at Newcaſtle, which wou'd have totally ruin'd them, and which his Majeſty's Intereſt ſeem'd to invite him to; and concluded with wiſhing, That God would be pleas'd to look upon him according to the Sincerity of his Heart towards his Majeſty.

Cromwell's Hypocritical Pretenſions.

Several Days paſs'd in this ſecret Negotiation, till the Army's Propoſitions were compleated; but ſtill his Majeſty had a great Diffidence in all the Army, except Major Huntington, a brave Officer in Cromwell's own Regiment, and did believe that their Promiſes proceeded in a great Meaſure from the Uſe they had of him; and without Him he unfortunately thought they cou'd do nothing. Berkley conceives that this was firſt inculcated by Bamfield and Loe, and afterwards by the Lord Lauderdale, who had frequent Acceſſes to him from the Scots, the Presbyterians, and the City of London, who knew nothing was ſo fatal to them as a Conjunction between the King and the Army. Mr. Aſhburnham alſo abounded much in his Majeſty's Senſe, in ſuſpecting the Fidelity of the Army; ſo that when Berkley brought their Propoſals to him, he not only objected againſt them, but ſaid, That they cou'd not ſubſiſt without him, and he ſhou'd ſee them glad e'er long to accept more equal Terms. The Propoſals were indeed more moderate to Him and his Party, than thoſe ſent by the Parliament, but ſtill deſtructive both to the Monarchy and the Church. When they were brought to him by the Chief Officers, and his Concurrence deſir'd, he rejected them with Sharpneſs, and ſaid, You cannot be without Me; You will fall to Ruin if I do not ſuſtain You. Berkley us'd all Means to perſuade his Majeſty to a Compliance; and He and others ſeem to intimate that the King loſt his Time, and a fair Opportunity of being reſtor'd; ſince the Officers declar'd, That if the Parliament wou'd not agree to their Propoſals, they wou'd make them. This is not eaſy to determine; but Sir P. Warwick juſtly obſerves, That when the Two Gentlemen, Berkley and Aſhburnham, were deſir'd to declare, 'Whether the Army had given the 'King any ſuch Tye, that if they prov'd Unfaithful, they 'might be prov'd Perfidious, ſo that the King and his 'Counſellors might not appear too credulous to the 'World;' no ſuch Thing cou'd be produc'd. For Cromwell and Ireton ſtill kept themſelves in the Dark, and cou'd raiſe as many Difficulties as they had Occaſion to pretend. His Majeſty had ſome Cautions given him of Cromwell's private Boaſting of his fine Arts in impoſing upon the King; and therefore muſt certainly be under very great Difficulties at this Time. It is certain, that ſome of the General Officers were ſincere to the King, and really his Converts; and Barron in his Defence tells us, that one of them ſeeing Cromwell hold the King's Hand between his own, and while he made his Promiſes, waſhing it with his Tears; when he came out, he asked the Officer whether he had not acted his Part well? who anſwer'd, Were you not in Earneſt? Not in the leaſt, reply'd He; for which he ever after deteſted him, and acquainted the King what a Devil Incarnate he had to deal withal.

The King's Freedom at Hampton-Court.

His Advice to his Children.

5. In the mean Time the King continu'd at Hampton-Court for two or three Months, in greater Splendor than during the Motions of the Army: The Reſpects of the Chief Officers ſeem'd greater than before; the King's Friends of all Conditions repair'd to him, and convers'd with him without Reſerve; and the Citizens flock'd thither as they us'd to do at the End of a Progreſs, after a long Abſence from London: But that which gave the King the moſt ſenſible Pleaſure, was the Company of his own Children, which were permitted frequently to come to him from Sion, where they were under the Earl of Northumberland's Care. The King's tender Treatment, their Dutiful Behaviour, and the Harmonious Concurrence of both, often prov'd the moſt affecting Sight in the World, and rais'd all the ſoft Motions of Pity from his very Enemies. He gave particular and ſolemn Advice to each of them, as tho' he had then foreſeen the worſt that cou'd happen to him; and urg'd them 'to preſerve unſhaken their Affection and Duty to the Prince their Brother.' The Duke of York, being then about Fourteen Years of Age, was adviſ'd by Him, 'If any Alterations ſhou'd happen as 'to Himſelf, to make his Eſcape, and tranſport Himſelf 'into Holland, where he preſum'd his Siſter wou'd receive 'him kindly.' The Princeſs Elizabeth was about Twelve Years of Age, a Lady of admirable Parts, and a forward Underſtanding: She was enjoyn'd, 'never to be diſpos'd 'of in Marriage without the Approbation of her Mother, 'and Eldeſt Brother, and to perform all Duty and Obedience to both Thoſe; and to obey the Queen in all 'Things, except in Matters of Religion, in which he commanded her, upon his Bleſſing, never to hearken or conſent to Her; but to continue firm to the Religion in which 'ſhe had been Educated, what Misfortunes ſoever might 'befal the poor Church.' The Duke of Gloceſter was not above Seven Years of Age; therefore the King took greater Pains to make the moſt laſting Impreſſions upon him, when he commanded him poſitively 'never to be perſuaded or threatned out of the Religion of the Church, for 'the Purity and Integrity of which he bid him remember, 'That he had his Father's Teſtimony and Authority: And 'ſince ſome deſigning Men might poſſibly endeavour to 'ſet him up for King, he commanded him, upon his Bleſſing, never to ſuffer himſelf to be made King, while either of his elder Brothers were alive.' Theſe were the Subjects which he frequently inculcated and urg'd with all the Tenderneſs of a Parent, and the Authority of a Maſter.

He recovers his Book, &c.

The King, beſides the comfortable Preſence of his Children, had now the Satisfaction of recovering the Divine Meditations he had wrote, afterwards call'd ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ, that is ſo much as had been written before, and taken at the Battle of Naſeby; being procur'd by the Intereſt of Major Huntington, from the Hands of General Fairfax. They had been ſent up to the Parliament, and by their Order peruſed by Mr. Prynne, but were not thought proper to be publiſh'd with the King's Letters taken at the ſame Time. The King upon the Receipt of theſe Papers, appear'd very joyful, and ſaid He eſteem'd them more than all the Jewels he had loſt in his Cabinet; and the Major was ſo affected with the Reading of them, that from that Time he became a Proſelyte to the Royal Cauſe. About the ſame Time the King alſo recover'd a Manuſcript Hiſtory out of the Hands of Cromwell, written by his Secretary of War, Sir Edward Walker, but in many Places corrected by his own Hand. This he ſent into France, to Sir Edward Hyde, the Chancellor of the Exchequer; who from thence Collected the moſt important Paſſages in his famous Hiſtory, for the two Years 1644, and 1645.

The Parliament's Propoſitions to the King.

6. The two Houſes, having been reduc'd to ſome Degree of Settlement, began now to be at leiſure to re-aſſume their Pretence of a well-grounded Peace between the King and his Subjects. And having made ſome few Amendments to the Propoſitions they had ſent to Newcaſtle, on the ſecond of September, it was reſolv'd, 'That a Day be 'appointed for the Delivering of the Propoſitions of both 'Kingdoms to the King's Majeſty for a ſafe and well-grounded Peace; and that the Commiſſioners of both 'Houſes ſhou'd attend his Majeſty to deliver the ſaid Propoſitions; within ſix Days to be limited for receiving his 'Majeſty's Aſwer.' They were accordingly deliver'd, and were only told by his Majeſty, That he wou'd return Anſwer with all Conveniency.

The King's Caution.

The Proteſtations of Cromwell and Ireton.

His Majeſty in his Anſwer thought it very neceſſary to take care of the Intereſt of the Army; but before he wou'd determine what Anſwer to make, he call'd Major Huntington to him, and told him he muſt reſolve him a ſhort Queſtion, which was, Whether he cou'd aſſure him that Cromwell was the ſame in his Heart to him, as he had by his Tongue ſo freely and frequently expreſs'd himſelf. At which Queſtion the Major being not little ſtagger'd, and fearing the Danger of an uncertain Anſwer, begg'd a Day's Time for Conſideration; which being granted, he went privately by Night to Cromwell at Putney; and having with an Excuſe rais'd him out of Bed, Cromwell in ſhort anſwer'd, That he did really and uprightly mean and intend to perform the ſame to his utmoſt, which he had ſo often profeſs'd to the King; which was the full reſtoring and eſtabliſhing him in his juſt and lawful Rights: Imprecating, That neither Himſelf, nor his Wife or Children might ever proſper, if he did not reſtore him, in Caſe the Army remain'd an Army; and if not, they were bound to fall with him; and that he Himſelf wou'd ſtand by him, if there were but ten Men to ſtick to him; uſing bitter Reflections upon the rigid Party in Parliament, which by their Preſbyterian Principles and Practices deſign'd to enſlave Him. Ireton expreſs'd the ſame Senſe, and farther added, That they wou'd purge and purge again, till they had brought the Houſe to ſuch a Temper as ſhou'd do his Majeſty's Buſineſs: And rather than fall ſhort of their Promiſes, he wou'd joyn with French, Spaniard, Cavalier, or any that wou'd joyn with him to force them to it. But notwithſtanding all this, the Major was ſo cautious, that he condition'd with Cromwell, That if any thing ſhou'd happen, which might hinder the Effect of his fair Intentions, the King might have timely Notice, ſo as to eſcape the Danger. Which being promis'd, the Major return'd with great Hopes and Satisfaction to the King, and inform'd him of the whole Matter.

The King's Anſwer to the Propoſitions.

The Villany of Cromwell and Ireton.

Hereupon the King form'd his Anſwer to the Parliament's Propoſals, and ſent them by Major Huntington to Cromwell and Ireton, to be perus'd, with the Liberty to add and alter what they ſhou'd think fit: Which being done by them, and return'd to his Majeſty, he wrote it again, and ſent it to the Houſes at Weſtminſter, where it was read about the middle of September. In Subſtance it declar'd, 'That he cou'd not conſent to all their Propoſitions, but 'deſir'd them to take into Conſideration the Propoſals of 'the Army, as more conducing to the Satisfaction of all 'Intereſts, and to have a Perſonal Treaty upon them: 'Therefore he conjur'd his two Houſes of Parliament, by 'their Duty they ow'd to God and Himſelf their King, 'and by the Bowels of Compaſſion they had to their Fellow-Subjects, both for Relief of their preſent Sufferings, 'and to prevent future Miſeries; that they wou'd forthwith accept of his Offer, whereby the joyful News of 'Peace might be reſtor'd to this diſtreſſed Kingdom.' But ſee, ſays Huntington, the horrid Perfidiouſneſs of theſe grand Impoſtors, Cromwell and Ireton; no ſooner was this Candid Anſwer read in the Houſe of Commons, but both of them appear'd with the Higheſt in their Invectives againſt it: In ſhort, the Houſes Voted this Anſwer a flat Denyal. The News of which being brought to the King, he immediately diſpatch'd Major Huntington to Cromwell, to require a Reaſon for theſe Proceedings; whoſe Anſwer was, That what he had then ſaid in the Houſe of Commons, was to ſound the Depth of thoſe virulent Humours, which had poſſeſs'd the Preſbyterians, whom he knew to be no Friends to his Majeſty. And after this Time Cromwell never came to his Majeſty; as we are inform'd by this Major's own Account, which he ſent to Sir William Dugdale.

We are told indeed by private Hands of a ſecret Treaty between the King and Cromwell, by which He and Ireton were to receive the higheſt Poſts of Honour and Profit; but that the King dealt unfairly by them; which they diſ-cover'd by ſome intercepted Letters to the Queen, and therefore reſolv'd never to truſt Him any more. This is related by ſome of the King's Enemies, with much Confidence, but with little Authority, and a very ſuſpicious Variety; but after a careful Search, we can find nothing to ſupport, or indeed to countenance ſuch a Story among the moſt authentick Writers; who generally own that the King was ready to give any Reward to theſe two Leaders, but they always dealt baſely and treacherouſly by Him: And Major Huntington plainly told the King, That Cromwell was a Villain, and wou'd deſtroy him, if he were not prevented; and in a ſhort Time after, he threw up his Commiſſion, and left the Army. Cromwell indeed complain'd to Mr. Aſhburnham, That the King cou'd not be truſted; that he had no Confidence in the Army, but was jealous of them and all the Officers: That he had Intrigues in the Parliament, and Treaties with the City Presbyterians, to raiſe new Troubles; that he had a Treaty with the Scotch Commiſſioners to engage the Nation again in Blood; therefore he cou'd not be anſwerable if any Thing fell out contrary to Expectation. In this latter Point Cromwell employ'd Major Huntington to ſound the King as to his Knowledge or Privity of any ſuch Deſign; which being carefully perform'd, the King utterly diſclaim'd it, aſſuring him, If they cou'd prove that any one of the Engliſh Officers had, by his Authority, confederated with the Scots, they ſhou'd conclude him guilty of all they did ſo ſurmiſe; and that he did only depend on thoſe ſolemn Promiſes which Cromwell had made to him.

Cromwell's Complaints of the King.

But all this was of no Advantage to the King; for the Army having now brought the Parliament and City to a right Underſtanding, they became leſs regardful of his Majeſty, than formerly; the chief Officers came rarely to Hampton-Court, the Guards about the King grew more rude and troubleſome, and highly affronted the Scotch Commiſſioners, who in the Month of October firſt came thither. A more mutinous Spirit aroſe in the Army, and a new ſort of People, call'd Levellers, appear'd, who pretending to bring all Degrees of Men to an Equality, in a ſhort Time became formidable to Cromwell Himſelf, who many believ'd had made a ſecret Bargain with the King. The Agitators now began to change their Diſcourſe, and openly complain'd in their Councils both of the King, and the Malignants about his Perſon: They ſaid, 'Since the King had not accepted of their Propoſals, they were not oblig'd any farther to them: They found it apparent, That God had on one Side hardned the King's Heart, and blinded his Eyes in not paſſing the Propoſals; and on the other Side, the Lord had led Captivity Captive, and put all Things under their Feet, and therefore they were bound to finiſh the Work of the Lord.' Several Officers met at Putney in the Beginning of November, where Colonel Harriſon made a long Narration concerning ſome Things that lay upon his Spirit, in Relation to the King, Lords, &c. declaring, That the King was a Man of Blood, and therefore the Ingagements to him were taken off, and that they ought to proſecute him. And on the ſame Day the Agitators of nine Regiments, and the General's Life-Guard, had prepared a Letter of the ſame Strain by Way of Narrative to all the Soldiers of the Army, to draw them to a General Rendezvous, to declare againſt any Settlement with the King.

The Scots Commiſſioners offer to reſcue the King.

Before theſe laſt Proceedings, the Scotch Commiſſioners, Lowdon, Lanerick and Lauderdale, who with ſome Difficulty repair'd to the King, began to enter into a Treaty with him, and offer'd to reſcue him out of the Hands of the Army, or periſh in the Attempt: And ſhortly after, the King being to hunt at Noneſuch, the two Latter came thither on Pretence of waiting on his Majeſty, accompany'd with fifty Horſe, which ſtruck no ſmall Terror in the ſmall Guard about the King. Theſe Lords told his Majeſty, That they came to reſcue him from his Captivity, and they were all reſolv'd to dye at his Feet; therefore they begg'd him to make his Eſcape. But the King told them, He had ingag'd his Honour not to leave the Army without giving them Notice; and till he had freed himſelf from that, he wou'd rather dye than break his Faith. But the Leaders, as well as others in the Army, were now weary of the King's being with them, and wiſh'd to have him in ſome ſecure and remote Place; wherefore they caus'd Reports to be often brought to him, that his Life was in great Danger from the Levellers and other implacable Men. Whereupon the King ſent to the two Earls, and told them, He had now freed himſelf from the Engagement of not leaving the Army, and deſir'd their Advice concerning his Eſcape. He ask'd them firſt of his going to Scotland: Lauderdale told him, That except he reſolv'd to comply with their Deſires about Religion, he might expect no better Uſage from the Kirk Party, than he had met with at Newcaſtle. Then ſpeaking of London, the Earl gave ſufficient Reaſons for his not going thither; nor cou'd he give him any Hopes of the Scots Commiſſioners Acknowledgment of him in the Name of the Scotch Nation. Laſt of all the King propos'd Barwick as a Place to fly to; upon which the Earl of Lanerick begg'd of his Majeſty That for God's Sake he wou'd follow that Motion; which being back'd by Lauderdale, the King ſeem'd reſolv'd upon that Place, when they left him.

The King eſcapes from Hampton-Court.

But ſoon after his Majeſty, being terrify'd with new Apprehenſions, was driven upon other Meaſures. He ſeem'd now more ſolicitous how to eſcape, than where to fly: There is Reaſon to believe that he had reſolv'd to tranſport himſelf beyond the Seas, which had not been difficult to effect; but whom he conſulted for the way of doing it, ſtill remains a Secret; they who were inſtrumental in his Removal, pretending to know nothing of the Reſolution or Advice. But one Morning, being the eleventh of November, the King having over Night pretended ſome Indiſpoſition, and that he wou'd go to Reſt; they who went into his Chamber, were ſurpris'd in not finding him there, and more when they found he had not been in his Bed that Night. There were two or three Letters found upon the Table, all writ with his own Hand, one to the Parliament, and another to the General; in which he declar'd 'That the Reaſon of his Removal was an Apprehenſion, that ſome deſperate Perſons had deſign'd to aſſaſſinate him; and therefore he had withdrawn himſelf with a Purpoſe of remaining conceal'd, till the Parliament had agreed upon ſuch Propoſitions as ſhou'd be fit for him to conſent to. In Concluſion, if he might be heard with Freedom, Honour and Safety, he wou'd inſtantly break through this Cloud of Retirement, and ſhew himſelf really to be Pater Patriæ.' Such was the King's ſudden Departure, after he had been near five Months in the Army; which prov'd a wonderful Surpriſe to all Men, and ſo terrify'd the Parliament, that they immediately ſent Poſt all Ways imaginable to find him out, and voted it 'Confiſcation of Eſtate, and Loſs of Life, without Mercy, to any one who detain'd the King's Perſon, without revealing it to the two Houſes.

III. I. At this Time there was a new and ſudden Change of the King's Affairs, an unexpected Eſcape; probably occaſion'd by the Contrivance, and effected with the Connivance of Cromwell, who had reduc'd his Majeſty to the reſtleſs State of a ſick Man, who is very ready to change his Bed, to try if it wou'd alter the Diſtemper. It was on a Thurſday Night, between the Hours of eight and nine, that the King in Diſguiſe went from his Lodgings through a private Door into the Park, where there was no Centinel; and taking a Boat there laid for him, he croſs'd the River to Thame-Ditton, where Sir John Berkley, Mr. Aſhburnham and Mr. Leg, were ready with Horſes for his Eſcape, the two laſt being of his Bed-Chamber. Mr. Aſhburnham alone ſeem'd to know what they were to do, the other two having receiv'd only Orders to attend. They rode South-Weſt, towards that Part of Hampſhire which led to the New Forreſt; but the Night being exceeding dark and ſtormy, they loſt their Way, and cou'd not reach Sutton till Break of Day. Being paſs'd the Danger of Guards and Horſe Quarters, the King ask'd Aſhburnham, Where the Ship lay? which made the other two conclude, that the King reſolv'd to tranſport himſelf. His Majeſty finding himſelf diſappointed, ſeem'd much concern'd; and now thought it beſt to get as privately as he cou'd to Tichfield, a noble Seat of the Earl of Southampton, now only inhabited by the old Lady his Mother, with a ſmall Family, which made the Retreat the more convenient. There his Majeſty alighted, and made no Scruple of diſcovering himſelf to that good Lady, whom he knew to be one of unqueſtionable Honour and Fidelity. There he had Time to refreſh himſelf, and to conſult with his three Servants, what he ſhou'd attempt next, ſince there was no Ship ready, nor cou'd they think to remain long there undiſcover'd.

He retires to Tichfield.

He ſends Berkley and Aſhburnham into the Iſle of Wight.

In this Debate, the Iſle of Wight was mention'd, as it is ſaid, by Mr. Aſhburnham, as a Place where his Majeſty might reſt ſecure, till he thought fit to inform the Parliament where he was. Colonel Hammond was Governor there, nearly related to Dr. Hammond, but of neareſt Truſt with Cromwell; yet by ſome fatal Miſtake, this Man was thought a Perſon of ſufficient Honour and Generoſity to be entruſted with the King's Perſon: Accordingly both Berkley and Aſhburnham were ſent to him with Orders, 'Firſt to be ſure that the Man wou'd faithfully promiſe not to deliver up his Majeſty, tho' he ſhou'd be requir'd by the Parliament or the Army; but if he were not able to defend him, to give him his Liberty to eſcape; and except he wou'd make that Promiſe, they ſhou'd not let him know were his Majeſty was, but ſhou'd immediately return to him.' With this Commiſſion the two Gentlemen croſs'd the Water to the Iſle of Wight, while his Majeſty ſafely repos'd himſelf at Tichfield. The next Day they found Colonel Hammond on Horſe-back, who knew them both from the Time they had been treating with the Army. Sir John Berkley took him aſide, and deliver'd the Meſſage to him according to Order; upon which the Colonel turn'd pale, and fell into ſuch a trembling, that he was ready to fall from his Horſe, crying out in a diſtracted Manner, O Gentlemen! you have undone me, by bringing the King into the Iſland, if you have brought him; if not, pray let him not come: For what between Duty and Gratitude to his Majeſty, and Fidelity to the Army, I ſhall be confounded. Sir John, to appeaſe him, told him There was no Harm done; That his Majeſty intended a Favour to him and his Poſterity, in giving him an Occaſion to lay a great Obligation upon him; which if he did not approve of, his Majeſty wou'd be far from impoſing his Perſon upon him. After he had well recover'd himſelf, the Colonel ſaid, Since his Majeſty had made Choice of him as a Perſon of Honour and Honeſty, to lay this great Truſt upon, he therefore wou'd not deceive his Majeſty's Expectations. When he ſaw they were not ſatisfy'd with this general Expreſſion, he ask'd where the King was? To which they made no other Anſwer, but that they wou'd acquaint his Majeſty with his Anſwer, and if he were ſatisfy'd with it, they wou'd return to him again.

Upon this the Colonel demanded that Mr. Aſhburnham wou'd ſtay with him, and that the other might go to the King, which Mr. Aſhburnham refus'd to do. But after ſome Time ſpent in Debate, he at laſt declar'd to both, That he wou'd ſay that which he was ſure ought to content any reaſonable Man, which was, That he did believe his Majeſty rely'd on him, as on a Perſon of Honour and Honeſty, therefore he did engage himſelf to them to perform whatſoever ſhou'd be expected from a Perſon of Honour and Honeſty. At which Mr. Aſhburnham ſaid, He wou'd ask no more; and was content that the Colonel ſhou'd go with them to the Place to which the King was retir'd. So, contrary to Sir John Berkley's Opinion, they went together; and at Cows Caſtle, Hammond taking Basket the Governor along with him, in his Paſſage, they all four went to Tichfield Houſe. Three of them ſtaying below, Mr. Aſhburnham went up to the King's Chamber; and when he acquainted him with all that had paſs'd, the King broke out in a paſſionate Exclamation, What! have you brought Hammond with you? O Jack, you have undone me! with which the other falling into a bitter Paſſion of Weeping, offer'd to go down and kill Hammond: To which the King wou'd by no means conſent, and ſaid it was now too late of thinking any Thing, but going through the Way he had forc'd him upon, and leave the Iſſue to God. Then ſending for Sir John Berkley up, ſaid, I hope you are not ſo paſſionate as Jack Aſhburnham: Do you think you have follow'd my Directions? The other anſwer'd No, but charg'd all upon Mr. Aſhburnham. His Majeſty now judg'd it was too late to ſtruggle, and therefore he receiv'd Hammond with all Chearfulneſs, who promis'd more to his Majeſty than he had done to the Gentlemen. Hereupon the King went with him into the Iſle of Wight, and was lodg'd at Cariſbrook-Caſtle, at firſt with all Demonſtrations of Reſpect and Duty. Such was the King's ſtrange and unhappy Journey, in which there were ſo many unaccountable Steps, that many believ'd that there was Treaſon in the Contrivance, or the moſt groſs Impoſition upon the Projectors of it. Moſt Writers condemn both Berkley and Aſhburnham of great Miſmanagement, eſpecially the latter; but their Fidelity was never call'd in Queſtion by the Court: And the King once told Sir Philip Warwick, as to Mr. Aſhburnham, That he did not believe he was unfaithful to him; but he thought he wanted Courage at that Time, when he durſt not ſtay with Hammond in the Caſtle, whom he never knew wanted it before. This nice and difficult Matter is largely diſcuſs'd, but ſcarce fully determin'd by the Lord Clarendon in this Place.

The King goes with them to Cariſbrook Caſtle.

2. The unexpected Withdrawing of the King made a ſtrange Impreſſion upon the Minds of all Men, every Perſon imagining that his Majeſty would act according to his particular Wiſh. The Presbyterians believ'd he lay conceal'd in the City, and would wait for a new Rupture between the Parliament and the Army, and the many Factions that daily appear'd and increas'd in the Army, and then to diſcover Himſelf. The Cavaliers hop'd that he would tranſport Himſelf beyond the Seas, and quietly attend there for thoſe Alterations at home, which probably might ſoon invite his Return. The Army was not without this Apprehenſion, as believing it the worſt that could happen againſt their Deſigns. But all theſe Imaginations were ſoon at an End; for within two Days Cromwell inform'd the Houſe of Commons, ‘ That he had receiv'd Letters from Colonel Hammond, of all the manner of the King's coming to the Iſle of Wight, and the Company that came with him; that he remain'd ſafe in the Caſtle of Cariſbrook, till the Pleaſure of the Parliament ſhould be known.’ He aſſur'd them, That Colonel Hammond was ſo honeſt a Man, and ſo devoted to their Service, that they need not fear his being corrupted by any Man living: And all this Relation he made with a Gaiety ſo unuſual, that all concluded that the King was got in the Place he either deſign'd, or deſir'd he ſhould be in.

Notice of his Arrival given to the Parliament.

And now the Parliament and the Army being come to a ſort of a Coalition, the former tamely ſubmitted to what the latter propos'd; the Presbyterians in both Houſes and the City, being exceeding fearful that ſome of their ſecret Correſpondencies with the King at Hampton-Court would be diſcover'd, would give no farther Occaſion of Jealouſy by any Contradictions, leaving it to their Clergy in the Pulpit to keep the Fire burning in the Hearts of the People; which Truſt they religiouſly diſcharg'd. At the ſame Time Cromwell was very buſy in extinguiſhing a Fire in his own Quarters: The Agitators, who were firſt form'd by him, had hitherto tranſcrib'd all the Copies he had given them, had offer'd ſuch Advices, and made ſuch Demands to the Parliament as were neceſſary, while there was any Deſign to treat with the King, or any Reaſon to flatter his Party; but now the King was at a Diſtance from the Army, and the Parliament render'd ſo ſoft, that the Army Party in it could make any Impreſſion upon them, he deſir'd to reſtrain the Agitators from the Liberty of pretending to ſettle the Government of the Kingdom; which he thought ought now to be left to the Parliament, whoſe preſent Authority he reſolv'd to ſupport, and by that means eſtabliſh what elſe was to be done. But the Agitators, like their Leaders, would not be ſo diſmiſs'd: They enter'd into new Aſſociations, and made Propoſitions to their Officers and the Parliament, to introduce a Parity among all Men and Conditions, from whence they were call'd Levellers, and not only met againſt the Command of their Officers, but drew conſiderable Bodies to a Rendezvous, and perſuaded them to enter into ſuch Engagements, as would in a ſhort Time have diſſolv'd the Government of the Army, and freed them from a Dependance upon their General Commanders. For the Suppreſſion of this Licence, Cromwell was oblig'd to exert all his Cunning, Dexterity and Courage; ſo that after he had flatter'd the Parliament into a Belief that their Preſervation was all his Care, tho' his own was immediately concern'd; he ſent ſome falſe Brethren to joyn in the Counſels of the Conſpirators, and by that means learning their Rendezvous at Hounſlow-Heath, he was unexpectedly among them with an ordinary Guard; and with a wonderful Vivacity, having ask'd Queſtions, and receiv'd inſolent Anſwers from ſome of the moſt Active, he knock'd down two or three of them with his own Hand, and then charging the reſt with his Troop, he took ſuch a Number of them as he thought fit, of whom he immediately caus'd ſome to be hang'd, and ſent others to London for a more formal Tryal. By theſe Means he totally ſubdu'd that Spirit in the Army, which threatned Confuſion to all Parties, and which could not have been quell'd by any Thing leſs than the rough and vigorous Temper of Cromwell.

Cromwell quells the Agitators and Levellers.

About this Time was appointed a Meeting of the General Officers of the Army at Windſor; where this Man and Ireton were preſent, to conſult what ſhould now be done with the King. For having now leſs Occaſion for the Agitators, his chief Confidence was in thoſe Officers, who at this Time were able to govern both the Parliament and Army, and conſequently to effect his extraordinary Deſigns. At this grand Conference, which according to Cuſtom, began with Faſting and Prayers, perform'd by Cromwell, Ireton, or ſome inſpir'd Officer, it was reſolv'd, That the King ſhould be proſecuted for his Life as a criminal Perſon. Of this his Majeſty was ſpeedily inform'd by Watſon, Quarter-Maſter-General of the Army, who was preſent; one who had pretended from the firſt coming of the King to the Army to have an Inclination to ſerve him, and deſir'd to be thought ſtill to retain it. But the Reſolution was a great Secret, of which the two Houſes had not the leaſt Notice or Suſpicion, but were, as they had often been, to be gradually ſeduced into what they never intended to act. Nor was the King himſelf eaſily perſuaded to give Credit to the Information; for tho' he had probable Expectations that they would ſome time murder him, he could not believe they would attempt his Life with that odious Formality, or let the People know their Intentions.

He and Ireton conſult about the King's Death.

3. All Oppoſition being ſuppreſs'd, and Cromwell needing no other Aſſiſtance than the preſent Temper of the two Houſes, they ſent a Meſſage to the King, with Offers of Treaty, according as his Majeſty had lately deſir'd, ‘ Upon Condition that his Majeſty, as a Pledge of his future Sincerity, would forthwith grant his Royal Aſſent to four Preliminary Acts of Parliament, then ſent to him.’ By one of them ‘ He was to confeſs the War to have been rais'd by Him againſt the Parliament; and ſo that he was guilty of all the Blood that had been ſpilt.’ By another, ‘ He was totally to diſſolve the Government of the Church

‘ by Biſhops, and to grant all the Lands belonging to the ‘ Church to ſuch Uſes as they propos'd; leaving the ſettling a future Government in the Place thereof to farther ‘ Time and Counſels.’ By a Third, ‘ He was to grant ‘ and ſettle the Militia in the Manner, and in the Perſons ‘ propos'd, without reſerving ſo much Power in Himſelf, ‘ as any Subject was capable of.’ In the laſt Place, ‘ He ‘ was, in Effect, to ſacrifice all thoſe who had ſerv'd, or ‘ adhered to him, to the Mercy of the Parliament.’ The Commiſſioners who were ſent with theſe four Bills, had only Liberty given to expect the King's Anſwer within four Days, and were then requir'd to return to the Parliament. With Them came likewiſe the Commiſſioners of Scotland, who after the four Bills were read to the King, the next Day deſired an Audience, and with great Confidence and Formality deliver'd a Declaration and Proteſtation on the Behalf of the Kingdom of Scotland againſt thoſe Bills and Propoſitions. They declar'd, ‘ They were ſo ‘ prejudicial to the Religion, the Crown, the Union, and ‘ Intereſt of the Kingdoms, and ſo far different from the ‘ former Proceedings and Engagements between the two ‘ Kingdoms, that they could not concur therein; and there- ‘ fore, In the Name of the whole Kingdom of Scotland, ‘ did declare their Diſſent.

The Scots proteſt againſt them.

The King had receiv'd private Advice, that as ſoon as he ſhould refuſe to conſent to the Bills, he ſhould be made a cloſe Priſoner, and all his Servants ſhould be remov'd from him: Upon which, and becauſe the Commiſſioners had no Power to treat with him, but were only to receive his poſitive Anſwer, he reſolv'd that his Anſwer ſhould not be known till it was deliver'd to the Parliament; and that in the mean Time he would endeavour to make his Eſcape, before new Orders could be ſent from Weſtminſter: So when the Commiſſioners came to receive his Anſwer, he gave it to them ſeal'd. The Earl of Denbigh, who was the chief of them, and a Perſon very ungracious to the King, told him, That tho' they had no Authority to treat with him, yet they were not to be look'd upon as common Meſſengers, and to carry back an Anſwer that they had not ſeen: And in ſhort, refus'd to receive it, and ſaid, They would return without any, except they might ſee what they carry'd. The King conſidering, that their Return without his Anſwer would be attended with the worſt Conſequences, told them, He had ſome Reaſon for what he did; but if they would give Him their Words, That the communicating of it to Them ſhould bring no Prejudice to Him, he would open it, and cauſe it to be read; which upon their Promiſes was accordingly done. The Subſtance was, ‘ That he had always thought it a Matter of great ‘ Difficulty to comply in ſuch a manner with all engaged ‘ Intereſts, ſo as to produce a laſting Peace; in which Opinion he was now confirm'd, ſince the Commiſſioners ‘ from Scotland do ſolemnly proteſt againſt the ſeveral ‘ Bills and Propoſitions they had ſent him; ſo that it was ‘ not poſſible for him to give ſuch an Anſwer as might be ‘ the Foundation of a hopeful Peace.’ He gave them many good Reaſons why he could not paſs the four Bills as they were offer'd to him; and told them, ‘ That neither ‘ the Deſire of being freed from that tedious and irkſom ‘ Condition of Life, which he had ſo long ſuffer'd, nor ‘ the Apprehenſion of any Thing that might befal him, ‘ ſhould ever prevail with him to conſent to any one Act, ‘ till the Conditions of the whole Peace ſhould be con- ‘ cluded; and then that he would be ready to give all juſt ‘ and reaſonable Satisfaction, in all Particulars; and for ‘ the adjuſting of all this, he earneſtly deſir'd to have a ‘ Perſonal Treaty, to be at London, or any other Place ‘ they would chuſe.’ As ſoon as the Anſwer was read, he deliver'd it to the Commiſſioners, who kiſs'd his Hand, and departed for Weſtminſter, on the latter End of December.

The King's Anſwer to them.

If we may believe Sir John Bowring, in his Memoirs, the King had for ſome Time an Intention of paſſing theſe four Dethroning Bills, with four Counter-Bills to ballance them; but that the King chang'd his Mind, which he ſeems to believe was occaſion'd by the Perſuaſions of the Scotch Commiſſioners: But this Authority is too uncertain to be rely'd on. However this is certain, that during theſe four Days allow'd by the Parliament to give in his Anſwer, a Time of the greateſt Trouble and Perplexity, his Majeſty was ſo overcome by the Promiſes of the Scotch Commiſſioners, as to ſign the Propoſals he had before refus'd at Hampton-Court, which Propoſals contain'd many unreaſonable Particulars in Favour of the Scots, and highly diſhonourable to the Engliſh Nation, as may be more largely ſeen in the Lord Clarendon, and in no other Writer. This Agreement was extorted from the King, when he had not only no Time to adviſe with his Friends, but could not adviſe with Himſelf upon ſo many monſtrous Demands made to him by both Kingdoms at the ſame Time. The Treaty was manag'd with the utmoſt Secrecy by only three Earls, Lowdon, Lauderdale and Lanerick; nor did they truſt any one Presbyterian in England with the Knowledge of the Particulars; and to prevent the worſt from Searchers, they made up their Contract in Lead, and bury'd it in a Garden in the Iſle, from whence they eaſily found Means afterwards to receive it. That which alone prevail'd upon the King was, ‘ That they did not expect that he ſhould ‘ punctually obſerve the Articles, but the Treaty was only ‘ to engage the Kingdom of Scotland to raiſe an Army, and ‘ to unite it in his Majeſty's Service, and to his Reſtora- ‘ tion.’ And here was laid the Foundation of a new War, which ruin'd the Scots, and their Covenant, and almoſt all that eſteem'd either one or the other.

He makes a Treaty with the Scots.

The Engliſh Commiſſioners were no ſooner gone, than Colonel Hammond caus'd all the King's Servants, who till then had Liberty to be with him, to be immediately put out of the Caſtle; and appointed a ſtrong Guard to reſtrain any Perſon from going to the King, if he ſhould endeavour it. This exceedingly troubled and ſurpris'd him, being a total Diſappointment of all the Hope he had left. He told Hammond, That this was not according to his Engagement, and that it did not become a Man of Honour and Honeſty to treat him ſo, who had freely put himſelf into his Hands. He farther ask'd him, Whether the Commiſſioners were acquainted with this Proceeding? To which he anſwer'd, That they were not; but that he had an Order from the Parliament to do thus; and that he plainly ſaw by his Anſwer to the Propoſitions, that he acted by other Counſels than ſtood with the Good of the Kingdom. This ſtrange Proceeding put the Iſland into a high Mutiny; and there was at that Time one Captain Burly, a Perſon of a good Family in the Iſland, who being by chance at Newport, indiſcreetly caus'd a Drum to be beaten, and put himſelf at the Head of the People that flock'd together, and cry'd, For God, the King and the People! and ſaid, he would lead them to the Caſtle, and reſcue the King from his Captivity. The Attempt was ſoon diſcern'd to be raſh and impracticable; and by the Diligence of the King's Servants, juſt put out of the Caſtle, the People were quieted, and all return'd to their Houſes. But the poor Gentleman paid dear for his unſeaſonable Loyalty; for Hammond having made him Priſoner, the Parliament immediately ſent down a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer; in which preſided Wild, an infamous Judge of their own making, who caus'd Burly to be formally indicted of High-Treaſon, for levying War againſt the King, and engaging the Kingdom in a new War; of which a pack'd Jury found him guilty: Upon which this unfortunate Captain was forthwith hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, with all the Circumſtances of Barbarity and Cruelty; which ſtruck a wonderful Terror into all Men, and made a deeper Impreſſion than all the Severities they had exercis'd in their Courts of War.

He is made a cloſe Priſoner.

4. In the mean Time there appear'd a new Spirit and Temper in the Houſe of Commons, after they had receiv'd the King's Anſwer: Hitherto none had mention'd the King's Perſon without Duty and Reſpect, and only lamented, ‘ That he was miſ-led by evil Counſellors, who ‘ being remov'd from him, he might ſtill govern well by ‘ the Advice of his Parliament.’ But now, upon the Refuſal to paſs theſe Bills, every Man's Mouth was open'd againſt him with the utmoſt Liberty and Sawcineſs: Cromwell, contrary to all his former Methods, declar'd, That the King was a Man of great Parts, and great Underſtanding, but withal ſo great a Diſſembler, and ſo falſe a Man, that he was not to be truſted. He alledg'd many Particulars againſt him, and highly complain'd, ‘ That while he ‘ ſolemnly profeſs'd that he referr'd himſelf wholly to the ‘ Parliament, and depended only upon them for compoſing ‘ the Kingdom's Diſtractions, at the ſame Time he had ‘ ſecret Treaties with the Scotch Commiſſioners, how he ‘ might embroil the Nation in a new War, and deſtroy the ‘ Parliament.’ He concluded, ‘ That they might no fur- ‘ ther trouble themſelves with ſending Meſſages or Pro- ‘ poſitions, but that they might enter into ſuch Counſels as ‘ were neceſſary towards the Settlement of the Kingdom, ‘ without having further Recourſe to the King.’ Ireton declar'd, That his rejecting the Bills was no other than the Denial of his Protection, and that the People upon that Account did owe him no Subjection. One Wroth propos'd ‘ To have him cloſely kept in ſome Inland Garriſon, till ‘ he could be brought to Judgment;’ and ſaid, It was equal to him what kind of Government they ſettled, provided they admitted neither Kings nor Devils. Thoſe of the ſame Party added new Reproaches upon the Perſon of the King, charging him with ſuch abominable Actions, as had never been heard of, and could only proceed from the Height of Malice; while Men who had any Modeſty, or Senſe of ſuch Proceedings, ſtood amaz'd at the Preſumption, but without Courage to ſtem this overflowing Rage. So that after ſeveral Days ſpent in paſſionate Debates to Several Speeches in Parliament.

this Purpoſe, they voted, ‘ That they would make no more Addreſſes to the King, but proceed towards the ſettling the Government, and providing for the Peace of the Kingdom, in ſuch a manner as they ſhould judge beſt for the Benefit and Liberty of the Subject.’ This ſurpriſing Vote was made by the Commons upon the 3d of January, and was on the 17th of the ſame Month agreed to by the Houſe of Lords.

The Commons large Declaration.

This was ſhortly after ſucceeded by a large and ſolemn Declaration of the Commons, for the Reaſons of this extraordinary Way of Proceeding; in which they loaded the King with every Thing that cou'd be conceiv'd to render him odious to the People, without conſidering the innumerable Anſwers that had been before made to thoſe Calumnies. ‘ They charg'd him with making all their Addreſſes fruitleſs; with Cruelties done at Brentford, and a bloody Maſſacre intended upon London; with a Guilt in the Death of his Father King James; with betraying Rochelle and the Engliſh Fleet into the Hands of the French King; with Deſign of bringing over German Horſe to enſlave the Nation; with Grinding the People by Loans, Privy-Seals, Coat and Conduct Mony, Patents, Monopolies, and that one Compendium of Slavery, Ship-Mony; with Torturing Mens Bodies by Whipping, Slitting Noſes, Cutting off Ears, Branding Cheeks, Racks, Pillories and cloſe Impriſonments; with Lording it over Souls by Oaths Ex Officio, Excommunications, Ceremonies, Articles, new Canons, and Canon Oaths; with a Scandalous Declaration for Diſſolving the Parliament in 1640; with a Cabal for bringing up the Northern Army to awe the Parliament; with Sealing a Commiſſion to the Iriſh Rebels; with an Unwillingneſs to disband the Popiſh Iriſh Army; with Writing Letters to the Pope, and the Duke of Lorrain; with charging Members of Parliament with Treaſon, and an unparallel'd Way of Coming to the Houſe; with the Preparation of a Fleet from Denmark, and Expecting another from Holland; with Signing the moſt Illegal Commiſſion of Array, and a Commiſſion for ten Thouſand Rebels to conquer the Parliament and City of London:’ And at laſt they tell the World They cou'd give many Reaſons more why they will make no more Addreſſes. And in ſum they make it ‘ High-Treaſon for any Perſon whatſoever to deliver any Meſſage from the King, or receive any Letter or Meſſage from him, without leave from both Houſes of Parliament.’ This Declaration and their Grand Remonſtrance in the Year 1641, are the Original mighty Libels againſt the King and his Government, from which the whole Swarm of little Libellers ſeem to have ſince copied: And this at preſent was ſo virulent, diſingenuous, and falſe, that the Framers of it ſeem'd already to erect the High Court of Juſtice, and to draw up the very Form of Impeachment againſt the King. Even Hollis himſelf, who had been too much concern'd in the former Remonſtrance, utterly condemns this; and looks upon three of the Particulars, as to the Betraying of Rochelle, the Rebellion in Ireland, and the Death of King James, as Things altogether incredible and abſurd.

This Declaration found great Oppoſition in the Houſe of Commons, by reaſon of the Reproaches now caſt upon the Perſon of the King, which in their former Declarations had been always charg'd upon Evil Counſellors, and Perſons about him; for which ſome had been ſentenc'd and condemn'd for thoſe very Crimes of which they now accus'd his Majeſty. But greater Exception was made to their Concluſion, That therefore they wou'd addreſs themſelves no more to him; and Mr. Maynard himſelf, who had too much concurr'd with their irregular and unjuſt Proceedings, after he had warmly oppos'd, and unanſwerably contradicted the moſt odious Parts of their Declaration, plainly told them, ‘ That by their laſt Reſolution, they did, as far as in them lay, diſſolve the Parliament; and That, from the Time of that Determination, he knew not with what Security, in Point of Law, they cou'd meet together, or any Man joyn with them: That it was of the Eſſence of Parliament, that they ſhou'd upon all Occaſions repair to the King; and that his Majeſty's Refuſal at any Time to receive their Petitions or Addreſſes, had been always held the higheſt Breach of their Privilege, becauſe it tended to their Diſſolution without diſſolving them; and therefore if they, on their Parts, ſhou'd now determine that they wou'd receive no more Meſſages from him, nor make Addreſſes to him, they did, in Effect, declare That they were no longer a Parliament.’ This Argumentation being bravely urg'd by a Man of that Authority in the Law, who had very ſeldom been disbeliev'd, made a mighty Impreſſion upon all who had not proſtituted themſelves to Cromwell and his Party. But the other Side, knowing where their Strength lay, call'd for the Queſtion, and carry'd it by a Majority, as they foreſaw they ſhou'd; many who abhorr'd the Determination, wanting Courage to own their Diſſent, and others ſatisfying themſelves with a future Withdrawing from their Counſels, as Maynard did, till they cou'd hope to ſee a Reverſal of this Monſtrous Determination. Being paſs'd the Houſe of Peers, where it met with little Oppoſition, it was immediately printed, and new Orders ſent to the Iſle of Wight, to prevent the King's Eſcape.

Maynard's Arguments againſt it.

These Proceedings were of ſuch infinite Scandal to all indifferent People, who cou'd hearken to their Reaſon, or their Conſcience, that they produc'd great Diſcontents and Murmurings, and innumerable repenting Thoughts for former Heats and violent Tranſactions: Many Pamphlets were now publiſh'd that ſhew'd the Parliament to be the great Grievance of the Nation; ſuch as The Parliament's Ten Commandments, &c. another intitled The New Teſtament of our Lords and Saviours the Houſe of Commons ſitting at Weſtminſter; and ſeveral others; the Parliament in vain burning the Books, and offering Money for the Diſcovery of the Authors. Several Apologies were alſo publiſh'd in full Anſwer to the laſt Declaration; and the King Himſelf, tho' deſtitute of Friends and Aſſiſtants, penn'd an elegant Declaration and Apology, and found means to get it printed: In which he not only clear'd Himſelf from the Crimes laid to his Charge, but retorted all thoſe Wickedneſſes they were ſo viſibly Guilty of, upon their own Heads. ‘ He repreſents his wretched and diſconſolate Condition, through a long and rigid Impriſonment; and declares with what Earneſtneſs he had endeavour'd the compoſing all Things in a deſirable Peace, and gives unanſwerable Reaſons why he cou'd not yield his Aſſent to the four Dethroning Bills. He therefore appeals to the whole World Why, or How he had deſerv'd this Uſage? eſpecially by thoſe who were his Subjects, ſince he had Sacrificed all to them for the Peace of his Kingdoms, but, what was more dear to him than his Life, his Honour and Conſcience. He farther mention'd his Compliance with the Army, and their Intereſts; as alſo, of what Importance that was to them, and their often repeated Profeſſions and Engagements, for his juſt Rights and Reſtitution. In Concluſion he asks, If it was Peace they deſir'd? he ſhew'd them the Way to it, to which he wou'd contribute his utmoſt. Was it Plenty and Happineſs? they were the inſeparable Effects of Peace. Was it Security? he that did wiſh, that all Men wou'd forgive and forget like him, had offer'd the Militia for his Time. Was it Liberty of Conſcience? he who wanted it, was moſt ready to give it. Was it the Right Adminiſtration of Juſtice? Offices of Truſt were committed to the Choice of the two Houſes. Finally, Was it the Arrears of the Army? Upon a Settlement they wou'd certainly be paid with much Eaſe, which otherwiſe wou'd ſcarce be poſſible to effect.

The King's Declaration and Apology.

The Death of the Marqueſs of Worceſter;

We ſhall conclude this melancholy Period with the Deaths of ſeveral conſiderable Perſons that hapned in this Year 1647; as Firſt, Henry Somerſet Marqueſs of Worceſter, that old loyal Nobleman that has been more than once mention'd; a Perſon of a pleaſant and facetious Temper, and of a generous and munificent Diſpoſition; but now was ſtript of all his large Poſſeſſions, and cou'd not ſave Mony for his own Funeral. Next, Dr. Walter Curle, a worthy and active Divine, a Cantabrigian by Education, who through ſeveral Stations and Preferments was advanc'd to be Biſhop of Winchester, and Lord Almoner to the King; in both which Places he gain'd great Reputation with Men of Note, and the true Sons of the Church of England. Dr. Robert Pink, Warden of New-College in Oxford, was a Divine in a lower Station, but particularly eſteem'd for his great Worth and Learning, both by King James and the preſent King; and now much lamented by his Collegiates, to whom he had been an admirable Governor, by the Poor of Oxford, to whom he had been a conſtant Benefactor, by the Orphans, to whom he had been a Father, and by all good Men, to whom he had been an Example of every Virtue. The two next to be mention'd are Mr. Degorie Whear, and Mr. Thomas Farnabie, Men of a different Stamp and Genius: The Former was Principal of Gloceſter Hall in Oxford, and made by the great Mr. Camden his firſt Reader of the Hiſtory Lecture, which he founded in that Univerſity; and is chiefly to be remember'd for his Maſterly Skill in his particular Profeſſion. The Latter, Mr. Farnabie, was the famous School-Maſter of Sevenock in Kent, who was accounted the chief Grammarian, Rhetorician, Poet, Latiniſt and Grecian of his Time; and his School was ſo much frequented, that more Church-Men and States-Men went from thence, than from any taught by one Man in England. Beſides theſe, we are to mention Sir William Boſwell, for ſome Years Reſident or Leiger Ambaſſador to the United Provinces; a Man of conſpicuous Learning, and a generous Encourager of it, zealous for the Church of England, faithful in his Employments, highly eſteem'd, and much lamented at his Death. Next, Sir John Lamb, of whom mention has been formerly made, a Cantabrigian

Mr. Udall,

And the Lord Fairfax.

Doctor of the Civil Law, and Dean of the Arches; a Man of great Parts and Activity, and a warm Proſecutor of the Puritans; for which he became a very great Sufferer in theſe diſmal Times, and after ſeveral Plunderings, Sequeſtrations and Compoſitions, he dy'd in a very low Condition. Laſtly, Mr. Ephraim Udall, a worthy and learned Divine of London of the Puritan Stamp; who notwithſtanding his exemplary Piety, Humility, Devotion, &c. for not going full Lengths with his Party, was by them ſilenc'd, plunder'd, impriſon'd, and left to great Want and Miſery. After all theſe we muſt mention Ferdinando Lord Fairfax, Father to Sir Thomas Fairfax the preſent General, a Perſon often mention'd, who now dy'd at York on the 13th Day of March, upon a Sickneſs occaſion'd by a Bruiſe on his Foot where a Corn was growing, which turning to a Gangrene took away his Life: Upon which the Houſe of Commons immediately order'd, ' That his Excellency, now Lord ' Fairfax, ſhou'd be Keeper of Pontfract Caſtle, Cuſtos ' Rotulorum for Yorkſhire, chief Ranger, &c.' the Places before held by his deceaſed Father.

Great Oppreſſions by the Army, and Confuſions.

IV. 1. We are now entering upon the grand fatal Year of Forty Eight, a Year of Darkneſs and Infamy exceeding all that had paſs'd before it; a Year labouring under a Complication of all Sorts of Miſeries and Misfortunes; a Year curs'd with all the ill Seaſons of Weather, with new Scenes of Blood and Confuſion, and with the deepeſt Villanies and Treaſons that ever had diſhonour'd the Engliſh Nation. In the Beginning of it, the Votes of Non-Addreſſes, and the enſuing Declaration, rais'd a general Deteſtation, and open'd the Mouths of the People againſt both Parliament and Army; and the Clamour was improv'd by the Increaſe of Taxes and Impoſitions, rais'd by new Ordinances of Parliament: And tho' they were ſo intirely poſſeſs'd of the whole Power and Force of the Kingdom, that they had no Enemy to apprehend, yet they disbanded no Part of their Army; and notwithſtanding the incredible Sums rais'd by the Sale of Crown and Church-Lands, Delinquents Eſtates, Compoſitions, &c. they ſtill augmented the publick Taxes; and beſides all Cuſtoms and Exciſe, they levy'd a Monthly Contribution of above a hundred thouſand Pounds throughout the Kingdom; which being at a Time when they had no Enemy to oppoſe them, it was evident that the Army was ſtill kept up, to confirm their Reſolution of having no more to do with the King, and that made the Reſolution the more odious. All this became the more inſupportable, by reaſon that upon publiſhing this unheard-of Declaration, moſt of thoſe Men of Condition, who throughout the Kingdom had been ſeduc'd into unwarrantable Imployments, withdrew themſelves from the Service of the Parliament. So now a more inferior Sort of the Common People came into Power; and they, who within a few Years, were not above the Condition of ordinary Conſtables, now became Juſtices of Peace, Sequeſtrators, and Commiſſioners, who executed the Commands of their Maſters with the moſt inſolent Rigour and Tyranny. In effect, the whole Government of the Nation remain'd wholly in the Hands of thoſe, who in the Beginning of the Parliament were ſcarce ever heard of, or their Names known but in the Places of their Habitation. The eminent Presbyterians were remov'd from Places of the greateſt Profit and Authority, which diſpos'd them to all Reſolutions of Revenge; but the Pulpit Skirmiſhes were higher than ever; in which the Presbyterians loſt nothing of their Courage, having a great Intereſt in the City, notwithſtanding the Endeavours of the Independents, who, according to the noble Hiſtorian, were more learned and rational. Liberty of Conſcience was now become the great Charter; and Inſpired Perſons preach'd and pray'd when and where they wou'd; and beſides Cromwell himſelf, moſt of the Officers of the Army, and many Common Soldiers, ſhew'd their Gifts that way. The Univerſities were both purg'd and reform'd from all malignant Members; Anabaptiſts grew very numerous, with whom the Independents joyn'd ſo far as to the aboliſhing of all Tithes, now the Patrimony of the Presbyterians, and therefore proſecuted by one Party, and defended by the other, with equal Heat and Animoſity: So that there never was ſuch a Scene of Diſtraction, as at this Time had ſpread it ſelf over the Face of the whole Kingdom.

Reſolutions to reſcue the King.

In this Time of univerſal Diſcontent and Murmuring, the Presbyterians diſcours'd freely of great Hopes from Scotland; and moſt Perſons awaked out of their Lethargy, and began to reſolve to vindicate their Sovereign, and their Liberties, by the Way of Arms. But firſt they try'd the Effects of Petitioning, in which the Men of Eſſex led the Way; being follow'd by them of Surry in greater Numbers, requiring, ' That the Treaty with the King might be ' renew'd, and that the Army be paid off, and disbanded.' But their Reception was very rude, and contrary to Decency; ſeveral being beaten, and plunder'd, and ſome ſlain by their Guards. Inſomuch that the Kentiſh Men having likewiſe fram'd a Petition for Peace, upon the like Uſage by a Party of Horſe, and being threatned to have two hang'd out of each Pariſh that were Promoters of it, and the reſt ſequeſter'd, they reſolv'd to ſtand bravely to their Cauſe, and carry their Petition in one Hand, and their Sword in the other. So that in a ſhort time a new Flame broke out, and a ſecond Civil War infeſted the whole Nation.

An Inſurrection in London.

The firſt Appearance of an Inſurrection ſhew'd it ſelf in the City of London; being rather accidental, and not ſo much upon the King's Account. The Parliament had zealouſly voted down Holy-Days, and abrogated all the Feſtivals of the Church; having appointed, in lieu of them, one Day in every Month for publick Recreations. The Apprentices, according to Cuſtom, had met in ſome Numbers in Moor-Fields on the 9th Day of April, to play and divert themſelves; but this being a Sunday, it rais'd the Indignation of ſome Officers of the Train'd-Bands, who with their Guards endeavour'd to force them away; but were themſelves routed by theſe young Perſons with Stones and Clubs, who took their Colours from them, and in a childiſh Bravery, marching into the Streets, frighted Warner the preſent Lord-Mayor into his Houſe; and taking away a Drake from his Door, planted it at Ludgate neareſt the chief Foe, the Army, then lodging about White-hall. Their Numbers encreaſing that Night, Fairfax entering with ſome Regiments of Horſe and Foot at Alderſgate, eaſily diſpers'd them, tho' very numerous, no Perſon of Quality undertaking their Conduct. The better to keep the City in Awe, two Regiments of Foot and a Troop of Horſe were put into the Tower; the Common-Council very humbly ſubmitting, and diſowning the Inſurrection, deſiring the chief Actors might be puniſh'd, and promiſing for themſelves and the City never to do the like. However the better to oblige them to obſerve their Promiſe, as they had before demoliſhed their Fortifications, ſo now the very Poſts and Chains were pull'd down, and the Citizens forc'd to raiſe a thouſand Pounds for a Gratuity to their new Deliverers, the two Regiments that had ſubdu'd the Apprentices.

A ſecond CIVIL WAR.

Part of Wales revolt,

2. The Fame of this tumultuous Inſurrection, or uncommon Riot, was ſoon carry'd with Advantage throughout the Kingdom, which, tho' ſtifled in its Infancy, ſeem'd to animate the oppreſs'd Populace to follow the Example; by which they might redeem themſelves, and their Liberties, from their impending Slavery. The Welſh were the firſt that took up Arms under the Conduct of Major-General Laughorn, Colonel Poyer and Colonel Powell, all three formerly zealous Aſſerters of the Parliament's Juriſdiction. But now being to be disbanded by Orders of the Council of War of the Army, they refus'd to obey; and the better to ſecure themſelves, declar'd for the King, and acted by Commiſſion and Powers from the preſent Prince of Wales. Laughorn ſuddenly increas'd his Numbers by the Acceſſion of Major-General Stradling, and others of the King's Party, to a conſiderable Army, eſteem'd eight thouſand ſtrong; which in a ſhort Time render'd him Maſter of the Town and Caſtles of Pembroke and Tenby. At the ſame Time Sir Nicholas Kemiſh ſurpris'd Chepſtow-Caſtle; and Sir John Owen, another eminent Cavalier in North-Wales, defeated the high Sheriff of Caernarvan, and took him Priſoner. So that all Wales ſeem'd at once to ſhake off that cruel Yoak, under which they ſo long and hardly labour'd.

And Kent;

And the Fleet,

Nor were the Preparations of the Kentiſh Men for a War leſs formidable; for rendezvouſing near Rocheſter, they choſe Goring Earl of Norwich, then upon the Place, to be their General; a Perſon of great Intereſt and Acquaintance from his extraordinary pleaſant Diſpoſition, but not ſo proper for any great Command. Great Numbers of Apprentices, and reform'd Officers and Soldiers daily flock'd from London to their Quarters; which ſo terrify'd the Parliament, that they ſuddenly reſtor'd to the City their Militia, which they fear'd otherwiſe might be extorted from them, hoping by this Confidence to render them more ſecure to their Intereſt; and Skippon being readmitted to the Command of their Forces, the Communication with Kent was interrupted, by placing Guards upon the Paſſages of the River. The Increaſe of the Kentiſh Forces gave ſuch Encouragement to the Sea-men, that a great Part of the Navy, to the Number of twenty Men of War, deteſting the Tyranny of their old Maſters, deſerted them, and revolted to the Prince of Wales; and Batten himſelf, one of their prime Leaders, having been diſmiſs'd by them, return'd to his Duty, and freely joyn'd with his Highneſs, who undertook the Command of the Fleet. The Sea-men had expos'd Rainsborough their Admiral, and a turbulent Leveller, by putting him on Shore; and now embracing the King's Party with univerſal Conſent, ſeem'd reſolv'd to expiate their former Errors, and to merit their Pardon by the Eminency of their Services. About the ſame Time the Duke of York found Means to eſcape from the Palace at St. James's, in Women's Apparel; and, by the Aſſiſtance of Colonel Bamfield, arriv'd firſt in Holland, and ſoon after in this new revolted Fleet.

And the North,

And other Places.

But the Clouds that threatned the fierceſt Storm, gather'd in the North, where Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and other Royaliſts, having ſurpris'd the ſtrong Town of Berwick, and Sir Philip Muſgrave and Sir Thomas Glemham that of Carliſle, had rais'd conſiderable Forces to joyn with the Scots, now ready with a powerful Army to enter England, who ſeem'd no leſs able than willing to effect what they pretended, the Reſtoration of their King: Tho' it be true, that the Scots Declaration had ſo many unreaſonable Reſtrictions in it, that nothing but the frank Loyalty of the King's Party could have oblig'd them to joyn with that Nation. Indeed upon the firſt Rumour of their Army, many of the Engliſh repair'd into Scotland, which caus'd the Houſes at Weſtminſter, by their Deputies, to require the Delivery of the chief of them as Incendiaries between England and Scotland. They particularly nam'd Wogan, who carry'd over a Troop thither, with Sir Thomas Glemham and others: But the Scots refus'd the Demand, as being not ſtipulated in the Treaties between both Nations; declaring, They judg'd not thoſe to be Incendiaries between the two Kingdoms, but only between the King and the Kingdom of England. Likewiſe the Earl of Holland, now touch'd with the Senſe of his former Errors, with the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Francis his Brother, the Earl of Peterborough, and ſome others of Quality, appear'd near Kingſton, with a Body of five hundred Horſe and ſome Foot, for his Majeſty's Service. Tinmouth-Caſtle was ſeiz'd upon by Major Lilburn, Brother to Colonel John; Scarborough-Caſtle declar'd for the King, under the Command of Sir Matthew Boynton; and Pomfret was artfully ſurpris'd by Major Morrice. All Things were carry'd on with little Reſervation; and there was ſcarce a County in England, in which there was not ſome Aſſociation begun to appear in Arms in Favour of the King.

The Parliament's Projects.

3. Theſe Revolts and Preparations for a new War became very formidable to the Leaders at Weſtminſter: who, notwithſtanding their extenſive Power, found many Difficulties in eſtabliſhing their own Authority with the Peace of the Kingdom. Their firſt Attempt was to get Hands out of ſeveral Counties by way of Approbation and Confirmation of their Votes of Non-Addreſſes, and their late Declaration. Accordingly Prideanx endeavour'd to engage the whole County of Somerſet, but could prevail no farther than with a few Sectaries of the Town of Taunton, to thank the Houſes for theſe Votes; which was ſeconded through the Induſtry of Serjeant Wild, as he rode the Circuit, by the Subſcription of a pack'd Grand-Jury for the County. Colonel Pureſoy went upon the ſame Employment in Warwickſhire, and Sir Arthur Haſlerigg about Newcaſtle; but all with as ſmall Succeſs as Sir Henry Mildmay had in the County of Eſſex; tho' great Endeavours, even ſometimes to Compulſion, were us'd to gain this Point. They likewiſe form'd A Committee of Safety for the Common-wealth, which daily ſat at Derby-Houſe, in the ſame Place where the Committee for both Kingdoms, England and Scotland, had ſat before. This conſiſted of twenty Perſons, ſeven Lords, the Earls of Northumberland, Kent, Warwick and Mancheſter, the Lords Say, Wharton and Roberts; and thirteen of the Commons, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. N. Fiennes, Sir Henry Vane Senior, and Junior, Sir William Armyn, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir John Evelin, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, Mr. Saint John, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Crew, and Mr. Brown. To this Committee Power was given to ſuppreſs all Tumults and Inſurrections, and to that Purpoſe to raiſe Forces as they ſaw Occaſion. But before the Houſes made uſe of their Arms, they reviv'd their Votes of 1642, Declaring, That it appears, That the King, ſeduc'd by wicked Counſel, tho' then a cloſe Priſoner, intends to make War againſt the Parliament.

Their Votes.

Fairfax reduces Kent,

And beſieges Colcheſter.

Theſe Inſurrections for the King happening at different Times, and all of them too ſoon for the Arrival of the Scots, who were not unanimous in their Expedition, they were the more eaſily ſuppreſs'd, eſpecially by a regular Army. In order to effect this, the Army was divided: Cromwell was ſent into Wales and the North; and Fairfax, who was unwilling to fight againſt the Scots, undertook the Kentiſh Expedition. Accordingly that General march'd out of London with ſix thouſand Foot and two thouſand Horſe into Kent; where the Cavaliers being unfortunately ſeparated, and fighting ſingly by Parties, were eaſily vanquiſh'd and diſpers'd. Fifteen hundred of them, brave Men, were ſent to Maidſtone, to oppoſe their Enemies Paſſage in that Town; who fought with ſo much Valour and Reſolution, that after they had been beaten from the Avenues and Hedges, they ſtill kept the Place, firing from the Houſes and Leads, for above the Space of ſix Hours, with great Slaughter of the Enemy: So that it was believ'd, that if the Earl of Norwich had come up with the reſt of the Army to their Aſſiſtance, Fairfax and his Army would have been that Day totally defeated. But he dividing his Forces, ſent half of them to Dover, and himſelf march'd with the reſt to Black-Heath; and being now deny'd a Paſſage through the City of London, which had been promis'd him, he ferry'd and ſwim'd over his ſmall Army from Greenwich to the Iſle of Dogs. From thence he mov'd to Mile-End-Green; but ſeeing none come out of London to his Relief, as he fully expected, he himſelf with only five hundred Men joyn'd with the Eſſex Men at Bow, under the Command of Sir Charles Lucas; the reſt of his Soldiers having deſerted upon their Diſappointment of the London Aſſiſtance. Here they all ſtay'd for ſome Time, to favour any loyal Attempt that might be made at London; till at length they were compell'd to diſlodge by reaſon of the Approach of Fairfax, who having diſpatch'd Rich and Barkſtead with their Regiments to reduce thoſe Caſtles which the Kentiſh Men had taken towards the Downs, had now paſs'd the Thames at Graveſend. Then marching further into the Country, they ſeiz'd a Store of Arms and Ammunition in the Earl of Warwick's Houſe at Lees; and having ſurpris'd the Parliament Committee at Chelmsford, advanc'd to Colcheſter, where the brave Lord Capel joyn'd them with ſome Horſe; and all of them receiv'd the Van of Fairfax's Army with ſuch Gallantry at the Town's End, that they forc'd them to retire to their main Body with conſiderable Loſs. If they had not been ſo cloſely purſu'd, they deſign'd to have march'd further, with Hopes of powerful Aſſiſtance from the Inhabitants of Norfolk and Suffolk. But theſe not only failing, but joyning with the Enemy, contrary to their ſolemn Promiſes, the Royaliſts were beſieg'd in this Town, a Place no way tenable in it ſelf; but by the incomparable Fortitude of the Defendants, it prov'd one of the moſt memorable Sieges in the whole War.

Cromwell reduces Wales.

The E. of Holland defeated and taken.

In the mean Time Cromwell's Progreſs was no leſs ſucceſsful in Wales, where Laughorn's Army was ſoon defeated at St. Fagons, May the 8th, by Colonel Horton, with ſcarce half the Number, and with the Loſs of fifteen hundred ſlain, and near three thouſand taken Priſoners. Cromwell purſu'd Laughorn and Powell and the ſcatter'd Remainders into Pembroke, which Place he cloſely inveſted; having firſt taken Tenby-Caſtle, and forc'd that of Chepſtow by Colonel Eure, who ſlew the Governour in cold Blood. The Rumour of the Scotch Invaſion daily increaſing, animated Cromwell to employ all his Skill and Vigour for the Reduction of this important Poſt of Pembroke. The Garriſon within was ſtrong and reſolute, and the Place well fortify'd, which however he reſolv'd to attempt by Storm; and falling on with ſingular Courage, was as bravely receiv'd, and at length repell'd with great Slaughter of his Men. After this not thinking it adviſeable to expoſe his diſcourag'd Soldiers to new Hazards, he reſolv'd to gain that by Famine, which he could not effect by Force. Which being perceiv'd by the Garriſon, they choſe rather to ſurrender upon Terms, than languiſh in the Miſeries of a tedious Siege; tho' they had a fair Proſpect of a general Inſurrection in the Kingdom, and the Certainty of the Scots Invaſion. But Cromwell, being ſenſible how precious his Time was, offer'd the Soldiery and inferior Officers very good Conditions; by which Means he had this ſtrong Place with the three chief Commanders, Laughorn, Poyer and Powell, deliver'd into his Hands by theſe faithleſs People. Nor was Sir John Owen more fortunate in North-Wales, being defeated and taken Priſoner by Colonel Mitton. So that the whole Country being again reduc'd to the Parliament's Obedience, Cromwell was at Liberty to march againſt the Scots with all his Power. As to the Inſurrection by the Earl of Holland, the Duke of Buckingham, and other Noble Men, that was ſoon ſuppreſs'd, but not without ſome bloody Skirmiſhes; in one of which the brave and beautiful young Lord Francis Villars, Brother to the Duke of Buckingham, refuſing Quarter, was barbarouſly ſlain by an unknown Hand. The Earl of Holland was taken in his Flight at St. Neots by Colonel Scroop; where Dalbier, ſometime Favourite to the Earl of Eſſex, was kill'd in his Quarters. The Earl of Holland was ſent Priſoner to Warwick-Caſtle, but the Duke of Buckingham with great Difficulty eſcap'd into Holland.

The Prince appears with a Fleet.

About the ſame Time Prince Charles, with the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, the Lords Hopton, Wilmot, Willoughby, Colepeper, and others of Name and Quality, ſailed from Holland with the late revolted Fleet, conſiſting of twenty Men of War, and came into Yarmouth Road, with Deſign to attempt any Thing that was poſſible for the Relief of Colcheſter, then cloſely beſieg'd. But finding the Diſtance from that Town too great, and the Shore and Paſſages poſſeſs'd by the numerous Enemy, his Highneſs ſail'd to the Mouth of the Thames, where he took ſeveral Veſſels, and caus'd great Apprehenſion and Terror to the City of London. But his Stay there was not long, the Caſtles of Deal, Walmer and Sandwich requiring his ſpecial Aſſiſtance; which he attempted by landing five hundred Men; who tho' they fought with great Courage and Gallantry, were yet forc'd back to their Ships with great Loſs; and the Caſtles, after this Defeat, were immediately ſurrender'd to the Parliament. By this Time the Earl of Warwick, lately reſtor'd to his Admiral's Place, had fitted out another Fleet in the River; and having joyn'd that at Portſmouth, reſolv'd to fight the Prince; which he ſtill delay'd for ſome Time, not only terrify'd with the Revolt of others, but under ſome Apprehenſion of the Fidelity of his own Men. The Prince perceiving this, courted the Earl with munificent Offers, to the return of his Duty; but he, immoveably obſtinate, perſiſted in his Rebellion; tho' in Recompence for his Services he was diſgracefully outed of all Truſt, and ſaw his only Brother, the Earl of Holland, beheaded for his late Return to his Obedience. Some were of Opinion, that the Royaliſts omitted a fair Opportunity of fighting, the Seamen being couragious and loyal, and the Enemy a little wavering; tho' the Event afterwards prov'd the contrary. In the mean Time, the Prince ſeeing his Land Forces every where defeated, and the adverſe Fleet daily encreaſing in Strength, return'd into Holland, giving the Command of the Fleet to Prince Rupert; but many of the Ships, out of an innate Levity of their Sea-Men, leaving the Prince, return'd to the Earl of Warwick, while the reſt continuing in their Duty, firmly adhered to their new Admiral.

He returns to Holland.

Duke Hamilton enters England with an Army.

4. But the moſt material and important Tranſaction at this Time, was the Expedition of the Scots, who had three ſeveral Times taken up Arms againſt the King and his Party, and had twice enter'd England with all the Advantages of Conqueſt, Plunder, and unuſual Rewards. Now a fourth Attempt was reſolv'd on, upon a different Cauſe, and for the Delivery of the King; and in a great meaſure undertaken by the Intereſt and Influence of Duke Hamilton himſelf, who ſeem'd now to have exerted Himſelf beyond all his former Proceedings, and did ſufficiently ſhew that his Authority was very great in Scotland, notwithſtanding all the powerful Oppoſition of Argyle, and the Kirk Party. He put himſelf at the Head of a very conſiderable Army, with which he enter'd the Kingdom of England upon the eighth Day of July, in a more gallant Manner and Equipage, than the Scots had formerly appear'd. According to Fame, the Army conſiſted of twenty thouſand Foot, and ſix thouſand Horſe; but when they came to their Misfortunes, they ſaid, that the Kirk Party had given them ſo many Interruptions, that they march'd with but ten thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe: Tho' Biſhop Guthry tells us, That the Army was one of the greateſt and beſt furniſh'd that ever Scotland had ſent forth. Whatever they were in Numbers, they gave a very ſlender Account, either of their Bravery of Courage, or Solidity of Conduct. Hamilton was the General, and the Earl of Calender, an experienc'd Soldier, was Lieutenant-General, and Bayly was Major-General of the Foot, and Middleton commanded the Horſe. The beſt Body of Men they had, were not made uſe of; for Colonel Monro, who came to their Aſſiſtance from Ireland, whoſe Men were veteran and experienc'd Soldiers, being unwilling to be commanded by Calender, was impolitickly left behind about Appleby and thoſe Parts.

The March of the Army.

This Army came out of their Country without, and contrary to the Bleſſing of the Kirk, and without holding any reaſonable Correſpondence with their Engliſh Friends. There were great Diviſions among themſelves, eſpecially between Hamilton and Calender; and the former having incommunicable and clandeſtine Deſigns, concerted Nothing with any of the Engliſh in their ſeveral Inſurrections; who thereby judging his Deſign to be only Presbyterian, and as much againſt the King's Honour and Conſcience, as their former Proceedings had been, and fearing that the Original was form'd for ſome particular Advantage to the Scotch Nation, they thus precipitately threw Themſelves into the Miſadventures beforemention'd. The Scotch Army march'd very ſlowly, and with great Negligence, and indeed with ſo little Apprehenſion of an Enemy, that one Part of it was oftentimes twenty Miles diſtant from another. Having joyn'd Sir Marmaduke Langdale, or rather permitted him to march before them, with his Engliſh Body of near four thouſand Foot, and ſeven hundred Horſe, they paſs'd through Cumberland and Weſtmorland; and at Kendall, upon a long Debate, they unfortunately took the worſt Counſel, and reſolv'd to make their Way through Lancaſhire, and not Yorkſhire, tho' that Country was known to be much more loyal and unanimous for the King, and the other as much ſecur'd to the Parliament. Therefore Lambert, who firſt gave great Interruptions to this Army's Progreſs, found a much more eaſy Task, eſpecially having Cromwell coming up after him. So that he for ſome Time skilfully choſe rather to haraſs this Army than to fight it; and to let them advance, that they might have the longer Way to retreat home; and they made ſo many ſeveral and inconvenient Halts, that the Army was daily diminiſh'd, and often ſeparated to very great Diſadvantage; all which have been attributed either to dark Deſigns in the Army, Diviſions, or weak Management. Indeed they were aſham'd to march backwards; for ſuch a diſhonourable Retreat wou'd have brought them into Contempt in their own Country; and if they did, they were ſure to be follow'd by Lambert and Cromwell.

They are routed by Cromwell near Preſton.

After they had been about five Weeks in England, they came to ſome ſharp Fighting, but were routed and diſpers'd without the Formality of a Battel. This was on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt about Wigan, or rather near Preſton in Lancaſhire, where Sir Marmaduke Langdale, being at ſome Diſtance before the Scotch Army, engag'd the Enemy with uncommon Bravery; and maintain'd the Diſpute for ſix Hours; but being neglected, and no ways ſuccour'd by the Scots, he was oppreſs'd by the adverſe Multitudes; tho' he afterwards declar'd, That if one thouſand Foot had been ſent to him, he verily believ'd he ſhou'd have gain'd the Day; and Cromwell himſelf acknowledg'd, That he never ſaw Foot fight ſo deſperately as they did. It is believ'd, That the Scots preſum'd upon their own Power, and thinking to conquer by themſelves, and conſequently gain the Advantage of the Victory, and the Honour of Reſtoring the King, abandon'd them that fought ſo well, and by this fooliſh Precaution or Preſumption, contributed to their own Ruin. Being hardly preſs'd upon, Major-General Bayly, after ſharp Encounters with thoſe who purſu'd him, having recover'd Warrington Bridge, deliver'd up Himſelf and four thouſand Foot to the Mercy of the Conqueror. Middleton, who commanded the Cavalry, was intercepted with four hundred Horſe, and Hamilton himſelf having advanc'd farther inſtead of returning back, at Uxeter in Staffordſhire, with three thouſand Horſe, was taken without a Blow, ſo remarkably, that it was not known whether it was by the Country Troops, or by the Lord Gray of Groby, or by ſome of Lambert's Colonels, ſent to capitulate with him: To which laſt he intitled himſelf a Priſoner, as moſt for the Security of his Life, which with all his Dexterity he cou'd not ſave, tho' he remain'd ſo long a Priſoner, that at Windſor his Maſter and he were both together; and whom he ſaw carry'd away to be murther'd, and not long after went himſelf to be executed. Thus the Scots were defeated by an Army amounting but to a Third Part of their Number. And Ludlow tells us, that when the News of this Loſs came to the Iſle of Wight, the King ſaid to the Governor, That it was the worſt News that ever came to England; to which he anſwer'd, His Majeſty had no reaſon to be of that Opinion, ſince if Hamilton had beaten the Engliſh, he wou'd have certainly poſſeſs'd Himſelf of the Throne of England and Scotland: The King preſently reply'd, You are miſtaken, I cou'd have commanded him back with the Motion of my Hand.

Cromwell marches to Edinburgh.

His Return.

While this was tranſacting in England, the Marqueſs of Argyle was endeavouring to defeat the Earl of Lanerick, and had beſieg'd Sterlin-Caſtle in Scotland; but loſt a good Part of his Men by the Arrival of Monro, who eaſily eſcap'd out of England. At length Monro came to Conditions for the Arrears of his own and his Men's Pay, and for the Accommodations that were to be given him for Tranſporting his Men into Ireland: But while they were in ſmall Companies marching to the Sea-Side, they receiv'd the unwelcome News, That Carickfergus, Belfaſt, and Colrain, their chief Holds in Ireland, were betray'd by their own Officers into the Hands of General Monk, who then commanded the Engliſh Army in Ireland. And thus Providence blaſted all the Scotch Subtleties and Intereſt, both in their own Country, and in England and Ireland; and Cromwell, having Carliſle and Berwick deliver'd up to him, enter'd their Nation and came to Edinburgh it ſelf. Here joyning Forces and Counſels with Argyle, by whom he had been invited; they not only oblig'd the contrary Faction to lay down Arms, but having Summon'd another Parliament, condemn'd the late Expedition as unjuſt and treaſonable. The Pulpits were fill'd with Invectives againſt the Sinfulneſs of it, and Solemn Faſts enjoyn'd by the Aſſembly to implore God's Pardon for that heinous Tranſgreſſion; the Chancellor Lowdon giving the good Example, by making his Recantation and Submiſſion with many Tears. Here it is ſaid that Cromwell concerted with Argyle concerning the Ruin of the King, and Extirpation of Monarchy, and the very Form of the future Regicide: However it was, having ſettled Things in Scotland, Cromwell departed for England, having been moſt magnificently treated and entertain'd by ſome of the Chief of the Kingdom, and complimented by the Kirk as Their Deliverer: which he return'd in as good Scriptural Language, laying his Hand on his Breaſt, and demurely looking on their grave Countenances, and ſmiling to ſee what Ideots he had made of thoſe Politicians at their own ſanctify'd Weapons. In ſhort, he ſo bound the Hands of that Nation, that they had ſcarce any uſe of them but to hold them up to Heaven at the tragical Murther of their Native King, whom by their primitive Rebellions they had brought to this ſinking Condition.

Colcheſter Siege.

It Surrenders.

5. All this while, the Town of Colcheſter held out with incredible Courage and Conſtancy, upon Hopes of Relief from the Scots. The Place was cloſely inveſted by Fairſax and Ireton, on the thirteenth Day of June; and upon the firſt Summons Goring Earl of Norwich ask'd the Trumpeter that brought it, How his General did; and bid him tell his General That he heard he was ill of the Gout, but that Goring wou'd cure him of all Diſeaſes. This unſeaſonable Jeſting, to which that Lord was too much addicted, did highly provoke the Soldiers; and Whitelock in his Manuſcript Additions to his Memorials ſays, That this little Jeſt upon the General was thought to coſt the Lives of many of his Party, and to have promoted his own dangerous Tryal afterwards. The Siege continu'd ten Weeks, accompany'd with the moſt exceſſive Rains, Floods, and diſmal Weather; and the Beſiegers were not only content to defend Themſelves, but did extreamly annoy the Enemy with their frequent Sallies and Camiſades. But at length having almoſt conſum'd their Horſes, Dogs and Cats, and what elſe was no leſs abhorrent to Nature, and their Hopes from the Scots being loſt by the Defeat of Duke Hamilton, they had taken a Reſolution to force their Way through the Enemies Leaguer, or dye nobly; but ſome unworthy Spirits, having infus'd a Belief into the Common Soldiers, that the Commanders and Gentlemen deſign'd to leave them to their Enemies Mercy, the Plot fail'd; So they were compell'd, on the 28th of Auguſt, to ſurrender upon ſuch Conditions as the Enemy wou'd grant them, which were, 'That their ſeveral Regiments ſhou'd lay down their Arms at their ſeveral Poſts, and there remain with their Officers, under Captains, till further Orders: That the Lords, with the reſt of the Officers and Gentlemen, ſhou'd by Eight in the Morning be at the King's-Head, and their Horſes and Arms put into St. Mary's Church-yard: That all the Ordnance ſhou'd be left on the Platforms, and all the Ammunition left in the Magazine at the Town-Hall.

Liſle and Lucas condemn'd, and Shot to Death.

Theſe Articles conluded, the Lord Fairfax enter'd the Town, and having rid in Triumph through the Works, call'd a Council of War, from whence he ſent Colonel Ewers to the Lords and Gentlemen at the King's-Head, who with a ſlighting Air told Sir Charles Lucas, That the General wou'd ſpeak with Him, Sir George Liſle and Sir Bernard Gaſcoigne; and they foreboding their Fate, took their ſolemn Leave of the reſt of the Lords and Gentlemen. Being come before the Council, without being call'd to anſwer for Themſelves, they were convey'd to the Caſtle, where immediately Ireton came and told them, They muſt prepare themſelves to dye: Whereupon Sir Charles ask'd him by what Law? To which the other reply'd, It was by Vote of the Council of War, according to an Order of Parliament, by which all found in Arms were to be proceeded againſt as Traitors. Sir Charles then deſir'd to be reſpited till the Morning, but was deny'd by Ireton; upon which he continu'd, Sir, do not think I make this Requeſt out of a Deſire to live, for I ſcorn to ask Life at your Hands, but that I might have Time to make ſome Addreſſes to God above, and ſettle ſome Things below; but ſince it will not be by your Charity, I muſt ſubmit to the Mercy of God: Do your worſt, I ſhall ſoon be ready for Execution. Sir George Liſle likewiſe deſir'd ſome Reſpit to write to his Father and Mother, but was deny'd; ſo having had ſome private Prayers with the Chaplain, and receiv'd the Sacrament, they were led to the Place of Execution. The Lords and Gentlemen ſent to deſire the General Either to forbear the Execution, or that they might all, who were equally guilty, undergo the ſame Sentence with thoſe Three; but all to no Effect. The firſt brought to the Place was Sir Charles Lucas, who told them He had often look'd Death in the Face, and now they ſhou'd ſee he durſt dye; and ſo after ſome private Prayers, he unbutton'd his Doublet, ſhew'd them his Breaſt, and ſet his Hands to his Sides, calling out, See, I am ready for you; Rebels, do your worſt! At which Word they immediately fired, and ſhooting him in four Places he fell. Whereupon Sir George Liſle ran to him, imbraced, and kiſs'd him; then turning to the Spectators, he ſaid, How many of your Lives have I ſav'd in hot Blood, and muſt now my ſelf be barbarouſly murther'd in cold? but what dare they not do, who wou'd willingly deſtroy my dear Sovereign? for whoſe Deliverance, and Peace to this poor Nation, I dedicate my laſt Prayers to Heaven. Then looking upon the Executioners, and thinking them at too great a Diſtance, he bad them come nearer, at which one of them ſaid I'll warrant you, Sir, we'll hit you: He anſwer'd Smiling, Friends, I have been nearer to you, when you have miſs'd me. And ſo being fir'd at all at once, he fell to the Ground without ſpeaking. Thus they murder'd two Men of great Name and Eſteem in the War, the one being as good a Commander of Horſe, and the other of Foot, as the Nation had; which barbarous Proceeding was generally imputed to Ireton's bloody Diſpoſition: and ſo much I have ſeveral Times been told by a near Kinſman of the General Himſelf. Sir Bernard Gaſcoigne was ready for Execution; but being an Italian, and a Perſon of ſome Intereſt in his own Country, his Life was ſpared.

The End of the ſecond Civil War.

As ſoon as the bloody Sacrifice was ended, Fairfax with his chief Officers went to viſit the noble Priſoners; and the General civilly apply'd himſelf to the Earl of Norwich and the Lord Capel; and ſeeming in ſome Degree to excuſe this Proceeding, which he ſaid The Military Juſtice required; he told them, That all the Lives of the reſt were ſafe; and that they ſhou'd be well treated, and diſpos'd of as the Parliament ſhou'd direct. The Lord Capel had not ſo ſoon digeſted this barbarous Act, as to receive theſe Viſiters with that Civility they expected; but ſaid, They ſhou'd do well to finiſh their Work, and execute the ſame Rigour to the reſt; upon which there paſs'd two or three bitter Replies between him and Ireton, that coſt him his Life a few Months after. When the General had given Notice to the Parliament of his Proceedings, he receiv'd Orders to ſend the Earl of Norwich and the Lord Capel to Windſor Caſtle, where they had afterwards the Society of Duke Hamilton, to lament each other's Misfortunes. The reſt of the Priſoners, as the Lord Loughborough, Sir William Compton, Sir Abraham Shipman, Sir John Watts, Sir Lodowick Dyer, Sir Henry Appleton, Sir Denart Strutt, Sir Hugh Buelly, Sir Richard Maleverer, and many other Officers and Gentlemen, were convey'd to ſeveral Priſons, moſt of them diſtant from each other, and from the Places of their Habitations. Fairfax having perform'd this Service, and fined the Town thirteen thouſand Pounds, march'd to Yarmouth, and round the Country, to ſettle Peace, till he return'd to his Head-Quarters at St. Albans. Thus, except the holding out of Pontfract Caſtle, all Inſurrections were quell'd, and the ſecond Civil War ended in the Space of about five Months.

The King's Confinement.

His Employment.

VI. During the Time of this tumultuous and tempeſtuous Seaſon, the King, tho' under ſevere Confinement, and a diſconſolate Condition, by Means of his unparallel'd Patience, ſeem'd to enjoy all the Eaſe of a calm and undiſturb'd State of Life, in the Iſle of Wight. He was not permitted, as before, to go abroad into the Iſle, but was confin'd within the Lines of Carisbrook-Caſtle; in which Limits he had the Conveniency of a Bowling-Green, and a Summer-Houſe, for Recreation and Retirement. All imaginable Care was taken to keep Strangers from ſpeaking with him, or conveying Letters to him, and to hinder any Communication, without the Knowledge of his Keepers; which at ſeveral Times prov'd ineffectual. Mr. Harrington and Mr. Herbert were the only Perſons allow'd to wait upon his Majeſty in his Bed-Chamber; the latter of whom has given us a particular Account of his Courſe of Life and Studies, during the Time of about eight Months Impriſonment. The Sacred Scripture was the Book he moſt delighted in, and he often read in Biſhop Andrews Sermons, Hooker's Eccleſiaſtical Polity, Dr. Hammond's Works, Villalpandus upon Ezekiel, &c. Sandys's Paraphraſe upon King David's Pſalms, Herbert's Divine Poems; and alſo the Italian Heroick Poems of Taſſo and Arioſto, Spencer's Fairy-Queen, and the like, for alleviating his Spirits after ſerious Studies. Here he compleated his celebrated Book formerly mention'd, which he firſt call'd by the Title of Suſpiria Regalia; and likewiſe tranſlated Dr. Sanderſon's judicious Book de Juramentis. He wrote ſeveral ſhort Engliſh Poems, and ſome Latin Diſtichs in his Books, which teſtify'd his Knowledge and Delight in Learning. For he underſtood Authors in the Originals, whether Greek, Latin, French, Spaniſh or Italian, which three laſt he ſpoke perfectly; and none was better read in Hiſtory of all Sorts, which render'd him an accompliſh'd Perſon, and alſo wou'd diſcourſe well in Arts and Sciences, and never at a Loſs in any Subject. In many of his Books he delighted himſelf with the Motto Dum Spiro Spero; which he wrote frequently as the Emblem of his Hopes as well as Endeavours for a happy Agreement with the Parliament. He was moſt regular and exact in his Devotions, and all the Time ſhew'd himſelf an admirable Example of Magnanimity and Patience. Yet three Things ſeem to have laid heavy upon his Spirits, as appears by the Prayer and Confeſſion he made for the Times of his Affliction, in which are theſe remarkable Words: Was it through Ignorance, that I ſuffer'd innocent Blood to be ſhed by a falſe pretended Juſtice? Or that I permitted a wrong Way of thy Worſhip to be ſet up in Scotland? And injur'd the Biſhops in England? O no; but with Shame and Grief I confeſs, that I therein follow'd the Per- ſuaſions of Worldly Wiſdom, forſaking the Dictates of a right informed Conſcience. He delighted in one Saying that is worthy of Remembrance, He cou'd more willingly loſe his Crowns than his Credit, his Kingdoms being leſs valuable to him than his Honour and Reputation.

Several Attempts to eſcape.

Notwithſtanding the King's great Reſtraint, and the Care taken that few ſhou'd be about him but Men of inhuman Tempers and Natures, his gracious Diſpoſition and generous Affability ſtill wrought upon ſome Soldier, or other ſtrict Obſerver of him, to undertake and perform ſome Offices of Truſt, in conveying Papers and Letters to and from him, with the utmoſt Secrecy. Sometimes Letters were thruſt through the Chink of the Wall into his Bed-Chamber, and ſometimes little Notes put into the Fingers of his Gloves, and other private Methods us'd by ſuch as Hammond had appointed to be his Conſervators. Among theſe none was more ſerviceable than Mr. Thomas Firebrace, who found out ſeveral Ways of converſing with his Majeſty, and conveying Letters of Moment both to and from him in the Time of his greateſt Difficulty. One Oſborne alſo was ſo affected with the Sweetneſs and Dignity of his Behaviour, that he became a ſecret Convert, and us'd all Ways and Methods to oblige and ſerve his Majeſty, together with one Doucet, who heartily join'd with him in the ſame loyal Deſign. Theſe all incourag'd the King to make his Eſcape, and provided all the Aſſiſtance they ſafely cou'd; and his Majeſty was ſo far prevail'd upon, that on one dark Night, when all things were prepar'd for him, he endeavour'd to get out of his Window by a Cord; but he unfortunately ſtuck in the Window, and it was with great Difficulty he got back again, as Firebrace informs us in his Memoirs. Another Time the King, having ſawn an Iron Bar aſunder in his Window, was ready for an Eſcape; but ſome Diſcovery was made by thoſe concerned in it, ſo that if he had proceeded, he wou'd have been ſhot dead by one Rolph, a bloody Captain got ready for that Purpoſe. Mr. Worſley of the Iſle, and Mr. Newland of Newport were both very aſſiſting in all Attempts for his Majeſty's Eſcape; and by ſome of the King's Letters of late publiſh'd by Mr. Wagſtaff, we find ſeveral Perſons, both in and out of the Iſle, concern'd in the ſame or the like Deſigns; but their Names being in Figures, we want a ſufficient Key to uncipher them.

Rolph's Conſpiracy.

As to Captain Rolph, he having form'd a Conſpiracy to deſtroy the King by Poyſon, Aſſaſſination, or any other Way, and fully diſcover'd his Intention to Oſborne and Doucet, the former gave Notice of it to the Lord Wharton, and afterwards to the Speakers of the two Houſes. Among the Commons the Information was ſlighted; but it made a greater Impreſſion upon the Houſe of Peers, who, together with the Clamour of the People, ſo far prevail'd upon the Commons, as they voted, That Rolph ſhou'd be try'd at the general Aſſizes at Wincheſter, where their true Servant Serjeant Wild was ſent to be Judge. And having impannell'd the major Part of the Grand Jury that found Captain Burley guilty, tho' Oſborn and Doucet both ſwore home to the Indictment, yet the Judge gave ſuch wholſome Directions to thoſe Gentlemen, that they found an Ignoramus upon the Bill, and ſo put a Period to the whole Buſineſs.

London Petitions for a Treaty.

2. After a cloſe Confinement of above eight Months, his Majeſty met with ſome ſort of Liberty and Inlargement, occaſion'd as following: When the Army was remov'd from London, upon the Account of the Inſurrections, Cromwell towards the North, and Fairfax into Kent, the Presbyterians began to lift up their Heads, and to appear more ſtrong and numerous in the Houſe of Commons than before; and the Common-Council of the City ventur'd to deliver a Petition to the Parliament for a Perſonal Treaty with the King, as the only Way to reſtore the Kingdom to a happy Peace. This appear'd to have ſo much the univerſal Concurrence of the City, that the Parliament durſt not give it a poſitive Denial; and in reality the major Part at this Time deſir'd the ſame Thing; which forc'd Sir Harry Vane and his Party to contrive ſome ſpecious Way to defer and delay it by ſeeming to conſent to it. And therefore they appointed a Committee of the Commons, to meet with a Committee of the City, to confer about Means to provide for the King's Security during the Time of the Treaty; and being met, the Parliament Committee perplex'd the other with numerous Queſtions, and with ſuch as they knew the other cou'd give no Anſwer to, without firſt calling another Common-Council to receive further Directions. By this Artifice, and by ſtarting of new Queſtions at every Meeting, they ſpent much Time, and met with the Delays they deſired. So that notwithſtanding the City's Earneſtneſs for the Treaty, it was deferr'd till the Inſurrection in Kent, and the Earl of Holland's Deſigns were defeated and expired. However the Prince was ſtill in the Downs with his Fleet, the Gentlemen in Colcheſter bravely defended themſelves, and the Scots Army was enter'd the Kingdom, all which ſupported their Spirits and Courage; inſomuch that, after all the Delays, the Parliament conſented, and declared, 'That they wou'd enter into a Perſonal Treaty with the King for the ſettling of the Peace of the Kingdom; that the Treaty ſhou'd be in the Iſle of Wight, where his Majeſty ſhou'd enjoy Honour, Freedom and Safety.

The Parliament conſent.

It is propos'd to the King.

His Anſwer.

So, notwithſtanding all Endeavours, in the beginning of Auguſt, the Earl of Middleſex was ſent by the Houſe of Lords, and Sir John Hippeſly and Mr. Bulkeley from the Houſe of Commons, to Cariſbrook Caſtle, where they deliver'd this Meſſage, 'That the Houſes did deſire a Treaty with his Majeſty, in what Place of the Iſle of Wight he wou'd appoint, upon the Propoſitions tender'd to him at Hampton-Court, and ſuch other Propoſitions, as ſhou'd be preſented to him; and that his Majeſty ſhou'd enjoy Honour, Freedom, and Safety to his Perſon.' The Meſſengers were to return within ten Days; they not being very ſtrict in the Limitation of Time to a Day, becauſe the Treaty was ſo much the longer kept off, which they ſtill hop'd wou'd be prevented by ſome intervening Accident. The King receiv'd them graciouſly and chearfully, and told them, 'That he cou'd not believe any Man cou'd deſire a Peace more heartily than himſelf, ſince no Man ſuffer'd ſo much by the Want of it: That, tho' he was without any Man to conſult with, and without a Secretary to write what he ſhould dictate, yet they ſhou'd not ſtay long for an Anſwer.' Accordingly, within two or three Days he gave them one, all written with his own Hand; in which, after he had lamented his preſent calamitous Condition, he ſaid, 'He very chearfully embrac'd their Motion, and accepted a Treaty they promis'd ſhou'd be with Honour, Freedom and Safety, which he hop'd they wou'd make good; for that, in his confin'd Condition, he was ſo totally ignorant and uninform'd of the preſent State of his Dominions, that a blind Man was as fit to judge of Colours, as he to treat of the Peace of the Kingdom, except they firſt revok'd their Votes, by which all Men were prohibited to write, or ſpeak to him. He nam'd Newport in the Iſle for the Place of the Treaty; and deſir'd that ſuch Perſons might have Liberty to repair to him, whoſe Advice and Aſſiſtance he ſhou'd want in the Treaty.' He ſent a Liſt of ſome of the Nobility, and ſeveral Biſhops, Lawyers, and Civilians, whoſe Attendance wou'd be moſt uſeful to him; and deſir'd, 'That he might be in the ſame State of Freedom, as he enjoy'd while he was at Hampton-Court.

The Parliament Commiſſioners.

The Commiſſioners had no ſooner return'd from the Iſle of Wight, and deliver'd the King's Anſwer to the Houſes, but News was brought of the Defeat of the Scots Army; and Cromwell had written to his Friends, 'That it wou'd be ſuch a perpetual Ignominy to the Parliament, that No-body abroad or at home wou'd ever give Credit to them, if they ſhou'd recede from their former Votes of Non-Addreſſes to the King, and conjur'd them to continue firm in that Reſolution.' But they had now made too great a Step to recede; and ſince the firſt Motion for a Treaty, many abſent Members had flock'd to the Houſe, and advanc'd that Overture; ſo that they were much more numerous than thoſe who endeavour'd firſt to obſtruct, and now hop'd to fruſtrate all that had been propos'd towards a Treaty. And the great Victory, and other Succeſſes of the Army, made them more preſſing for a Treaty, as the only Hope left to prevent the Confuſion they ſaw threatning the Kingdom: And ſo with more Vigour they urg'd, 'That Satisfaction might be given to the King in what he had propos'd in his Anſwer,' and, notwithſtanding the moſt furious Oppoſition, it was declared, 'That the Votes for Non-Addreſſes ſhou'd ſtand repeal'd; That the Treaty ſhou'd be at Newport; That his Majeſty ſhou'd be there with the ſame Freedom he was at Hampton-Court; That the reſtraining Inſtructions given to Colonel Hammond ſhou'd be recall'd; That all thoſe Perſons nam'd by the King ſhou'd have free Liberty to repair to him, and remain with him without Trouble.' And having thus far proceeded, they appointed for their Commiſſioners five Lords, and ten Commoners, the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Saliſbury, and Middleſex, and the Lord Say; the Lord Wenman, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Mr. William Pierrepoint, Sir Henry Vane Junior, Sir Harbottle Grimſton, Mr. Samuel Brown, Mr. John Crew, Mr. Recorder Glyn, Sir John Potts, and Mr. John Bulkeley; who were enjoin'd to haſten the Treaty with all poſſible Expedition: But Sir Harry Vane us'd all his Arts and Cunning to obſtruct and prolong it, in hopes that Cromwell wou'd diſpatch his Affairs in Scotland time enough to return, and uſe more powerful Arguments againſt it, than were to be found in the two Houſes. The Commiſſioners had ſeveral Attendants, and Chaplains along with them, particularly Mr.

Marſhal, Mr. Caryl, Mr. Vines, Mr. Seaman, Mr. Nye, Mr. Spurſtow, and Mr. Jenkins.

Thoſe for the King.

The King on the other Side made a ſolemn Preparation for this Treaty, and compos'd an excellent Prayer for the Succeſs of it. Thoſe allow'd to repair to the King, were the Duke of Richmond, the Marqueſs of Hartford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Lindſey, Dr. Juxon Biſhop of London, Dr. Duppa Biſhop of Salisbury, Dr. Sanderſon, Dr. Henchman, Dr. Morley, Dr. Holdſworth, Dr. Turner, and ſome other Divines; Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Sir Thomas Gardiner, Sir Robert Holborn, and Sir Geoffry Palmer, Lawyers; Sir Thomas Rieves, and Dr. Duck, Civilians; Sir Edward Walker, Mr. Whitaker, Mr. Oudart, and Mr. Philip Warwick; beſides the Grooms of the Bed-chamber, Pages of the Back-Stairs, and other Servants that had Offices. Theſe having repair'd thither to the King's great Satisfaction, and hearing that the Parliament Commiſſioners were on their Way, his Majeſty remov'd from Carisbrook Caſtle, that Place of Cares, to Sir William Hopkins's Houſe at Newport, the Place appointed for the Treaty, attended by the Gentlemen of the Iſle with all the Marks of Loyalty and Satisfaction.

The Commiſſioners Arrival.

The Parliament Commiſſioners arriv'd at Newport on the 15th of September, and ſtay'd three Days there before the Treaty began, which was limited to the Space of forty Days. The ſecond Day the King kept a ſolemn Faſt, with all the Marks of the moſt profound Devotion and Piety. During the three Days the Commiſſioners waited ſeveral Times upon his Majeſty, with great Shew of outward Duty and Reſpect: And the Truth is there were ſeveral amongſt them, who had been carry'd on with the Violence of the Stream, that now wou'd have rejoic'd at ſuch Conceſſions as the King wou'd willingly have granted, together with a general Act of Indemnity and Oblivion. And of all the reſt, who were moſt paſſionate for the Militia, and againſt the Church, there was no Man, except Sir Harry Vane, who did not deſire that the Peace might be eſtabliſh'd by this Treaty. For as all the other Lords deſir'd nothing more than to have their Miſcarriages obliterated; ſo the inveterate Lord Say plainly foreſaw the Ruin of his Peerage, if the Treaty prov'd ineffectual; therefore he us'd all Endeavours to prevail with the King to yield to what was propos'd to him, and afterwards with the Parliament to be content with what his Majeſty had yielded. But the Advice that they generally gave was the ſame, 'That his Majeſty ſhou'd immediately, and without delaying it to the Expiration of the forty Days aſſign'd by the Parliament, yield to the full Demands made in the Propoſitions.' Their only Argument was, 'That if he did not, or not quickly, the Army wou'd proceed their own Way, depoſe the King, change the Government, and ſettle a Republick.' This was generally believ'd by both Parties; and I have been told by a conſiderable Hand, that Mr. Hollis and Sir Harbottle Grimſton had ſo far convinc'd the King of this Truth, that he deſign'd to have acted accordingly, had he not been impos'd upon by Sir Harry Vane, who confidently aſſur'd him, that he wou'd procure him better Articles from the Independent Party, and ſuch as wou'd be more agreeable to his Honour and Conſcience. How inclinable ſoever the Commiſſioners were, they made it firſt known to the King,

A Preliminary.

'That they cou'd not admit that any Perſon ſhou'd be in the Room where the Treaty ſhou'd be held: That they were Commiſſioners ſent by the Parliament to treat with his Majeſty, and with him alone; therefore they might not permit any private Perſons to oppoſe, or debate any thing with them:' So that all the Lords and great Men, allow'd to be with the King, were like to be of ſmall Uſe to him, if they might not be preſent at the Debate. But at laſt they were contented, that they might ſtand behind a Curtain, and about his Chair, but were not allow'd to ſpeak there, but only with the King in his own Chamber, as Occaſion offer'd. Such was the unequal Preliminary, to which the King was compell'd to ſubmit before the Treaty cou'd commence.

TREATY III. At Newport.

3. On Monday the 18th of September the Treaty began, with all Formality; and after the Commiſſioners had produc'd their Commiſſion, they preſented their firſt Propoſition to his Majeſty, 'That he would revoke all Declarations and Commiſſions granted heretofore by Him againſt the Parliament.' Upon which the King deſir'd to ſee all their Propoſitions together; that he might the better conſider what Satisfaction he could give them upon the whole; to which with great Reluctancy they yielded. And tho' their Commiſſion referr'd to Inſtructions, and the King deſir'd to ſee thoſe, they peremptorily refus'd that; and only told him, 'That by their Inſtructions they were firſt to treat upon the Propoſition already preſented to him, and next of the Church, then of the Militia, and fourthly of Ireland, and afterwards of the reſt of the Propoſitions, to the Number of eleven; and particularly, they were not to enter upon new Propoſitions, before they ſhou'd have receiv'd his Majeſty's final Anſwer to what was firſt propos'd.' Hereupon the King demanded of them, Whether they had Power to recede from any Particular in the Propoſitions, or to conſent to any Alteration, if he ſhou'd give them good Reaſon ſo to do? To which they magiſterially anſwer'd, That they were ready to debate, to ſhow how reaſonable their Deſires were, and that there cou'd be no Reaſon why they ſhou'd alter, or recede from them; but if his Majeſty did ſatisfy them, they ſhou'd proceed according to their Inſtructions. Theſe Limitations in Matters of ſuch vaſt Importance, gave a mighty Diſcouragement to the King; but however he reſolv'd to try if conſenting to the ſubſtantial Part of any Propoſition wou'd give Satisfaction; and ſo without taking Notice of the Preamble of this firſt Propoſition, he declar'd to them in Writing, 'That he was willing to grant the Body of their Propoſition, that was to recall all Declarations, &c.' But they immediately return'd another Paper to him, complaining, 'That his Majeſty had omitted the moſt eſſential Part of their Propoſition, the Preamble, which recited, That the two Houſes of Parliament had been neceſſitated to enter into a War in their juſt and lawful Defence, &c.' To this they vehemently preſs'd his Majeſty's Approbation and Conſent, without which they cou'd not believe themſelves to be in any Security: And the Lord Say in the Debate, twice declar'd with unuſual Paſſion, He trembled to think how ſad the Conſequence wou'd be, if his Majeſty deny'd This. This Preamble being ſo contrary to the known Truth, his Majeſty cou'd not forbear telling them, That no Act of Parliament cou'd make that true, which was notoriouſly known to be falſe; that this Treaty muſt be the Foundation of future Peace and Security, and that he was moſt willing, That it ſhou'd be very penal to every Man to reproach another for any thing done during the late Troubles. Therefore he propos'd, as a Medium, to expreſs it thus; That Jealouſies had abruptly and unfortunately thrown both Parties into a War, and to ſecure all by Acts of Indemnity. But where the Guilt was moſt apparent, Satisfaction was moſt difficult; therefore they cou'd not believe themſelves ſecure without a full Conſent to their own Preamble. Upon which Mr. Warwick took the Liberty to ſay privately to the Earl of Northumberland, My good Lord, remember how gracious this good Prince has been to you, and do but compaſſionate his Diſtreſſes, and the Strait he is now in: To whom he civilly, but poſitively reply'd, Sir, in this it is impoſſible for me to do any Thing: For the King, in this Point, is ſafe as King; but we cannot be ſo.

The King being retir'd, he ſaid to his Friends, and wrote the ſame to the Prince his Son, That the long Reſtraint he had endur'd in Carisbrook Caſtle, was not a greater Evidence of the Captivity of his Perſon, than this was of the Captivity of his Mind, by his being forc'd to decline thoſe Anſwers and Arguments which were proper to the Support of his Cauſe, and which muſt have brought Bluſhes over the Faces of the Commiſſioners; and to frame others more fit to be offer'd to Men in that Condition, from him who was to receive, and not give Conditions. They all repreſented to him, from what they had learnt from the Commiſſioners, 'That if there was no more ſatisfactory Expedient found out, the Commiſſioners wou'd ſoon be recall'd, and the Treaty be at an End; and then it wou'd be univerſally declar'd and believ'd, how untrue ſoever the Aſſertion was, That the King refus'd to ſecure the Parliament, and their Adherents, from a Proſecution by Law. The Lawyers alſo inform'd him, That his giving Way to a Recital in a new Law, which was not declaratory of what the Law was formerly in being, concerning the Buſineſs in Queſtion, and only in a Preamble to a Law for recalling of Declarations, &c. did not make their Actions Lawful, if they were not ſo before; nor did it take from them that had adhered to him, any Defence or Benefit the former Laws had given to them.' Theſe and other Things being urged by all about him, the King firſt deliver'd a written Paper to the Commiſſioners, in which he declared

The King perſuaded to comply with the firſt Propoſition.

'That nothing put in Writing concerning any Propoſition, ſhou'd be binding, prejudicial, or made uſe of, if the Treaty ſhou'd break off without Effect.' Which being agreed to by the Commiſſioners, the King on the twenty fifth of September, with great Unwillingneſs conſented to paſs the firſt Propoſition, with the Preamble to it, Tho' he well foreſaw the Aſperſions it wou'd expoſe him to; yet he hop'd his good Subjects wou'd confeſs that it was but a Part of the Price he had paid for their Benefit, and the Peace of his Dominious.

The Second Propoſition.

The firſt Propoſition being thus obtain'd, they deliver'd the Second concerning Religion and the Church, which comprehended 'The utter Aboliſhing of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans and Chapters, and Alienating their Lands; the taking away the Liturgy and Common-Prayer-Book; a new Reformation of Religion, by Eſtabliſhing the Presbyterian Government, the Directory, the Articles of the ‘Chriſtian Religion; the Suppreſſing Innovations in Churches; for the better advancing of Preaching, and the Obſervation of the Lord's-Day; a Bill againſt Pluralities and Non-Reſidency; ſeveral Acts againſt Papiſts, and the Taking the Covenant by the King, and the impoſing of it upon Others.’ This pregnant Propoſition ſufficiently warn'd the King, how impoſſible it wou'd be to give them Satisfaction in all; therefore he thought fit firſt to offer to the Commiſſioners a Propoſition of his own, in very few Words: 1. ‘That he might enjoy his Liberty: 2. That his Revenue might be reſtor'd to him: 3. That an Act of Oblivion might paſs.’ The Commiſſioners abſolutely refus'd to ſend it to the Houſe, tho' they had no Authority to anſwer it; but ſaid, It rather contain'd an Anſwer to all their Propoſitions; and that the Sole End of making it, was to cajole the People; which, the King told them, better became him to do, than any Body elſe: And ſo ſent an Expreſs of his own to deliver it; which being done, after ſome Days Deliberation, the Houſes return'd no other Anſwer to him, than, ‘That his Propoſition was unſatisfactory.’ In the mean Time the Commiſſioners preſs'd for his Anſwer to Aboliſhing of Epiſcopacy, &c. on which Subject they let looſe their own Clergy upon his Majeſty, who was much better vers'd in the Argument than they were. They urg'd many of the Common Allegations with great Rudeneſs and Animoſity; and two of them, Jenkins and Spurſtow the Smectymnuan, very plainly and fiercely told the King, That if he did not conſent to the utter Aboliſhing of Epiſcopacy, he wou'd be damn'd. The King was not mov'd, but anſwer'd their Objections with great Calmneſs and Acuteneſs. It wou'd be tedious and unneceſſary to recite all the Arguments, which may be ſeen in Sir Edward Walker and others; but in ſhort, the King at laſt, with great Reluctancy offer'd, ‘To ſuſpend Epiſcopacy for three Years, and then upon Conſultation with Divines, of which twenty to be of his own Chuſing, ſuch a Government of the Church as ſhou'd be agreed upon, might be eſtabliſh'd: That he wou'd not force any Man to take the Covenant, and wou'd have the Privilege of his own Chapel to have the Common-Prayer, and obſerve the ſame Worſhip as formerly; and that all Perſons, who deſir'd it, might have Liberty to take the Covenant, and uſe the Directory: He conſented that Mony ſhou'd be rais'd upon the Sale of the Church Lands, and only the old Rent ſhou'd be reſerv'd to the juſt Owners, and their Succeſſors. Theſe and ſome other Conceſſions of leſs Importance, which related to ſome other Branches of the ſame Propoſition, he deliver'd to the Commiſſioners as his final Anſwer, on the ninth Day of October.

How far the King complies.

A ſecret Letter ſent to the King.

The King now became more apprehenſive of Danger: and a little before this he receiv'd a Letter, in which were theſe Words: There is a notable Deſign, to which are agreed the Army and Parliament, by concurring Counſels; to which End an Expreſs is ſent to Cromwell to diſpoſe of his Majeſty. Many here wiſh (for his Friends in the City are numerous) that the King wou'd throughly concede, to prevent Dangers incumbing; but I fear, if Good be not intended him, no Condeſcenſion of his can avert it. If then he will take him to his Eſcape, let him do it on Thurſday or Friday next, but by all Means out of ſome Door, and not from the Top of the Houſe, by the Help of Ladders, for I have heard too much of that talk'd of by ſome near Him. Farther, I deſire none may be truſted herewith but your Son and Levet. The Prince of Orange will not fail I know to ſend a Ship, but I have too great Reaſon to apprehend, if he rely thereon, his Intention will be made fruſtrate, as not coming Time enough. ----- For your own Particular, I have ſuch Grounds of the Governor's Indiſguſt of his Majeſty's Eſcape, as if perform'd, ſhall never bring you into any Examination or Trouble about it. ---- This Letter was written moſt of it in Cypher, and ſubſcrib'd by a feign'd Name, but ſo well known to the King, that he decypher'd it with his own Hand; as it appears from Mr. Wagſtaff's Appendix to his Vindication of this King: By which Appendix, which conſiſts of Original Letters never before publiſh'd, it appears that the King was ſufficiently ſenſible of the horrid Deſigns of Cromwell and ſome of the Parliament, and therefore often thought to make an Eſcape. But nothing ſeems to have hinder'd him ſo much, as a Promiſe made to the Commiſſioners, Not to depart out of the Iſland during the Treaty, nor in three Weeks after: Tho' to this he was anſwer'd, ‘That his Promiſe to them, cou'd not bind him any longer than they cou'd ſecure him from the bloody Deſigns of other Perſons.

4. The two firſt Propoſitions being paſs'd, as all Perſons thought, the other nine were diſpatcht with more Eaſe and Quickneſs, tho' ſome of them of the higheſt Moment; the King being worn out by the Importunity of Friends and Enemies, and almoſt as weary of Denying as of Granting the Demands of inflexible and inexorable Men. To the Third Propoſition concerning the Militia, his Majeſty conſented ‘That the Parliament ſhou'd have the ſole and full Power in their Hands for the Space of twenty Years.’ He agreed to the Fourth, ‘for nulling the Ceſſation of Ireland, and leaving for ſome Time the Government both Civil and Military in the Hands of the two Houſes of Parliament.’ To the Fifth and Sixth Propoſitions, ‘for Vacating Titles of Honour conferr'd ſince the Great Seal was carry'd from London to Oxford; and for Payment of Debts Publick he gave his Aſſent, provided that the Debts be aſcertain'd within two Years.’ To the Seventh he conſented, ‘That thoſe of his Party, declar'd Delinquents, ſhou'd ſubmit to a Fine, and be prohibited Acceſs to the Court, as alſo to the Council, unleſs by the Parliament's Conſent; and likewiſe that for three Years they ſhou'd be diſabled from ſitting in either Houſe of Parliament without their Conſent; and alſo to undergo a legal Tryal, if the two Houſes thought fit, and to ſuffer according to Deſert, if convicted by due courſe of Law.’ But to the charging them with Treaſon, or to the taking away their Lives or Eſtates, for Acting by his Commiſſion during the late War, he abhorr'd the Thoughts of it, and poſitively refus'd to give his Conſent. To the Eighth Propoſition the King agreed, ‘That the Parliament ſhou'd have Power to confer all the Offices in his Kingdom, and likewiſe conſtitute Magiſtrates, for twenty Years.’ To the Ninth, ‘for the confirming their new Broad Seal, with all Grants and Commiſſions paſt under the ſame, his Majeſty agreed. To the Tenth, the King conſented, ‘That all Charters, Grants, Privileges and Immunities, with Power to diſpoſe of the Tower of London, be ratify'd, the Militia there confirm'd, and the Citizens exempted from Military Duty and Service out of their Liberties, unleſs order'd by the two Houſes of Parliament.’ And laſtly he gave his Conſent to the Eleventh Propoſition, ‘That the Court of Wards ſhou'd be aboliſh'd, his Majeſty having fifty thouſand Pounds a Year paid him in Compoſition or Compenſation thereof.’ From theſe extraordinary Conceſſions, there was almoſt an univerſal Hope and Expectation of a happy Concluſion, and a firm Settlement of Peace.

1648. Car. 24.

How far the King Conſents to the reſt of the Propoſitions.

The King's general Behaviour and Abilities.

In all this Treaty, which laſted ſo many Days, the King was obſerv'd in the whole Tranſaction both with the Commiſſioners and Divines, to keep an exact Decorum, with great Prudence, Caution, and good Order; and tho' his Countenance and Aſpect was much alter'd by means of a total Diſregard to his Hair and Habit, yet he ſtill carry'd himſelf with a particular Vivacity and Majeſty. And being oblig'd ſingly to treat and debate with fifteen Perſons, moſt of them of great Parts and Volubility of Expreſſion, and of no leſs Depth and Subtlety, it gave him Occaſion of diſplaying his Abilities beyond Expectation, and of ſhowing that he was highly converſant in Divinity, Law, and good Reaſon. Inſomuch that one Day, when he was riſing up, the Earl of Salisbury ſaid ſuddenly to Mr. Warwick, The King is wonderfully improv'd! to which he as ſuddenly reply'd, No, my Lord, he was always ſo: but your Lordſhip too late diſcern'd it. Sir Harry Vane Himſelf, diſcourſing with Sir Edward Walker, likewiſe confeſs'd, That they were much deceiv'd in his Majeſty, who was repreſented to them as a weak Man, which they all along believ'd; but now they found him far otherwiſe, and that he was a Perſon of great Parts and Abilities: And thereupon maliciouſly inferr'd, That they muſt conſider their own Securities, and that he fear'd the Time was paſt to do any Good by Treaty. The former Gentleman, in his Memoirs, tells us, that two Replies made by the King to two of the Commiſſioners in the ſame Day was obſervable: The one to Mr. Hollis, who preſſing ſomewhat hardly upon him, he return'd A good Nature wou'd not offer this you ſay; nor is it true Logick: And then made another Kind of ingenious Reply to Mr. Bulkeley, a Perſon who had promis'd him, That if a Treaty cou'd be procur'd, the Malice of the Devil ſhou'd not be able to break it; therefore now pray'd his Majeſty to make a right Uſe of this Treaty. To which he readily anſwer'd, Conſider Mr. Bulkeley, if you call this a Treaty, whether it be not like the Fray in the Comedy; where a Man comes out and ſays, There has been a Fray and no Fray; and being ask'd how that cou'd be, he reply'd, There has been three Blows given, and I had them all. See therefore, whether this be not a parallel Caſe: Obſerve whether I have not granted abſolutely moſt of your Propoſitions, and very moderately limited ſome few of them: Nay conſider whether you have made me any one Conceſſion, and whether you have not juſt now confeſs'd to me, ‘That tho' upon any Propoſition you were all concurrently ſatisfy'd, yet till you had remitted them to your Superiors, you had not Authority to concurr with me in any one Thing.

Several Sayings of the King's.

The ſame Author tells us ſome other Particulars that are worthy of Remembrance: About the latter End of the Treaty, finding it was like to be ineffectual, I wiſh, ſays he, he, I had conſulted no Body, but my own Self; for then, where in Honour or Conſcience I cou'd not have comply'd, I cou'd have early been poſitive: For with Job I wou'd willinglier have choſen Miſery than Sin. When he was preſs'd by the Parliament Miniſters to give Way for a ſmall Catechiſm for Children, applying Himſelf to Mr. Marſhall, he ſaid, I will not take upon me to determine all theſe Texts you quote are rightly apply'd, and have their true Senſe given them; and I aſſure you, Gentlemen, I would licenſe a Catechiſm at a venture ſooner for Men, than I wou'd for Children; becauſe they can judge for Themſelves: And I make a great Conſcience to permit, that Children ſhou'd be corrupted in their firſt Principles. One Evening the ſame Author, Mr. Warwick, waiting upon his Majeſty with the Notes that paſs'd that Day, he told him, That he ſhou'd be like a Captain, that had defended a Place well, and his Superiors not being able to relieve him, he had leave to ſurrender it; but, continu'd he, tho' they cannot relieve me in the Time I demand it, let them relieve me, when they can: Elſe I will hold it out, till I make ſome Stone in this Building my Tomb-Stone: And ſo will I do by the Church of England. Another Time talking of the Unreaſonableneſs of the Parliament Propoſitions, about the Civil Government, Well, ſaid he, they will ask ſo much, and uſe it ſo ill, that the People of England will be one Day glad to relodge the Power they had taken from the Crown, where it is due; and I have offended againſt them more in the Things I have granted them, than in any Thing I ever deſign'd againſt them. With theſe, and ſome other Paſſages the Author concludes with my Lord Bacon, that he was a Prince of thoſe eminent Virtues, which uſually gain not Kings Renown: ‘ For there are few, that ‘ can judge of, or diſcern the higheſt Sort of Virtues; and ‘ therefore Princes are commonly famous by the middle ‘ Sort of Virtues; the Higheſt being unintelligible to the ‘ Multitude.

5. The forty Days for the Treaty being expir'd, which was on the 4th of November, the King in Concluſion earneſtly deſir'd the Commiſſioners, That ſince he had departed from ſo much of his own Right to give his two Houſes Satisfaction, they would be a Means that he might be preſs'd no farther; ſince the few Things he had not ſatisfy'd them in, had ſo near a Relation to his Conſcience, that, with the Peace of that, he could not yield further: And then begg'd of them to uſe the ſame Eloquence and Abilities, by which they had prevail'd with him, in repreſenting to the two Houſes the deplorable Condition of the Kingdom, if it were not preſerv'd by this Treaty. And ſo concluded with many gracious Expreſſions for their Perſonal Civilities and other Obligations, ſufficient to make an Impreſſion upon the moſt obdurate Diſpoſitions. But when all Men thought the Treaty had been at an End, the Commiſſioners receiv'd new Orders and Inſtructions to enlarge the Treaty fourteen Days longer, and after that to continue it four Days more, and laſt of all one Day more. All which was directly againſt the King, and againſt the Inclination of thoſe in the Houſes that had any good Wiſhes for him. For it was eaſily diſcern'd, that it was manag'd only by them who deſign'd the Treaty ſhould have no good Effect; and the Army not having finiſh'd their Work in other Places, it quickly appear'd, by the new Inſtances they made, that Delay was their only Buſineſs. This was particularly the grand Deſign of Sir Harry Vane, who, as Bates aſſures us, had perſuaded the King to grant no more, ſince he had already yielded ſo many and great Privileges to the Parliament, as he thought it neither lawful for them to expect, or take; all which he promis'd publickly to aſſert.

The Treaty prolonged.

The nineteen Days of Prolongation were very much ſpent in Repetitions of former Matters, and Repreſentations that ſome Particulars of the King's Conceſſions were ſtill Unſatisfactory to the Parliament. They particularly made Complaints about the Affairs of Ireland, ‘ where the Marqueſs of Ormond had lately declar'd he had Authority to ‘ make Peace with the Iriſh Rebels, and was then treating ‘ to that Purpoſe; therefore they deſir'd his Majeſty would ‘ forthwith publiſh a Declaration againſt him.’ The King told them ‘ there was no Occaſion for ſuch Declaration, ſince if the Treaty ſhould end happily, the De‘ ſires of the two Houſes were ſatisfy'd by the Conceſſions ‘ he had already made in that Affair.’ Then they complain'd that his Conceſſions with Reference to Epiſcopacy and the Church Lands were Unſatisfactory; and ſaid, The Parliament did not intend to force, but only to rectifie his Conſcience, and to that End they added more Reaſons to convince him in the ſeveral Points. This occaſion'd many new Diſputes and Debates, both with the Commiſſioners, and their own Miniſters. His Majeſty adhered to his former Anſwers, and to the Point of Sacriledge, he ſaid, The concurrent Opinion of all Divines was a much better Information to his Conſcience, What is Sacriledge, than any Precedents or Law of the Land could be; and concluded with declaring, That he could with much more Comfort caſt Himſelf upon his Saviour's Goodneſs to ſupport and defend him from all Afflictions that might befal him, than deprive Himſelf of the inward Tranquility of his Mind, for any Politick Conſideration that might be a Means to reſtore him. All that was done to any ſeeming Effect, was the Parliament's Conſent to the King's own Propoſition formerly mention'd; ‘ provided the Agreements of this Treaty be firſt ratify'd ‘ by Acts of Parliament.’ And now the Time being fully expired, and the Commiſſioners coming to take their Leave of Him, he pathetically acquainted them with the Condition of the Times, and That he had reaſon to believe that this would be the laſt Time of their Interview: But that, bleſſed be God, he had made his Peace with him; and ſhould without Fear undergo, what he ſhould be pleas'd to ſuffer Men to do unto him. As for Them, they could not but know, that in his Fall and Ruin, they ſaw their Own, and that alſo near to them; and pray'd God to ſend them better Friends than he had found. He was fully inform'd of the whole Plot and Carriage againſt Him and His; but nothing ſo much afflicted Him, as the Senſe and Feeling he had of the Sufferings of his Subjects, and the Miſeries that hung over his Three Kingdoms; drawn upon them by Thoſe, who upon Pretences of Good, violently purſu'd their own Ends and Intereſts. Thus with all imaginable Tenderneſs he finally parted from them on the 28th of November, after they had been ten Weeks in the Iſle of Wight.

The King's Speech to the Commiſſioners.

Thus ended the laſt Treaty of Newport, of which the King drew up a full Account in a Letter to the Prince his Son, which he began before the firſt forty Days were expired, and continu'd it, as the Treaty was prolong'd to the laſt Hour, and finiſh'd it the 29th of November, after the Commiſſioners were departed, and with it ſent a very exact Copy of all the Papers which had paſs'd in the Treaty; the true Copies of which are of late printed in Sir Edward Walker's Hiſtorical Collections. The Letter to the Prince was all in the King's own Hand, and contain'd above ſix Sheets of Paper; in which he made a very particular Relation of the Motives and Reaſons which had prevail'd with him, and over him, to make thoſe Conceſſions; and told him, That more miſguided Perſons were at laſt reduc'd to their Loyalty, than could in any Story be exampled. And the Lord Clarendon ſays, ‘ It is almoſt evident, that the ma‘ jor Part of both Houſes was, at that Time, ſo far from ‘ deſiring the Execution of all thoſe Conceſſions, that if ‘ they had been able to have reſiſted the wild Fury of the ‘ Army, they would have been themſelves Suitors to have ‘ declin'd the greateſt Part of them.’ The Concluſion of the Letter, he ſays, deſerves to be preſerv'd in Letters of Gold, and gives the beſt Character of that excellent Prince; and therefore ought to be remember'd here, tho' often publiſh'd before.

The Treaty ends.

‘ By what hath been ſaid, you ſee how long we have la‘ bour'd in the Search of Peace: Do not you be diſheart‘ ned to tread in the ſame Steps. Uſe all worthy Ways ‘ to reſtore your Self to your Right, but prefer the Way ‘ of Peace: Shew the Greatneſs of your Mind, if God ‘ bleſs you, rather to conquer your Enemies by Pardoning, ‘ than Puniſhing. If you ſaw how Unmanly and Un‘ chriſtian the implacable Diſpoſition is in our Ill-Willers, ‘ you would avoid that Spirit. Cenſure Us not for having ‘ parted with ſo much of our own Right; the Price was ‘ great, but the Commodity was Security to Us, Peace to ‘ our People: And we were confident, another Parlia‘ ment would remember how uſeful a King's Power is to ‘ a People's Liberty, of how much thereof we have di‘ veſted our Self, that We and they might meet once again ‘ in a due Parliamentary Way, to agree the Bounds of ‘ Prince and People. And in this give Belief to our Ex‘ perience, never to affect more Greatneſs or Prerogative, ‘ than that which is really and intrinſically for the Good of ‘ Subjects, not the Satisfaction of Favourites. If you thus ‘ uſe it, you will never want Means to be a Father to all, ‘ and a bountiful Prince to any you would be extraordi‘ narily gracious to. You may perceive all Men entruſt their ‘ Treaſure where it returns them Intereſt; and if Princes, ‘ like the Sea, receive and repay all the freſh Streams the ‘ Rivers entruſt them with, they will not grudge, but pride ‘ themſelves to make them up an Ocean. Theſe Conſide‘ rations may make you as Great a Prince, as your Father ‘ is now a Low One, and your State may be ſo much the ‘ more eſtabliſh'd, as Mine hath been ſhaken. For our ‘ Subjects have learn'd, we dare ſay, that Victories over ‘ their Princes are but Triumphs over Themſelves; and ſo ‘ will be more unwilling to hearken to Changes hereafter. ‘ The Engliſh Nation are a Sober People, however at pre‘ ſent under ſome Infatuation. We know not but this may ‘ be the laſt Time we may ſpeak to You, or the World, ‘ publickly: We are ſenſible into what Hands we are fal‘ len; and yet, we bleſs God, we have thoſe Inward Re‘ freſhments the Malice of our Enemies cannot perturb.

The King's Letter to the Prince his Son.

'We have learn'd to buſy our Self by retiring into our Self; and therefore can the better digeſt what befalls us; not doubting but God's Providence will reſtrain our Enemies Power, and turn their Fierceneſs to his Praiſe. To conclude, if God gives you Succeſs, uſe it humbly, and far from Revenge. If he reſtore you to your Right upon hard Conditions, whatever you promiſe, keep. Theſe Men, who have forc'd Laws, which they were bound to preſerve, will find their Triumphs full of Troubles! Do not think any Thing in the World worth the obtaining by foul and unjuſt Means. You are the Son of our Love, and as we direct you to weigh what we recommend to you, ſo we aſſure you, we do not more affectionately pray for you, (to whom we are a Natural Parent) than we do, That the ancient Glory and Renown of this Nation be not bury'd in Irreligion and Phanatick Humour; and that all our Subjects, to whom we are a Politick Parent, may have ſuch ſober Thoughts, as to ſeek their Peace in the Orthodox Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Religion, as was eſtabliſh'd ſince the Reformation in this Kingdom, and not in New Revelations; and that the ancient Laws, with the Interpretation according to the known Practice, may once again be a Hedge about them: That you may in due Time govern, and they be govern'd, as in the Fear of God, is the Prayer of your very Loving Father, C. R.

The Army's Remonſtrance.

VI. 1. During the Time of this Treaty, the Army, fluſh'd with Victory, and elevated with unlimited Power, began openly to manifeſt to the World, that nothing ſhou'd ſatisfy them, but the abſolute Deſtruction of the King, and the utter Extirpation of Monarchy. Towards the accompliſhing of which execrable Deſign, a large Remonſtrance was fram'd by Cromwell and Ireton, and ſome inveterate Officers in the Army then at St. Albans: In which they fiercely declaim'd againſt any Peace with the King, or his Reſtoration, demanding, 'That he ſhou'd, by a Tryal, be brought to Juſtice; and likewiſe that thoſe Members of Parliament impeach'd the laſt Year, with all others that ſat, when the Speaker and Members fled to the Army, be excluded the Houſe: Requiring, That the Soldiers Arrears ſhou'd be paid out of the King's and Churches Lands; That a certain Term ſhou'd be prefix'd to that preſent Long-Parliament; as alſo a more equal Number of Perſons, as Repreſentatives of the People, to be thenceforth elected, in whom the Supreme Power ſhou'd hereafter reſide.' They particularly obſerv'd, 'That whereas it might be objected, That they were oblig'd by the Covenant to preſerve his Majeſty's Perſon and Authority; it was with this Reſtriction, in the Preſervation of the true Religion, and Liberties of the Kingdom. So that, conſidering Religion and the Publick Intereſt were to be underſtood the principal and ſupreme Matters engag'd for; and the King's Perſon and Authority, as inferior and ſubordinate thereto; therefore ſince the Preſervation of his Perſon and Authority was not conſiſtent with the Preſervation of Religion and the Publick Intereſt, they were therefore by the Covenant oblig'd againſt it.' This they illuſtrated by the conſtant Practice of the Parliament in the late Wars, 'which not only oppos'd his Majeſty and his Authority, but really endeavour'd to kill and deſtroy both his Perſon and Authority by Bullets and otherwiſe, in Order to the Preſervation of Religion and Liberties of the Kingdom.' And as it was uſual to procure Petitions from ſeveral Places, to countenance the carrying on any mighty Deſign they had projected; ſo now having publiſh'd this horrid Remonſtrance on the twentieth of November, they obtain'd Congratulations from thoſe call'd the Well-affected in many Parts, the more to intimidate all Perſons from making any Oppoſition.

Debates in the Houſe of Commons.

In the mean Time the Parliament remain'd under great Fears and Apprehenſions, where the Report of the Commiſſioners from the Iſle of Wight took up many Days in the Houſe of Commons. The Queſtion upon the whole was, 'Whether the Anſwer the King had made to their Propoſitions was ſatiſfactory?' which was debated with all the Violence and Virulence that could ariſe from the Height of Faction and Party. Sir Harry Vane, notwithſtanding his Proteſtations to the King, began the Debate with the higheſt Inſolence and Provocation, telling them, 'That they ſhould that Day know and diſcover, who were their Friends, and who were their Foes; or, to ſpeak more plainly, who were the King's Party in the Houſe, and who were for the People;' and then proceeded with his uſual Gravity and Animoſity againſt the Perſon of the King, and made a long Narration of the 'Happineſs the Nation began to taſte from the Republican Government after the Vote for Non-Addreſſes, till diſturb'd by contemptible Inſurrections, which were now all quell'd; therefore they had nothing to do but to ſettle the Government, without the King, and ſo to puniſh all Diſturbers of the Peace, as might terrify all Men from the like bold Attempts.' His Preface, and Entrance into the Debate, were taken notice of with equal Sharpneſs; and his preſumptuous Manner of dividing the Houſe, and his cenſuring their Affections, as their Judgment ſhould agree, or diſagree with his own. One ſaid, 'Since he had, after an unprecedented Manner, taken ſo much upon him, he ſhou'd not take it ill, if the Contrary was aſſum'd by other Men; and that it was as lawful for another, who ſaid he was no Gainer by the Troubles, to make another Diviſion of the Houſe, and to ſay, That they ſhou'd find in that Debate, That there were Some who were deſirous of Peace, who were all Loſers, or at leaſt not Gainers by the War; and that Others were againſt Peace, who had gain'd great Riches by the War: Therefore his Motion was, that the Gainers might contribute to the Loſers, if they wou'd not conſent that the One might enjoy what was left, and the Other poſſeſs what they had got, by a Peace that might be happy for Both.

The King remov'd to Hurſt-Caſtle.

While this was debating in the Houſe, ſix Officers from the Head Quarters at Windſor, whither the Army had lately arriv'd, brought their large Remonſtrance to the Houſe, which threw all into a great Confuſion. But that which moſt terrify'd them, and indeed awaken'd them, to the moſt diſmal Apprehenſions, was the News from the Iſle of Wight, that Colonel Hammond was diſcharg'd, and Colonel Ewre had carry'd away the King to Hurſt-Caſtle, a ſort of a Block-Houſe in the Sea, not far from the Iſle of Wight, in a diſmal cold and unwholeſome Air. His Majeſty had been lately adviſ'd by Mr. Warwick 'To take care of Himſelf, That Hammond was likely to leave the Iſle, and that Rolph and other ill Spirits of the Army hung about the Place.' To which the King reply'd, That the Governour was grown ſuch a Rogue, that he cou'd not be in worſe Hands. The Night before this Seizure, which was the twenty ninth of November, when ſuch a Thing was ſtrongly ſuſpected by the King and thoſe about him, he was urg'd by the Duke of Richmond, and the Earl of Lindſey to make his Eſcape, which was thought very practicable, by the Aſſiſtance of Colonel Cooke, and the Advantage of a dark rainy Night. But the King had ſome Scruples upon him on the account of his Promiſe; and after the Matter was debated he ſaid, They have promis'd Me, and I have promis'd Them, and I will not break firſt. And after they had diſtinguiſh'd between the Parliament and the Army, and that Promiſes made to one did not bind with Reſpect to the other, he declar'd, He wou'd not do any Thing that ſhou'd look like breaking of his Word. And ſo, tho' the Danger was apparent, and the Eſcape feaſible, he yielded to his Fate, and was the next Morning not only ſeiz'd, but hurry'd away with great Precipitation, from the Iſle; after he had been a little above a Year in the Place.

The Commons diſpleas'd.

2. This News being brought to the Commons when they were in the Heat of the Debate upon the King's Anſwer, they immediately deſiſted, and Voted, 'That the carrying the King to Hurſt-Caſtle was without their Advice and Conſent;' and order'd a Letter to be written to the General 'That the Orders and Inſtructions to Colonel Ewre were contrary to thoſe given to Colonel Hammond; and therefore it was the Pleaſure of the Houſe, that he ſhou'd recall thoſe Orders, and that Colonel Hammond ſhou'd again reſume the Care of the King's Perſon.' But the General, without taking Notice of their Complaint, or Command, demanded the Arrears due to the Army, declaring, 'That unleſs there were preſent Money ſent to that Purpoſe, he ſhou'd be forc'd to remove the Army nearer to London.' And at the ſame Time a new Declaration was ſent to the Houſe from the Army, in Purſuance of their late Remonſtrance: which was ſo far from being allow'd, that ſome reſolute Members mov'd, 'That the Army might be declar'd Traytors, if they preſum'd to march nearer London than they were at preſent, and that an Impeachment of High-Treaſon might be drawn up againſt the principal Officers of it.' This haſtned the Criſis, and the General march'd directly to London, and quarter'd at White-Hall, and other Officers with their Troops in Durham-Houſe, the Mues, Covent-Garden, and St. James's; and to prevent farther Inconveniencies, they ſent to the City, the Original Fund for the whole War, immediately to iſſue out forty thouſand Pounds to ſatisfy the Army. Notwithſtanding this monſtrous Proceeding, the Houſe of Commons reſolv'd to exert it ſelf, and boldly aſſert the Treaty; and accordingly there hapned a violent Struggle between the two Parties in the Houſe for the Space of a whole Day and Night together. About five a Clock on Tueſday Morning, the fifth of December, they firſt put the Queſtion, Whether the Queſtion ſhou'd be put? and carry'd it by a hundred and forty Voices againſt a hundred and four: So that they paſs'd the grand Queſtion,

The Army enters London.

and Voted without Dividing, namely, ‘ That his Majeſty's Conceſſions to the Propoſitions upon the Treaty, are ſufficient Grounds for the Houſes to proceed upon for the Settlement of the Peace of the Kingdom:’ And to prevent future Stroaks, they appointed a Committee ‘ To confer with the General, for the better procuring a good Intelligence and Correſpondence between the Army and the Parliament, and ſo adjourn'd till the next Morning.

The Houſe of Commons purg'd by the Army.

Upon this the Officers reſolv'd to exert Themſelves, and make one brave and deſperate Puſh; and accordingly the next Morning, they ſent certain Regiments of Horſe and Foot to Weſtminſter, who ſetting Guards upon all the Avenues to the Parliament-Houſe, ſeiz'd upon one and forty of the Members as they were entring the Houſe, viz. Major-General Brown, Mr. Bulkley, Colonel Birch, Mr. Boughton, Mr. Buller, Sir John Clotworthy, Mr. Copley, Mr. Crew, Sir Simonds D'ewes, Mr. Drake, Sir Walter Earle, Mr. N. Fiennes, Mr. Green, Sir Harbottle Grimſton, Mr. Gerard, Sir Robert Harley, Colonel E. Harley, Sir Anthony Irby, Mr. Knightly, Sir Martin Lyſter, Colonel Leigh, Mr. Lane, Sir Samuel Luke, Sir William Lewes, Major-General Maſſy, Sir John Merrick, Sir Richard Onſlow, Mr. Pelham, Sir Robert Pye, Mr. Prynne, Mr. Prieſtley, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Mr. Strode, Sir Thomas Soame, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Swinfen, Mr. Vaughan, Sir William Waller, Sir William Wheeler, the Lord Wenman, and Mr. Clement Walker: Of whoſe Names Hugh Peters, their great Preacher, came to take a Liſt; and then convey'd them into their great Victualling-Houſe, near Weſtminſter-Hall, call'd Hell; where they kept them all Night without any Beds. Whence being driven as Priſoners, through Snow and Rain, to ſeveral Inns in the Strand; the Soldiers upbraided them in their Paſſage, That they were the Men, who had Cozen'd the State of their Mony, and kept back the Army's Pay. And as they made Priſoners of theſe, ſo they deny'd Entrance into the Houſe to above a Hundred and Sixty more: Whereupon the reſt of the Presbyterian Party, being terrify'd with the Uſage of their Fellow Members, declin'd the Houſe, leaving it to the Poſſeſſion of about a Hundred and Fifty, who being moſt of them Officers of the Army, perform'd every Thing according to the Directions of their Leaders. This great Change and Reformation, was call'd by the Name of Colonel Pride's Purge. And it is obſervable, that moſt of theſe Members, as Brown, Waller, Maſſy, Copley and Clotworthy, had as maliciouſly advanc'd the Service of the Parliament againſt the King, as any Men in their Rank in the Kingdom, and much more than any Officer of the preſent Army had then Credit to do: But now, in Reward of their Labours, they were not only depos'd, but ſeverally committed to cloſe Impriſonment.

Their Proceedings after that.

Immediately after this grand Purge, the Houſe renew'd their old Votes of Non-Addreſſes to the King, and annul'd and made void all thoſe that introduced and ſucceeded the Treaty, and particularly voted, ‘ That the King's Anſwer to their Propoſitions was not Satisfactory.’ And then they made a full Order of the Houſe, That none of them who had not been preſent upon the Day of Excluſion, ſhou'd ſit in the Houſe before they had ſubſcrib'd this laſt Vote; but upon Subſcription they were as well qualify'd Members as before. The ſecluded Members publiſh'd a Proteſtation and Narrative againſt the unparallel'd Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons and the Army; which made ſo great a Noiſe in the Kingdom, and ſo incens'd the ſitting Members, that on the 15th of December they made a ſolemn Declaration againſt that Proteſtation, pronouncing it ‘ To be falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious, and tending to the Deſtruction of the Viſible and Fundamental Government of the Kingdom:’ And to this extraordinary Declaration they obtain'd the Concurrence of the ſmall Houſe of Peers, and jointly ordain'd ‘ That that Proteſtation ſhou'd be ſuppreſs'd, and that no Man ſhou'd preſume to ſell, or buy, or read the ſame.’ That upper Houſe, which had ſo often weakned and exhauſted it ſelf by unreaſonable Compliances, was now at its loweſt Ebb, and drain'd to its Dregs: Inſomuch that ſeveral of that noble Body went to General Fairfax to expreſs their good Affections to him, and Concurrence with him for the Common Good; and particularly to let his Excellency know, ‘ That they wou'd wave their Privileges and Titles, in Caſe they ſhou'd be found burthenſome to the Liberties of the People.’ And now reſolving to gratify the Army, they took into Conſideration a Paper formerly digeſted by them as a Model for a new Form of Government, call'd The Agreement of the People, and for Publiſhing of which, one of the Agitators had been ſhot to Death by Cromwell's own Directions a Year before. So that all Things contributed to bring about the Reſolves of the preſent Powers; who, after ſeveral contriv'd Petitions, appointed a Committee to prepare a Charge of High-Treaſon againſt the King himſelf, who, they ſaid, ‘ had been the Cauſe of all the Blood that had been ſpilt, and therefore it was fit that ſuch a Man of Blood ſhou'd be brought to exemplary Juſtice.

The King remov'd to Windſor.

3. In Order to accompliſh this prodigious Deſign, upon the 21ſt of December they remov'd the King from Hurſt-Caſtle, after he had remain'd about three Weeks in that diſconſolate Place; from whence he was conducted by Colonel Harriſon, a Favourite of Cromwell's, to Wincheſter, where he was reſpectfully receiv'd by the Mayor and Corporation; from thence to Farnham Caſtle, and laſtly to Windſor, where he ſtaid for ſome Time. In his Paſſage to this Place his Majeſty found Means to dine at Bagſhot Lodge, where liv'd the Lord Newburgh, lately married to the Lady Aubigney, both Perſons of inviolable Loyalty. Here a hopeful Project had been laid for the King's Eſcape, and one of the fleeteſt Horſes in England provided for that Purpoſe, which probably wou'd have taken Effect, notwithſtanding all the Circumſpection of Harriſon; but, unfortunately, that Horſe was that very Day ſo lamed by the Stroak of another, that he became altogether uſeleſs. At Windſor his Majeſty was deliver'd to Colonel Whitchcott the Governor of the Caſtle, where he found ſome Eaſe and Diverſion, differing from his former Solitude. But in a few Days it was order'd by the Parliament that all State, and the Ceremony of Knee ſhou'd thenceforth be diſcontinu'd, and his Attendants leſſen'd. Here the unfortunate Duke of Hamilton, a cloſe Priſoner in the Caſtle, obtain'd Leave of his Keeper to have a ſhort Interview with the King: He had but juſt Time to kneel down and kiſs his Hand, and with a melancholy Tranſport ſay, My dear Maſter! The King kindly embracing him, ſaid, I have been ſo indeed to you; and ſo they parted with the higeſt Marks of Grief and Sorrow.

He meets with Duke Hamilton.

Hugh Peters's Sermon.

That they might effect their Buſineſs with the greater Formality, they held a ſolemn Faſt in St. Margaret's Church at Weſtminſter, four of the moſt zealous Lords being preſent there, and many of the Houſe of Commons; where that Pulpit Buffoon, Hugh Peters, acted a Sermon before them, taking his Text out of the Pſalms, To bind their Kings in Chains, &c. Such Honour have all his Saints: He parallel'd the State of the Kingdom with the bringing the Children of Iſrael out of Egyptian Bondage: And the better to ſhew how they ſhou'd be brought out of this Bondage; having put his Hands before his Eyes, and laid his Head on the Cuſhion; from whence, after a while, raiſing it ſuddenly up, he told them, That he had a Revelation how to do it, which was, by extirpating of Monarchy, both here, and in all other Places. He compar'd the King to Barabbas, whom the fooliſh Citizens wou'd have to be releas'd, and the Red-Coats he call'd our Saviours, whom they wou'd have to be crucify'd. As to the Saints in his Text, he often call'd them Saint Judges; and profeſs'd he had found upon a ſtrict Scrutiny, that there were in the Army five thouſand Saints, no leſs holy than thoſe that now convers'd in Heaven with God Almighty. Then kneeling, weeping, and lifting up his Hands, he begg'd them ‘ in the Name of the People of England, to execute Juſtice upon that great Barabbas at Windſor, and not let Benhadad eſcape in Safety, &c.’ To ſuch wretched Proſtitution was the Pulpit now debas'd; and ſo madly extravagant was the frequent Preaching at theſe Times, that a Member in his Speech ſaid There was no Way to end the Diviſions in England, but by forbidding all Preaching for one whole Year. And it was remarkably ſaid by Sir Robert Spotſwood, Son to the famous Archbiſhop, at his Execution in Scotland, None of the Judgments of God are greater, no not Plague, Famine, or the Sword, than when he ſuffers a Lying Spirit to fill the Mouths of the Prophets.

Cromwell's Profaneneſs.

The ſame horrid Degree of Profaneneſs, and Enthuſiaſm, ſhew'd it ſelf in Cromwell; who, when it was mov'd in the Houſe, immediately after the Faſt, That they ſhou'd proceed capitally againſt the King, he ſtood up and declar'd, That if any Man mov'd this upon Deſign, he ſhou'd think him the greateſt Traitor in the World; but ſince Providence and Neceſſity had caſt them upon it, he ſhou'd pray God to bleſs their Councils, tho' he was not provided, on the ſudden, to give them Counſel. And being a great Pretender to Revelations, he ſoon after told them, That as he was praying for a Bleſſing from God on his Undertaking to reſtore the King to his priſtine Majeſty, his Tongue cleav'd to the Roof of his Mouth, that he cou'd not ſpeak one Word more; which he took as a Return of Prayer, and that God had rejected him from being King. And to compleat his Character, to others he impudently aſſerted, That it was lawful to circumvent a wicked Man with Deceit and Fraud. And that nothing might be wanting to finiſh the Glorious Cauſe that God had OWN'D, a godly Virgin was brought out of Herefordſhire, who appearing before the General and Council of War at White-Hall, declar'd, She had a Revelation from God, whereby ſhe was incited to encourage them to go on in their Deſigns: Of which they made no ſmall Advantage, approving of it as the moſt ſeaſonable Revelation of that Time. Thus all Things grew ripe for the Grand Deſign; while the Interpoſition of the Prince and the States of Holland, and all the Endeavours of the Queen from France, cou'd by no Means hinder or divert it.

The Death of Biſhop Towers,

Dr. Hudſon,

Dr. Fell,

The Lord Herbert,

Sir Robert Holborn,

Mr. White,

And Mr. Forbes.

With this melancholy Poſture of Affairs, we ſhall conclude the old Year and Month of December, and a little relax the Reader's Thoughts with an Account of ſome conſiderable Men, who were ſo happy as to die before the moſt diſmal Part of the Tragedy was acted: And firſt Dr. John Towers, Biſhop of Peterborough, educated in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and juſtly remov'd through ſeveral Preferments into his Biſhoprick; of which being depriv'd by the prevailing Powers, he dy'd in a low and obſcure Condition. Beſides him, there dy'd two other eminent Divines, Dr. Michael Hudſon, and Dr. Samuel Fell; The firſt, of whom mention was formerly made, was one of the King's Chaplains, who had ſhewn himſelf no leſs remarkable for his Valour and Martial Enterprizes, than for his Scholarſhip and Divinity: He frequently accompany'd the King in the Wars, who uſually call'd him his Plain-Dealing Chaplain, becauſe he freely told him his Mind, when others wou'd not, or durſt not do it; and, after a ſtrange Variety of Fortune, he was barbarouſly murder'd this Year by the Rebels in Northamptonſhire. The latter, Dr. Fell, was Dean of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, and the Margaret Profeſſor of Divinity in the ſame Univerſity, a ſtrict Obſerver of Diſcipline, and a noble Pattern of Charity; who being ejected from his Preferments, and ſuffering much for his Loyalty, and his preſerving the Statutes and Liberties of the Univerſity, he dy'd in great Obſcurity. Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury is particularly to be remember'd; a Perſon who by his Parts and Abilities rais'd himſelf to this Dignity: He was well skill'd in Arts and Languages, a good Philoſopher, and an Hiſtorian, who underſtood Men as well as Books; but was more particularly celebrated for his accurate Hiſtory of the Reign of King Henry the Eighth. Nor muſt we forget that excellent Lawyer, Sir Robert Holborn, who had formerly ſhew'd his great Parts and Knowledge in his Pleadings againſt the Ship-mony, yet afterwards wrote a noble Defence of the King and Royaliſts. Being in a dying Condition a little before the King was ſeiz'd in the Iſle of Wight, he ſent his Majeſty a Paper with this Advice, as his laſt Legacy; 'That if ever he came to an Agreement with the Parliament, in Behalf of the Crown, as well as his Subjects in general, he wou'd make it an Article, That the two Houſes ſhou'd as much be ſworn to ground their Proceedings upon the Laws in Being, till they were repeal'd or alter'd by others, as the Kings were ſworn to them at their Coronation.' We are to mention another Sort of a famous Man, Mr. John White, a famous Puritan Divine, uſually called the Patriarch of Dorcheſter, where he was for many Years Miniſter, and where he ſhew'd an excellent Faculty in the clear and ſolid Interpretation of the Holy Scriptures: He was a Man of great Gravity, Preſence, and Influence in his Party, for ſeveral Years; and one of the Aſſembly of Divines, where he prov'd himſelf one of the moſt learned and moderate amongſt them. Laſtly we ſhall mention Mr. John Forbes, a moſt learned Scotch Divine, Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Aberdeen in Scotland, which Profeſſorſhip had been founded by his Father, who was Biſhop of the Place. His Parts were very pregnant, and his Learning of vaſt Extent, and highly admired by Foreigners; notwithſtanding which, he was driven from his Chair by the Covenanters, and forc'd into Holland, from whence he return'd, and dy'd obſcurely in his own Country.

The Commons Charge againſt the King.

VII. I. We are now arriv'd at the fatal Month of January, dark and hideous beyond any that preceded it in the whole War, and ſuch as cannot be parallel'd in the Annals of any other King's Reign. It began with an unheard-of Charge prepared by a Committee of the Houſe of Commons, which they call'd 'An Impeachment of High-Treaſon againſt Charles Stuart King of England,' digeſted into ſeveral Articles, which contain'd all thoſe Calumnies they had formerly heap'd up in that Declaration of Non-Addreſſes, with ſome additional Reproaches. After it was read and approv'd by the Commons, it was ſent to the Houſe of Peers for their Concurrence; which Houſe was much diminiſh'd both in Number and Eſteem. It was now believ'd that they who had done ſo many extravagant Things, purely in Compliance with the Commons, wou'd likewiſe concurr with them in this, rather than divide from them when they were ſo triumphant. But contrary to this Expectation, this Impeachment was ſo ill receiv'd by the Lords, that there was not one Perſon aſſented to it; but having with ſome Warmth rejected it, they adjourn'd for nine Days; preſuming by this Means to give ſome Interruption to the Career of the lower Houſe, and in that Time to find ſome Expedient to reconcile the Proceedings of both Houſes. But in this they were wholly deceiv'd; for tho' ſome of the Commons mov'd for an Impeachment againſt them for thus favouring the grand Delinquent, yet the reſt were generally well pleas'd, and rightly thought they had given them that Eaſe, which they cou'd not ſo well have contriv'd for themſelves. So they proceeded in their own Method, and when the Day came to which the Lords had adjourn'd themſelves, they found all their Doors lock'd, and ſecur'd with Padlocks, ſo that there ſhou'd be no more Entrance for them.

The Lords reject it, and are excluded

The Commons Votes.

They erect an High Court of Juſtice.

Upon the Lords Refuſal, on the fourth of January they voted, 'Firſt, That the People were, under God, the Original of all juſt Power: Secondly, That the Commons of England, being choſen by, and repreſenting the People, were the Supream Power of the Nation: Thirdly, That whatſoever is Enacted or Declared for Law by the Houſe of Commons, aſſembled in Parliament, hath the Force of Law, tho' the Conſent of the King and Houſe of Peers be not had thereunto.' So much being ſettled and agreed upon, they next conſider'd in what Manner and Form to proceed, that there might be ſome Appearance of Reaſon and Juſtice. Nothing cou'd be found in the Common or Statute-Law, which cou'd afford them any Directions or Warrant; nor cou'd any Example or Precedent aſſiſt them; and therefore they were to make and erect a Form, new and altogether unheard-of. Accordingly they conſtituted and created a Court that ſhou'd be call'd The High Court of Juſtice, to conſiſt of ſo many, who ſhou'd have Authority to try the King, Whether he were guilty of what he was accus'd of, or no; and in Order thereto, to examine ſuch Witneſſes as ſhou'd be produc'd. The Number of the Judges nominated were a hundred and thirty five, of which twenty or more might proceed. They cou'd not find ſuch a Number among themſelves, upon which they might intirely depend in this laſt tragical Act: And therefore they laid this for a Ground, That if they ſhou'd make only their own Members to be Judges in this Caſe, they might appear too much Parties in the Eyes of the World, as having from the Beginning maintain'd a War againſt the King, and therefore not ſo proper to be the only Judges who were in the Fault. On the other Hand, if they ſhou'd name none of themſelves, it might be thought that they look'd upon it as too dangerous a Province to engage themſelves in, and therefore wou'd diſcourage others from undertaking it. Wherefore, to ſhew their Impartiality, they reſolv'd that the Judges ſhould be nominated promiſcuouſly, as well of Members of the Houſe, as of ſuch other of their good and godly Men in the Kingdom. All the chief Officers were nam'd, and ſuch Aldermen and Citizens of London as had been moſt violent againſt Peace, with ſome few Country Gentlemen, who had been ſufficiently diſtinguiſh'd by their Zeal and Fidelity to this extraordinary Cauſe.

Bradſhaw made Preſident of it.

When ſuch a Number of Perſons were nam'd as were thought to be equal to the Work, tho' about fifty of them refus'd to act, they made Choice of a Speaker or Prolocutor, whom they call'd Lord Preſident of that High Court, who was to manage Proceedings, examine Witneſſes, and anſwer what the Priſoner ſhould propoſe. To which Office one Mr. John Bradſhaw was choſen, a Lawyer of Gray's-Inn, whom they had lately made a Serjeant, not much known in Weſtminſter-Hall; tho' of good Practice in his Chamber, and not a little employ'd by the Faction. He was a Gentleman of an ancient Family in Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, but of a Fortune of his own making; not without Parts, but of great Inſolence and Ambition. He ſeem'd much ſurpris'd, and modeſt in declining ſo important a Charge, and with Humility accepted of the Office, which he afterwards adminiſter'd with all imaginable Pride, Impudence and Superciliouſneſs. He was immediately inveſted in great State, and many Officers and a Guard aſſign'd for the Security of his Perſon, and the Dean's Houſe at Weſtminſter given to him for ever, for his Habitation; and about five Thouſand Pounds in Mony was to be preſently paid to him, to put himſelf in ſuch an Equipage and way of Living, as the Dignity of that high Office required: So that now the Lord Preſident of the High-Court of Juſtice ſeem'd to be the greateſt Magiſtrate in the Kingdom. After this, they made Choice of ſome Lawyers, obſcure Men, ſcarce heard of in their Profeſſion, to perform the Offices of Attorney-General, and Solicitor-General for the State, to proſecute the Priſoner at his Tryal, and to manage the Evidences againſt him. Other Officers, of all Kinds, were appointed to attend this new Court, which was order'd to be erected in Weſtminſter-Hall.

They make Proclamation againſt the King.

And that theſe their ſanguinary Proceedings might carry the more Shew of Authority, upon the 9th of January they ſent Dandy their Serjeant at Arms with his Mace, accompany'd with ſix Trumpets on Horſeback into Weſtmiſter-Hall; where, among great Guards of Soldiers, he made ſolemn Proclamation, ‘ That if any Man had ought to alledge againſt Charles Stuart, they ſhould repair the following Day, at two a Clock Afternoon, into the Painted-Chamber, where they ſhou'd be heard.’ The like Proclamation he made at the Exchange, and other publick Places in London. The ſame Day alſo they voted, That Writs ſhould no longer run in the King's Name; and for the making of a new Great-Seal, with the Arms of England and Ireland, the Croſs and Harp, on one Side, with this Circumſcription, THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND; and on the other Side the Figure of the Parliament, with this Circumſcription, IN THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED, 1648.

Almoſt all Parties interpoſe againſt it.

2. Theſe unheard-of Proceedings allarm'd the whole Nation, and confounded the wiſeſt Heads of three Kingdoms; the Mouths of vaſt Numbers were fill'd with Murmurs and Complaints, and their Minds with Indignation and Reſentment. Almoſt all the Presbyterian Miniſters of London, and very many out of the ſeveral Counties, and a few of the Independents themſelves, declar'd againſt the Deſign in their Sermons from the Pulpit, in Conferences, Monitory Letters, Petitions, Proteſtations, and publick Remonſtrances. They earneſtly begg'd, ‘ That contrary to ſo many Imprecations and Oaths, contrary to publick and private Faith confirm'd by Declarations and Promiſes, contrary to the Law of Nations, thoſe of Nature, and the Commands of Scripture, nay, and contrary to the publick Good of the Kingdom, they would not defile their own Hands and the Kingdom with Royal Blood.’ But now they had loſt their Miniſterial Authority by being ſo ſubſervient to the Faction, that they needed not their Aſſiſtance, and ſo all their Admonitions were deſpiſed: Beſides, the very ſame Principles they had preach'd to kindle the War, were now ſharply retorted upon them, and with great Acuteneſs made uſe of to juſtify the intended Murder. The People alſo contemn'd them for their Short-ſightedneſs, in being the little Inſtruments of ſuch Men, and in ſuch Practices, as in Time muſt of Neceſſity ruin them and all Miniſters, as well as the King and the Biſhops. The Scots alſo by their Commiſſioners declar'd and proteſted againſt this Attempt. The States of Holland, by their Ambaſſadors, interceded, as a Deſign deſtructive to the Proteſtant Intereſt. Some of the moſt eminent of the Nobility, as the Duke of Richmond, the Marqueſs of Hartford, the Earl of Southampton, and the Earl of Lindſey, neglected no Ways, either by Prayers, or Ranſom, to ſave the ſinking King; and more, they generouſly offer'd Themſelves, as being the prime Miniſters of the King's Commands, as Hoſtages for him, and if the Conſpirators muſt needs be fed with Blood, to ſuffer in his ſtead for whatſoever he had done amiſs. The Prince us'd all Ways and Means to deliver his Father, and wrote a moſt pathetical Letter to General Fairfax; and beſides the States Ambaſſadors, whom he had procur'd, both He and the Prince of Orange daily ſent as Agents the Kindred and Relations of Cromwell, Ireton, and the other Conſpirators, with full Power to propoſe any Conditions, make any Promiſes, and uſe any Threatnings, to divert, prevent or retard their intended Cruelty.

Scaffolds erected in Weſtminſter-Hall.

But all theſe Attempts were in vain, and no Conditions of Peace could ſatisfy them who were poſſeſs'd with lawleſs and boundleſs Deſires; yet ſtill they pretended the Calls and Ducts of Providence, and the Impulſes of the Bleſſed Spirit, as their grand Warrant and Security. And now being arm'd with a Force ſufficient to ſubdue all Oppoſers, on the tenth of January, the Commiſſioners of the High Court of Juſtice ſat formally in the Painted Chamber, to receive Informations from ſuch, whom they had then prepar'd to come in for that Purpoſe: From which Time, for the Space of nine Days, theſe Commiſſioners had conſtant Meetings, to frame and ſettle the ſpecial Order and Form for executing of that their wretched Deſign. In the mean Time they erected a bloody Theatre at the upper End of Weſtminſter-Hall, where the Tragedy was to begin with unuſual Pomp and Solemnity. They took extraordinary Care in the Ordering of the Seats and Scaffolds, in the fixing of Soldiers and Guards in every particular Place and Paſſage, even to the Leads and Windows of the Hall, and for the keeping all Spectators at a proper Diſtance; not ſo much for the Security of the King's Perſon, as the Safety of their own; and all their cautious Proceedings ſhew'd that they had Fears within and without, and on every Side. And they had the more Reaſon to be careful, ſince a particular Deſign had been detected againſt their Lord Preſident Bradſhaw, by one Burghill, who being diſcover'd, was ſeiz'd and brought before the Commiſſioners, being in the greateſt Danger of his Life; but by means of the Drunkenneſs of the Guards, he found an Opportunity to eſcape. And more than that, he was ſo conſcious of this unprecedented Action, that beſides other Defence, he wore a thick high-crown'd Beaver-Hat lin'd with plated Steel, to ward off Blows he might juſtly expect: Which Hat has been ſince ſent as a Rarity to the Muſæum at Oxford, with a Latin Inſcription upon it, to preſerve the Hiſtory of ſuch a Relique.

The Names of the King's Judges,&c.

The Commiſſioners that actually ſat or aſſiſted as Judges upon the King's Tryal, were Seventy Nine in Number, namely, Serjeant Bradſhaw Preſident, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, Commiſſary-General Ireton, Sir Hardreſs Waller, Col. Harriſon, Col. Whally, Col. Pride, Col. Ewer, Col. Ingoldsby, Sir Henry Mildmay, Lord Grey of Groby, Lord Munſon, Sir John Danvers, Sir Thomas Maleverer, Sir John Bowcher, Sir James Harrington, Mr. Henningham, Alderman Pennington, Col. Harry Marten, Col. Purefoy, Col. Berkſtead, Sir William Conſtable, Col. Ludlow, Col. Hutchinſon, Col. Tichborne, Col. Roe, Col. Scroop, Col. Okey, Mr. Holland, Mr. Allen, Mr. Pelham, Mr. *T. There were many Commiſſioners nominated, that refus'd to act or ſit in Judgement, to the Number of fifty two, whoſe Names the Reader may deſire to know, as the Speaker Lenthal, General Fairfax, Major-General Skippon, Alderman Fowlks, Alderman Atkins, Sir William Alliſon, Sir William Armyn, Mr. Aiſlaby, Sir John Barrington, Sir William Brereton, Sir Godfrey Boſvile, Mr. Burrel, Sir Edward Bainton, Mr. Berners, Mr. Bond, Mr. Boone, Mr. *J. Thoſe who did not act.

The King remov'd to St. James's.

3. During theſe Preparations, the King was remov'd from Windſor to St. James's, under the Conduct of Colonel Harriſon, which Place he had never ſeen ſince the Year 1641, when the Tumults had driven him from his Court and Parliament. In his Journey, Harriſon obſerving that the King had always an Apprehenſion that there was a fix'd Deſign to murder him, and that he had once dropp'd ſome Words of the Odiouſneſs and Wickedneſs of ſuch an Aſſaſſination, which could never be ſafe to the Perſon who undertook it, he told him plainly, That he needed not to entertain any ſuch Imagination; that the Parliament had too much Honour and Juſtice to cheriſh ſo foul an Intention; and aſſur'd him, That whatever the Parliament reſolv'd to do, would be very publick, and in a way of Juſtice, to which the World ſhould be Witneſs; and would never endure a Thought of ſecret Violence: Which his Majeſty could not perſuade himſelf to believe; nor did he imagine that they durſt ever produce him in the Sight of the People, under any Form of a publick Tryal.

His Uſage there.

At St. James's, the King was deliver'd into the Hands and Cuſtody of Colonel Tomlinſon, a Colonel of the Foot, who tho' he ſeem'd to be a Man of better Breeding, and of a Nature more civil than Harriſon, and pretended to pay much Reſpect and Duty to the King in his outward Demeanour, yet his Majeſty, after a ſhort Time, was treated with greater Rudeneſs and Barbarity than he had ever been before. Indeed they were ſo jealous of their own Guards, leſt they ſhould be wrought upon by the Influence of his Piety and Innocency, or by the Remorſe of their own Conſcience upon the Account of ſuch inſufferable Uſage, that they cauſ'd the Guards to be continually chang'd; and the ſame Men were never ſuffer'd twice to perform the ſame unheard-of Duty. Being much abridg'd both of his former Diet and Attendance, he ſhew'd no publick Uneaſineſs at it, but only ſaid calmly, Is there any thing more contemptible than a deſpis'd Prince? Still he could hardly believe the worſt of his Fate, as being ſo tranſcendently infamous; but he continu'd his accuſtomed Prudence and Patience, ſo as no outward Perturbation could be diſcern'd, with Chriſtian Fortitude ſubmitting to the good Pleaſure of the Almighty, ſometimes ſighing, but never breaking out into any Paſſion, or uttering a reproachful or revengeful Word againſt any of his profeſs'd Enemies, only ſaying, God forgive their Impiety. Thus he continu'd till the 19th Day of January, when he was remov'd to White-Hall, and to Sir Robert Cotton's Houſe near Weſtminſter-Hall, in order to his laſt and fatal Tryal.

The preſent State of the Nation.

And here we may make a little Reſt, and juſtly take Notice of the State of the Nation, and the Parties at this Period, as they are repreſented by a conſiderable Writer at this Time. 'The Presbyterians, who were the firſt Fomenters of the Rebellion, who once made honeſt Men Malignants to them, are now made Malignants to worſe Rebels themſelves: The Lords, who were once ſo forward to vote Biſhops out of their Houſe, are now thrown out of their Houſe by their Companions in Rebellion, having hitherto been us'd as the vileſt Inſtruments of the common People. Thoſe Members that at firſt were ſo active in the Cauſe, and eſteem'd as Pillars of the Common-wealth, and Fathers of their Country, are now driven out of the Verge of the Houſe, and thrown away as Rotten Members: Waller, Maſſy, Brown, and other great Champions of Reformation, are now look'd upon as Enemies to the Common-wealth, impriſon'd, and to be proceeded againſt as Traytors: Eſſex, their magnanimous Heroe, was at beſt but carry'd to his Grave with a few Compliments, where he lyes forgotten; ſcarce worth an Epitaph: Carew and the Hothams receiv'd the Reward of their Rebellion upon Tower-Hill, from the Hands of their Fellow-Traytors: The Covenant, the Idol and Stalking-Horſe of Rebellion, is caſt into the Fire as an Almanack out of Date: The new modell'd Aſſembly with their Calvinian Levites, thoſe furious Rabſhekaes, breathing from their Pulpits Blaſphemy againſt God and his Anointed, and poſſeſſing the People with the Spirit of Sedition and Madneſs, now are look'd upon both with Envy and Contempt, as the Caterpillars and Locuſts, that devour not only the Subſtance, but the Souls of the People: The City, that Parliament Prop, the Refuge and Sanctuary of Sedition, the grand Artillery and Magazine of Confiding Men, the Inn and Hoſpital of all their maimed Soldiers, and the common Purſe and Exchequer together, is now look'd upon as the only Remora to Reformation, a diſaffected Place, and fill'd with their Enemies: That Army which they rais'd and ſent into the Boſom of the Kingdom for the Deſtruction of Monarchy, is now crept into their own Bowels, threatning and reputing their Ruin and Devaſtation, the only Warrant of their Security: That City that could not live ſatisfy'd under the proſperous Government of Kings, who gave them their Charter, muſt live patiently in Bondage to thoſe Tyrants, that will take it from them, and level their high Privileges to a miſerable Community. Thus all, that will not ſhut their Eyes, may ſee innumerable Judgments, and expreſs Marks of the Divine Vengeance falling upon the ſeveral Parties, and Actors in this Rebellion.'

THE TRYAL OF THE KING.

VIII. 1. All Things being prepar'd, and a Theatre erected to begin the grand Tragedy, on Saturday the 20th of January the principal Actors met firſt in the Painted-Chamber; where upon the landing of the King from White-Hall to Sir Robert Cotton's Houſe, Cromwell caſting his Eye upon his Majeſty with ſome Apprehenſion, immediately put this Queſtion to the Commiſſioners: The firſt Thing the King will demand of us will be, 'By what Authority we bring him before us;' what ſhall we ſay, by whoſe Authority? After a little Pauſe, Harry Marten briſkly reply'd, In the NAME and AUTHORITY of the Commons in Parliament aſſembled, and all the Good People of England: So true an Enemy he was to Kingly Government, as he afterwards declar'd in a particular manner. After this they remov'd into Weſtminſter-Hall, under the Name and Title of the High-Court of Juſtice: After reading of the Ordinance, the Names of the Commiſſioners, as Judges, were call'd over: Every Man anſwering to his Name as he was call'd, and the Preſident being firſt call'd and making Anſwer, the next who was call'd being the General, Lord Fairfax, and no Anſwer being made, the Officer call'd him the ſecond Time, when there was a Voice heard that ſaid, He had more Wit than to be there, which put the Court into ſome Diſorder; and ſome asking who it was? there was no other Anſwer but a little Murmuring. But ſoon after, when the Impeachment was read, and that Expreſſion us'd, In the Name of all the good People of England, the ſame Voice, in a louder Tone, cry'd out, No not the hundredth Part of them! Upon which one of the Officers bid the Soldiers give Fire into that Box from whence thoſe preſumptuous Words were utter'd. But it was quickly diſcern'd that it was the General's Wife, the Lady Fairfax, that ſhew'd this uncommon Bravery, notwithſtanding ſhe had too much promoted the Nation's Miſeries; but was ſoon perſwaded, or forc'd to leave the Place, to prevent any new Diſorder.

The Firſt Day.

Sixty ſeven Commiſſioners anſwer'd to their Names; and then the Court commanded the Serjeant at Arms to ſend for their Priſoner, who was brought up in the Face of the Court by Colonel Tomlinſon, under a ſtrong Guard, and deliver'd to the Serjeant at Arms, who conducted him to the Bar, where a Crimſon Velvet Chair was ſet before him. After looking upon the Court with a ſtern ſort of Majeſty, and upon the People in the Galleries on each Side of them, he plac'd himſelf in the Chair, without any moving of his Hat; all the impudent Judges ſitting cover'd, and fixing their Eyes upon him without the leaſt Shew of Reſpect. The King preſently roſe up again, and turn'd about, looking downwards on the Guards and Multitudes of Spectators. Being again plac'd in his Chair, and Silence proclaim'd, Bradſhaw the Preſident acquainted him, 'That the Commons of England, aſſembled in Parliament, being deeply ſenſible of the Evils and Calamities that had been brought upon the Nation, and of the innocent Blood that had been ſpilt in it, which was fix'd upon him as the principal Author, had reſolv'd to make Inquiſition for this Blood; and according to the Debt they did owe to God, to Juſtice, to the Kingdom, and Themſelves, and according to the fundamental Truſt repos'd in them by the People, had reſolv'd to bring him to Tryal and Judgment, and had therefore conſtituted that Court of Juſtice before which he was then brought, where he was to hear his Charge, upon which the Court would proceed according to Juſtice.' Upon which Mr. Cook, the Solicitor, offer'd to ſpeak; but the King holding up his Cane, and ſoftly laying it upon Cook's Shoulder two or three times, bid him Hold: But, at the Command of the Preſident, Cook proceeded, and in the Name and Behalf of the People of England, exhibited a Charge of High-Treaſon, and other high Crimes, and did therewith accuſe the ſaid Charles Stuart King of England; praying that the ſaid Charge might be receiv'd and read, and due Proceedings had thereupon. The King interrupted the Reading of it; but the Clerk, at the Command of the Court, read out the Charge, concluding, 'That the ſaid Charles Stuart hath been, and is the Occaſion, Author and Continuer of the ſaid unnatural, cruel and bloody Wars; and therein guilty of all the Treaſons, Murders, Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Deſolations, Damages, and Miſchiefs to this Nation, acted and committed in the ſaid Wars, or occaſion'd thereby.' The King ſmil'd at the foul Appellations of Tyrant, Traytor, &c. which were given him in the Charge; but ſhew'd no other Mark of Reſentment or Indignation.

Bradſhaw, after he had inſolently reprehended the King for not ſhewing more Reſpect to that High Tribunal, told him, 'That the Parliament of England had appointed that Court to Try him for the ſeveral Treaſons and Miſdemeanors which he had committed againſt the Kingdom during the Evil Adminiſtration of his Government; and that upon the Examination thereof, Juſtice might be done.' And after much Sawcineſs of Talk, he ask'd the King What Anſwer he had to make to that Impeachment? The King, without any Alteration in his Countenance by all that Provocation, told them, 'He wou'd firſt know of them, by what Authority they preſum'd by Force to bring Him before Them, and who gave them Power to judge of his Actions, for which he was accountable to none but God, tho' they had been always ſuch as he need not be aſham'd to own them before all the World.' He told them, 'That He was their King, they his Subjects, who ow'd him Duty and Obedience: That no Parliament had Authority to convene him before Them; but, that they were not the Parliament, nor had any Authority

The King's General Defence.

‘ thority from the Parliament to ſit in that Manner. That ‘ of all the Perſons who ſat there, and took upon them to ‘ judge him (except ſome of the Officers of the Army, ‘ whom he cou’d not but know while he was forc’d to be ‘ among them) there were but three or four Faces which ‘ he had ever ſeen before, or whoſe Names were known ‘ to him.’ And after urging their Duty to him, and his Superiority over them, by ſuch Reaſons and Arguments as were not capable of any Anſwer, he concluded, ‘ That ‘ he wou’d not ſo much betray Himſelf, and his Royal ‘ Dignity, as to anſwer any Thing they objected againſt ‘ him, which were to acknowledge their Authority; tho’ ‘ he believ’d that every one of Themſelves, as well as the ‘ Spectators, did in their own Conſciences abſolve him ‘ from all the Material Things which were objected againſt ‘ him.’ Bradſhaw, in a very arrogant Manner, advis’d him, ‘ Not to deceive himſelf with an Opinion, that any ‘ Thing he had ſaid wou’d do him any good: That the ‘ Parliament knew their own Authority, and wou’d not ‘ have it ſuffer’d to be call’d in Queſtion or debated: ‘ Therefore requir’d him, To think better of it againſt he ‘ ſhou’d be next brought thither, and that he wou’d anſwer ‘ directly to his Charge; otherwiſe, he cou’d not be ſo ‘ ignorant as not to know, what Judgment the Law pronounc’d againſt thoſe that ſtood Mute, and obſtinately ‘ refus’d to plead.’ So the Guard carry’d his Majeſty back to Sir Robert Cotton’s Houſe, where he was to continue during the whole Time of his Tryal.

Accidents the firſt Day. The King’s Deportment was very Majeſtick and Steady; and tho’ his Tongue did uſually a little heſitate, yet it was very free at this Time, and he was never diſcompos’d in Mind, as he declar’d to Biſhop Juxon, who attended him afterwards. Yet he confeſs’d to him, That one Incident ſhock’d him very much; for while he was leaning in the Court upon his Cane, which had a Head of Gold, the Head broke off on a ſudden, without any viſible Reaſon: He took it up, but ſeem’d unconcern’d; yet told the Biſhop, It really made a great Impreſſion upon him; and he never cou’d poſſibly diſcover how it ſhou’d happen. When Bradſhaw commanded the Guard to take him away, he with an auſtere Countenance, reply’d, Well, Sir! and going down, he with his Cane pointed to the Sword upon the Table, and ſaid, I do not fear That! The Spectators were very numerous to behold this melancholy Sight, many of whom with bleeding Hearts and weeping Eyes lamented the miſerable Fate of this pious Prince. Others ſhew’d ſo barbarous and brutal Behaviour to him, that they call’d him Tyrant and Murtherer, and one of the Soldiers in his Paſſage ſpit on his Face; which his Majeſty wip’d off with his Handkerchief, and mildly ſaid, My Saviour ſuffer’d far more than this for Me. At his Return from the Court, one Soldier, calling out God bleſs you, Sir, the King courteouſly thank’d him; upon which an Officer ſtruck the poor Man over the Head; which his Majeſty obſerving ſaid, The Puniſhment exceeded the Offence. And indeed all Care was taken that none ſhou’d ſhew him any Reverence or Reſpect; and Hugh Peters and Axtel, upon every Occaſion, mov’d the Soldiers to cry out Juſtice, Juſtice! Execution, Execution! Upon which the King ſaid to Mr. Herbert, He did not wonder at it, being well aſſured that the Soldiers bore no Malice to him: The Cry was, no doubt, given by their Officers, for whom they wou’d do the like, were there Occaſion.

2. The next Day, being Sunday, vaſt Numbers of People came from the City to Weſtminſter to ſee the King, but being under ſtrong Guards, they were diſappointed. His Majeſty ſpent the greateſt Part of that Day in the moſt ſolemn Devotions; and on Monday was brought to Weſtminſter-Hall as before, where Cook the Solicitor mov’d The Second Day. the Court, ‘ That the Priſoner might give a poſitive Anſwer to his Charge, or otherwiſe that the Court wou’d ‘ take the Matter of it pro Confeſſo, and proceed thereupon according to Juſtice:’ Which was preſs’d upon the King by Bradſhaw the Preſident, and their Judgment made known to him, ‘ That he was to anſwer to his ‘ Charge, otherwiſe that his Contumacy wou’d be recorded.’ The King ſtill inſiſted upon his former Plea ‘ That the Court had no Power, nor the Commons of ‘ England, if they had conſtituted it, to proceed againſt ‘ Him.’ Then he told them, That he pleaded the Cauſe of the People of England, as well as of Himſelf; and therefore deſired to be heard; declaring That Power without Law cou’d never make a Law; and going to give his Reaſons, which he had in Writing, he was interrupted by Bradſhaw, who boldly requir’d his intire Submiſſion to the Court, whoſe Authority might not be diſputed. The King inſiſted upon the Laws of the Land, and told them, That he knew as much Law as any Gentleman in England, and pleaded for the Liberties of the People more than they did. Then being again interrupted by Bradſhaw, he bid him remember that he deny’d to hear his King, and aſk’d him What Kind of Court that was, where Reaſon cou’d not be heard: The other inadvertently, but with great Truth, told him, That he ſhou’d find it there. The King ſtill refuſing, and inſiſting That the Houſe of Commons not being a Court of Judicature, cou’d not erect one, his Contempt was recorded, Himſelf ſent back, and the Court adjourn’d till the next Day. This ſecond Day of Tryal paſs’d in the Preſence of Seventy Commiſſioners.

The third Day ſeventy one Commiſſioners appear’d; The Third Day. when the King being brought, and the ſame Cries made of Juſtice and Execution as formerly, Cook addreſſing Himſelf to the Court, repeated the ‘ former Delays and Contempts of the Priſoner, ſo as that no more needed on his ‘ Part, but to demand Judgment; yet offer’d, notwithſtanding the Notoriety of the Facts charg’d in the Impeachment, to prove the Truth of the ſame by Witneſſes, if thereto required; and therefore pray’d, and yet ‘ not ſo much He, as the Innocent Blood that had been ſhed, ‘ the Cry whereof was very Great, that a ſpeedy Sentence ‘ might be pronounc’d againſt the Priſoner at the Bar according to Juſtice.’ Hereupon Bradſhaw with uncommon Aſſurance put the King in mind of former Proceedings, ‘ And tho’ by the Rules of Juſtice, if Advantage was ‘ taken of his paſt Contempts, nothing cou’d remain but to ‘ pronounce Judgment againſt him, they had nevertheleſs ‘ determin’d to give him leave to anſwer to his Charge, ‘ and plainly told him, That Juſtice knew no Reſpect of ‘ Perſons, therefore he muſt plead guilty or not guilty to the ‘ Charge.’ The King ſaid, As to the Charge he valued it not a Ruſh; it was the Liberty of the People of England he ſtood for; and complain’d, ‘ That when he was in Treaty, ‘ upon the publick Faith of the Kingdom, with the two ‘ Houſes of Parliament, he was hurry’d away and brought ‘ hither.’ Bradſhaw twice interrupted him, and inſolently told him, That the Court crav’d it not of him, but once more commanded him to give his poſitive Anſwer; and order’d the Clerk to do the ſame. The King ſtill deny’d the Juriſdiction of the Court, and ‘ declar’d it againſt the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom; and that he had done ‘ nothing againſt the Truſt that had been committed to him.’ At laſt Bradſhaw told him, ‘ That he had now a third Time ‘ publickly diſown’d and affronted the Court; That how good ‘ a Preſerver he had been of the Fundamental Laws and ‘ Freedoms of the People, his Actions had ſpoken; that he ‘ had written his Meaning in bloody Characters throughout ‘ the Kingdom, and that he ſhou’d find at laſt, tho’ at preſent he wou’d not underſtand it, that he was before a ‘ Court of Juſtice. Hereupon he order’d the Clerk to record the Priſoner’s Default, and ſo the Court adjourn’d, and ſate in private in the Painted Chamber.

On Wedneſday, the 24th of January, the Court ſat in the Painted Chamber upon a ſort of a mock Examination of Witneſſes againſt the King; where theſe wretched Fellows following gave in their formal Depoſitions, as taken upon Oath, ſome of which were impertinent, and others falſe and inconſiſtent. The Witneſſes againſt the King. William Cuthbert of Patrington, in Holderneſs, Gent. John Bennet of Harwood, in the County of York, Glover. William Brayne of Wixall, in the County of Salop, Gent. Henry Hartford of Stratford upon Avon. Robert Lacy, of the Town of Nottingham, Painter. Edward Roberts of Biſhop’s-Caſtle, in the County of Salop, Ironmonger. Robert Loads of Cottam, in Nottinghamſhire, Tyler. Samuel Morgan of Wellington, Com’ Salop, Feltmaker. James Williams of Roſs, in Herefordſhire, Shoemaker. John Pyneger of Hayner, in the County of Darby, Yeoman. Samuel Lawſon of Nottingham, Malſter. Arthur Young, of the City of London, Barber-Chirurgeon. Thomas Whittington of Nottingham, Shoemaker. John Thomas of Llangellen, in the County of Denbeigh, Husbandman. Richard Blomfield of London, Weaver. William Jones of Usk, Com’ Monmouth, Husbandman. Humphry Brown of Whitſondine, in the County of Rutland, Husbandman. David Evans of Abergenny, Com’ Monmouth, Smith. Diogenes Edwards of Carſton, in the County of Salop, Butcher. Gyles Gryce of Wellington, Com’ Salop, Gent. John Vinſon of Damorham, in the County of Wilts, Gent. George Seely of London, Cordwainer. John Moore of Cork, in Ireland, Gent. Thomas Ives of Boyſet, in the County of Northampton, Husbandman. Thomas Rawlins of Hanſlope, in the County of Bucks, Gent. Thomas Read of Maidſtone, in Kent, Gent. James Crosby of Dublin in Ireland, Barber. Samuel Burden of Lyneham, in the County of Wilts, Gent. Michael Potts of Sharpereton, in the County of Northumberland, Vintner. George Cornwall of Aſton, in the County of Hereford, Ferry-man. Henry Gooche of Gray’s-Inn, Gent. Robert Williams of St. Martins, in the County of Cornwall, Husbandman. Richard Price of London, Scrivener. Several Deaths propos'd.

3. While theſe Things were acted openly in the View of the People, the mercileſs Judges, in their private Meetings and Cabals, proceeded to allot every one the Part he was to act, what Words and Geſtures they were to uſe; conſulting together about the Time, Place, Kind, and all the Manner and Solemnity of the intended Murder: Where it is ſtrange to mention what diſmal Kinds of Death were propos'd, before the Sentence, according as the Wantonneſs, Cruelty, or Hatred of the ſeveral Tempers did ſuggeſt. Some voted that his Head and Quarters might be ſet up in Publick Places, a Puniſhment inflicted upon Traitors, as a laſting Infamy after their Death: Some wou'd have him hang'd, after the Manner of Murderers, Robbers and common Thieves: Others again were of Opinion that he ſhou'd ſuffer in his Crown and Robes, as an eternal Monument of the Power of the People over their King. At length the Majority agreed, that it was ſufficient he ſhou'd loſe his Head upon a Scaffold to be erected before the Banqueting-Houſe of White-Hall, 'That 'from the ſame Place where he us'd to mount the Throne, 'and appear in the ſacred Pomp of Majeſty, he might paſs 'on to the Block, and caſt off the Ornaments of Royalty, 'where he was commonly inveſted with them.' This was the Triumph and theſe the Trophies of a victorious Revenge. And becauſe ſome imagin'd, that the King wou'd not ſubmit his Neck to the Ax of his Subjects, they order'd Iron Rings and Staples to be made on the Scaffold, that if he refus'd, he might be drawn down to the Block by his Head and Hands.

The Fourth and Laſt Day.

After two Days private Conſultations, when all Men's Minds were fill'd with Horror or Wonder, they had their fourth and laſt Meeting in Weſtminſter-Hall, where their Lord Preſident Bradſhaw was now array'd in a Scarlet Gown, the Sight of which gave the King a plain View of his enſuing Fate; which was further manifeſted to him by the more vehement Cries of the Soldiers for Juſtice and Execution. Bradſhaw ſtood up, with an Intention of addreſſing to the People, and not to the King, who had ſo often declin'd the Juriſdiction of the Court; which the King obſerving, earneſtly mov'd he might be heard before Judgment was given; for a haſty Judgment was not ſoon recall'd. Upon which the other with a ſawcy Air bid him Hear the Court firſt; but at laſt did allow that he ſhou'd be heard after he had heard them. Then he fell to enumerating the Priſoner's ſeveral Contempts and Defaults; yet notwithſtanding they did allow he ſhou'd be heard, what he had to ſay in Defence of himſelf concerning the Matter charg'd; provided he did not call in Queſtion the Juriſdiction of the Court. Whereupon the King declar'd, That if he had had Reſpect to his Life, more than to the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, he certainly ſhou'd have made a particular Defence; for by that at leaſt he might have delay'd a hard Sentence, which he believ'd wou'd paſs upon him: But now having ſomething to ſay that concerns Both, he deſir'd, before Sentence, to be heard in the Painted Chamber before the Lords and Commons. He inſiſted that this Delay cou'd not be prejudicial to them; and if they refus'd this, he proteſted, That thoſe fair Shews of Liberty and Peace were pure Shews, and that they wou'd not hear their King. Bradſhaw told him 'That this 'was declining the Juriſdiction of the Court, which was 'Supream, and tended to ſet up another, or a Co-ordinate 'Juriſdiction in Derogation of the Power whereby the 'Court ſat, and to the manifeſt Delay of their Juſtice.' The King anſwer'd to that Particular, and declar'd, That if he did ſay any Thing before the Houſes, that was not for the Peace of the Kingdom, and Liberty of the Subject, then the Shame ſhou'd be his.

The King's vehement urging of this Point, which ſeveral believe was with Deſign to reſign his Kingdoms to his Son, had ſome Effect upon the Court; and Colonel Downs ſaid to Cawly and Walton, who ſat next to him, What, have we Hearts of Stone? Are we Men? They telling him, He wou'd ruin both himſelf and them, he ſaid, If he dy'd for it, he muſt do it. Cromwell ask'd him What he meant to do? but ſtill he perſiſted, and declar'd to the Preſident, That he had ſomething to offer againſt the Sentence, and deſir'd the Court to adjourn. Upon which Bradſhaw ſaid, If any of Court be unſatisfied, it muſt adjourn: Accordingly it was adjourn'd for a while into the inner Court of Wards; where Colonel Downs alledg'd ſeveral Things in the King's Favour, and particularly objected, 'That none 'of the Witneſſes had given in their Evidences Viva Voce, 'but only in Writing; and more particularly the King's 'deſiring to ſpeak with the Parliament was but reaſonable.' Cromwell fell into a Fury, and ſaid It was not fit that the Court ſhou'd be hinder'd from their Duty by one peeviſh Man; and if the Bottom was known, he wou'd fain ſave his old Maſter, and deſir'd the Court, without more delay, wou'd go and do their Duty. Others fell upon him with ſufficient Severity; and all that the Colonel gain'd by his Tenderneſs was nothing but Reproaches and Threats to harden him to go through the Remainder of their Villany with them, which at laſt had their Effect. They Voted, 'That what the King had mov'd only tended to Delay;' yet ſeveral of the Commiſſioners were of a contrary Opinion, deſiring to know what the King wou'd ſay to them. But it was voted in the Negative by the Major Part; whereupon ſome of them, ſtung with the Terrors of their own Conſciences, went away in Diſcontent.

The Court adjourns.

The reſt being return'd into the Court, the Preſident told the King, 'That he had in Effect receiv'd his Anſwer be'fore the Court withdrew, and that their Judgment was, 'as to his Motion, the ſame as to him before declar'd: 'That the Court acted, and were Judges appointed by the 'Higheſt Authority, and that Judges were no more to delay, 'than to deny Juſtice, according to a Maxim in the old 'Charter of England: That their Duty call'd upon them 'to avoid farther Delays, and to proceed to Judgment; 'which was their unanimous Reſolution.' To which the King reply'd, and ſtrongly inſiſted upon his former Deſires: 'He confeſs'd a Delay, but it was a Delay very important 'for the Peace of the Kingdom, which he look'd upon as 'much as his own Perſon: Therefore he requir'd them, 'as they wou'd anſwer it at the dreadful Day of Judgment, 'that they wou'd conſider it once again.' In anſwer to this Bradſhaw poſitively told him, 'That they had fully before 'conſider'd of this Propoſal, and muſt give him the ſame 'Anſwer to his renew'd Deſires, and that they were ready 'to proceed to Sentence, if he had nothing more to ſay.' Whereupon the King ſubjoin'd, He had nothing more to ſay; but deſir'd that what he had ſaid might be enter'd. Then Bradſhaw proceeded in a long inſolent Harangue, endeavouring to juſtify their Proceedings, miſapplying both Law and Hiſtory, taking up and wreſting whatever he thought fit for his Purpoſe, alledging the Examples of former Treaſons, both at home and abroad: He told him, to acquit the Guilty, was of equal Abomination as to condemn the Innocent; adviſ'd him to a ſerious Repentance, and concluded him to be a Traitor, a Tyrant, a Murtherer, and a Publick Enemy to the Common-wealth of England. All which the King heard with his uſual Patience; and when he interpos'd to ſpeak concerning the great Imputations laid to his Charge, he told him, His Time was paſt, and ſo having order'd the Charge to be recited, he proceeded to Sentence, namely, 'This Court doth adjudge, that the ſaid Charles 'Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor, Murtherer, and Publick 'Enemy, ſhall be put to Death by the ſevering his Head 'from his Body.' While the Preſident was pronouncing this, the King was obſerv'd with a ſort of a Smile to lift up his Eyes to Heaven, as appealing to the Divine Majeſty, the moſt ſupreme Judge; and when he offer'd to ſpeak, he was interrupted and hurry'd away; and in his Paſſage to Sir Robert Cotton's Houſe, he was entertain'd with new Cries of Juſtice, Scoffs and Affronts by the Soldiers, who blew the Smoke of Tobacco in his Face, which was very diſtaſteful to him; all which he bore with the moſt Heroick Patience.

Sentence paſs'd upon the King.

Obſervations upon it.

Thus ended the King's Tryal, if it may be ſo call'd, when there was neither Law nor Evidence on one Side, nor Pleading nor Acknowledgment on the other; in all which the King ſhew'd a Magnanimity never to be forgotten, and has been highly applauded for being ſo inviolably ſteady to the fundamental Conſtitution of the Kingdom. And Mr. Clement Walker, a Presbyterian who had vaſtly contributed towards his Misfortunes, obſerves, 'That 'cou'd they have brought the King to have ſubmitted to 'the Juriſdiction of this Court, his Example wou'd have 'been urg'd as an irrefragable Precedent againſt the Lives 'and Liberties of the whole Kingdom, and urg'd to be of 'as great Authority, as if he had eſtabliſh'd that Court by Act 'of Parliament: But in that was their great Defeat; ſo that, 'as this Author acknowledges, the King is to be look'd on 'as a Civil Martyr, dying for the Liberty of the People.' The bloody Sentence was paſs'd on Saturday the 27th of January; but we muſt not forget a Paſſage out of Sir Roger Manley, that the very ſame Morning, Bradſhaw's Wife, ruſhing into her Husband's Chamber, fell upon her Knees at his Feet, and juſt diſſolv'd in Tears and Sighs, beſought her Husband, That he wou'd have nothing to do with his Majeſty, nor Sentence this Earthly King, for fear of the dreadful Sentence of the King of Heaven. You have no Child, continu'd ſhe, and why ſhou'd you do ſuch a monſtrous Act to favour others? But Bradſhaw bidding her get about her Buſineſs, added, I confeſs he has done me no harm, nor will I do him any, but what the Law commands. So wretchedly was this unthinking Man miſ-led in the Buſineſs of his own Profeſſion; but being ſurpris'd with an Imagination of being the chief Magiſtrate in the Land, his Head became ſo intoxicated, that he prov'd one of the moſt inſolent as well as infamous of Mankind. The reſt of the Judges that ſat when Sentence was given, and formally ſtood up to teſtify their Aſſent, were ſixty-ſix in Number, namely, Cromwell, Ireton, Liſle, Say, Waller, Bourchier, Heveningham, Pennington, Marten, Purefoy, Barkſtead, Tomlinſon, Blackſtone, Millington, Conſtable, Ludlow, Hutchenſon, Liveſey, Tichborne, Roe, Lilburn, Scroop, Deane, Okey, Hewſon, Goffe, Holland, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Allen, Pelham, Blagrave, Walton, Harriſon, Whalley, Pride, Ewers, Grey of Groby, Danvers, Maleverer, Moore, Alured, Smith, Edwards, Clement, Wogan, Norton, Harvey, Ven, Scot, Andrews, Cawley, Stapeley, Downes, Horton, Hammond, Love, Potter, Garland, Dixwell, Fleetwood, Mayne, the two Temples, and Wayte.

The King's Preparation for Death.

His Deſires.

IX. 1. This unheard-of Tryal being ended, which ſtruck the Eyes and Ears of all Men with Amazement, the King employ'd his whole Thoughts in preparing for Death, which he now found was inevitable. Nothing of the Fear of Death, or Indignities offer'd, ſeem'd a Terror, or provok'd him to Impatience; nor did he uſe one reflecting Word upon his Judges, tho' ſome who ſat in Court he knew had been his Domeſtick Servants, as Mounſon, Mildmay, Danvers and Holland. At the Riſing of the Court, he was with a Guard of Halberdiers return'd to White-Hall in a cloſe Chair, through King's-ſtreet, lined on both Sides with a ſtrong Guard of Foot Soldiers, who were ſilent as his Majeſty paſs'd the Street: But the Shops and Windows were fill'd with great Numbers of People, many of them cover'd with Tears, and ſome with audible Voices praying for the King, who through the Privy-Garden was carry'd to his Bed-Chamber; from whence, after two Hours Space, he was remov'd to St. James's. Here he deſir'd two Things, That he might have Liberty to ſee his Children, and that Dr. Juxon, Biſhop of London, might be admitted to aſſiſt him in his private and laſt Devotions. This being ſignified to the preſent Governors, the former was readily granted, but the latter with ſome Difficulty. Being now reſolv'd to ſequeſter himſelf from all outward Impediments, he order'd Mr. Herbert to make an Excuſe to any that might have the Deſire to viſit him: I know, ſaid he, my Nephew, the Prince Elector, will endeavour it, and ſome other Lords that love me, which I take very kindly; but my Time is ſhort and precious, and I deſire to improve it the beſt I can in Preparation: I hope they will not take it ill, that none have Acceſs to me but my Children: The beſt Office they can do now, is to pray for me. And it happen'd accordingly; for his Electoral Highneſs, accompany'd by the four loyal Lords, the Duke of Richmond, the Marqueſs of Hertford, the Earls of Southampton and Lindſey, with ſome more, having got leave, came to the Bed-Chamber Door, where Mr. Herbert acquainted them with what the King had given him in Charge; at which they acquieſc'd, and preſenting their humble Duty to his Majeſty, they return'd with all the Marks of Grief and Sorrow.

The Concern in the City, &c.

The next Day, being Sunday, was ſpent by the King in the moſt profound Devotions; tho' he was ſometimes interrupted by Meſſages, and other Times by the Queſtions, Cavils and Petulancy of the Enthuſiaſtick Soldiers; all which he either repreſs'd by Arguments, or eluded by a generous Neglect. In the mean Time, the Miniſters in the ſeveral Churches of London, and in thoſe other Parts where his Danger was known, were very earneſt in their Prayers to God for his Deliverance and Spiritual Aſſiſtance. Some of them in their Sermons declar'd, 'the Horror of 'that publick Sin that was ready to be committed, de'teſted the Impiety of the Parricides, and denounc'd the 'heavy Judgments which ſuch a ſinful Nation, polluted 'with their Prince's Blood, were to expect.' The Congregations were generally melted and diſſolv'd into Tears. Some bewail'd the 'deplorable Condition of the King, as 'the Effect of the Sins of the Nation:' Others curs'd 'their ſottiſh Credulity of the Slanderers of that juſt 'Man; and all the ſpecious Promiſes of Liberty by their 'Impoſtors:' And another Sort wept, 'becauſe their 'Fears prognoſticated a Deluge of Miſeries, which the 'Fountain of his Blood wou'd let in upon them:' And 'every one found Matter of Grief, Fear and Indignation, 'in the Loſs of a Prince, whoſe Character appear'd 'brighter every Day.' All Countenances were fill'd and clouded with Sadneſs and Aſtoniſhment; there were no Tumults, nor any Quiet, every one liſtening and hearkning, either as impatient to know the Greatneſs of their Miſery, or greedy to receive ſome Hopes of Comfort in their Sovereign's Safety: Otherwiſe there was a Stillneſs like that produc'd by too ſtrong Paſſions, and ſuch as might rather be thought a Stupidity than a Calmneſs; and among the many thouſands in the City, and elſewhere, that were moſt willing, not one of them was able to give the leaſt Aſſiſtance to their King; and indeed many of the former Incendiaries were ready to teſtify their Repentance, but now were totally diſabled from making the leaſt Reſtitution.

Propoſals to the King,

Rejected.

On the ſame Day ſome of the Grandees and Leaders came to the King, and tender'd to him a Paper Book, with Promiſe of Life, and ſome Shadow of Regality, in Caſe he wou'd ſubſcribe it; which contain'd many Particulars deſtructive to the Eſtabliſh'd Religion, to the Laws of the Land, and to the Liberties and Properties of the People. Of which one was, 'That he ſhou'd paſs an Act 'for keeping on foot their Army during the Pleaſure of 'ſuch as they ſhou'd nominate to be entruſted with the 'Militia; with Power from Time to Time, to recruit and 'continue them, to the Number of Forty Thouſand 'Horſe and Foot, under their preſent General and Officers; and that the Council of War ſhou'd have Power to 'make Choice of new Officers, and Generals, from 'Time to Time, as Occaſion ſhou'd happen, and they 'think fit; as alſo to ſettle a Tax upon the People, by 'Way of Land-Rate, for ſupporting the ſame Army, to 'be collected and levy'd by the Soldiers themſelves; and 'for the Eſtabliſhing a Court-Marſhal of extraordinary 'Extent.' But ſo ſoon as his Majeſty had read ſome few of thoſe Tyrannous Propoſals, he threw them aſide with Indignation, ſaying, That he wou'd rather become a Sacrifice for his People, than thus to betray their Laws, Liberties, Lives and Eſtates, with the Church, the Common-Wealth, and Honour of the Crown, to ſo intolerable a Bondage of an armed Faction.

Cromwell's Kinſman's Diſcourſe with him.

About the ſame Time there arriv'd Colonel John Cromwell, nearly related to the great Oliver, with credential Letters from the States of Holland, to which was added a Blank, with the King's Signet, and another of the Prince's, both confirm'd by the States, for Oliver himſelf to write his own Conditions, if he wou'd now ſave the Life of the King. The Colonel found out his Kinſman at his Houſe, but ſo retired and ſhut up in his Chamber, with an Order that none ſhou'd know he was within, that he was with great Difficulty admitted, after he had declar'd his Name. After mutual Salutations, and deſiring a Word in private, the Colonel began freely to tell the other of the Heinouſneſs of the Fact, then ready to be committed, and how deteſtable it reſounded abroad, adding, That of all Men living he never cou'd have imagin'd that he wou'd have been concern'd in it, having in his Hearing proteſted ſo much for the King. Whereupon Cromwell flew to his old Shifts, telling him, It was not He, but the Army; he own'd he did once ſay ſome ſuch Words, but Times were alter'd, and Providence ſeem'd to diſpoſe Things otherwiſe; that he had pray'd and faſted for the King, but no Return that Way was yet made to him. Whereupon the Colonel, ſtepping back, ſuddenly ſhut the Door, which frighted the other with the Belief of an Aſſaſſination; and then pulling out his Papers, Couſin, ſaid he, this is no Time to trifle with Words. See here, it is now in your own Power not only to make your Self, but your Family, Relations and Poſterity, happy and honourable for ever; otherwiſe as they have chang'd their Name before from Williams to Cromwell, ſo now they muſt be forc'd to change it again; for this Fact will bring ſuch an Ignominy upon the whole Generation of them, that no Time will be able to deface. Here Cromwell paus'd, and ſeem'd to reflect with himſelf, and then ſaid, Couſin, I deſire you will give me till Night to conſider of it, and do you go to your Inn, and not to Bed, till you hear from Me. This the Colonel obſerv'd, and about one a Clock in the Night, a Meſſenger came and told him, He might go to Reſt, and expect no other Anſwer to carry to the Prince, for the Council of Officers had been SEEKING GOD, as he alſo had done the ſame, and it was reſolv'd by them all that the King muſt dye.

Biſhop Juxon repairs to the King.

2. The King long expected the Biſhop of London, who was not admitted to come to him till Sunday in the Evening, tho' allow'd by the Parliament to attend his Majeſty; but ſome of the London Miniſters were admitted, as Mr. Calamy, Mr. Vines, Mr. Caryl, Mr. Dell, and Mr. Goodwyn, who offer'd their Spiritual Aſſiſtance; but after a handſome Return of Thanks, he let them know that he had made Choice of Dr. Juxon for that Purpoſe, and ſo civilly diſmiſs'd them. As ſoon as that good Biſhop appear'd, the King receiv'd him with great Openneſs and Chearfulneſs; but the other began with ſome condoling Expreſſions, ſuitable to the melancholy Occaſion. His Majeſty quickly anſwer'd, Leave off this, my Lord, we have not Time for it: Let us think of our great Work, and prepare to meet that great God, to whom ere long I am to give an Account of my ſelf; and I hope I ſhall do it with Peace, and that you will aſſiſt me therein. We will not talk of theſe Rogues in whoſe Hands I am; they thirſt after my Blood, and they will have it, but God's Will be done: I thank God, I heartily forgive them, and I will talk of them no more. And ſo for two or three Hours the Biſhop and He conferr'd together; and tho' they ſhut the Door, a Soldier wou'd open it once in half a quarter of an Hour, to ſee whether the King was ſafe, and ſo ſhut it again. They were interrupted by the Arrival of Mr. Seamour, a Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to the Prince, who by Colonel Hacker's Permiſſion came to the Door, deſiring to ſpeak with his Majeſty from the Prince his Son. Being admitted, he preſented the King with a Letter from his Highneſs, bearing Date from the Hague, January the twenty-third old Stile. Mr. Seamour, at his Entrance, was overwhelm'd with Paſſion, having formerly ſeen his Majeſty in a glorious, and now in a doleful State; and having kiſs'd the King's Hand, he claſp'd about his Legs, and utter'd ſuch mournful Sighs, that Hacker, the King's Keeper, was deeply touch'd and affected. But as ſoon as the King had read his Son's melancholy Letter, and heard what his Servant had to ſay, and imparted to him what he thought fit in return, he took his leave; and ſo the Biſhop proceeded in his Devotions, and the Reading ſome ſelect Paſſages in the Sacred Scripture.

Mr. Seamour comes to him.

The King ſends to the Lady Wheeler.

That Evening the King took a Ring from his Finger, and gave it to Mr. Herbert; it contain'd an Emerald ſet between two Diamonds, and order'd him, as late as it was, to go with it to the Lady Wheeler, living then in Channel-Row in Weſtminſter, without Naming her Name, and to give it her, without ſaying any Thing. The Night was exceeding dark, and ſtrong Guards ſet in ſeveral Places, as St. James's-Houſe, the Garden, Park, Gates near Whitehall, King's-Street, and other Avenues. But learning the Word from Colonel Tomlinſon, the ſuperior Officer, whoſe Civility to the King had ſenſibly increas'd, this Gentleman paſs'd currently through all the Guards; and being arriv'd at the Lady's Houſe, he deliver'd her the Ring. She courteouſly receiving it, in a little Time brought him a Cabinet, ſecur'd with three Seals, of which two were the King's Arms, deſiring him to deliver it to the very ſame Hand that had ſent her the Ring. Mr. Herbert return'd ſafely, and deliver'd the Cabinet to the King, who after his Devotions the next Morning, open'd it before the Biſhop and him; and ſhewing there ſome Diamonds and Jewels, with ſome broken Georges and Garters, he ſaid, You ſee all the Wealth now in my Power to give to my two Children.

The King's Children come to him.

Shortly after the Princeſs Elizabeth, and the Duke of Gloceſter her Brother, came to take their ſad Farewel of the King their Father; and to ask his Bleſſing; the former being thirteen, and the latter eight Years of Age. The Princeſs, a Lady of excellent Underſtanding, was moſt ſenſible of her Royal Father's Condition, and cou'd not withhold from a Flood of Tears; and her little Brother ſeeing her weep, he took the like Impreſſion, tho' by reaſon of his tender Age he cou'd not have the like Apprehenſion. The King rais'd them both from off their Knees, kiſs'd them, and gave them his Bleſſing; then ſetting them upon his own Knees, he admoniſh'd them concerning their Duty and Loyal Obſervance to the Queen their Mother, the Prince his Succeſſor, Love to the Duke of York, and his other Relations. He wiſh'd the Princeſs not to grieve or torment her Self for Him, for that wou'd be a glorious Death he ſhou'd dye, it being for the Laws and Liberties of this Land, and for maintaining the true Proteſtant Religion; and that he doubted not but the Lord wou'd ſettle his Throne upon his Son, and that they ſhou'd be all happier than they cou'd have expected to have been if he had liv'd. Then he bid her to read Biſhop Andrews's Sermons, Hooker's Eccleſiaſtical Polity, and Biſhop Laud's Book againſt Fiſher; which wou'd ground her againſt Popery. He told her, That he had forgiven all his Enemies, and deſir'd them alſo to forgive them, but never to truſt them, for they had been moſt falſe to him, and to thoſe that gave them Power; and he fear'd alſo to their own Souls. He particularly and ſolemnly bid her tell Mother, That his Thoughts had never ſtray'd from Her, and that his Love ſhou'd be the ſame to the laſt. After theſe and other Things he ſaid, Sweet Heart, you will forget this: No, ſaid She, I ſhall never forget it whilſt I live; and pouring out abundance of Tears, promis'd him to write down the Particulars. Then holding the Duke of Gloceſter on his Knee, he ſaid, Now they will cut off thy Father's Head, at which Words the Child look'd very ſtedfaſtly upon him; Mark, Child, what I ſay; They will cut off my Head, and perhaps make Thee a King: But mark what I ſay, You muſt not be a King as long as your Brothers Charles and James do live: For they will cut off your Brothers Heads, when they can catch them, and cut off thy Head too at laſt; and therefore I charge you do not be made a King by Them. At which the Child ſighing ſaid, I will be torn in Pieces firſt: Which, falling from one ſo young, exceedingly pleas'd the King; who now gave them all his Jewels, except the George he wore, which was cut in an Onyx with great Curioſity, and ſet about on each Side with twenty one fair Diamonds. Then with Kiſſes, Embraces, and his laſt Bleſſing, they parted from him in ſuch a ſorrowful Manner, as mov'd the Hearts and Souls of the very Keepers.

His Diſcourſe with them.

The Warrant for the King's Execution.

The Perſons that Sign'd it.

3. All this Day was imploy'd by the pretended Judges, or at leaſt the Leaders and Managers among them, in Conſultation how to perfect and compleat the Tragedy of the next; and fifty nine of them agreed both to Sign and Seal a bloody Warrant, particularly directed to Colonel Francis Hacker, Colonel Huncks, and Lieutenant-Colonel Phray, and to every of them, 'Willing and Requiring them to ſee 'the Sentence given upon Saturday laſt executed in the 'Open Street before Whitehall, upon the Morrow, being 'the 30th Day of this Inſtant Month of January, between 'the Hours of ten in the Morning, and five in the Afternoon of the ſame Day, with full Effect: Requiring alſo 'all Officers, Soldiers and others, the Good People of this 'Nation of England, to be aſſiſting in this Service.' They that ſeal'd and ſubſcrib'd it were Bradſhaw, Grey of Groby, Cromwell, Whally, Liveſey, Okey, Danvers, Bourchier, Ireton, Maleverer, Blakeſtone, Hutchinſon, Goffe, Pride, P. Temple, Harriſon, Hewſon, Smith, Pelham, Mayne, Horton, Jones, Moore, Waller, Millington, Fleetwood, Alured, Lilburn, Say, Stapeley, Deane, Tichburn, Edwards, Blagrave, Roe, Purefoy, Scroop, J. Temple, Garland, Ludlow, Martin, Potter, Conſtable, Ingoldsby, Cawley, Berkſtead, Ewers, Dixwell, Walton, Norton, Chaloner, Wogan, Venn, Clement, Downs, Wayte, Scot, Carew and Corbet. In this Order they ſtood, only with the Chriſtian Names before them, in this execrable Warrant; the Original of which was afterwards diſcover'd, and ſtill remains a Blot and Record of Infamy to this Nation. And indeed an Act of Parliament has ſince branded them and their Aſſiſtants with the Name of a 'Party of Wretched Men, 'deſperately wicked, and hardned in their Impiety; Miſ'creants, who were as far from being True Proteſtants, as 'they were from being True Subjects.

There were others beſides theſe, who were as deeply ingag'd, but acted with more Privacy and behind the Curtain, among which Saint John and Vane ſtand charg'd; and indeed this whole Day's Work was acted with all the Secrecy and Darkneſs that cou'd be imagin'd: And yet moſt of the Actors ſeem'd ſtill to have had ſome Inclination to ſave the King's Life, if they cou'd have had ſome ſpecial Terms of Security, &c. Concerning which I have receiv'd from a good Friend a Manuſcript Teſtimonial of Mrs. Thornton, a Yorkſhire Gentlewoman, Daughter to Sir Chriſtopher Wandesford, who had been Deputy-Governor of Ireland under the Earl of Strafford: It is a Relation of a Meeting at Mr. William Wandesford her Father's Brother's Houſe in London, on the 29th Day of January, 1648. The Perſon was generally eſteem'd for her Worth and Piety; and has given this following Account, worthy of the Reader's Notice. 'Not long after the Death of the 'King, being in Company with the ſaid Mr. Wandesford, 'and ſome others, condoling and condemning the bloody 'Fact, he told Me, There happen'd to be a Cabal or Meeting 'of ſeveral Perſons at his Houſe the Day before that Tragedy 'was acted, about the Execution of it, as he underſtood afterwards, to his great Grief that ſuch an odious Conſult ſhou'd 'be within his Walls. The Particulars of whoſe Relation 'were as follows. That Mr. Ruſhworth, Author of the 'Collections, &c. came to him ſome Days before the ſaid 'Conſult, and deſir'd the Liberty of a large Room in his 'Houſe for that Day, to give him the Key of the Door, 'That He, and his ſaid Company might meet privately, paſs and repaſs, without Trouble, Entertainment or Attendance. 'This, he ſaid, he cou'd not deny him in reſpect of their 'mutual Friendſhip, and ſome paſt Civilities; yet the Care 'that was taken for ſuch a Convenience, and the Caution 'us'd to tranſact it ſo ſecretly, made him not a little wonder, and ſo curious as to obſerve them. The Company 'came in the Morning, not together, but One by One, 'and were above a Dozen in Number: Particularly he 'knew the Lord Baltimore, and Mr. William Lilly, and 'ſaw others, ſuſpected by him to be Papiſts; which ſtrange 'Mixture did much amaze him. Towards the Evening he 'took Notice, that Mr. Ruſhworth and another went out, 'and ſtaid about two Hours before they return'd, and then 'preſently after the Company broke up.

A private Relation of what paſs'd the Day before the King's Death.

'That a few Days after, Mr. Ruſhworth meeting him, 'gave him Thanks for his late Civility; and He caſting

‘out ſome Words by Way of Enquiry about the meeting there at that Time, Mr. Ruſhworth freely told him, That the Perſons there met, were THE CLOSE COMMITTEE to conſult about the King's Execution; That He and another were order'd to wait on his Majeſty, and uſe all their Art and Arguments, to perſuade him to recede ſomething from his former reſolute Stiffneſs in inſiſting ſo much upon his own Innocency, and Charging the Guilt of all the Blood ſhed in the late Wars upon the Parliament, and to own Himſelf, at leaſt in ſome Meaſure, to have been the Cauſe thereof, and ſo juſtify their Proceedings; which if he wou'd do, All of Them, from whom they came, promis'd to ſerve him to their utmoſt, and to ſet him upon his Throne again; but that he obſtinately rejected the Offer, as moſt unreaſonable and unjuſt, and ſaid, That he cou'd not do it without manifeſt Wrong to his Honour, and his Cauſe, and Conſcience; and if he could not have his Life but upon ſuch baſe Compliance, he was contented to die. So, when they could, as he ſaid, do no Good on him, being reſolv'd to perſiſt in his wilful Way, they bid him provide for Death, for the next Day the Sentence paſs'd upon him ſhould be executed: At which he ſaid, God's Will be done! and they left him.’ Such is the Account given by a Perſon of unqueſtion'd Reputation, who dy'd in the Year 1705, of which the Reader is left to make his own Judgment.

All this Day the King eat and drank very ſparingly, a great Part of it being ſpent in Prayer and Devotion; and it was ſome Hours after Night before the Biſhop took leave of his Majeſty, who deſir'd him to be early with him next Morning. The fatal Warrant being ſign'd, that Night Colonel Hacker, who commanded the Guards about the King, would have plac'd two Muſqueteers in the King's Bed-Chamber, which being told to his Majeſty, he made no Reply, only gave a deep Sigh: However the good Biſhop and Mr. Herbert apprehending the Horror of it, and Diſturbance it would give the King in his ſolemn Preparations, and having repreſented the Barbarouſneſs of ſuch an Act, they never would deſiſt, till the Colonel had withdrawn theſe Men. Before the Biſhop's Departure, the King ſaid, My Lord, I muſt remember one, that has had Relation to you and Me: Tell my Son Charles, that he has been an uſeful and honeſt Man to me. Being retired to his Lodging, the King continu'd reading and praying more than two Hours after; and after that commanded Mr. Herbert to lye by his Bed-ſide upon a Pallat, where that Gentleman could take but very little Reſt; but the King ſlept ſoundly for about four Hours, as having nothing to fear, nothing to diſcompoſe him the next Day.

Hacker's Deſign.

About two Hours before Day he awak'd, and calling to Mr. Herbert, he bad him riſe, For, ſaid his Majeſty, I will get up, having a great Work to do this Day: Herbert, this is my Second Marriage Day; I would be as trimm to Day as may be; for before Night I hope to be eſpous'd to my bleſſed Jeſus. And then appointing what Cloaths he would wear, he ſaid, Let me have a Shirt on more than ordinary, for the Seaſon is ſo ſharp as probably may make me ſhake, which ſome Obſervers will imagine proceeds from Fear. I would have no ſuch Imputation: I fear not Death! Death is not terrible to me: I bleſs my God I am prepared. Being got up, and Biſhop Juxon being come according to Promiſe, the King deliver'd to Mr. Herbert a Bible, in which he had writ many Annotations and Quotations with his own Hands, ‘charging him to give it to the Prince as ſoon as he return'd, and That he would be dutiful and indulgent to the Queen his Mother, affectionate to his Brothers and Siſters, who were alſo to be obſervient and dutiful to Him their Sovereign: And for as much as from his Heart he had forgiven his Enemies, and would leave the World in perfect Charity with all Men, he had adviſ'd his Son to exceed in Mercy, not in Rigour: And as to Epiſcopacy, it was ſtill his Opinion, That it is of Apoſtolick Inſtitution, and in this Kingdom exercis'd from the Primitive Times; and therein, as in all other Affairs, pray'd God to vouchſafe him a pious and diſcerning Spirit, both in Reference to Church and State; and that it was his laſt and earneſt Requeſt, that he would frequently read the Bible, which in all the Time of his Affliction had been his beſt Inſtructor and Delight.’ Then making ſome preſents of Books, a Sun-Dial Ring, and a Gold Watch, to his Children, the Earl of Lindſey, and the Dutcheſs of Richmond, he bad Mr. Herbert withdraw, and retir'd in private with the Biſhop. Then Herbert being call'd in, the Biſhop proceeded to the Service of the Day, and read the 27th of St. Matthew, the Hiſtory of our Saviour's Paſſion. The King ſuppoſing it had been ſelected on purpoſe, thank'd him for his ſeaſonable Choice; but the Biſhop modeſtly told him, It was the Leſſon appointed by the Calendar for that Day: which highly pleas'd the King as a Providential Preparation for his Paſſion; and ſo with great Satisfaction he took the bleſſed Sacrament.

The King's Advice to his eldeſt Son.

JANUARY. XXX.

4. All Things being now prepar'd, there began the laſt Scene of this Tragedy, on Tueſday the 30th of January, a Day melancholy and diſmal beyond any that England had ever yet beheld. About Ten in the Morning Colonel Hacker knocking ſoftly at the King's Chamber-Door, he let him know with a trembling Voice that it was Time to go to White-Hall, where his Majeſty might have ſome further Time to reſt. The King came out with the Biſhop and Mr. Herbert, to the latter of whom he gave his Silver Clock; and paſſing through the Garden, went into the Park, where ſeveral Companies of Foot were drawn up, who made a Guard on either Side as the King paſs'd. The King was alſo guarded by many Halberdiers before and behind, and walk'd between the Biſhop and Colonel Tomlinſon, both bare-headed. His Majeſty walking very faſt, bid them go faſter, ſaying, He now went before them to ſtrive for a Heavenly Crown, with leſs Solicitude than he had often encourag'd his Soldiers to fight for an Earthly Diadem. One of the Commanders by the way, thinking to diſturb him, ask'd him, whether he was not conſenting to his Father's Death; Friend, ſaid he, If I had no other Sin (I ſpeak it with Reverence to God's Majeſty) I aſſure Thee, I would not ask him Pardon. At the End of the Park the King went up the Stairs leading to the Long Gallery, and ſo into the Cabinet-Chamber; where they permitted Him and the Biſhop to be alone for ſome Space. While he was at his private Devotions, Nye and ſome other bold Miniſters knock'd at the Door, and the Biſhop opening it, they told him, They came to offer their Service to pray with the King. When the King declin'd their Service, and they became more importunate, and ſeem'd to require an Anſwer, his Majeſty ſaid, Then thank them from Me for the Tender of Themſelves: But tell them plainly, that they, that have ſo often and cauſeleſly pray'd againſt me, ſhall never pray with me in this Agony. They may, if they pleaſe, pray for me, and I'll thank them for it. Then having finiſh'd their Devotions, Now, ſays he, let the Rogues come; I have heartily forgiven them, and am prepar'd for all I am to undergo.

It was a very cold dark Day, and they at White-Hall had prepar'd two or three Diſhes of Meat for him to dine upon: But he refus'd to eat any Thing, deſigning to touch nothing after the Sacrament. Upon which the Biſhop urg'd him to conſider how long he had faſted, how ſharp the Weather was, and how ſome Fit of Fainting might take him upon the Scaffold, of which his Murderes would make an injurious Interpretotion; by which he prevail'd with him to eat half a Manchet of Bread, and drink a Glaſs of Wine. Being now prepared for the fatal Moment, upon the laſt Call of Colonel Hacker, he went with him and the Biſhop through the Banquetting-Houſe to the Scaffold by a Paſſage made through a Window; from whence he came with the ſame Unconcernedneſs and Motion that he uſually had when he enter'd it on a Maſque-Night. On the Scaffold, which was all cover'd with Black, the firſt Objects he ſaw were two Executioners, dreſs'd in Frocks and Vizzards to diſguiſe and conceal them, a Block and an Axe, with the Hooks and Staples to drag him to Execution, ſhould he make any ſort of Reſiſtance; all which did no ways diſmay his Chriſtian or Royal Courage. Then looking round upon the vaſt Throngs of People, who with bleeding Hearts and weeping Eyes preſs'd to behold this diſmal Spectacle, he found that they were kept at ſuch a Diſtance by the numerous Guards of Horſe and Foot, that he could not make that Speech he deſign'd to deliver to the Multitude, the Heads of which he had in a Paper. So that what he ſaid was to Colonel Tomlinſon and thoſe on the Scaffold; which Speech being publiſh'd only by his Enemies, it has been juſtly thought by many, that it was very defectively taken; tho' in general it is very material, and worthy the Royal Martyr, of which this is the Subſtance.

The King brought to the Scaffold.

He told them, He could have held his Peace very well, if he had not thought his Silence would make ſome Men think he ſubmitted to the Guilt, as well as the Puniſhment: Therefore he thought it his Duty, to God firſt, and to his Country, to clear Himſelf as an innocent Man, a good King, and a good Chriſtian. Firſt for his Innocence, he inſiſted upon the great Hinge of the Controverſy; and declar'd, That all the World knew That he never did begin the War with the two Houſes of Parliament; and call'd God to witneſs, to whom he muſt ſhortly give an Account, That he never did intend to incroach upon their Privileges. As to the War, he ſhew'd that they began with him about the Militia, and appeal'd to what could not be deny'd, the very Dates of their Commiſſions and His, and likewiſe to the Declarations, by which they might clearly ſee, That they began theſe unhappy Troubles, not He. Therefore he hop'd that God would clear him of the Guilt of thoſe enormous Crimes laid to his Charge. Yet he ſaid, God forbid

His laſt Speech.

he ſhould lay it on the two Houſes of Parliament; there was no Neceſſity of either; for he believ'd that ill Inſtruments between Them and Him, had been the chief Cauſe of all this Bloodſhed. Yet he could not but own That God's Judgment was juſt upon him, which is many Times paid by an Unjuſt Sentence; particularly acknowledging, That an Unjuſt Sentence he had ſuffer'd to take Effect, was now puniſh'd by an Unjuſt Sentence upon Himſelf, meaning the Earl of Strafford. Having clear'd his Innocence, he proceeded to ſhew, that he was a Good Chriſtian, and pointing to the Biſhop, he ſaid, That good Man could bear him Witneſs, that he had forgiven all the World, and even thoſe that had been the chief Cauſers of his Death. And his Charity muſt go further; he wiſh'd that they may repent, and pray'd God with St. Stephen, That this be not laid to their Charge; and not only ſo, but that they may take the right Way to the Peace of the Kingdom: For his Charity commanded him, not only to forgive particular Men, but to endeavour to the laſt Gaſp the Peace of the Kingdom. This Particular he enforc'd to ſome Gentlement that were writing; and then would ſhew them how they were out of the Way, and how they might be recover'd. Then he let them know That Conqueſt was Their Way, which was never juſt without a good juſt Cauſe, and conſequently no better than great Robbery. But to put them in the Way, he aſſur'd them, That God would never proſper them, till they gave God his Due, the King and his Succeſſors their Due, and the People their Due. They muſt give God his Due, by Regulating his Church according to Scripture, which was now out of Order; for which he propos'd a National Synod, freely call'd, freely debating among Themſelves, as the moſt likely Method to ſettle it. For the King, the Laws of the Land would clearly inſtruct them in That; therefore he only gave them a Hint of that. For the People, whoſe Liberty and Freedom he deſir'd as much as any Man, he truly told them, That they conſiſted in having of Government, thoſe Laws by which their Lives and Goods may be moſt their own: It was not in having a Share in Government, ſince a Subject and a Sovereign were clear different Things, therefore till they put the People in that Liberty, they would never enjoy Themſelves. Then he declar'd, It was for This that he now came here: If he had yielded to Arbitrary Sway, to have all Laws chang'd according to the Power of the Sword, he needed not to have come here; and therefore he told them, and pray'd it might not be laid to their Charge, That he was The MARTYR of the People. And ſo concluded with an Excuſe of Want of Time for the better digeſting of what he had to ſay, and with a Prayer, That they took thoſe Courſes that were beſt for the Good of the Kingdom, and their own Salvation.

Upon finiſhing his Speech, the good Biſhop thought it convenient to remember him, That tho' it was well known what his Affections were to the Proteſtant Religion, yet it might be expected that he ſhould ſay ſomewhat for the World's Satisfaction in that Particular. The King heartily thank'd him for this Remembrance, and declar'd before them all, That he dy'd a Chriſtian according to the Profeſſion of the Church of England, as he found it left him by his Father, of which this honeſt Man was a Witneſs. Then turning to the Officers, he declar'd He had a good Cauſe, and a gracious God; to Colonel Hacker he ſaid, Take Care that they don't put me to Pain, and gave him Mony; and to the Executioner, He ſhould ſay a ſhort Prayer, and when he thruſt out his Hands-------- After this he call'd for his Cap, which being put on by the Help of the Biſhop and Executioner, he repeated the Goodneſs of his Cauſe, and how gracious a God he had on his Side. The Biſhop alluding to his private Diſcourſe with him concerning the ſeveral Stages of Man's Life, ſaid, There was but one Stage more; which tho' turbulent and troubleſome, would carry him a very great way, from Earth to Heaven, where he ſhould find the deſired Prize, a Crown of Glory. To which the King adjoyn'd, I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible Crown, where there can be no Diſturbance; a happy Exchange, as the Biſhop reply'd. Then taking off his Cloak and George, he deliver'd the latter to the Biſhop with a particular Emphaſis REMEMBER! as being the laſt Word he ſpoke to him. Having ſpoken to the Executioner to faſten the Block, after a few Words of Ejaculation, he meekly laid his Neck upon the Block, and then bid the Executioner ſtay for the Sign, which was for the ſtretching forth his Hands; upon which Motion, his Head was at one Blow ſever'd from his Body, which being held up, and ſhewn to the aſtoniſh'd People, was with his Body put into a Coffin cover'd with black Velvet, and carry'd into his Lodging in White-Hall.

His Execution.

Thus fell the ROYAL MARTYR King Charles the Firſt, in 49th Year and Strength of his Age, both after a happy and comfortleſs Reign of twenty three Years, ten Months and three Days. Nor did they think it ſufficient to exerciſe their Cruelty upon the Living: For his Enemies deſpoil'd his Headleſs Body, waſh'd their Hands in his Blood, dipp'd their Staves in it, and offer'd for Mony the Block cut in Pieces, and the Sand diſtain'd with Gore, and likewiſe expos'd his Hair to Sale: His Body was deliver'd to be embowell'd by ſome Camp Surgeons, who were ſtrictly order'd to enquire and declare whether he had any ſcandalous Diſtemper. But this intended Villany was defeated by the Induſtry of an honeſt Phyſician, who privately thruſt himſelf into the Diſſection of the Body, who declar'd he had all the Signs and Marks of a long Life, and an admirable Conſtitution and Temperature of Body. Then, contrary to the publick Faith, they ſeiz'd on the Biſhop of London, rifled him of all his Papers, and ſearch'd his Cloaths and Coffers, leſt any thing deliver'd to him by the King ſhou'd appear abroad, to the Reputation of himſelf or his Cauſe. And becauſe they believ'd that the King's laſt Word, REMEMBER, might have ſome extraordinary Meaning in it, theſe Judges with great Threats adjur'd him to make a full Explanation of it. At which the good Biſhop diſcover'd and declar'd to them, That the King his Maſter bad him REMEMBER to carry this ſupreme Command of his dying Father, to the Prince his Son and Heir, That if ever he was reſtored to his Crown, HE SHOU'D FORGIVE THE AUTHORS OF HIS DEATH: An Anſwer manifeſting the Perfection of Chriſtianity, and no doubt very ſurpriſing to his Enemies. None of the Kings of England ever left the World with more open Marks of Sorrow and Affliction. The venerable Archbiſhop Uſher, from a Window, ſwooned at the Sight of the fatal Blow, as at a Prodigy too great for Heaven to permit, or the Earth to behold: And as the Rumour of his Death ſpread throughout the Kingdom, Women miſcarry'd, many of both Sexes fell into Palpitations, Swoonings and Melancholy, and ſome, with ſudden Conſternation, expired: The Pulpits every where reſounded with Sighs and Lamentations, even of thoſe Perſons who had ſo much contributed towards this miſerable Fate; while their Congregations of Men, Women and Children were diſſolv'd in Tears. Men of all Sorts, and almoſt of all Sects, extoll'd his Virtues, and compar'd him to Job, to David, and to Solomon, for Patience, Piety and Prudence. So true was what the noble Hiſtorian aſſures us, ‘ That, ‘ in that very Hour when he was thus wickedly murder'd ‘ in the Sight of the Sun, he had as great a Share in the ‘ Hearts and Affections of his Subjects in general, was ‘ as much belov'd, eſteem'd and long'd for by the People ‘ of the three Kingdoms, as any of his Predeceſſors had ‘ ever been.

The Barbarity of his Enemies.

The Concern of the People.

Therefore it cannot be improper here to hint at ſome other Things, that help'd to contribute towards this Tragedy, which had great Influence, but very little Appearance in the Publick, as we find them in the beſt Writers; who bring in the Popiſh Party for a conſiderable Share both in the War, and the Parricide. Tho' ſeveral of the Engliſh Papiſts were truly loyal, and great Sufferers; yet it was otherwiſe with many more, who under Hopes of Liberty of Conſcience, or of deſtroying Epiſcopacy, join'd with the Enemies of Church and State, and eſpecially with Foreign Prieſts and Jeſuits, whoſe very Intereſt led them to be intirely againſt the King and his Religion. Sir William Boſwell, in a Letter to Archbiſhop Laud from beyond Sea, aſſures him, ‘ That the ‘ Romiſh Clergy had gull'd the miſ-led Party of the Engliſh Nation, and that under a Puritanical Dreſs; for ‘ which the ſeveral Fraternities of that Church, have ‘ lately receiv'd Indulgence from the See of Rome. He ‘ tells him that the main Drift of their Intentions was to ‘ pull down the Engliſh Epiſcopacy: And that it wrought ‘ ſo much on divers of the Foreign Miniſters of the Proteſtants, that they eſteem'd the Engliſh Clergy little better than Papiſts.' How far theſe People were aſſiſtant in the Parliament Army, the King publickly complains of in more than one of his Declarations; and Salmonet himſelf owns that ſeveral of their Prieſts were found dead in that Army after the Battel of Edge-Hill. Biſhop Bramhall gives us further Particulars, who in a Letter to Archbiſhop Uſher, in the Year 1654, informs him from his own Knowledge, ‘ That in the Year 1646, by Order from Rome, above a hundred of the Romiſh Clergy ‘ were ſent into England, conſiſting of Engliſh, Scotch ‘ and Iriſh, who had with their Orders been taught ſeveral Handicraft Trades; moſt of whom went into the ‘ Parliament's Army under the Name of Puritans. Many of the Engliſh Romaniſts were at firſt ſurpris'd at ‘ this Pretence, but they ſoon came to a true underſtanding; and it was agreed that there was no better Deſign

How far the Papiſts contributed towards this Tragedy.

'to confound the Church of England, than by pretending Liberty of Conſcience. And when they found that ſuch Changes as they deſir'd cou'd not be brought about without the Death of the King, the Foreign Prieſts wrote to their ſeveral Convents, but eſpecially to the Sorboniſts, "Whether it might be ſcrupled to take away the King and his Family." To which the Sorboniſts reply'd, That it was lawful for Catholicks to work Changes in Governments for the Mother Church's Advancement, and chiefly in an Heretical Kingdom; and ſo lawful to make away the King.

In Confirmation of theſe Authorities, the learned Du Mouling is ſtill more particular, and obſerves, 'That a Year before the King's Death a ſelect Number of Engliſh Jeſuits were ſent from their Party in England, firſt to Paris, to conſult with the Faculty of the Sorbon, who were then wholly Jeſuited, about this Queſtion: "Whether ſeeing the State of England was in a likely Poſture to change Government, it was lawful, for the Catholick Cauſe in England, to make away the King, whom there was no hope to turn from his Hereſie?" This was anſwer'd affirmatively: After which the ſame Perſons went to Rome, where the ſame Queſtion being debated and propounded, it was concluded by the Pope, That it was both lawful and expedient for the Catholicks to promote that Alteration of State, &c. When the horrid Parricide had taken effect, the Pope commanded all the Papers about that Queſtion to be gather'd and burnt: In Obedience to which Order, a Roman Catholick in Paris was demanded to give up a Copy which he had of theſe Papers; but the Gentleman, who had Time to conſider and deteſt the Wickedneſs of that Project, refus'd to give it, and ſhew'd it to a Proteſtant Friend of his, relating to him the whole Carriage of the Negotiation, with great Abhorrency of the Practices of the Jeſuits. And when the Jeſuits return'd from Rome, they brought many more after them to help on the ſame Work; which they effected to their great Joy.' This ſame Author farther ſays, 'That the Roman Prieſt and Confeſſor [viz. the Queen's] is known, who when he ſaw the fatal Stroak given to the King, flouriſh'd with his Sword and cry'd out, Now the greateſt Enemy we had in the World is gone!' Then he tells us, 'That a Proteſtant Lady living in Paris, being perſwaded by a Jeſuit to turn Catholick; when the diſmal News of the Murther came to that City, the Lady was deeply afflicted with it; and when the Jeſuit came to ſee her, and found her all in Tears for that Diſaſter, he told her with a ſmiling Countenance, That ſhe had no Reaſon to lament, but rather rejoice, ſeeing the Catholicks were rid of their greateſt Enemy, and that Cauſe much promoted by his Death. Upon which the Lady in great Paſſion put him down the Stairs, ſaying, If that be your Religion, I have done with you for ever; and made her Words good.' He ſays, 'That many intelligent Travellers can tell of the great Joy among the Engliſh Convents and Seminaries, about the King's Death, as having overcome their Enemies, and done their main Work for their Settlement in England; of which they made themſelves ſo ſure, that the Benedictines were in great Fear, that the Jeſuits ſhou'd get their Lands; and the Engliſh Nuns were contending who ſhou'd be Abbeſſes in England.' Such are the Evidences of theſe ſecret Works of Darkneſs, which are not, nor cou'd not be very well laid open by our common Writers and Hiſtorians. To all which we ſhall add another Particular very little known; namely, That one of the moſt inveterate of the King's Judges, Sir John Danvers, was at that time a profeſs'd Papiſt, and ſo continu'd to the Day of his Death, as his own Daughter has ſufficiently atteſted.

And alſo the French.

How far the French were concern'd in our Troubles and this Tragedy, we have more than once taken Notice of; but ſtill it may not be improper in this Place to add a particular Story ſent me by the Reverend Dr. Torriano, a Divine of good Worth and Credit, which is here inſerted in his own Words. 'The French Story was plainly this: Dr. Shadwell and I (whom I ſuppoſe you know to have had the Honour of attending together the Earl of Mancheſter in his Embaſſy to France) waiting one Evening, about the Beginning of the Year 1701, in the Apartments at Verſailles, in Expectation of the King's coming out to Supper; and ſtaying in a Room where about eight or ten Gentlemen of, in Appearance, the beſt Rank of the Court were talking, We heard One of them entertaining the reſt concerning the Dutcheſs of Chevreux; and, at their ſeeming not readily to apprehend which of the Ladies of that Family he meant, explaining Himſelf to them, That it was the old Dutcheſs; She, ſays He, that went into England to make Charles the Firſt's Head be cut off; drawing, at the ſame Time, his Hand from Ear to Ear under his Throat.------- For you muſt know, continu'd He, the Queen, and Cardinal, and She, were One: Adding, She went into England to diſorder the Cards, but; with an Aſſeveration, they rais'd a Flame which they cou'd not afterwards put out: And then went on with what he was ſaying of Her and her Family. From this Deſcription caſually let fall in our Preſence, whom they either had not obſerv'd to be there, or whom they muſt have miſtaken for their Countrymen; and from that Company's acquieſcing in it, as a proper diſcriminating Character of that Lady, from the reſt of her Family, Dr. Shadwell and I cou'd not but look upon it to have been a Tradition in the French Court, That that unfortunate Alliance had been improv'd by the Cardinal towards the Deſtruction of our then Sovereign, and the Diſturbance of our Country, that themſelves might be able to purſue, without Interruption, their then early Deſigns of enſlaving Europe.

The King's Funeral.

But to return to the martyr'd King, of whoſe Character ſomething may be here expected; but of that ſufficient has been ſaid in ſeveral Parts of this Hiſtory: Therefore we ſhall in a great Meaſure decline it here, and ſo proceed to give an Account of his Funeral. Mr. Herbert had much ſolicited the preſent Governours, That his Royal Corps might be bury'd in King Henry the Seventh's Chappel at Weſtminſter, near the Grave of King James his Father; which they refus'd, alledging the Danger of much Concourſe to that Place out of a ſuperſtitious Reſpect. At length they appointed Windſor to be the Place of Interrment, which they allow'd, 'might be in a decent manner, provided the whole Expence did not exceed five Hundred Pounds.' The four faithful and loyal Lords, the Duke of Richmond, the Marqueſs of Hertford, the Earl of Southampton, and the Earl of Lindſey deſired, That they might have Leave to perform their laſt Duty to their dead Maſter, and to wait upon him to the Grave; which, after ſome Pauſes, they were permitted to do, with this Reſtriction, 'That they ſhou'd not attend the Corps out of the Town; ſince they reſolv'd it ſhou'd be carry'd to Windſor without Pomp and Noiſe, and then they ſhou'd have timely Notice, that if they pleas'd, they might be at the Interrment.' And accordingly it was committed to four of thoſe Servants, who had been allow'd to wait upon him during his Impriſonment, That they ſhou'd privately convey the Body to Windſor; which they perform'd with the greateſt Caution. The Coffin was firſt laid in the Bed-Chamber, and then in the great Hall, till the Arrival of the four Lords; who immediately repaired to Colonel Whitchcot the Governor of the Caſtle, and ſhew'd the Order from the Parliament to be preſent at the Burial, which he admitted; but when they deſired that the Biſhop of London, then attending, might bury his Majeſty according to the Form of the Common-Prayer Book, he abſolutely refus'd to conſent to it, declaring, That ſince the Common-Prayer Book was put down, he wou'd not ſuffer it to be us'd in that Garriſon where he commanded. This Refuſal has been hardly cenſured; but, as I have learnt from his Friends, he deſign'd not to have refus'd this Favour, if it had been ask'd him in a private Manner; ſo that what he did, was more the Effect of Fear, than of Obſtinacy, or Principle. By knocking on the Pavement, they with Difficulty found the large Vault, oppoſite to the Eleventh Stall on the Sovereign's Side; in which were two Coffins, one very large of King Henry the Eighth, the other of Queen Jane his third Wife, both cover'd with Velvet. There the King's Coffin was laid, together with the Velvet Pall, without any Words, or other Ceremonies than the Tears and Sighs of the few Spectators; among whom it can hardly be ſaid which was moſt tranſcendent, their Love to their Friend, their Obedience to their Maſter, or their Loyalty to their Prince. Such was the Funeral of this unfortunate good Prince, who had no other Epitaph but theſe Words on a Plate of Lead fixt to the Coffin, KING CHARLES 1648.

Certificate concerning it.

It has been made a Queſtion and a Wonder by many, why a particular Monument was not erected for him after the Reſtoration of his Son; eſpecially when the Parliament was well inclined to have given a good Sum for that grateful Purpoſe. This has caus'd ſeveral Conjectures and Reflexions; and Intimations have been given as if the Royal Body had never been depoſited there, or elſe had been afterwards removed by the Regicides; and the Lord Clarendon Himſelf ſpeaks ſoftly and ſuſpiciouſly of this Matter, as if he believ'd that the Body cou'd not be found. But to remove all Imaginations, we ſhall here inſert a Memorandum, or Certificate ſent by Mr. John Sewell a Regiſter at Windſor-Caſtle: 'Anno 1696, September twenty-firſt, the ſame Vault, in which 'King Charles the Firſt was bury'd, was open'd, to lay 'in a ſtill-born Child of the then Princeſs of Denmark, 'now our gracious Queen. On the King's Coffin the 'Velvet Pall was ſtrong and ſound, and there was about 'the Coffin a Leaden Band, with this Inſcription cut 'through it, KING CHARLES 1648. Queen 'Jane's Coffin was whole and entire; but that of King 'Henry the Eighth was ſunk in upon the Breaſt Part, and 'the Lead and Wood conſum'd with the Heat of the 'Gums he was embalm'd with; and when I laid my 'Hand on it, it was run together, and hard, and had no 'noiſom Smell.' As a farther Memorandum relating to King Charles's Interrment, He ſays, 'That when the 'Body of King Charles the Firſt lay in State in the Dean's 'Hall, the Duke of Richmond had the Coffin open'd, 'and was ſatisfy'd That it was the King's Body. This 'ſeveral People have declared they knew to be true, who 'were alive, and then preſent, as Mr. Randolph of New 'Windſor, and others:' So that he thinks the Lord Clarendon was miſ-led in that Matter, and that King Charles the Second never ſent to enquire after the Body, 'Since 'it was well known both to the Inhabitants of the Caſtle, 'and Town, that it was in that Vault.

We ſhall conclude this Reign and Period with this ſhort general Obſervation upon the Misfortunes of this pious King; That he ſuffer'd as much by the cowardly Treachery of his Friends, as the perverſe Obſtinacy of his Enemies; and loſt more by his Tenderneſs and Conceſſions, than by all the pretended Acts of his Severity and Tyranny: And if he had been of a more Reſolute and Imperious Nature, he wou'd have met with fewer Miſchiefs, either from his Friends, or his Enemies.

I. 1. ENGLAND, for ſeven or eight Years had met with the moſt terrible Convulſions that had ever been felt by that Kingdom; and now, upon the Murther of its Sovereign, ſaw the moſt univerſal and amazing Revolution it ever had beheld ſince the Memorials of Time or Government. The Engliſh Kings indeed had ſometimes been depos'd, chang'd, and otherwiſe treated; but Monarchy it ſelf had never been condemn'd and eradicated till this Time; when the whole Face of Things was chang'd, and ſcarce any Remainders left of that Government which had continu'd for innumerable Centuries of Years. All which was effected by a Ballance unequal, and a Power unknown to the Engliſh Nation, a pretended and imaginary Repreſentative of the People, call'd by its Members The COMMON-WEALTH, but by others more properly The RUMP, or Fag End of a corrupted Houſe of Commons, which ow'd its whole Life and Subſiſtence to a ſtanding Army, which it knew not how to diſſolve, nor long to command, and from which in a few Years it met with its Deſtruction; which was ſucceeded by a ſtrange Series of various Rule and Power, till Providence and Neceſſity reduc'd all Things to the proper Channel. So that the Fundamental Laws and Conſtitution being violated and torn in Pieces, the Government of the Land for above eleven Years ſubſiſted purely by Art, and an unnatural Power. Yet in this we may juſtly obſerve the wonderful Mazes of Heaven, that thoſe ſeveral Uſurpers and Tyrants, all prov'd ſo many Inſtruments of the Divine Vengeance to chaſtiſe the Rage and Impiety of all Parties, but more ſignally the Authors and Promoters of the bloody War and Rebellion, not only in England, but in Scotland, and in Ireland, and even in Holland, and the remoter Parts of the World.

The COMMON-WEALTH of England.

The firſt Attempt after the Murther of the King, made by theſe uſurping Commonwealths-Men, was a formal Proclamation, commanding 'That no Perſon whatſoever 'ſhou'd preſume to declare Charles Stuart, Son of the 'late Charles, commonly call'd the Prince of Wales, or 'any other Perſon, to be King, or chief Magiſtrate of 'England, or Ireland, or of any Dominions belonging 'to them, by Colour of Inheritance, Succeſſion, Election, or any other Claim whatſoever, without the free 'Conſent of the People in Parliament, firſt had and ſignify'd by a particular Act or Ordinance for that Purpoſe; 'any Law, Statute, Uſage and Cuſtom to the contrary notwithſtanding: And whoſoever ſhall contrary to this Act 'proclaim the ſaid Charles Stuart, ſhou'd be deem'd and 'judg'd a Traitor, and ſuffer accordingly.' Yet this ſevere Inhibition did not deter many loyal Subjects from performing their Duty, who on the ſecond of February printed a contrary Proclamation, and diſpers'd it about the Streets of London; in which they ſolemnly declar'd 'The illuſtrious Charles Prince of Wales, to be by Hereditary Birth-Right, and lawful Succeſſion, rightful, and 'undoubted King of Great Britain, France and Ireland; 'which they promis'd to maintain with their Eſtates, 'Lives, and laſt Drop of their Bloods, in Oppoſition to 'all Traytors, &c.' Many of theſe Proclamations were burnt by the preſent Rulers, and ſome ſuſpected Perſons ſeiz'd and impriſon'd; and not ſatisfy'd with this, they ſent out their Spies and Emiſſaries into all Parts of the City, to watch the very Looks and Sighs of the People; and they were poſſeſs'd with ſuch pannick Fears, that upon the Meeting of five or ſix Perſons together, the Houſe was preſently allarm'd with the Cries of bloody Deſigns, Plots and Treaſon!

164$\frac{8}{9}$. Car. 1.

Next, to ſecure their Infant Republick, they paſs'd an Act, 'That ſuch as had aſſented to the Vote of December 'the fifth, That the King's Conceſſions were a Ground for 'the Houſe to proceed to a Settlement, ſhou'd not be re-'admitted to ſit as Members:' As alſo, 'That ſuch as 'were then in the Houſe, and voted in the Negative, 'ſhou'd firſt enter their Diſſent to the ſaid Vote: and ſuch 'as were abſent ſhou'd declare their Diſapproval before 'they ſat.' Having thus ſettled their own Houſe, the Houſe of Lords fell next under their Conſideration, who having by a Meſſage acquainted them, 'That the Judges 'Commiſſions and Power being determin'd by the King's 'Death, they cou'd not give their uſual Aſſiſtance to the 'Houſe, which had put a Stand to all Proceedings; they 'therefore deſired that eighteen of the Commons might be 'ſent to confer with nine of the Lords, about ſettling of 'the Government;' inſtead of receiving an Anſwer, the Commons fell to a Debate about the very Being of the Houſe of Lords, and upon the ſixth of February voted, 'That they wou'd make no farther Addreſſes to the 'Houſe of Lords, nor receive any more from them: 'That the Houſe of Peers in Parliament was Uſeleſs and 'Dangerous; and that an Act ſhou'd be brought in for aboliſhing it: That the Privilege of the Peers being freed 'from Arreſts ſhou'd be made null and void.' But yet they condeſcended, 'That the Peers ſhou'd have the Privilege to be elected Knights, or Burgeſſes in Parlia‘ment;’ of which gracious Conceſſion three of them took the Benefit ſoon after, namely the old Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Salisbury, and the Lord Howard of Eſcrick. But the Peers in general highly reſented the Indignity, and in a Proteſtation publiſh'd in the Name of all the Peers and Barons in the Realm, ‘They aſſerted their Privileges, and the Fundamental Laws of the Nation, and diſclaim'd all Acts, Votes, &c. of the ſaid Members of the Commons Houſe, for erecting of New Courts of Juſtice, to Try, or Execute the King, or any Peer or Subject of this Realm, for altering the Government, Laws, Great-Seal, &c. raiſing new Forces, and impoſing new Taxes or Oaths; and likewiſe proteſted againſt the Traiterous Murthering of the late King, and the Diſinheriting of his Son the Prince of Wales, and particularly againſt that Inſolent and Frantick Vote, concerning the Aboliſhing the Houſe of Peers as Uſeleſs and Dangerous: All which Votes, Acts and Orders, they declar'd to be not only illegal, but deteſtable and deſtructive to the Rights and Beings of Parliaments, the Fundamental Laws of the Realm, and the Lives, Liberties and Properties of the People.’ But this made no Impreſſion upon the Commons, who ſecur'd their Doors by Guards of Soldiers: So that this moſt ancient and noble Houſe, which had given it ſelf ſuch deſperate Wounds by the Excluſion of one Part, and the Defection of another, was now brought to a diſgraceful Period.

The Lords Proteſtation.

Kingly Government aboliſh'd.

And now to compleat their Security by a Third Tye, the Commons reſolv'd and declar'd, ‘That it had been found by Experience, That the Office of a KING in this Nation, or to have the Power thereof in any Single Perſon, was Unneceſſary, Burthenſom, and Dangerous to the Liberty and Safety, and Publick Intereſt of the Nation; and therefore it ſhould be utterly aboliſh'd; and to that Purpoſe an Act ſhould be forthwith prepar'd.’ It is remarkable, that in this Debate, when all did not ſhew themſelves equally fond of a Common-wealth, Harry Martin himſelf ingenuouſly declar'd, If they deſir'd a King, the Laſt was as proper as any Gentleman in England; therefore freely own'd, he had always ſtood againſt the Thing, not the Perſon. The Act being order'd to be proclaim'd in all Parts of the Kingdom, Reinoldſon, the preſent Lord-Mayor, a Perſon of great Integrity and Loyalty, refus'd to publiſh it in London; for which he was diſcharg'd from his Office, and with three Aldermen of the ſame Judgment committed Priſoner to the Tower, and one Andrews was choſen in his Place, who with Pennington, Atkins, Wollaſton, Viner, Foulk, Edmunds and Pack, then Aldermen, and ſome others, proclaim'd this exorbitant Act in ſeveral Parts of the City. But this great Alteration ſo much amaz'd the Generality of the People, that the Parliament endeavour'd to give them ſome Satisfaction by a plauſible Declaration, in which, ‘They promis'd to deliver them from the Bondage introduc'd by the Norman Conqueſt, and to maintain the ancient Laws, which they much extoll'd;’ adding, ‘That they might well conſiſt with the preſent Government of a Republick, upon ſome eaſy Alterations of Form only, leaving the Subſtance intire, and reforming the Abuſes thereof.’ They farther promis'd ‘the Eſtabliſhment of a firm and ſafe Peace, the Advancement of the true Proteſtant Religion, and the liberal Maintenance of a Godly Miniſtry; the ſettling of Treaties with Foreign Princes and States, the Encouragement of Manufactures, for the Increaſe of Trade, and the Maintenance of the Poor in all Places of the Land.

The Parliament's Declaration.

Commiſſioners of the Great-Seal.

Their new Great-Seal, formerly mention'd, was now got ready; the Cuſtody of which was committed to three Lawyers, Whitelock, Keeble, and Liſle; of whom the former complains of the two latter in his Manuſcript Additions, &c. and ſays that Keeble had little Experience in Practice, and Liſle had leſs, but was very Opinionative. The Judges being ſent for, ſix of them, Rolles and Jermin of the King's-Bench, Saint John and Pheſant of the Common-Pleas, and Wild and Yates of the Exchequer, receiv'd their Commiſſions from theſe new Keepers of the Great-Seal, and ſubmitted to act according to the Alterations in the Law made by the Parliament, who had enacted, ‘That the Writs ſhould no more run in the King's Name; but the Name, Stile, and Teſt, ſhould be Cuſtodes Libertatis Angliæ, Authoritate Parliamenti:’ Which was ſuch a notorious Violation of the Conſtitution, that tho' Ten were their own by Creation, and Two by continual Submiſſion, the remaining Six, Bacon, Brown, Beddenfield, Creſwell, Treavor and Atkins, threw up their Commiſſions, and refus'd to act any longer. But their Places were ſoon ſupply'd, the Circuits appointed, and a new Oath impos'd upon them, whereby they were to ſwear, ‘Well and truly to ſerve the Common-wealth in the Office of a Juſtice in the Upper-Bench, or Common-Pleas, according to their beſt Skill and Cunning.’ And that all might yield ready Obedience, and to make way for future Oaths, they by an Act repeal'd thoſe Clauſes in the Firſt of Queen Elizabeth, and the Third of King James, which enjoin'd the taking the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to the Kings of England, and their Succeſſors. Then beſides their Great-Seal, they appointed that all the Mony from that Time to be coyn'd, ſhould, inſtead of the King's Impreſſion, bear the Croſs and Harp, with this Motto, GOD WITH US.

Thus was this Part of a Parliament actuated and guided by a ſtanding Army, who together thought themſelves inſufficient, till they had erected a Third Power to ſtrengthen their Uſurpation: This they call'd a COUNCIL OF STATE, conſiſting of about forty Perſons, namely the Earls of Denbigh, Mulgrave, Pembroke and Salisbury, the Lords Gray, Fairfax, and Grey of Groby, Liſle, Rolles, Saint John, Wild, Bradſhaw, Cromwell, Skippon, Pickering, Maſſam, Haſlerigg, Harrington, Vane, Danvers, Armin, Mildmay, Conſtable, Pennington, Wilſon, Whitelock, Marten, Ludlow, Stapleton, Heveningham, Wallop, Hutchinſon, Bond, Popham, Valentine, Walton, Scot, Purefoy and Jones. To theſe Power was given ‘To command and ſettle the Militia of England and Ireland, to order the Fleet, and ſet forth ſuch a Naval Power as they ſhould think fit; to appoint Magazines and Stores for England and Ireland, and to diſpoſe of them for the Service of both Nations, as they thought proper: That they ſhould have Power to ſit and execute theſe Powers for the Space of one whole Year.’ The better to unite theſe, a ſevere Oath of Secrecy and Fidelity was invented, in ſuch Terms as it threw out ſome of the beſt of them, and let in others of more extended Conſciences. Laſtly, that they might have ſome future Obligation of Obedience from their Subjects, who had broken all the former Oaths they had taken, a new Oath was prepar'd, which they call'd an ENGAGEMENT; the Form of which was, that every Man ſhould ſwear, That he would be true and faithful to the Government eſtabliſh'd, without King or Houſe of Peers: And whoever refus'd to take that Oath, ſhould be incapable of holding any Place or Office, in Church or State. The Neceſſity of taking of which did not only exclude all of the Royal Party, but freed them from very many who had Offices in Church and State, who being of the Presbyterian Party, durſt not ſacrifice their beloved Covenant to this new Engagement. Thus, in a few Weeks, an extraordinary Power was eſtabliſh'd; and now inſtead of King, Lords and Commons, the Nation was govern'd by about a Fifth Part of the latter, ſupported by a ſtanding Army, and a Third Thing ariſing from both, call'd a Council of State.

A Council of State.

The Oath of Engagement.

A new High Court of Juſtice.

2. Before all theſe could be compleated, the Rulers had, in ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom, terrify'd the People with the bloody Executions of many Perſons concern'd in the late Inſurrections. And that all Hopes and Pretences might be remov'd from their Subjects, the Peers of the Realm, of taking Advantage from the Fundamental Laws of it, a new High Court of Juſtice was erected to ſit for the Tryal of the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen a private Gentleman: that they might ſee there ſhould hereafter be no more Diſtinction of Quality, but that the Higheſt and the Loweſt ſhould undergo the ſame Form of Tryal for Life. The former of them, Duke Hamilton, could hardly be otherwiſe accounted than a Priſoner of War, and therefore in no Danger of his Life; but being ſenſible of the Fury of the Times, he made his Eſcape out of Windſor-Caſtle, and was three Days out of his Enemies Hands: But being impatient to be at a greater Diſtance from them, he was ſeiz'd as he was taking Horſe in Southwark, and carry'd Priſoner to the Tower, from whence he was brought, with the others, before that High Court of Juſtice.

The Tryal of Duke Hamilton.

The Tryal of this great Man laſted many Days, in which Time He and his Council ſhew'd the utmoſt of their Art, and fenc'd with great Dexterity againſt all that could be alledg'd againſt him. He principally inſiſted upon ‘The Right and Privilege of the Kingdom of Scotland, by whoſe Laws he was entirely govern'd: That he had not the leaſt Dependence upon the Kingdom of England; but being a Subject of Scotland, was bound to obey the Commands of that Kingdom; the Parliament of which having thought it neceſſary to raiſe an Army for the Relief of their King, and conſtituted him General of that Army, it was not lawful for him to refuſe the Command thereof; and whatſoever Misfortune he had ſuſtain'd, he could not be conceiv'd to be liable to any other Puniſhment, than what was due to a Priſoner of War.’ But on the other ſide he was told, ‘That the Rights and Laws of the Kingdom of Scotland were not call'd in Queſtion, nor could be violated by their Proceedings againſt him, who was a Subject of England; againſt which he was charg'd with Rebellion and Treaſon: That they did not proceed againſt him as Duke of Hamilton in Scotland, but as Earl of Cambridge in England, and they would judge him as ſuch.’ To this he made ſeveral Replies, and inſiſted upon on his Nonnaturalization: But this would not clear his Cauſe, and to ſhew that he was not a pure Foreigner, they unluckily prov'd, 'That as a Peer of England, he in the Houſe of Peers had took the National Covenant, and ſubſcrib'd to it, CAMBRIDGE; and likewiſe as a Peer of England had took the Negative Oath before the Commiſſioners of the Great Seal.' So that after all his various Pleas, and his offering a Hundred Thouſand Pounds for his Life, he was condemn'd to be beheaded.

The Earls of Holland and Norwich.

The next was the Earl of Holland, that unhappy Affector of Popularity, now in a languiſhing State of Health, who being charg'd with the late Inſurrections, confeſs'd the Fact, but poorly urg'd 'The many Services he had formerly done to the Parliament,' and more reaſonably pleaded. 'The Benefit of Quarter given him at St. Neots.' To the firſt he was anſwer'd, 'That he had once before deſerted the Parliament, yet upon his Return had his Sequeſtration taken off, when he proteſted, That he would for ever ſerve them with his Life and Fortunes; which Proteſtation and Promiſe he had lately broken, by an Inſurrection, and ſhedding of innocent Blood.' As for the Benefit of Quarter, 'It was deny'd that any had been given him, and declar'd that he had yielded to Mercy.' So Sentence of Death was pronounc'd againſt him; notwithſtanding all the Intereſt of his Brother the Earl of Warwick, and the whole Presbyterian Party. The jovial Earl of Norwich behav'd himſelf with a handſom Submiſſion to the Court, and generouſly inſiſted upon his Gratitude and Obligations to the Crown, 'His being bred up in Court from his Cradle, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth; his having been Servant to King James all his Reign; his Dependence upon Prince Henry, and afterwards upon the late King; for which he had always endeavour'd to do the beſt Service he could; and concluded as a Man that would be oblig'd to them if they would give him Leave to live.

And the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen.

The brave Lord Capel utterly refus'd to ſubmit to their Juriſdiction; alledging, 'That being a Soldier, and a Priſoner of War, the Lawyers and Gown Men had nothing to do with him; therefore would not anſwer to any Thing that Steel had ſo rudely preſs'd, but inſiſted upon the Law of Nations, which exempted all Priſoners from Death, though ſubmitting to Mercy, after ſuch a Number of Days, which were now expired.' He urg'd the Declaration made by General Fairfax to him and the reſt of the Priſoners, after the Death of Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Liſle, That no other of their Lives ſhould be in Danger, which he had Witneſſes ready to prove, if they might be heard;' and concluded with demanding the Privilege of being try'd by his Peers. Ireton, who ſat as one of his Judges, deny'd 'That the General had made any ſuch Promiſe, and if he had, it could not have reſtrained the Parliament's Authority;' and put him in Mind of his Carriage that Time, and how much he then neglected the General's Civility. The other ſtill inſiſted on the Promiſe, and urg'd, 'That the General might be ſent for, and examin'd; which they knew not how to deny, but becauſe of his preſent Indiſpoſition, they ſaid they would ſend to him, whilſt they proceeded againſt Sir John Owen, who anſwer'd them without any Application, 'That he was a plain Gentleman of Wales, who had always been taught to obey the King; that he had ſerv'd him honeſtly during the War, and finding afterwards that many honeſt Men endeavour'd to raiſe Forces to releaſe him out of Priſon, he did the like;' and concluded as a Man not much concern'd at what they reſolv'd concerning him. In the mean Time the Lord Capel's Queſtion being put to Fairfax, his Anſwer was interpreted in the Court, 'That a Promiſe of free Quarter only exempted him from the Sword, but not from the Judicial Proceedings of a Civil Court;' and Bradſhaw told that Lord, with many inſolent Expreſſions, That he was try'd before ſuch Judges as the Parliament thought fit to aſſign him, and who had judg'd a better Man than Himſelf. So Sentence was pronounc'd againſt all five of them, 'That they ſhould loſe their Heads:' Upon which Sir John Owen, with a reverend Bow, gave them humble Thanks; and being ask'd by one preſent, What he meant: He ſaid aloud, It was a very great Honour to a poor Gentleman of Wales to loſe his Head in ſuch noble Company; and ſwore a great Oath, That he was afraid they would have hang'd him.

All are condemn'd.

3. Great Endeavours were us'd to preſerve the Lives of theſe Perſons by the Power and Authority of the Parliament, where there were ſo many Members who had not ſat in Judgment upon them, of ſuch different Intereſts and Affections, that there might be reaſonable Hopes of reſcuing them from the unjuſt Sentence. Their Wives, and Children, and Friends, left no Way untry'd to prevail: They offer'd, and gave Mony to ſome, and receiv'd Promiſes accordingly; but they who had the greateſt Power and Credit, were inexorable; yet dealt ſo much more honeſtly than the reſt, that they declar'd to the Ladies, who begg'd for their Husbands and Fathers, That they would not endeavour to do them Service. And Ireton, above all Men, continu'd his inſolent and implacable Humour, and told them, If he had Credit, they ſhou'd all dye.

Their ſeveral Petitions.

The Petitions of the four Lords were read in Order in the Houſe, being penn'd in ſuch Styles as their Friends were adviſ'd. Duke Hamilton's Petition, and great Offer, being firſt read, many upon the Motives of Juſtice, and as they imagin'd his Death might be the Occaſion of new Troubles between the two Nations of England and Scotland, wou'd have been willing he ſhou'd live. But he had fewer Friends as to his Perſon than any of the reſt; and Cromwell well knew that his being remov'd out of the Way, wou'd be acceptable to them upon whom the Security of Scotland depended: So that when his Petition was read, it was rejected by a great Majority of Voices; yet after that, private Offers were made to him of Life and Grandeur, by Hugh Peters and others, if he wou'd make ſuitable Diſcoveries; which he as generouſly rejected. The Conſideration of the two Earls, Holland and Norwich, took up a much longer Debate: For the Former, the Intereſt and Interpoſition of his Brother the Earl of Warwick, was apply'd; and all the Presbyterians were infinitely ſollicitous to preſerve him. They urg'd 'his Merit towards the Parliament in the Beginning of the Troubles; how much he had ſuffer'd in the Court for his Affection to them; his Age and Infirmities, which wou'd not ſuffer him long to enjoy that Life they ſhou'd give him; and the Conſideration of his Wife and Children, which were numerous.' But theſe Arguments provok'd others to exclaim againſt his Backſlidings with the greater Animoſity, and to undervalue his Services he had ever done, to tax his Vanities, and his Breach of Faith; and Cromwell having particular Reſentments againſt him, upon the Account of ſome former Contemptuous Words, he was at laſt overpower'd.

The Earl of Norwich, having always led a chearful and jovial Life, without contracting many Enemies, had many there who wiſh'd him well, and few who had Animoſity againſt him; ſo that when the Queſtion was put concerning him, the Houſe was equally divided, four and twenty of each Side. Inſomuch that his Life or Death depended upon the ſingle Vote of the Speaker, who told the Houſe, 'That he had receiv'd ſeveral Obligations to that Lord; and particularly he had once skreen'd him from the King's Diſpleaſure, and remov'd a Prejudice againſt him, which might have been very penal to him; therefore he was oblig'd in Gratitude to give his Vote for the ſaving his Life:' And it is juſtly believ'd that he had not come into ſo much Danger, had it not been for his unſeaſonable Jeſting upon General Fairfax at the Siege of Colcheſter. The Houſe was likewiſe equally divided in the Caſe of the Earl of Holland; but here the Speaker turn'd the Scale the other Way, and gave him up to Death, as Whitelock aſſures us. Thus the Earl of Norwich, who had been no Friend to the zealous Puritan Party, was ſav'd, and the Earl of Holland, who had been the moſt obliging Perſon to them, by the ſame ſingle Vote loſt his Life: Which, as the laſt nam'd Author obſerves, may be a Caution to us againſt the Affectation of Popularity, when we ſee the Iſſue of it in this noble Gentleman, who being ſo full of Generoſity and Courtſhip to all ſorts of People, was by their Repreſentatives given up to Execution for Treaſon; and another Lord, who never made any Profeſſion for Liberty, and who exceeded the other as much in his Crime againſt the Parliament, as he came ſhort of him in his Popularity, had his Life ſpared by the People,

Earl of Norwich acquitted.

The Lord Capel flies, and is taken.

The Lord Capel, being impriſon'd in the Tower, had by a ſtrange Adventure, by a Cord and other Means, let himſelf down out of his Chamber Window in the Night, over the Tower Wall, into the great Ditch; where he found the Water and the Mud ſo deep and toilſom, that in wading it he muſt have periſh'd, had he not been by the Head taller than other Men. The Way was ſo long, and the Fatigue of drawing himſelf out of the Mud ſo painful, that his Spirits were near exhauſted, and he was once ready to call out to his Enemies to deliver him from a Place ſo diſmal. But at length with great Difficulty he got to the Place where his Friends expected him, who carry'd him to a Chamber in the Temple, where he remain'd ſecure for two or three Days. At which Time a faithful Friend, conceiving he might be more ſafe than in a Place where ſo many were ſought for, had provided a private Lodging for him in Lambeth Marſh; but croſſing the Water in a dark Night, his Lordſhip's Perſon, or Diſguiſe, or ſome Accident, rais'd a Suſpicion in the wicked Waterman, who undiſcern'd follow'd them, till he ſaw into what Houſe they retir'd; and then went to an Officer, and ask'd, What he wou'd give him to bring him to the Place where the Lord Capel lay? and being promis'd ten Pounds, he immediately led him to the Houſe, where that great Man was ſeiz'd, and carry'd back to the Tower. When the Petition, deliver'd by his Lady, was read, many Gentlemen ſpoke in his Favour, and expreſs'd a juſt Veneration for his great Virtues; declaring, 'That he had never deceiv'd or betray'd them, but had always magnanimouſly declar'd for the King:' And Cromwell, who well knew him, ſpoke ſo honourably of him, and with ſo many Profeſſions of Reſpect and Kindneſs, that all Men thought he was Safe, till he concluded, 'That his Affection to the Publick ſo out-weigh'd his private Friendſhip, that he cou'd not but tell them, That the Queſtion was now, Whether they wou'd preſerve the moſt invincible Enemy they had? That he knew well that the Lord Capel wou'd be the laſt Man in England that wou'd abandon the Royal Intereſt; that he had great Courage, Induſtry and Generoſity, and ſo many Friends to adhere to him, that as long as he liv'd, in any Condition whatſoever, he wou'd be a Thorn in their Sides; and therefore, for the Good of the Common-Wealth, he wou'd give his Vote againſt the Petition.' Ireton's Hatred was Immortal, who ſpoke againſt him as a Man of whom he was heartily afraid. Many were ſway'd by the ſuperſtitious Argument that had been urg'd againſt Duke Hamilton, That God was not pleas'd that he ſhou'd eſcape, becauſe he had put Him into their Hands again, when he was at Liberty. After a long Debate, tho' there was not a Man that had not a Value for him, and very few who had a particular Malice or Prejudice againſt him, the Queſtion being put, the Negative was greater by three or four Voices: So that, of the four Lords, three were without the Mercy of theſe implacable People.

Owen acquitted.

There being no other Petition preſented, Ireton told them, 'There had been great Endeavours and Sollicitations us'd to ſave theſe Lords; but that there was a Commoner, another condemn'd Perſon, for whom no Man had ſpoke a Word, nor had he Himſelf ſo much as petition'd them; and therefore he deſir'd That Sir John Owen might be preſerv'd by the meer Motive and Goodneſs of the Houſe it ſelf:' Which Motion found little Oppoſition; whether they were now ſatiated with Blood, or that they were willing, by this very Inſtance, that the Nobility ſhou'd ſee that a Commoner ſhou'd be preferr'd before them. However, ſo much lawleſs Severity was now ſhewn, that the High-Court of Juſtice began at this Time, both in Print and in Private, to be call'd CROMWELL's NEW SLAUGHTER-HOUSE.

The Execution of Duke Hamilton,

4. To compleat the Tragedy, a Scaffold was erected before Weſtminſter-Hall, directly againſt the High-Court of Juſtice; and on the ninth Day of March all the Priſoners condemn'd were brought to Sir Robert Cotton's Houſe; where they were ſuffer'd to repoſe themſelves about the Space of an Hour, and were ſucceſſively led through the Hall to the Scaffold. The Firſt was the Duke of Hamilton, who, apprehending he might be interrupted by Noiſe or otherways upon the Scaffold, had prepar'd a Speech in Writing, which he deliver'd to his Friends, in which he declar'd Himſelf 'to have been a loyal and faithful Subject and Servant to the late King, in whom he had obſerv'd as eminent Virtues, and as little Vice, as in any Man he ever knew. And among other Things he clear'd himſelf, both from adviſing the King to paſs the Bill for the Continuance of the Parliament, and that other for the Attainder of the Earl of Strafford; and likewiſe clear'd both the King, and Himſelf, from being any ways the Cauſers or Countenancers of the Iriſh Rebellion.' Being ready to go to the Scaffold, ſome Officers from Cromwell came to him, and proffer'd, 'That if he wou'd diſcover what had been often ask'd of him, he ſhou'd not only be preſerv'd, but be made a great Man.' But he utterly rejected their Propoſals, and ſaid, If he had as many Lives as Hairs on his Head, he wou'd ſooner lay them all down, than redeem them by ſuch baſe Means; as Mr. Burnet had it from an Ear-Witneſs. Having aſcended the Scaffold with Dr. Sibbald, he ſeem'd yet to have ſome hope of a Reprieve from the Waiting of the Earl of Denbigh to ſpeak with him; but after a ſhort Whiſper, he prepar'd for Death. He repeated ſome Parts of his written Speech, and complain'd much 'of the Injuſtice that was done him; and that he was put to Death for obeying the Laws of his Country; which if he had refus'd, he muſt have ſuffer'd there;' and ſo with great Patience and Devotion he ſubmitted to the fatal Stroak. Thus dy'd this illuſtrious Perſon in the forty third Year of his Age; whoſe natural Darkneſs and Reſervedneſs, made him to be thought a Wiſe Man; and his having commanded under the King of Sweden, made him be thought a great Soldier: Both which Miſtakes, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, caus'd him to be accounted a worſe and more dangerous Man, than in truth he deſerv'd to be. Moſt Writers have born hard upon the Memory of this unfortunate Man, and none more effectually than Biſhop Guthry, who ſeems to have known him beſt: Therefore Sir James Turner in a Manuſcript formerly mention'd, has endeavour'd to vindicate him againſt the Biſhop; which he has done with greater Heat than Proof; and has ſaid nothing to his remarkable Proceedings in the Scotch Parliament, in the latter End of the Year 1646, relating to the giving up the King to the Engliſh Parliament.

And the Earl of Holland.

The next Sufferer was the Earl of Holland, a Perſon almoſt ſpent with Troubles and Sickneſs, who had for his Confeſſors two eminent Presbyterian Miniſters, Mr. Bolton, and Mr. Hodges. For ſeveral Days after his Sentence he was in great Perplexity and Agony of Thought, concerning the Pardon of his Sins, and continu'd in a deſponding Condition, till the Day before his Execution he found Relief from the Advice and Prayers of the latter of the two Divines. Being upon the Scaffold, 'he excus'd and extenuated the Variety of his Proceedings, as to King and Parliament, and ſpoke much of his Religion, as a Matter unqueſtionable, by the Education he had in the Religious Family of which he was a Branch:' Which was thought a ſtrange Topick for a dying Man, who knew enough of the Iniquity of his Father's Houſe, which ſhou'd rather have been bury'd in Silence, than reviv'd by ſuch an unſeaſonable Teſtimony. He took more care to be thought a good Friend to Parliaments, than a true Servant to his Maſter, and was thought to have ſaid too little of his Want of Duty and Gratitude to him, which moſt good Men believe to be the Source of his preſent Calamity. He was ſo weak, that he cou'd not have liv'd long, and the fatal Stroak was follow'd by very little Blood. Sufficient has been ſaid of the Character of this unfortunate fine Gentleman, whoſe chief Unhappineſs was his Deſire to enjoy Eaſe and Plenty, when his Maſter cou'd have neither, and his Belief that Poverty was the moſt inſupportable Evil in this World.

A more particular Account of the Lord Capel.

The laſt Sufferer, the Lord Capel, was of a contrary Diſpoſition; a Perſon who had been poſſeſs'd of all the Bleſſings of this Life, a noble Eſtate, an admirable Lady both for Virtue and Beauty, a numerous and hopeful Iſſue of both Sexes, and an excellent Neighbourhood of worthy Friends; all which he enjoy'd with a full Reliſh and Comfort. He had no private Obligations to the Crown, and no Dependance upon the Court, but join'd in that general Torrent that bore down the Earl of Strafford. Yet no ſooner was the King's Honour and juſt Power invaded, than he threw all his great Bleſſings behind him, frankly engag'd both his Perſon and his Fortune, in all Actions of the greateſt Hazard and Danger, and ſo continu'd through all Difficulties inviolably ſteady to the Royal Cauſe; inſomuch that when his Life was offer'd him, if he wou'd marry his eldeſt Son to the Daughter of one in great Power at this Time, he ſaid, He wou'd not purchaſe his Life ſo baſely, as by giving his Son to ſuch a Traytor's Daughter. There are ſome Things concerning this great Man's End, worthy of Remembrance, but unknown to the World, which we have recover'd from the Mouth of Dr. Morley, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter, whom he had made Choice of for his ſpecial Aſſiſtant in this laſt Extremity. This worthy Divine coming to him at his Lodgings in the Tower, his Lordſhip told him, That he had choſen him to be his Confeſſor; that he had ſtrictly recollected the whole Courſe of his Life, to the beſt of his Remembrance, and was reſolv'd to confeſs all the Miſdoings of it, in Order to receive Abſolution according to the Church of England, if he thought him worthy of it. Upon hearing his Confeſſion, the Doctor freely told him, He cou'd not give him Abſolution, becauſe he had omitted one Sin, greater than all he had confeſs'd. Upon which the Lord, clapping his Hand upon his Breaſt in a Surpriſe, ask'd What Sin was that? The other reply'd, The Blood of the Earl of Strafford lyes upon your Head; of which you were highly guilty with his other Enemies. Doctor, ſaid his Lordſhip, I beg God's and your Pardon for omitting this great Sin, for which I have often ask'd Forgiveneſs of God, as a Man guilty of innocent Blood; but my Mind was ſo intent upon my private Sins, that I forgot the mentioning of this; and I will do any Thing you'll have me, to receive Abſolution from it. The Doctor made Anſwer, My Lord, your private Confeſſion of this heinous Sin is not ſufficient for Abſolution; nor ought I to give it, unleſs your Lordſhip will promiſe me to make your Confeſſion as publick as your Crime. I will do it, ſaid his Lordſhip, with all my Heart, if you will tell me how. At which the other told him, There is but one Way, and that is to confeſs it in your laſt Speech at the Place of Execution, and then your Repentance will be as publick as your Sin. Upon which his Lordſhip, embracing the Doctor, ſaid, I heartily thank you, Doctor, and I do promiſe I will do it; and I wou'd not for all the World have dy'd without a publick Confeſſion of this Sin, and making the beſt Satisfaction I can to the Memory of my Lord Strafford, before God and Men, for having my Hands dipt in his Blod.

His Converſation with Dr. Morley.

The

His Diſcourſe with his Son.

The Officers being come to remove him from the Tower, he firſt went into his Lady's Apartment juſt by, to take his Leave of her, and his eldeſt Son, then about thirteen Years old, and afterwards Earl of Eſſex. The Lady, unable to bear the fatal Departure of her dear Lord, immediately fell into ſwooning Fits, out of which, as faſt as ſhe recover'd, upon his beginning to ſpeak, ſhe relaps'd. After a long Attendance in vain he turn'd to his Son, who ſtood by, and ſpake in this Manner to him: My dear Child, I ſee your Mother is not in a Condition to hear my laſt Words to her; and being unwilling to detain the Officers any longer, what I wou'd have ſaid to her, I ſay in ſhort to you: Tell her, 'That as I always lov'd her as my own Soul, ſo the 'moſt ſenſible Part of my Sufferings is the being ſnatcht 'from her; and when this bittereſt Part of my Execution 'is over, I value not the reſt:' And ſince it has pleaſed God to call me to the Honour of ſuffering for ſuch a Cauſe, I cannot but bleſs his Name for appointing it at this Time, when you are at Age to underſtand the Righteouſneſs of the Cauſe for which I ſuffer: And I charge you here upon my Bleſſing, and as you expect to ſtand with me before God at the Day of Judgment, THAT YOU CONSTANTLY ADHERE TO THE SAME CAUSE, and ſerve the King with the SAME FIDELITY as I have ſerv'd both him and the King his Father; tho' your Services to him ſhou'd bring you to the ſame HONOURABLE END, which with Joy and Satisfaction I am going to make. All which, with a Flood of Tears, the young Gentleman promis'd, in that very ſame Room, in the narrow Cloſet of which he afterwards put an End to his own Life: Upon which Dr. Morley, when Biſhop, made ſeaſonable Remarks, as if the Sight of that Room had rais'd ſuch a Conſciouſneſs of Guilt, as threw him into an unconquerable Fit of Deſpair.

His Speech and Execution.

Having been brought, with the other two noble Sufferers, to Sir Robert Cotton's Houſe, this Lord in the laſt Place paſs'd through Weſtminſter-Hall, with a ſerene Countenance ſaluting all his Friends and Acquaintance. The Soldiers ſtopping Dr. Morley at the Foot of the Scaffold, he with kind Embraces took his leave of his Friend, and ſaid he ſhou'd go no further, apprehending that he might receive ſome Affront by that rude People after his Death. Then aſcending the Scaffold, he look'd about him with a Majeſtick Air, and ask'd Whether the other Lords had ſpoken to the People with their Hats on? And being told they were bare, he gave his Hat to his Servant, and then with a clear and ſtrong Voice declar'd 'That he was condemn'd to dye not by any Law of England, but contrary to all the Laws of England, and for maintaining 'the Fifth Commandment: That he had been born and 'bred under the Government of a King, whom he was 'bound in Conſcience to obey; under Laws, to which he 'had been always obſervant; and in the Boſom of a 'Church, which he thought the beſt in the World; to 'either of which he had never violated his Faith.' But according to his Promiſe, and in Imitation of the King, his Maſter, 'who for ſuffering an unjuſt Judgment upon 'another, was brought to ſuffer by an unjuſt Judgment, he 'own'd his Guilt in that he had given his Vote to the Bill 'againſt the Earl of Strafford; which he ſaid proceeded 'not from any Degree of Malice, but from an unworthy 'Cowardize, in not reſiſting ſo great a Torrent.' Then he enlarg'd himſelf in commending 'the great Virtue, 'and Piety, and Mercy of the King whom they had put 'to Death; and recommended to them the preſent King, 'their true and lawful Sovereign, who was likewiſe worthy to be ſo, by reaſon of his Underſtanding, Courage, 'Piety, and all other Princely Virtues which cou'd make 'a Nation happy: And therefore adviſ'd them to ſubmit 'to his Government, as the only Means to preſerve 'Themſelves, their Poſterity, and the Proteſtant Religion.' And having with great Zeal recommended this to them, after ſome Prayers devoutly pronounc'd upon his Knees, with an unparallel'd Chriſtian Courage he ſubmitted to the fatal Stroak, which depriv'd the Nation of the nobleſt Champion it had; a Perſon whoſe Memory all Men lov'd and reverenc'd, but whoſe Example was follow'd by few. The noble Hiſtorian ſums up his Character, when he ſays, 'He was a Man, that whoſoever 'ſhall, after him, deſerve beſt of the Engliſh Nation, he 'can never think himſelf undervalu'd, when he ſhall hear, 'that his Courage, Virtue and Fidelity, is laid in the 'Balance with, and compar'd to that of the Lord Capel.'

5. While the Common-wealth of England was laying its Foundation in Blood, the Leaders were allarm'd both from Ireland and Scotland; from the former by the great Advantages obtain'd by the Marqueſs of Ormond join'd with the Lord Inchiquin, who had driven out the Pope's Nuncio, and poſſeſs'd the whole Province of Munſter. In Scotland, they did not only proteſt againſt all the Proceedings of the Engliſh Parliament, but likewiſe proclaim'd the young King on the 3d Day of February, with all Solemnity, as their lawful Sovereign. Nor was England it ſelf wholly ſubdu'd to their Power; for ſtill the Gentlemen in Pontfret Caſtle held out with uncommon Bravery, under the Governor Colonel Morrice, who had formerly by a Stratagem ſurpris'd the Place. After the Defeat of the Scotch Army under Duke Hamilton, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale was brought Priſoner to Nottingham Caſtle, who expected to meet with no Mercy; this Garriſon reſolv'd to make a bold Attempt for his Service; and this was by taking Colonel Rainsborough Priſoner, who lay within ten Miles of them at Doncaſter, with a conſiderable Force ready to beſiege the Place. This with a ſelect Party they ſtrangely effected in the midſt of his Quarters, and had him in full Poſſeſſion, till finding himſelf ſurpris'd more than forc'd, he began to ſtruggle and cry out; upon which they ſtabb'd him and left him dead upon the Spot, and retir'd without the Loſs of one Man. This Man was Cromwell's particular Favourite, bold and barbarous to his Deſire, and deſign'd as Chief Commander of the Fleet; therefore this extraordinary Action was highly reſented by him, who ſent Colonel Lambert to beſiege the Place, and take full Vengeance upon the Garriſon.

Pontfret Caſtle holds out.

The Garriſon capitulates.

Six excepted.

The manner of their Eſcape.

When Lambert came to this Charge, and got what Body of Men he thought fit for that Purpoſe, he in a ſhort Time reduc'd them within their own Circuit, making good Works round the Caſtle, that Famine might finiſh what Force cou'd not effect. Nor did they quietly ſuffer themſelves to be thus hemm'd in without bold and frequent Sallies, in which many on both Sides loſt their Lives. But at laſt, having no human Hope of Relief, they offer'd to treat for the Delivery of the Caſtle, if they might have honourable Conditions; if not, they declar'd 'They had ſtill Proviſions for a long Time; that they 'durſt die, and would ſell their Lives at as dear a Price 'as they cou'd.' Lambert anſwer'd, 'He was ſenſible of 'their Courage, and he deſir'd to preſerve as many of 'them as was in his Power to do, but he muſt require ſix 'of them to be given up to him, whoſe Lives he cou'd 'not ſpare, for his Hands were bound; which he was 'ſorry for, ſince he knew them to be gallant Men.' The ſix excepted were Colonel Morrice, and five more who were in the Party that had deſtroy'd Rainsborough: Theſe he was oblig'd by Cromwell to ſacrifice; but all the reſt he 'was content to releaſe, that they might return to 'their Houſes, and make their Compoſition with the Parliament, towards which he wou'd do them all good Offices.' They from within acknowledg'd 'his Civility in 'that Particular, and wou'd be glad to embrace it; but 'they cou'd never be guilty of ſo much Baſeneſs as to deliver up any of their Companions;' and therefore they only deſir'd, 'That they might have ſix Days allow'd 'them, that thoſe ſix might do the beſt they could to deliver themſelves; in which it ſhould be lawful for the reſt 'to aſſiſt them:' To which Lambert generouſly conſented, 'provided the reſt would ſurrender at the End of that 'Time;' which was agreed to. Upon the firſt Day the Garriſon appear'd twice or thrice, as if they reſolv'd to make a Sally, but retired every time without charging; but the ſecond Day, in another Place, they made a brisk and noble Sally, and beat the Enemy from their Poſt with conſiderable Loſs; and tho' they were at laſt repell'd, yet Morrice, and another of the ſix made their Eſcape, the other four being forc'd to retire with the reſt. And all was quiet for two whole Days; but in the beginning of the Night of the fourth Day, they made another brave Attempt with that Succeſs, that two of the other four likewiſe eſcap'd: And the next Day they made great Shews of Joy, and ſent Word to Lambert, 'That their ſix Friends 'were gone, and therefore they would be ready the next 'Day to ſurrender.'

The two remaining now thought it in vain to make another Attempt, therefore invented another Way to ſecure themſelves, with leſs Danger to their Friends, who for their Sakes had ſuffer'd very much in the two laſt Sallies. The Building of the Caſtle being very large and irregular, and having great Store of waſte Stones fallen from ſome of the Walls; they found a convenient Place, which was like to to be leaſt viſited, where they walled up their two Friends in ſuch a manner that they had Air to ſuſtain them, and Proviſion enough to ſupport them a Month, in which Time they hop'd they might be able to eſcape. This being done, at the appointed Hour they open'd their Ports; and after Lambert had caus'd ſtrict Search to be made for thoſe ſix, none of which he believ'd had really eſcap'd, and was ſatisfy'd that they were not amongſt thoſe that were come out, he receiv'd the reſt very civilly, and punctually obſerv'd his Promiſe he had made to them, and ſeem'd ſatiſ-fy'd, That the ſix gallant Men were eſcap'd. And about the ſame Time Sir Marmaduke Langdale made his Eſcape out of Nottingham-Caſtle, and tranſported himſelf beyond the Seas. The Caſtle was ſurrender'd on the 24th Day of March, and Lambert preſently took Care to diſmantle the Place, that there ſhould be no more uſe of it for a Garriſon, leaving the vaſt Ruins ſtill ſtanding, and then drew off all his Troops to new Quarters: So that within ten Days after the Surrender, the two that were left walled up threw down their Incloſure, and ſafely provided for themſelves. Sir John Digby, who had been joyn'd in the Governorſhip of the Caſtle, liv'd many Years after the Reſtoration; but poor Morrice was ſoon after taken in Lancaſhire, and hapned to be put to Death in the ſame Place, where he had once perform'd a great piece of Service to the Parliament.

The Caſtle ſurrenders.

The Behaviour of Foreign Princes at the Death of the King.

Thus was the fatal Year 1648 compleated; at which Period of Time it may be proper to reſt, and take a ſhort View of the Actions and Behaviour of the Princes of Chriſtendom, upon this calamitous Turn of Affairs. Inſtead of Threatning, and combining to take Vengeance againſt the Deſtroyers of a Sovereign Brother, they haſtned to become Sharers in the Spoils of a murder'd Monarch. Cardinal Mazarine, now Governour of France, and Admirer of Cromwell, ſent to be admitted as a Merchant to traffick in the Purchaſe of the beſt Goods and Jewels of the rifled Crown; of which he bought the rich Beds, Hangings, and Carpets, which furniſh'd his Palace at Paris. The King of Spain's Ambaſſador, as ſoon as the diſmal Murder was over, purchas'd as many Pictures, and other precious Goods belonging to the Crown, as were carry'd upon eighteen Mules from the Groyne to Madrid. Chriſtina, Queen of Sweden, bought the Choice of all the Medals, and Jewels, and ſome Pictures of great Price, and receiv'd the Parliament's Agent with Joy and Pomp, and made an Alliance with them. The Arch-Duke Leopold, Governour of Flanders, disburs'd great Sums for many of the beſt Paintings, which adorn'd the ſeveral Palaces of the King; which were all brought to him to Bruſſels, and from thence carry'd by him into Germany. Thus did the Neighbouring Princes joyn to aſſiſt Cromwell with Treaſure, which enabled him to proſecute and finiſh his impious Deſigns; while they inrich'd and adorn'd themſelves with the Ruins of the ſurviving Heir, without applying any Part to his Relief, in the greateſt Neceſſities that ever King ſuſtain'd. And what was ſtill more wonder'd at, not one of all theſe Princes ever reſtor'd any of their unlawful Purchaſes, after the Reſtoration, when the King was in Ability to demand them.

Several Executions.

II. 1. The Common-Wealth of England being now in its Infancy, various Methods were us'd, and divers Projects undertaken to ſecure its Being and Authority. Firſt by the free ſhedding of the Blood of its Oppoſers; for beſides the Noblemen before-mention'd, ſeveral others ſuffer'd in different Parts of the Kingdom. And beſides Colonel Morrice, Colonel Blackburn was hang'd and quarter'd at York: Mr. Beaumont, a Miniſter, was hang'd at Pontfret, having been Chaplain to that Garriſon: Major Monday was ſhot to Death at Lancaſter; and Colonel Langhorn, Poyer and Powell, three valiant Welſhmen, were ſentenc'd to caſt Lots for their Lives, and the fatal Chance falling upon Poyer, he was ſhot to Death in Covent-Garden. There were ſome others ſlaughter'd upon the ſame Account; becoming unhappy Monuments of unfortunate Loyalty, and the Regicides Cruelty. Tho' ſeveral conſiderable Perſons, eluding the Cunning of their Keepers, eſcap'd; as Colonel Maſſy, Sir Lewis Dives, Mr. Holden, the Lord Loughborow, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and others. Nor was it only againſt the Perſons of Men that theſe Uſurpers rag'd; they alſo ſeiz'd the King and the Churches Patrimony, Revenues, Palaces, &c. and forc'd ſuch of the Cavaliers as they did not confiſcate, to a ruinous Ranſom of their Eſtates. Thus they clear'd their Way, and with the greateſt Tyranny, pretended to eſtabliſh an abſolute Freedom. Still Liberty was their Allegation; accordingly they took down the King's Statue from the Weſt-End of St. Paul's, and that other in the Royal-Exchange, putting up this ſtrange Inſcription in Letters of Gold; EXIT TYRANNUS, REGUM ULTIMUS, MDCXLVIII.

Cromwell his Preaching.

As their grand Support was a Military Power, ſo for ſuſtaining of That, they impos'd a ſettled Tax of ninety thouſand Pounds a Month, beſides ſeveral Taxes of other Kinds. Then wiſely conſidering, That as the Preachers had been their chief Inſtruments, by infuſing ſuch Principles into the Vulgar, as had by Length of Time accompliſh'd their great Deſign of aboliſhing Monarchy; leſt therefore, by the ſame Engine, the like Ruin might by Degrees be brought upon Themſelves, they order'd, ‘ That no Miniſter in the Pulpit, ſhould meddle with any State-Matters.' Yet Inſpirations and Revelations were never more frequent than at this Time, and every one pretended to be a Preacher, eſpecially among the Soldiers; ſix of whom in one Day exercis'd their particular Gifts at Whitehall: Inſomucch that Cromwell himſelf, ſubtilly obſerving the Bent of this Tide, aſcended the Pulpit, pretending He was call'd up by the Spirit of God; and ſtanding for ſome Time with his Eyes lifted up, and his Head inclining, as it were in a Trance, he fetch'd many deep Groans, and ſpent one Hour in his Prayer, and near two in his Sermon. In which Prayer, his Humility was ſuch, That, in Imitation of Moſes, he deſir'd God to take off from his Shoulders the Government of this mighty People of England, as being too heavy for him to bear. And ſo much did he then pretend to Revelations, and Inſpirations, that when any weighty Matter was propounded to him, he uſually retired for a quarter of an Hour, or more, and declar'd what was reveal'd to him. And tho' the preſent Rulers were generally Independents, yet they now ſeem'd deſirous to obtain the united Intereſt of the Presbyterians; and therefore they employ'd their chief Preachers, as Marſhal, Nye, Caryl, Goodwin and Peters, to uſe divers Arguments and Propoſals with the Heads of them; aſſuring them, ‘ That the Presbyterions differ'd ‘ with the King in Point of Civil Intereſt, which was much ‘ more irreconcilable than that of Church-Government, ‘ whatever Shew was made to the contrary: Likewiſe, ‘ That it was the Presbyterians who firſt made War againſt the late King, brought him low, and prepar'd him ‘ to receive his deadly Blow from the Independents; and ‘ therefore the King would certainly look upon them, as ‘ equally guilty with the Independents, and endeavour equally to deſtroy them both.' And to carry on their Work with the more Shew of Sanctity, they appointed a ſtrict Faſt, ‘ To implore God's Forgiveneſs for the Ingratitude of the People, who did not ſufficiently acknowledge his great Mercies upon this Land, in freeing them ‘ from Monarchy, and beſtowing Liberty upon them, by ‘ changing Kingly Government into a Free State.

Cajoles the Presbyterians.

Severer Methods againſt them.

When Perſuaſions had not their full Effect, ſeverer Methods were us'd againſt the Presbyterians, who were now much at their Mercy; and their Champion Milton, having baſely vilify'd the late King's Writings and Actions, boldly drew his Pen againſt them, and charg'd them with ‘ Jugling and paltering with the World, bandying and ‘ bearing Arms againſt their King, diveſting him, diſanointing him, nay curſing him all over in their Pulpits, Pamphlets, &c. and then not only turning Revolters from ‘ thoſe Principles, which only cou'd at firſt move them, ‘ but laying a Stain of Diſloyalty on thoſe Proceedings, ‘ which were the neceſſary Conſequences of their own ‘ former Actions.' He rallies them for ‘ citing the King ‘ ſo often under the Name of Tyrant in the hearing of God, ‘ of Angels, and the Holy Church aſſembled, and their ‘ charging him with ſpilling of more innocent Blood by ‘ far, than ever Nero did:' And demands of them, ‘ Whether their now recanting Miniſters had not preach'd againſt him as a Reprobate incurable, an Enemy to God ‘ and his Church, mark'd for Deſtruction, and therefore ‘ not to be treated with:' He ridicules their fine Clauſe in the Covenant to preſerve his Perſon, Crown and Dignity, as ‘ ſet there by ſome dodging Caſuiſt with more ‘ Craft than Sincerity, to mitigate the Matter in Caſe of ‘ ill Succeſs.' He calls their Preachers ‘ Miniſters of Sedition, not of the Goſpel, who while they ſaw it manifeſtly tend to Civil War and Bloodſhed, never ceas'd ‘ exaſperating the People againſt him; and now they ſee it ‘ likely to breed new Commotions, ceaſe not to incite others againſt the People that have ſav'd them from Him, ‘ as if Sedition were their only Aim, whether againſt Him ‘ or for Him.' In Sum, they were often treated with that Contempt and Indignity from the Ruling Party, that they had as much Reaſon perhaps to complain of Perſecution before, as they had after the Reſtoration.

Ordinances concerning Treaſons, &c.

And now to fortify themſelves, and their uſurp'd Dominion, they fram'd an Act, declaring certain Particulars to be High-Treaſon, as, ‘ 1. If any Man ſhould maliciouſly ‘ affirm the preſent Government to be Tyrannical, Uſurped, ‘ or Unlawful; or that the Commons in Parliament were ‘ not the Supream Authority of the Nation; or that ſhould ‘ endeavour to alter that their Government. 2. If any ſhould ‘ affirm their Council of State or Parliament to be Tyrannical or Unlawful, or endeavour to ſubvert them, or ſtir ‘ up Sedition againſt them. 3. For any Soldiers of the ‘ Army to contrive the Death of their General, or LIEUTENANT-GENERAL; or endeavour to raiſe ‘ Mutinies in the Army, to levy War againſt the Parliament, or to joyn with any to invade England or Ireland, ‘ or counterfeit their Great-Seal, or kill any Member of ‘ their Parliament, or any Judge or Miniſter of Juſtice in ‘ their Duty.' To ſweeten likewiſe the Affections of the Vulgar towards them, they made moſt ſpecious Pretences of paying all the publick Debts, and raiſing three hundred thouſand Pounds for the Neceſſities of the Common-Wealth, without any Burthen to the People; and to that End paſs'd an Act ‘ for aboliſhing all Deans and Chapters, and for Sale of their Lands.’ They likewiſe paſs'd another Act ‘ for the Sale of the Goods and Perſonal Eſtate of the King, Queen and Prince;’ and another ‘ for the Sale of the Crown-Lands, with particular Inſtructions to ſell them at thirteen Years Purchaſe.’ And for an Exerciſe of their full Power, they paſs'd an Act ‘ for coyning of new Mony, with Directions for the Form of the Stamp to be made thereon.

The Power of the Levellers.

2. While they were thus eſtabliſhing their Authority, they met with no Oppoſition from any, but an intire Submiſſion from all, except only from that Part of their own Army which had contributed moſt to their Grandeur and Empire, the Levellers. That People had been countenanc'd by Cromwell to enter into Confederacies to corrupt and diſſolve the Diſcipline of the Army, and by his Artifices had been us'd to bring about all his crooked Deſigns. By them he broke the ſtrict Union between the Parliament and the Scots, and then took the King out of the Hands of the Parliament, and kept him in the Army, with ſo many fair Profeſſions of treating Him, and his Party, better than the other had done: By them the Presbyterians had been affronted and trodden under Foot, and the City of London expos'd to Diſgrace and Infamy: By them he had broken the Treaty of the Iſle of Wight, forcibly driven out of the Parliament all thoſe who deſir'd Peace, and at laſt executed his barbarous Malice upon the Perſon of the King: And when he had apply'd them to all thoſe Uſes, he expected and endeavour'd to have reduc'd them again, by a ſtrict Hand, into that Order and Obedience from whence he had ſeduc'd them. But they had taſted too much of Power and Sovereignty, to be willing to be ſtripp'd and depriv'd of it; but at the ſame Time made an unskilful Computation of their own Power by the great Things they had effected in thoſe Changes and Revolutions; not conſidering that their ſuperior Officers were now united with the Parliament, and entirely concurr'd in the ſame Deſigns. However, being diſappointed in ſome Promiſes that had been made to them, they reſolv'd to exert themſelves, and appear'd both tumultuous and mutinous in many Parts of the Army.

Theſe ſort of Men, and new a Spawn of Agitators, for ſome Time created ſufficient Work for Cromwell, who in order to ſuppreſs them, ſtrictly forbad their private Meetings; but not ſucceeding in this, ſeveral of the Soldiers were ſeiz'd on, try'd and condemn'd by a Court-Martial, and Lockyer, one of their Ringleaders, was ſhot to Death; tho' magnificently bury'd by the Rabble of his Party. This Execution rather inflam'd than mollify'd the Tumour; and this being too feeble a Remedy for ſuch an increaſing Diſtemper, it was thought neceſſary to ſeparate them; which was attempted, by voting That eleven Regiments, by Lot, ſhould paſs over into Ireland. But this enrag'd them to that Height, that, perceiving that inſtead of enjoying the Advantages that had been promis'd them, they were expos'd to new Hazards, and the Dangers of a ſtarving War, they abſolutely declar'd againſt it, ‘ As a Contrivance to divide them, and that they would not go for Ireland, till the Liberties of the People, for which they were firſt engag'd in a War, were ſecured.’ They alſo requir'd, ‘ That the often-promis'd Repreſentative of the Nation might be choſen. They exclaim'd againſt the High-Court of Juſtice, and the Council of State, as Tyrannical, not without blaming the Injuſtice and Illegality of the Regicide it ſelf;’ and added, ‘ That the People had only chang'd, not ſhaken off their Yoak; and that the Rump's little Finger was heavier than the King's Loyns, &c.’ And finding that Diſcourſes and Repreſentations were ineffectual, they betook themſelves to Arms. Colonel Scroop's Regiment, having turn'd off their Officers, march'd with twelve Troops from their Quarters at Saliſbury towards Burford in Oxfordſhire, expecting to join with thoſe of Harriſon, Ireton and Skippon, and a Party under one Thompſon then lying near Banbury; which they had effected, if they had not been prevented by the extraordinary Diligence of Cromwell and Fairfax, who poſting forty Miles in one Day, overtook them at Abingdon. But being ſtill doubtful of the Event, they offer'd a Treaty, ‘ wherein Satisfaction might be mutually given; and till that were compleated, that neither Party might come within ten Miles of each other.’ Upon this Agreement, the Levellers, whoſe Numbers were encreas'd to about five Thouſand, march'd to Burford; but in the midſt of their Security, Colonel Reynolds, who is ſaid to have betray'd their Counſels, fell upon them at Midnight, routed them, and took four Hundred of them Priſoners, and nine Hundred of their Horſes. Thompſon took Shelter in a Wood near Milton, where he fought couragiouſly till he was kill'd; and thus, with the Execution of ſome of the Heads, the Inſurrection was ſuppreſs'd upon the fifteenth Day of May.

Their mutinous Demands.

They are ſuppreſs'd by Force.

After this Succeſs, the Lord-General Fairfax, and Lieutenant-General Cromwell went to Oxford, where they were highly treated, and Created Doctors of the Civil Law; and at the ſame Time Sir Hardreſs Waller, with eight Colonels, Harriſon, Ingoldsby, Hewſon, Okey, Groſvenour, Goff, Joyce and Cobbet, and Mr. Ruſhworth, were created Maſters of Arts. Then having viſited Portſmouth, they return'd to London in Triumph, where they receiv'd new Marks of Honour from the Members of Parliament, or new Common-Wealth, who, after a publick Thankſgiving for the late Succeſſes, were all in a Body invited by the Lord-Mayor and Corporation to a magnificent Feaſt in the City. The Lord-Mayor, as it was uſual towards Kings, met Lenthall the Speaker, with the reſt of the Members, at Temple-Bar; and there reſigning the Sword to Him, receiv'd it again, and carry'd it before him to Chriſt-Church, whence, after a remarkable Sermon, he conducted them to Grocers-Hall, where they were entertain'd in the Quality of a Free-State. Yet ſuch was the Effect of Guilt or Fear, that the Cooks were every one forc'd to take an Oath To prepare Nothing but wholſome Food. Here was preſented to the Lord-General a large and weighty Baſon and Ewer of beaten Gold, as a Teſtimony of the Affections of the City to his Excellency; and to the Lieutenant-General, three Hundred Pounds in Plate, and two Hundred Pieces in Gold. The Common-Wealth, not to appear ungrateful, or rather to engage them in their Intereſt, generouſly beſtow'd New-Park, with all the Deer in it, upon the Citizens.

The Parliament treated by the City.

The Condition of the young King at the Hague.

3. When the great Tragedy was acted in England, and Ordinances were prepared againſt the Royal Family, Prince Charles, aged eighteen Years and nine Months, juſtly took upon him all his Father's Titles; being in a moſt diſconſolate and almoſt abandon'd Condition at the Hague, where all the ſmall Support he had was from the Prince of Orange, and the Princeſs his Siſter, who were not in a Condition to maintain any of his Followers. However he kept up a ſort of a Court at this Place, weak and inconſiderable, and languiſhing under the Miſeries of Want, and divided Opinions. The Swediſh Ambaſſador indeed addreſs'd to him as a Crowned Head, and He and the Daniſh Miniſter generouſly invited the States-General to join with them in aſſiſting his Britannick Majeſty to regain his Birth-right; but the States were for no Rupture with their young Siſter, the Common-Wealth of England, and they ſoon became uneaſy at his Continuance in their Dominions. The diſtreſſed King had ſome Proſpect both from Scotland and Ireland; from the former of which he receiv'd Commiſſioners from the Privy-Council and the Kirk, to invite his Majeſty into Scotland, or rather to let him know upon what Terms he might come thither. They brought their Proclamation they had publiſh'd along with them, in which was this particular Clauſe, ‘ Becauſe his Majeſty is bound by the Law of God, and the Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, to rule in Righteouſneſs and Equity, to the Honour of God, and the Good of Religion, and the Wealth of the People; it is hereby declared, That before he be admitted to the Exerciſe of his Royal Power, he ſhall give Satisfaction to this Kingdom in thoſe Things which concern the Security of Religion, the Unity betwixt the Kingdoms, and the Good and Peace of this Kingdom, according to the National Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant.’ And the Kirk at the ſame Time declar'd, ‘ That before the King ſhou'd be receiv'd, albeit they had declared his Right by Succeſſion, he ſhou'd firſt ſign the Covenant, ſubmit to the Kirk's Cenſure, renounce the Sins of his Father's Houſe, and the Iniquity of his Mother, with other Things of the like Nature.’ And the Commiſſioners, both Laity and Clergy, ſpoke no other Language; and, excepting the outward Bows and ſhews of Reverence, they appear'd more like Ambaſſadors from a free State to an equal Ally, than like Subjects ſent to their own Sovereign.

The Scots Invitation.

Beſides theſe Commiſſioners, who were of the Kirk Party, in which Argyle govern'd, there were in the Hague at this Time the new Duke of Hamilton, and the Earl of Lautherdale, and others of the Nobility of the late Engagement, who were now as odious to the governing Party in Scotland, and as much perſecuted, as any who had ſerv'd the King from the Beginning. There was alſo the Marqueſs of Montroſs, with more of the Nobility, as the Earls of Seaforth and Kinoul, and others who adher'd to that great Man, who believ'd his clear Spirit to be moſt like to advance the King's Service. Of theſe three Parties, it was reaſonably hop'd that the two laſt, being equally perſecuted by the preſent Powers, wou'd have been eaſily united to have ſuppreſs'd the other. But this was too hard a Diviſions among the Scotch Nobility.

Point for the King to effect, who could as eaſily have perſuaded the Parliament to reject Cromwell, as the Lords of the Engagement to be reconcil'd to Montroſs: So that when his Majeſty hop'd to have met all the Scotch Nobility, to have conſulted what Anſwer he ſhould give to the Meſſengers from the Council and Kirk, thoſe Lords of the Engagement did not only refuſe to meet with the Lord Montroſs, but as ſoon as he appear'd before the King and Them, they immediately left the Room; and had the Confidence to deſire the King in Writing, 'That James Graham, as they call'd the Marqueſs, might be forbidden to come into his Majeſty's Preſence, or Court, becauſe he ſtood Excommunicated by the Kirk of Scotland, and degraded and forfeited by the Judicatory of that Kingdom.' The moſt inveterate Man againſt the Marqueſs was the Earl of Lautherdale, whoſe fiery Spirit was incapable of Moderation; inſomuch that in publick Company he ſwore in a Paſſion, That tho' he wiſh'd nothing more in this World than to ſee the King reſtor'd, he had much rather he ſhould never be reſtor'd, than that James Graham ſhou'd be permitted to come into the Court. The Duke of Hamilton was more moderate, and more averſe to the Covenant; yet declar'd to an Engliſh Privy-Counſellor, That he durſt not ſpeak his Mind upon thoſe Heads; becauſe he ſhould loſe all Power or Credit to ſerve the King; thus concluding his Diſcourſe, Here is my Friend and Kinſman the Earl of Lautherdale, who loves me heartily; and yet I dare ſay Nothing to him, either againſt the Covenant, or for the Marqueſs of Montroſs: And if I ſhould, I believe he wou'd rather chuſe to kill me, than to joyn with me; ſo much he is tranſported with Prejudice in both theſe Particulars, and ſo incapable to hear Reaſon upon either of thoſe Arguments.

Beſides the Miſchiefs of theſe Prejudices, the Lords of the Engagement abſolutely refus'd to give his Majeſty any Advice in the Preſence of his Council, which might have been of particular Advantage to him in the Debate. The King had more Hopes from Ireland, than Scotland, and was more deſirous of going thither, where he underſtood that the Marqueſs of Ormond daily gain'd Ground, and that his Preſence was much wanted in that Kingdom; ſo that he was willing to let the Scots know, That it was not yet ſeaſonable for him to go for Scotland. In this unſteady and irreſolute Condition of the King's Counſellors, it was very manifeſt, that to what Place ſoever he was to remove, he ſhould not be able to ſtay long where he was. The States, eſpecially thoſe of Holland, gave daily Intimations, That the King's reſiding at the Hague wou'd be very inconvenient for them; and it was the great Intereſt and Dexterity of the Prince of Orange, that kept the States from ſending a Meſſage directly to deſire him to depart. And there happen'd an Accident at this Time, which haſtned his Reſolution of Removing; which was the Aſſaſſination of Dr. Doriſlaus, who had been ſo much concern'd in the Tryal and Murther of the late King. This Man, being ſent as an Envoy from England to finiſh a reciprocal Alliance between the two Republicks, while he was at Supper in his Lodgings, in Company with many others at the Table, half a dozen Gentlemen enter'd the Room with their Swords drawn; and requir'd thoſe at the Table not to ſtir, for no Harm was intended to any but the Agent, who came from the Rebels in England, who had newly murther'd their King. Accordingly one Whitford pull'd Doriſlaus from the Table, and kill'd him at his Feet, ſaying Thus dyes one of the Regicides! and ſo, putting up their Swords, they walk'd quietly out of the Houſe, leaving thoſe in the Room in the greateſt Conſternation.

Dr. Doriſlaus murther'd at the Hague.

This Accident made a great Noiſe, not only in Holland but in England, where the Cavaliers were threatned with ſevere Retaliations; yet the Aſſaſſines were never brought to any Puniſhment, tho' they were moſt of them known to be Servants, or Dependents upon the Marqueſs of Montroſs. The King was exceedingly troubled and perplex'd, and ſo reſolv'd to leave the Place, and rely chiefly upon the Proſpect he had in Ireland; in order to which it was determin'd that he ſhould take his Journey through France, and there wait upon the Queen his Mother, who had been very urgent to have him come that Way. Not long before his Departure, on the ninth of April, his eldeſt and beloved Son was born at Rotterdam, who for ſeveral Years went by the Name of James Crofts, and was afterwards made Duke of Monmouth. His Mother was Mrs. Lucy Barlow, alias Walters, of Pembrokeſhire in Wales, a Perſon who is ſaid to have had no other Crime but her yielding to the Charms of the young Prince, who had ſo ſtrong a Paſſion for Her, that it gave Occaſion for many to believe ſhe was really marry'd to him; tho' the wiſer Part of the World were afterwards convinc'd to the contrary. However at preſent, all Things relating to the Matter were manag'd with the utmoſt Privacy, and the Infant was lodg'd at a Merchant's Houſe not far from Rotterdam, with an Engliſh Nurſe, and Servants to attend him.

The Birth of the Duke of Monmouth.

4. The King having given the beſt Orders he cou'd to the Marqueſs of Montroſs, and diſpatcht the Lord Cottington and Sir Edward Hyde as Ambaſſadors into Spain, in the Month of May left the Hague, being attended by the Princeſs Royal, his Siſter, and the Prince of Orange, his Brother-in-Law, through Rotterdam, Dort and Breda, in all which Places he was receiv'd with the Sound of their Cannon and Bells, and all other Marks of Honour. From thence he went to Antwerp, then the principal City of the Spaniſh Netherlands, where he was magnificently entertain'd, and preſented with a rich Coach and ſix fine Horſes, ſent to him by Arch-Duke Leopold, Governor of the Low-Countries. His Majeſty was alſo royally treated by him at Bruſſels; from whence, after ſome Stay, being convey'd on his Way to France by the Duke of Lorrain, and every where feaſted and honour'd with the ſame Grandeur, as if the King of Spain had been there, he came to Compeigne, where the French King, accompany'd with a great Train of his Nobility, receiv'd him with all outward Teſtimonies of Affection and Honour, and brought him thence in State to his Mother, the Queen of Great Britain, then at St. Germans. Here he continu'd two or three Months; for in a little Time he receiv'd ſuch ungrateful Accounts of the Declenſion of his Cauſe in Ireland, as broke all his Deſigns of going in Perſon into that Kingdom. But at the ſame Time the Court of France ſoon grew uneaſy at his Continuance there, and his Abſence was impatiently deſir'd; and the Queen her ſelf, being diſappointed of that Dominion over him ſhe had expected, reſolv'd to oblige the great Cardinal, by freeing him from a Gueſt ſo unwelcome at that Time. So it was determin'd that he ſhou'd take his Journey through Normandy, and embark himſelf for his Iſland of Jerſey, which ſtill continu'd under his Obedience, and under the Government of the loyal Sir George Carteret. In the middle of September he arriv'd at Jerſey, with a Retinue of not above three Hundred; and when he left the Court of France, had brought away no more than three Hundred Piſtoles to defray the Expences of his Journey and Voyage. The Truth is, the Cardinal ſeems always to have thought that the Extirpation of Monarchy in England, would raiſe the Grandeur of it in France, and therefore he always obſtructed and retarded the King's Reſtoration; and when his Royal Brother the Duke of York was at this Time ſolliciting and beſeeching the King, Queen and Cardinal, to have Compaſſion upon the King his Brother, and to give him all Aſſiſtance for the Regaining of his Kingdoms, the Cardinal coldly anſwer'd, That they might be hereafter in a Capacity to ſerve him, but it cou'd not be now.

The King leaves the Hague.

He retires into France.

And ſo to Jerſey.

As ſoon as it was known in Scotland that the King was arrived in Jerſey, the Marqueſs of Argyle, who govern'd in that Kingdom, could no longer withſtand the impatient Deſire of the People, to have their King come to them. Therefore Mr. Windram Layds of Libberton was diſpatcht away with a Meſſage to his Majeſty, who in the beginning of October preſented the following Deſires, and Offers of the States of Scotland, of the ſame Nature with the former, namely '1. That he wou'd Sign the Covenant, and paſs an Act for all Perſons to take the ſame. 2. That he wou'd paſs the Acts of Parliament in Scotland, which were ratify'd by their two laſt Seſſions. 3. That he wou'd withdraw his Commiſſion lately granted to Montroſs. 4. That he wou'd put away all Papiſts from about him. 5. That he wou'd appoint ſome Place in Holland to treat with Commiſſioners from the Eſtates of Scotland. 6. That he wou'd give a ſpeedy Anſwer;' not without a rude Inſinuation, 'That this ſhou'd be the laſt Invitation they wou'd make.' Some of the King's Council were for rejecting theſe Propoſitions as hard and diſhonourable; and others were for accepting of them as in a Caſe of great Neceſſity: Of this latter Opinion was the Queen-Mother, who ſent over Jermyn and Piercy to him, to let him know, It was the Advice of the Council of France, and her ſelf, That he agree with the Scots upon any Terms. Hamilton, Lauderdale and the Lords of the Engagement, who were ſtill forc'd to remain in Holland, were of the like Opinion, and urg'd his Majeſty to a Compliance; and even Montroſs adviſ'd the King to yield to their Deſires, and to make his perpetual Baniſhment one Condition of Agreement. But the King at preſent had too great a Senſe of Honour, tho' his Neceſſities afterwards extorted a more unreaſonable Submiſſion. In the mean time the King ſent Meſſages to the Emperor, the Czar of Muſcovy, the States of Venice, the King of Spain, and other Potentates, who all return'd Anſwers much to the ſame Effect, 'That they were ſorry for his Father's ill Succeſſes, and condol'd his Death; but as to the Differences between him and the People of England, they were Matters out of their Cogniſance, and they

A Meſſage to him from Scotland.

‘ ſhou'd not meddle in them’ He was not without Hopes in England; for at Preſton in Lancaſhire he was proclaimed King of England, at the Market-Croſs, without the Offer of any Oppoſition; and even the Levellers, that made formidable Bodies in ſeveral Counties, had in one of their Articles demanded, ‘ That Prince Charles ſhou'd ‘ be brought in;’ ſo that the Hearts of the People ſeem'd to be kept from him by nothing but the Sword. But now the prevailing Powers having prepar'd a Fleet againſt the Iſle of Jerſey, it was judg'd neceſſary for the King to leave that Place; which he did on the latter End of the Year, with great Hazard of his Life from a Storm. Then paſſing through France, he retir'd to Breda, where he enter'd upon new Treaties with the Scotch Commiſſioners, as will be remember'd in the Beginning of the next Year.

He repairs to Breda.

An Account of the Iriſh Affairs.

III. I. The new Common-Wealth of England had no ſooner been eſtabliſh'd, but it became not only a Scourge to that Kingdom which by ſtrange Gradations had erected it, but began to be an Inſtrument of the Divine Vengeance againſt the two other Kingdoms of Ireland and Scotland, that had ſo variouſly and perfidiouſly contributed towards that unknown Fabrick. The Iriſh had carry'd on their Cauſe with the utmoſt Bloodſhed and Treachery; and tho' they had been puniſh'd with innumerable Miſeries, yet they ſeem'd to have been reſerv'd for a more ſevere and ſignal Chaſtiſement at this Time. To give a ſhort Account of their Affairs from the Beginning of this Year; it is to be remember'd, that upon an Apprehenſion of the Power of the New Common-Wealth, the Chief of the Nation had enter'd into a Confederacy, and had ſolemnly invited over the Marqueſs of Ormond to be their Lord Lieutenant under the preſent King, with an Aſſurance of an intire Obedience to his Majeſty's Commands. The Pope's Nuncio being expell'd, and this great Man arriv'd, the Confederates ſoon became formidable by the Acceſſion of the Lord Inchequin, Preſident of Munſter, and the Scots in the Province of Ulſter. Both theſe had ſerv'd the Parliament with great Vigour, till the King and Monarchy had been deſtroy'd in England; but abhorring the boundleſs Tyranny of the Regicides, they deſerted that Party they had ſo ſucceſsfully follow'd, and return'd to their Duty and Allegiance to their Sovereign. And this was at a Seaſon, that if the unfortunate Iriſh wou'd have been unanimous, and laid hold on the preſent Advantages, that Kingdom might have been entirely reduc'd to the King's Obedience. But Owen-Roe-Oneal, the beſt Commander among the Iriſh, refus'd to be included in the Confederacy, upon pretence that ſufficient Proviſion had not been made for the Security of the Catholick Religion; but in reality, becauſe the Confederate Delegates had imprudently deny'd the Conditions he had demanded, and which his Quality and Intereſt ſeem'd to require. The Difference was about the Command of four Thouſand Men, which they were willing to grant, and ſix Thouſand which he inſiſted upon; to which afterwards they gave a ready Compliance, when the Seaſon was too late, and he had too ſucceſsfully joyn'd with Monk and Coot, and rais'd the Siege of London-derry.

During theſe Traverſes, the famous Marqueſs of Ormond enter'd upon his Government, but with too precarious an Authority. For he was compell'd to grant almoſt every Thing the Iriſh demanded; and likewiſe to conſent that the Lord Inchequin ſhou'd have Munſter entire to himſelf, for the Subſiſtance of his Army; which was indeed the Ruin of the old Iriſh Regiments of that Province. The Treaty being thus concluded, and theſe ſeveral Intereſts, however ill cemented, ſeeming to acquieſce in the grand Point, their Obedience to the King, an Army was rais'd by the extraordinary Labour and Prudence of the Lord-Lieutenant; and being reinforc'd by the conſiderable Troops of the Lords Inchequin, Clanrickard and Caſtlehaven, they march'd towards the capital City of Dublin. Inchequin was by the Impatience of the Engliſh and Scotch Forces declared Lieutenant-General of the Army; with which Preference Clanrickard and Caſtlehaven ſeem'd diſguſted; yet both acquieſc'd, preferring their Loyalty before the Satisfaction their Merits might have deſervedly challeng'd. As the united Forces approach'd Dublin, Colonel Michael Jones, who had been a Lawyer, and now Governor of the Place, advanc'd with his Troops as far as the Naas to obſtruct the March of the Army; but being unequal in Number, retreated again into the City. The Marqueſs of Ormond had omitted no Civilities and Promiſes to draw this brave Man to his Party and Duty again; but in vain; he obſtinately perſiſted in an Infidelity in which he had engag'd out of Spite, as Sir Roger Manly ſays, becauſe a Lieutenant-Colonel had been preferr'd over his Head: Which may ſerve for an Example not to prejudice deſerving Men in their juſt Pretences; tho' no Excuſe can cover the Sins of Perfidy and Rebellion.

A conſiderable Army under the Marqueſs of Ormond.

The Marqueſs of Ormond encamp'd his Army at Finglas, being at preſent content to ſhut the Garriſon within their Walls, and keep them from Foraging, till the ſeveral Parts of his Forces were come up to him. In the mean Time, Inchequin, now Lieutenant-General, was ſent with a ſtrong Party to reduce the Neighbouring Fortreſſes poſſeſſed by the Enemies Garriſons; which he effectually perform'd, defeating alſo a Battalion of Oneal's Men commanded by Farell, who were marching to the Relief of their Friends. He likewiſe routed the younger Coot with the Dublin Horſe, and had Dundalk deliver'd to him by the Garriſon, who alſo enter'd into the King's Pay, notwithſtanding the Endeavours of Colonel Monk their Governor to the contrary, and their former Promiſes of a firm Adherence to him. Trim, the Newry, and Droghedah it ſelf underwent the ſame Fate, ſo that all being clear'd on that ſide, Inchequin return'd Triumphant, with an Encreaſe of Numbers, to the Camp again; where it was forthwith reſolv'd, by Advice of the Peers and the Council of War, to inveſt and preſs the City of Dublin with all their Power. This capital City was firſt fortify'd with Works and a Garriſon by the late King, and after that by the Parliament, being now very defenſible by its Numbers and Fortifications. But the Lord-Lieutenant Ormond relying upon his formidable Army, now conſiſting of twenty thouſand Men, and the daily Deſertion of the Soldiers in Dublin, of whom many had formerly ſerv'd under him, reſolv'd upon a vigorous and cloſe Siege of the Place; eſpecially ſince that and Londonderry were almoſt the only Places not reduc'd by the King, and Confederate Forces. In order to which, leaving the Lord Dillon with a ſtrong Party at Caſtleknock, he decamp'd to the South ſide of the City; and that he might cloſely inveſt the City, and particularly prevent their Horſes and Cattle from grazing, he order'd a Fort to be erected at Baggot-rath, giving the charge of this conſiderable Poſt to Patrick Purcel, Major-General of the Army. Some Regiments from England were in the mean time landed at Dublin, under the Conduct of Reynolds and Venables, to the Number of three Thouſand Horſe and Foot; whereupon a great Rumour was ſpread, that Cromwell himſelf deſign'd for Munſter, as a People not yet confirm'd in their Defection from their late Maſters. This Report oblig'd Inchequin to deſire the Lord-Lieutenant's Permiſſion to go thither, affirming That all his Troops wou'd revolt, unleſs prevented by his ſpeedy Appearance amongſt them; which Ormond, not being in a Condition to refuſe, was unhappily compell'd to aſſent to. Thus unſeaſonably dividing the Army, he departed with eleven Hundred Horſe, when the whole was ſcarce ſufficient for the deſign'd Enterprize.

He marches againſt Dublin.

In the mean Time Colonel Jones the Governor, perceiving the Progreſs of the Work at Baggot-rath, and conſidering that if it were finiſh'd, it wou'd cut off all Commerce by Sea, as well as Communication by Land, reſolv'd to obſtruct it by a brave and vigorous Sally; which he did with uncommon Succeſs: For the Garriſon ruſhing out upon the Pioneers, eaſily diſpers'd them, and with the ſame Facility overthrew the Watch that guarded them, and poſſeſſing the Place, totally routed the amaz'd Iriſh: And their Courage encreaſing with their Succeſs, they purſu'd them to the Avenues of their Camp, where furiouſly falling upon the Guards, who ſeem'd rather as Spectators than Defenders, they put them likewiſe to Flight. The remaining Garriſon in the Town, ſeeing the extraordinary Progreſs of their Friends, together with the Inhabitants, flew all to their Aſſiſtance, and with very little Labour and Struggle, obtain'd a very great Victory. For the Army being ſuddenly ſurpris'd, with a more than Pannick Fear, the Soldiers forgetful of their Defence and Duty, threw down their Arms and ſhamefully ran away. In this Confuſion there were about three thouſand ſlain, amongſt whom Sir Thomas Vaughan was one, who had alſo fought well. The Priſoners were not leſs numerous; among whom were Colonel Butler, the Lord-Lieutenant's Brother, and a hundred Officers. The Cannon, the Camp, and the immenſe Spoils of it, fell to the preſent ſharing of the Conquerors, and ſoon after the whole Kingdom, the Forces of it being irrecoverably loſt by this Blow. The great Ormond, who had ſpent the Night on Horſeback in rounding and viewing the ſeveral Poſts of the Army, being but newly laid to Reſt, was rous'd by the coming in of the Lord Taffe, General of the Ordnance; but too late; the Camp being generally diſtracted with Fear and Confuſion. He therefore in this univerſal Conſternation, having in vain oppos'd himſelf to this overbearing Torrent, till abandon'd by his Followers, haſtned to the Lord Dillon's Camp; but thoſe Iriſh there had fled upon the Noiſe, having ſcarce ſeen the Enemy. This great Overthrow happen'd upon the 2d Day of Auguſt; and about the ſame Time London-derry was likewiſe reliev'd by Owen Oneal, who joining with Coot and Monk, as was before hinted, forc'd the Scots from that Siege.

2. Before theſe Tranſactions hapned, the Common-Wealth of England was ſo allarm'd with the Progreſs in Ireland, that they deſign'd to make their chiefeſt Efforts that Way; and Cromwell himſelf thought it high Time, in his own Perſon, to appear upon a Stage of ſo great Action. Some of his Friends, who were always ready upon ſuch Occaſions, on a ſudden propos'd him to be Lieutenant-General, to conduct the Expedition in Ireland. The Presbyterian Party were in hopes of obtaining Waller to be the Man, and the Independents were for having Lambert; but when Cromwell was propos'd, which was in his Abſence from the Houſe, the Presbyterians ſeem'd to acquieſce, concluding that it was only an Artifice to defer the Service, and that he never intended to go thither in Perſon; or that if he did, his Abſence from England wou'd give them all the Advantages they cou'd deſire, and that they ſhou'd entirely recover their General Fairfax to their Party, who was now extreamly uneaſie for his former Compliances, and had expreſs'd ſome Bitterneſs againſt the Perſons who had miſ-led him. And ſo immediately both Parties were agreed, and Oliver Cromwell declar'd to be Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, with a Commiſſion as full and ample as cou'd be prepared. This Man, how little ſoever ſurpris'd with his Charge, appear'd the next Day in the Houſe full of Confuſion and Irreſolution; which his natural Temper and Compoſure cou'd hardly avoid, when he leaſt deſir'd it; and therefore, when it was now to his Advantage, he cou'd act it to the Life. And after much Heſitation, and many Expreſſions ‘ of his own Unworthineſs, and Diſability to ſupport ſo great a Charge, and of the entire Reſignation of himſelf to their Commands, and abſolute Dependance upon God's Providence, he ſubmitted to their Good Will and Pleaſure;’ and deſired them to haſten all Preparations: ‘ For he confeſs'd that Kingdom to be reduc'd to ſo great Streights, that he was willing to engage his own Perſon, purely for the Difficulties which appear'd in the Expedition; and more out of Hope to give ſome Obſtruction to the preſent Succeſſes of the Rebels, and to preſerve to the Common-wealth ſome Footing in that Kingdom, than from any Expectation that he ſhou'd be able, with his Strength, in any ſignal Degree to prevail over them.

Cromwell made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

It was an incredible Expedition that he uſed from this Minute after his aſſuming that Charge, in the raiſing of Mony, providing of Shipping, and drawing of Forces together, for this Enterprize. With an Army of fourteen or fifteen thouſand Men he rendezvous'd at Milford Haven, where the Ships lying ready for their Tranſportation, he receiv'd Advice of Colonel Jones's defeating the Lord Lieutenant Ormond's Army before Dublin, which extreamly incourag'd his Soldiers, who rather expected to hear the News of the taking of that City, and were indeed ſtrangely diſheartned from attempting ſo hazardous an Enterprize as the landing an Army in Ireland, under ſuch appearing Diſadvantages. But now Fortune having declar'd ſo much on their Side, they were reſolute to proceed; and Cromwell, on the 13th of Auguſt, ſet ſail with the Van of the Army in thirty two Ships: Ireton ſoon following him with the main Body in forty two other Veſſels, and Hugh Peters with twenty Sail bringing up the Rear. By favourable Winds they were ſoon brought to Dublin, where Cromwell was receiv'd with all poſſible Demonſtrations of Joy, and daily feaſted by the Inhabitants. But waving their Civilities, in regard of the approaching Winter, he immediately prepar'd for Action, and drawing out ten or twelve thouſand compleat Horſe and Foot, with a well-furniſh'd Train of Artillery he advanc'd towards Droghedah, a Town well fortify'd, and a Garriſon in it of two thouſand five hundred Foot, and three hundred Horſe, the Flower of the Royal Army, under the Command of Sir Arthur Aſton, a brave experienc'd Soldier. The Marqueſs of Ormond had foreſeen, that this Place, by Reaſon of its Neighbourhood and Situation, wou'd be firſt attempted; it not being adviſable in the Enemy, to leave ſo conſiderable a Fortreſs behind them. And he hop'd he might have Time to recruit his ſhatter'd Army, and repair the Loſs of the late Overthrow, which he endeavour'd with the utmoſt Diligence, while Cromwell ſhou'd be waſting his Forces againſt a Town they concluded cou'd hold out a Month, and before that Time be reliev'd.

He arrives at Dublin.

Cromwell was ſenſible of the Miſchiefs of a long Siege, and therefore like an impatient Conqueror, omitting the common Forms of Approaches and Turnings, fell furiouſly to battering the Walls, in which he ſoon made two acceſſible Breaches, which were twice bravely aſſaulted, and twice no leſs valiantly defended, the Enemy being as often repell'd; till reinforc'd by Cromwell's ſpecial Preſence and Conduct, renewing the Storm, having ſlain Colonel Wall in the Breach, they at length enter'd the Place. A tumultuous Offer of Quarter being made, and accepted ſooner than it ought to have been, was the Ruin of the Defendents, and indeed of the whole Garriſon: For the Town being thus taken, they were all put to the Sword; tho' they did not fall unreveng'd, for they bravely fought in every Street, and from the Houſes and Towers whither they had retreated. Having got Poſſeſſion of the Town, the Slaughter was terrible and univerſal, Cromwell having given expreſs Order, That no Life either of Man, Woman or Child ſhou'd be ſpared; and when an Officer of his own pleaded for Mercy, he declar'd He wou'd ſacrifice their Souls to the Ghoſts of the Engliſh they had murther'd; tho' he knew that moſt of theſe were not the Murtherers of the Engliſh, but Engliſh themſelves, and the greateſt Part ſuch as had been Officers under the late King, as beſides the Governor, Sir Edward Varney, Colonels Warren, Flemming and Brinn, with many other brave Gentlemen and Officers, who ſuffer'd without Mercy. And ſo general was the Slaughter, that according to Cromwell's own Letter there were ſcarce thirty Lives ſav'd in the whole Town, and thoſe were by him reſerv'd to be ſent to Barbadoes; one Lieutenant only eſcaping, who reported to the Royal Party, that he was the only Perſon left alive of the whole Garriſon. The Inhabitants being deſtroy'd, the Town was ſpoil'd and pillag'd; and it was obſerv'd, that tho' it had repell'd the Fury of the Iriſh Popiſh Rebels for three whole Years, it cou'd not reſiſt the Force of the Engliſh Fanatick Rebels the Space of one Week. This caus'd ſuch a Terror, that O-Neal at the hearing of the News, burſt out in a Paſſion, ſwearing, That if Cromwell had taken Droghedah by Storm, if he ſhou'd ſtorm Hell, he wou'd take it.

He ſtorms Droghedah, and puts all to the Sword.

This miſerable Deſtruction of Droghedah render'd Cromwell's Name formidable to all the neighbouring Places. Few of them had ſo much Reſolution as to expect a Summons to ſurrender; the Garriſons of Trim and Dundalk, apprehending the ſame Fate, quitted them to the Conqueror. Upon which Cromwell thought fit to return to Dublin, and march'd with his Army to Wexford; and, having by the Way routed a Party of the Lord Inchequin's, had the Caſtle betray'd to him by Stafford that commanded it. The Town was otherwiſe ſtrong by Situation, and had a good Garriſon; but being thus ſurpris'd, was furiouſly aſſaulted, and enter'd, all Perſons being put to the Sword with the ſame Severity and Cruelty as at Droghedah. The Terror of which ſpreading into all the Towns and Forts along the Coaſt, as far as Dublin, ſpared this General the Trouble of ſummoning them. The Winter beginning to grow ſharp, and the Seaſon rainy, his Troops ſuffer'd very much from the Weather, and the Flux that rag'd amongſt them. Many believ'd that theſe Reaſons ſhou'd have oblig'd that General to put a Stop to his Conqueſts; but he was better ſenſible of the Advantages he was to make. The Difficulties encounter'd by the Marqueſs of Ormond in raiſing a new Army, after his Defeat at Dublin; the breaking out of the ancient Diſagreement between the Popiſh Confederates and him, on Account of that Misfortune; the ſecret Intelligence held by Cromwell in the Province of Munſter, and the mighty Affairs that wanted his Preſence in England, ſeem'd more powerful Motives for his continuing the War, than the Winter was to interrupt his Progreſs. Being thus reſolv'd, he attack'd Roſs, and took it, through the Default of the Lord Taffe, who held out but eight Days with a Garriſon of near two thouſand Men. Then laying a Bridge over the Barrow, he paſs'd over his Army to draw near to Munſter, ſubduing the Country as he went. It was happy for him that the Intelligence he held in that Province, prov'd more true to him, than it had done to the King; for he had ſuffer'd himſelf to be led away by the Courſe of his Succeſſes, and had abus'd his good Fortune. Thoſe Checks he met with at the Sieges of Duncannon and Waterford brought him to himſelf, and to think of taking Winter Quarters. It was then too late, had not Treachery reliev'd him; for December was approaching, and he had ſcarce four thouſand Men fit for Service, whereas the Marqueſs of Ormond lay with a Body of eight thouſand in his Way to Dublin. Cromwell had no other Place to Winter in; all the Towns he had taken being too much expos'd to the Excurſions of the other's Garriſons, to be well ſupply'd with Proviſions, and have leiſure enough to recover after ſo many Toils and Fatigues. But at this Time of Neceſſity, Diviſions on one Side, and Promiſes on the other took Place, and almoſt all Munſter declar'd for the Conqueror: Toughall, Kingſale, Cork, and other Poſts were deliver'd up to him at once, and furniſh'd him with Means to refreſh his Soldiers, during the three hardeſt Months of the Winter, which they ſpent there in great Security.

Wexford ſuffers the like Fate.

His great Progreſs and Succeſs.

Nor was the Loſs of theſe Places alone the only Miſfortune that attended the King's Affairs; for Prince Rupert

The ill Succeſs of Pr. Rupert's Fleet.

1649. Car. I. pert being with his Fleet hovering about the Coaſts of Ireland, in aſſiſting his Majeſty's good Subjects in that Kingdom, was met at Sea by a more potent Fleet belonging to the States of England, ſo that he was forc'd to take the Harbour of Kingſale for his Shelter, where he was block'd up for ſeveral Weeks. At length Cromwell approaching the City with his victorious Army, in Order to get Poſſeſſion of it by Land, the Prince was compell'd to adventure into Sea, and ſo with Difficulty broke through the Enemy's Fleet with the Loſs of three of his Ships; and then directing his Courſe to Lisbone, he enter'd the River Tagus with full Sail, where he found not only a Friendly Reception, but Protection alſo from that Prince. This ſo much diſpleas'd the Infant Common-Wealth of England, that they commenc'd a War with the Author of this Civility; and ſending the famous Blake with a Fleet, block'd up the Mouth of the River, and extreamly interrupted the Trade of Portugal, by ſeizing their Ships in their Return home from Foreign Parts. He lay there a conſiderable Time; but not being able to oblige that King by Intreaties or Force to abandon Prince Rupert, he was at length conſtrain'd to remove for a new Supply of Proviſions, he then wanted. The Prince taking the Opportunity of his Removal, put to Sea, and ſail'd towards the Coaſt of Malaga, where he took and burnt ſeveral Engliſh Veſſels; but Blake cloſely purſuing him, maſter'd and took the Roe-Buck, a very good Man of War, and forc'd five more upon the Rocks and Shores. The Prince himſelf eſcap'd this Misfortune, tho' reſerv'd for a greater Loſs; for being forc'd into the Weſtern Iſlands, after various Hazards and Adventures, his belov'd Brother Prince Maurice, being ſeparated from him in that tempeſtuous Ocean, periſh'd in a Hurricane, tho' the Manner of it is not ſufficiently known. The immature Fate of this Royal Youth was juſtly lamented by the Good and the Brave; as being no leſs eminent for Fortitude, Gentleneſs, Greatneſs of Mind, and other ſhining Virtues, than illuſtrious for his Birth and renowned Actions. He was ſnatch'd away in the thirtieth Year of his Age, leaving his great Fame to his Poſterity, and the Love of his Perſon to all his Contemporaries.

3. In the mean Time the King's Affairs ſtill declin'd in Ireland, where the Lord-Lieutenant Ormond, preſs'd with want of Neceſſaries to ſubſiſt, and having in vain attempted Paſſage and Waterford, the one by Inchequin, and the other by Tarell, was alſo obliged to ſend his Army into Winter Quarters, but too much divided and far diſtant from each other. The Ulſter Men, except fifteen Hundred that were ſent to Clonmell, return'd home to chuſe another General in the Room of Owen Oneal lately deceas'd, according to Agreement. Others were diſtributed into other Places; Taffe to Connaught, Inchequin to the County of Clare, and Dillon into Meath. It is ſcarce credible with what Induſtry and Prudence the Marqueſs of Ormond endeavour'd to allay the wild Animoſities and Diſſenſions of the Iriſh Confederates, tho' to little Effect, which occaſion'd the daily Revolt and Deſertion of the Soldiers. And now the Iriſh, as well as the Britiſh Soldiers, allur'd by the Succeſſes and Invitations of the Common-Wealth, and alſo deterr'd with the Plague that rag'd amongſt them, together with the Want of Pay and Neceſſaries, ran by Troops to Cromwell's Camp. Cromwell made notable Uſe of the Iriſh Animoſities, and of the Jealouſies between them and the Marqueſs of Ormond. He us'd to ask ſome Priſoners, who were Friends to the Marqueſs, What the Marqueſs of Ormond had to do with Charles Stuart, and what Obligations he had receiv'd from him? and then would mention the hard Meaſure his Grandfather had receiv'd from King James, and the many Years Impriſonment he had ſuſtain'd by him, for not ſubmitting to an extrajudicial Determination. He ſaid, He was confident, if the Marqueſs and he could meet together, upon Conference, they ſhould part very good Friends. And many of thoſe who heard theſe Diſcourſes, by his Permiſſion, inform'd of all he ſaid to the Marqueſs; who endeavour'd nothing but to put himſelf into ſuch a Poſture, as to be able to meet him in the Field.

Ormond's Induſtry in Ireland.

Cromwell being furniſh'd with Recruits and Proviſions out of England, the Winter drawing to an End, took the Field, being reſolv'd to make a ſhort and bloody Concluſion. He firſt divided his Army to diſtreſs the Marqueſs of Ormond; he left Broghill with a flying Camp in Munſter, Ingoldsby about Limerick, and while Coot and Venables acted in the North, came himſelf with part of his Forces before Calan, where he was joyn'd by the reſt under Ireton and Reynolds: That Place held out but one Day, and paid dear for that ſhort Reſiſtance, all Perſons there being put to the Sword, except Butler's Troops, which ſurrender'd before the Cannon was fired. Shortly after he forc'd Gowram, betray'd by the Sedition of the Soldiers, and caus'd Hammond the Governour, with ſome of his chief Officers, to be ſhot to Death in cold Blood. This done, he march'd with his victorious Troops to Kilkenny. This City, the Nurſery of the late Rebellion, and the Reſidence of the Supream Council, was by the Diligence of the Lord Caſtlehaven well provided with Defendents and neceſſary Proviſions. Nor were they wanting in a brave Defence, having repell'd the Enemy's Aſſaults with a conſiderable Slaughter of them. But loſing all Hopes of Relief, Colonel Butler, the Governour, at length ſurrender'd it upon reaſonable Conditions. Clonmell ſoon after met with the ſame Fate; tho' Hugh Oneal, who commanded there, having beaten off the reiterated Attacks of the Enemy, and ſlain above two Thouſand of their Men, was neceſſitated to quit the Place for Want of Powder; which he did with ſo much Secrecy, that the Enemy, without knowing of his Retreat, gave very good Conditions to the Townſmen the next Morning. The Biſhop of Roſs, with four Thouſand Foot and three Hundred Horſe, made an Attempt to relieve the Place; but moſt unfortunately, being routed and taken by the Lord Broghill, who, without Reſpect to his Character, caus'd him to be hang'd up.

16 49/50. Car. 2.

While Cromwell made theſe Conqueſts in one Part of Ireland, Coot and Venables did the like in another, and reduc'd all the North under his Obedience. Mac-Mahon, the Biſhop of Clogher, who had govern'd Owen Oneal in his Life, and ſucceeded him after his Death, was here totally defeated, and, like the Biſhop of Roſs, hang'd up by Coot's particular Command. This was a happy Victory for the Governors of England, in which three Thouſand of the old Rebels were there ſlain, all meer Iriſh, out of an Opinion they cou'd not proſper, as long as they had any Engliſh with them, and therefore had throughly purg'd their Army; which, as Borlaſe obſerves, had a full Return of God's Vengeance, they being the firſt Incendiaries and Actors in thoſe barbarous Cruelties, which follow'd their Inſurrection. Armagh, Carickfergus and Charlemont ſubmitted to the Conquerors, who with great Facility routed both Iriſh and Scots that oppos'd them, and made themſelves Maſters of their Garriſons on all Sides. And indeed ſuch was the Republicans Succeſs in all Parts of the Kingdom, that in leſs than a Year's Time, all but Limerick, Galloway, and ſome few Garriſons, and Forces on the Faſtneſſes, were at their Devotion. As to Cromwell, he gave a conſtant Account of his Proceedings to the Parliament and Council of State, with the Art of aſſuming greater Glory to Himſelf, by exhorting them in all his Letters to give the Glory unto God. And he carry'd all Things now with that abſolute Command, that there was printed and diſpers'd a Book entitled The Character of KING CROMWELL; which tho' ſuppreſs'd as a Libel, was even receiv'd as a Kind of a Prophecy. Before he left the Iſland, which was in the Beginning of the following Year, the better to weaken the Iriſh, he contriv'd means to get no leſs than forty Thouſand of them to be tranſported out of the Nation into the Service of ſeveral Foreign Princes, few of which ever return'd again; and which, if they had been unanimous and loyal, might have preſerv'd Themſelves and Country to their lawful Prince: So great a Scourge was Cromwell, and his Aſſociates, to that perfidious and rebellious People.

Moſt of Ireland reduc'd, and the Inhabitants puniſh'd.

4. Such was the firſt Year's Succeſs and Effects of the Common-Wealth of England, an unheard-of Uſurpation, and a heterogeneous Conjunction of Civil and Military Power, which had taken Poſſeſſion of the Lands of the King, Church and Cavaliers, and in Effect of the Purſes of the whole Nation; which by Degrees made it ſhine with the dazling Splendor, tho' not with the regular Beauty of an abſolute Monarchy. Like the Latter, it took away the preſent Liberties, as well as the ancient Rights of the Subjects, eſpecially the greateſt Part of them. The Spirits of all the Loyal Party were ſo broken and ſubdued, that they cou'd ſcarce breath under their vaſt Burthens by Impriſonments, Compoſitions and Sequeſtrations. Whatever Articles they had made in the War, and whatever Promiſes had been made to them of Quiet and Indemnity, they were now call'd upon to finiſh the Compoſitions for Delinquency, and dearly paid for the Credit they had given to the Profeſſions of the Army, who at firſt ſeem'd to pity the Severities they met with from the Preſbyterian Party: But now the Mask being off, they ſequeſter'd all their Eſtates, and left them nothing to live upon till they ſhou'd compound; which they were forc'd to do at ſuch unreaſonable Rates, that many were forc'd to ſell Half, to preſerve the other to their Families; which Remainder was ſtill liable to whatever Impoſitions they after-afterwards thought fit to inflict upon them, as their Perſons were to Impriſonment, when any groundleſs Report was rais'd of ſome Plot and Conſpiracy againſt the State. Innumerable Others ſuffer'd from the Confuſion of the Times, from Robbers and Pillagers, who in twenty or thirty in a Body, and under the Name of Soldiers, broke into Houſes, and committed many other Ravages. And as to Spiritual Matters, never was greater Licence and Extravagance, Hereſies and Blaſphemies ſwelling againſt Heaven to a prodigious Height. Particularly one Salmon, a Preacher in Coventry, taught the People to ſwear and curſe, and to commit Whoredom upon this profeſs'd Principle, That it was God that did Swear in them; and that it was their Liberty to keep Company with Women to ſatisfy their natural Appetites. And one Wyke ſet up for breathing the Spirit of God into Men, by kiſſing them three Times. And beſides theſe, the unaccountable Exorbitancies and Illuminations of George Fox, and the People call'd Quakers, had their firſt Appearances in this Year.

Yet this by many has been reckon'd the firſt Year of Happineſs and Glory to the Engliſh Nation; but for the Truth of this we may appeal to Whitelock himſelf, a wiſe and knowing Man, deeply concern'd in theſe Times, who in his Manuſcript Additions to his Memorials, never yet printed, has this remarkable Account of them, which for the Reader's Satisfaction ſhall be inſerted in his own Words, without Deviation or Diminution. ‘This was a Year of great Perplexity and Danger, as to the Publick Affairs in the Cauſe of the Parliament. The Publick Buſineſs ſtood on this Foot: If the Parliament had loſt but one Battle, all who were Ingag'd with them had been in Danger of Ruin, as to their Lives and Fortunes; and tho' they gain'd many Battles, yet their Enemies ſtill continu'd of Power to raiſe freſh Parties, and new Troubles againſt them. When they were all ſubdued, ſo that not one Man appear'd in Arms for the King, yet many appear'd againſt the Parliament: Their own Friends turn'd to be their Enemies: Thoſe, who againſt the King's Party joyn'd with the Parliament, and they fought together againſt the Cavaliers: When they were ſubdu'd, then the ſame Soldiers fought againſt their own Maſters, and Fellow-Soldiers, witneſs the Agitators, Levellers and Mutineers. Thoſe of the Army turn'd head againſt them from whom they had receiv'd their Commiſſions to be an Army, and bent their Arms againſt thoſe who had Impower'd them to bear Arms. Yet God was ſtill pleas'd to ſupport the Parliament, at leaſt a conſiderable Part of them, and to carry them through all the Difficulties they met with in relation to the Common Enemy, tho' Great, Numerous and Powerful; and in Relation to particular Diſtempers and Inſurrections, from thoſe of their own Party. We may from hence take Notice of the vaſt Hazard Men undergo by ingaging in ſuch Affairs as theſe were; in which the Conquered were ruin'd, and the Conquerors did thereby but create to Themſelves new War and Troubles. Succeſs rais'd in many of them a Haughtineſs of Mind, and a Roaming of Imagination: Every one of them endeavour'd, or expected, to have his private Fancy, to be put in Action, and to be little leſs than Princes. To effect ſomething Dream'd on to this Purpoſe, many Wits were working; ſome were for one Thing, ſome for another; all were violent in their Way, and brought into ſeveral Parties and Factions. The Army was divided into Levellers and Diſciplin'd Soldiers; The Parliament was divided into Royaliſts and Republicans; the whole Nation was Divided into Cavaliers and Parliamentarians. The Parliamentarians were again divided into Presbyterians, Independents, Anabaptiſts, Fifth-Monarchy Men, and many other Perſwaſions; and none but the moſt miſerable of all Cures for the Sick State; no Unity of Diviſions, but by a greater Calamity, by the Sword. When the King's Party grew up to any Strength, then thoſe of the Parliament Party united together to oppoſe the King's; and when that Work was done, then they fell at Variance among Themſelves. Thus we find it was by the precedent Story; and thus we ſhall find it to continue, if God give me Life and Opportunity to continue this Story. And this may be a ſufficient Argument, That there is neither Safety, nor Diſcretion, for any, who can avoid it, to ingage in Matters of this Nature. We who were ingag'd in thoſe before-mention'd, were unexperienc'd in theſe Things, and in the Conſequences of them, ſlipt into them by Degrees, and before many of us were aware of them; and being once in, were by little and little plung'd further in, and knew not how to get out again. But thoſe that have the Examples, and the Warnings, of the Age preceding, have in part known and heard their Fathers relate the Deep Miſeries and Calamities of the Civil War in their Days, and then both Parties will be Inexcuſable, if ever they ingage in ſuch Affairs. And may they never ſee again thoſe Sad Days which have been in thoſe Times, whereof we read before.’

Theſe Additions were deſign'd for the Month of July or Auguſt: In the following Month of March, ſpeaking of the Affairs of Ireland, Page 430, he adds theſe Manuſcript Obſervations, and Additions. ‘From theſe Paſſages we may obſerve the Contentiouſneſs of Men's Natures, and the little Quiet to be expected in this World: The Engliſh were at Variance with the Scots and Iriſh; the Scots at Variance with the Engliſh and Iriſh, the Iriſh hating both the Engliſh and Scots. The Native Iriſh differ'd among Themſelves, Rebels from Rebels, Rebels from the Engliſh Cavaliers, Rebels and Engliſh Cavaliers there in War againſt the Parliament. In Scotland was Contention between the Kirk Party and the State; both were jealous of the King's Party, all of them together deſigning againſt England. In England the Civil War not fully appeaſed, between the King and the Parliament; Contention among the Parliament Party between the Royaliſts and Republicans, and again between the Presbyterians and Independents.’

And thus we ſhall conclude the whole Year 1649, with the Deaths of ſeveral conſiderable and eminent Men, beſides thoſe that were carry'd off by the mercileſs Hands of Violence; and firſt with four worthy Divines, of which we are to begin with Dr. Richard Holdſworth, a Perſon who ſucceſſively became Profeſſor of Greſham-College in London, Maſter of Emanuel-College in Cambridge, and Dean of Worceſter, and had likewiſe the Offer of a Biſhoprick: He was an excellent Scholar, an admirable Divine, and a heavenly Preacher, who on his Death-Bed ſeem'd to have made more than ordinary Prophetical Diſcoveries, and to have ſtrangely foretold the unexpected Reſtoration. The ſecond was Dr. George Hakewill, Rector of Exeter-College in Oxford, and Arch-Deacon of Surrey; who having been Chaplain to Prince Charles, in the Reign of King James, took Occaſion to write againſt the Spaniſh Match: for which unſeaſonable Officiouſneſs he was diſmiſs'd the Court, and never further encourag'd, notwithſtanding the polite Learning, the ſubtle Philoſophy, and the profound Divinity that afterwards ſo illuſtriouſly appear'd in him. The third was Dr. William Wats, educated in Caius-College in Cambridge, and one of the London Divines; an admirable Man, both for Criticiſm and Theology, and highly eſteem'd by the great Voſſius, and other learned Foreigners: Having been ſequeſter'd, plunder'd, &c. by the late ruling Powers, he join'd himſelf to Prince Rupert, and ſerv'd in all the Battels he fought, and laſtly dy'd at Kingſale in Ireland. The laſt was Mr. Edward Symmonds, educated in Peter-Houſe-College in Cambridge, and no higher preferr'd than to be Rector of Little-Rayne in Eſſex, yet eminently remarkable for his Courage and Piety, as well as Learning and Wiſdom; and it is hard to ſay which were more conſpicuous, his worthy Actions, or his Sufferings for the Royal Cauſe: He render'd himſelf very eſtimable by his own Vindication of the late King, but more by helping into the World the beſt of all Vindications, the King's own Book, which ſhone and ſpread ſo univerſally, that above fifty Editions of it appear'd in a Year's Time, notwithſtanding all the bold Efforts of Milton and the Regicides to ſuppreſs its Worth and Being. Beſides theſe Divines, we are to mention Dr. Arthur Duck, a Doctor of the Civil Law, Chancellor of London, and Maſter of the Requeſts, and particularly employ'd by the late King in the Treaty of the Iſle of Wight; one who had highly improv'd himſelf by Travelling, and became an excellent Civilian, and no leſs notable Hiſtorian, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil. Here we muſt not forget that renowned Commander, Sir Thomas Glemham, a worthy Gentleman of Suffolk, who, by his noble Valour, Bravery and Conduct in York, Carliſle, Oxford, and other Places, gain'd immortal Honour, and no leſs Applauſes for his invincible Loyalty, and his inviolable Fidelity to his King and Country. Nor ſhould we omit Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, uſually ſtil'd the mad Earl, whoſe Character we have already given, who dy'd upon the 23d Day of January; leaving a Name diſhonourable as to his Actions, and degrading as to his Quality. His Son Philip, who was before a Member of the Houſe of Commons, continu'd his Place, tho' he now became an Earl. Laſt of all dy'd Alderman Rowland Wilſon, a wealthy Merchant, a Member of Parliament, and one of the Council of State, whom Whitelock commends as a Gentleman of excellent Parts, and great Piety, highly belov'd in the Parliament, the City, and the Army, and by all that knew him, and his Death as much lamented: He dy'd in the Beginning of March, and his Funeral was ſolemniz'd with a Pomp and Magnificence ſcarce to be parallel'd in any private Perſon.

Scotch Commiſſioners attend the King at Breda.

Their Propoſitions.

IV. 1. After England and Ireland had been ſeverely, tho' not fully, chaſtis'd, Scotland began to feel the ſame Fate and Vengeance, due to ſuch open Breakers of all Laws and Promiſes. The Scots, who had begun the Troubles, and had afterwards been deeply involv'd in them, began more and more to relent, and acknowledge their King, whoſe Father they had given up into his Enemies Hands; but ſtill they would not conſent to his Return and Government, but with particular and extraordinary Limitations. Accordingly they choſe proper Commiſſioners, the Earl of Caſſils, the Lord Lothian, the Laird Burley and the Laird Libberton, Sir John Smith, and Mr. Jeoffreys, for the Eſtates; and Mr. Broady, Leveſton and Wood, in Behalf of the Kirk. Theſe waited upon the King at Breda, on the latter end of March; and being formally receiv'd in a Place appointed, the Lord Caſſils, in Behalf of the Eſtates, and Mr. Leveſton in Behalf of the Kirk, having made their Speeches, declared the Occaſion of their coming, and urg'd his Majeſty's Compliance with the following Propoſitions from the Kirk and States of Scotland. '1. That all excommunicated Perſons ſhould be forbid Acceſs to the Court. 2. That the King would by ſolemn Oath, and under his Hand and Seal, declare his Allowance of the National Covenant of Scotland, and of the Solemn League and Covenant of the three Nations. 3. That he ſhould confirm all Acts of Parliament, enjoyning the Solemn League and Covenant, eſtabliſhing Presbytery, the Directory, the Confeſſion of Faith and Catechiſm in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approv'd by the General Aſſembly of the Kirk and the Parliament; and that he would obſerve the ſame in his own Family, and ſwear never to oppoſe, or endeavour the Alteration of the ſame. 4. That he would conſent that all Civil Matters might be determin'd by the preſent and ſubſequent Parliaments in Scotland, and all Matters Eccleſiaſtical by the enſuing General Kirk Aſſembly.

The King conſults about them.

After the reading of theſe ſhocking Propoſitions, and the Letters, his Majeſty being told that theſe were all their Inſtructions, anſwer'd, That he would take theſe Things into Conſideration, and doubted not but to return them ſo full an Anſwer, as might give his Kingdom of Scotland Satisfaction: And ſo diſmiſs'd them for the preſent. The better to determine this important Matter, he repair'd to the Hague, to conſult with his Aunt the Queen of Bohemia, and the Prince of Orange, who was viſited by the Commiſſioners, and deſired to be a Mediator between Them and his Majeſty. Soon after arriv'd the Earl of Carnwath and Mr. Murrey from the Committee of Eſtates, with farther Inſtructions and Propoſitions; as, 'That his Majeſty would ratify all that had been done in the Parliaments of Scotland in ſome late Seſſions; and conſent that Montroſs and his Adherents be prohibited Acceſs into that Kingdom.' Theſe added to the Difficulty; but ſtill there was no great Argument for Conſultation: Every Man was ſenſible of the Violence that was offer'd to his Majeſty's Honour and Conſcience; yet whoever objected againſt the Propoſitions upon any of thoſe Conſiderations, was look'd upon as a Party, becauſe he himſelf could not be ſuffer'd to attend the King. It was thought highly material, that they who diſſuaded the King from going to Scotland upon thoſe exorbitant Terms, could propoſe no other Way, nor no other Place where he might repoſe himſelf, with any Hopes of Subſiſtence; a ſad Fate attending a Prince of his Birth and Fortunes. The Scotch Lords of the Hamiltonian Engagement were thought the moſt impartial Counſellors, ſince they by going were to be expos'd to great Rigour, and to undergo very ſevere Cenſures: They could not ſit in the Parliament, nor in the Council, and well knew they ſhould not be ſuffer'd to be about the King's Perſon: Yet all theſe reſolv'd to wait upon his Majeſty, and perſuaded him to believe, 'That his Preſence would diſſipate thoſe Clouds; and that a little Time would produce many Alterations, which could not immediately be effected.' Then as to his Majeſty's ſigning the Covenant, he ſhould tell the Commiſſioners, 'That he would defer it till he came thither; and that then, if the Kirk would preſs it upon him, he would give them Satisfaction.' And they were confident, 'That after his Arrival, he ſhould be no more urg'd to it, but that even thoſe of the Kirk would contend to make themſelves gracious to him.' This ſort of Argumentation wrought much with the Prince of Orange, but more with the Duke of Buckingham, Wilmot and Wentworth, and others about the King, to engage him to ſubmit to any Conditions that would be required of them; yet the Hopes they would not be required of them, and the Promiſes made to them by the Scotch Lords, whoſe Authority was like to encreaſe in their own Native Air and Soil, prevail'd with them to uſe all the Credit with the King to embark himſelf, and try how propitious Fortune would be to him in his Kingdom of Scotland.

After many Difficulties,

He at laſt complies.

Yet ſtill there were two very powerful Arguments, which made ſo deep an Impreſſion upon ſome Lords and others, that they wou'd have totally diſſuaded the King, and actually proteſted againſt his going into Scotland. The firſt was, 'That the Expedition of Duke Hamilton the Year before, with an Army as numerous, and better furniſh'd and provided than Scotland cou'd in many Years be enabled to ſend out again, made it manifeſt, how little that Nation, tho' never ſo well united, cou'd prevail againſt the Power of England.' The other was ſtill more material, namely, 'That the ſole Power of Scotland being, at this Time, confeſſedly veſted in the Marqueſs of Argyle, it might juſtly be fear'd, That at the King's Arrival, and the firſt Diſcovery of thoſe Alterations in the Minds of the People, upon which the Hamiltonian Party fully depended, Argyle wou'd immediately deliver up the Perſon of the King into the Hands of Cromwell; and with the Aſſiſtance he wou'd willingly give, make that Kingdom tributary or ſubſervient to him, whilſt the King remain'd his Priſoner, and Argyle continu'd his Vicegerent in Scotland.' No doubt theſe Objections had ſufficient Weight with many Men, who were not blinded with Paſſion, or confounded with Deſpair: And tho' they knew not how to adviſe what Courſe the King might ſteer with reaſonable Hope and Security, they might ſtill juſtly diſſuade his expoſing himſelf to ſo many viſible Dangers both at Sea and Land; and might prudently believe, 'That the enjoying the obſcure Title of a King in any Part of the World, was preferrable to the empty Name of a King in any of his Dominions; the beſt that cou'd be expected from the Conditions now impos'd upon him.' But in the End, a faint Hope of the Affections of the People, and a ſtrong Deſpair of any other Expedient, prevailed ſo far with the King, that he reſolv'd upon any Terms to embark himſelf in Holland, in a Fleet provided for him by the Prince of Orange; and ſo with all the Scottiſh, and very few Engliſh Servants, ſet Sail for his ancient Kingdom of Scotland.

The Caſe of the Marqueſs of Montroſs.

His great Hopes.

2. During theſe Debates and Conſultations, there happned an Accident of that prodigious Nature, that, had not Providence for the Reproach of Scotland determin'd that the King ſhou'd once more try the Courage and Fidelity of that Nation, muſt have diverted his Majeſty from that Northern Expedition; which ſeem'd to have been predeſtinated for the greater Mortification and Puniſhment of that People. And this was the Caſe of the famous Marqueſs of Montroſs, who, as was formerly hinted, had obtain'd Commiſſions from his Majeſty to levy what Forces he cou'd on that Side of the Sea. This he endeavour'd to effect with the utmoſt of his Power in Foreign Parts, but chiefly among the Princes of the German Empire, where he found large and fair Promiſes, but very little real Aſſiſtance; only the Duke of Holſtein ſupply'd him with four Ships well arm'd and mann'd, tho' theſe were likewiſe by a ſtrange Neglect delay'd a long Time at Amſterdam, which extreamly retarded the Service: Colonel Cockran likewiſe, who had been ſent Agent into Poland to the Scotch Merchants there, for Aſſiſtance of Men and Mony, having receiv'd conſiderable Sums, and good Supplies of Corn, converted the firſt to his own Uſe, ſold the other, and revolted himſelf from the Service: General King, who was expected out of Sweden with a Party of Horſe, came not at all; all which Diſappointments were ſo many Omens of his future ill Succeſs. But the Marqueſs was carry'd on by a ſtronger Aſſurance he had receiv'd from ſome kind of Prophecies, to which he was naturally given, 'That he ſhou'd by his Valour recover Scotland for the King, and from thence conduct an Army that ſhou'd ſettle him in all his other Dominions.' Therefore, with only ſix or ſeven hundred Men, in four Ships, he reſolv'd to venture his Fortune, hoping to join with the Northern People in Scotland, who had formerly experienc'd his great Bravery and Conduct. He ſent two of his Ships, with above a third of his ſmall Numbers, before to the Iſlands of Orkney; himſelf following after with the other two, and a ſmall Frigate of fifteen Guns, with fifteen hundred Arms for thoſe Gentlemen who ſhou'd come in to him, given him by the Queen of Sweden. But arriving at the Iſlands, he found that his two Ships ſent before were by Storms caſt among the Rocks, and all the Men and Arms loſt. Notwithſtanding theſe Misfortunes, enough to diſcourage the moſt Magnanimous, the Marqueſs reſolutely proceeded, tho' contrary to the Advice of many, who look'd upon it as a deſperate Action, with ſuch ſmall Numbers to attempt a Kingdom, now well ſettled, and with a ſtanding Army to reſiſt all Foreign Invaſions, and inteſtine Inſurrections. But the Fear he had, that if the King ſhou'd conclude with the Scots before he had attempted any Thing, his Commiſſions wou'd be recall'd; and the Hopes he had that any Degree of Succeſs wou'd bring the Scots to more reaſonable Conditions with the King, hurry'd him on to his own Ruin.

He lands with a ſmall Force in Scotland.

His Declaration.

In the Beginning of April he landed in the Iſlands, with ſeveral Scotch Gentlemen, who reſolv'd to partake of his Fortune; the Chief of whom were Colonel Hurry, the Lord Frenderick, Colonel Johnſon, Colonel Grey, Henry Graham Kinſman to the Marqueſs, Colonel James Hay of Noughton, Sir Francis Hay of Dalgetie, and Mr. Drummond. Here he gather'd together a pretty conſiderable Number which had almoſt the Face of an Army, but was for the moſt part compos'd of raw and unskilful Perſons; with which he ſoon embark'd and landed in Cathanes, the moſt Northern Part of Scotland, expecting the coming of two thouſand Men rais'd in the Territories of the Earl of Seaforth. But the People here, whom he expected to have joyn'd with him, were ſo ſenſible of the Miſeries of the former War, and being now more terrify'd at the Name of Foreigners, deſerted their Habitations, and fled away, many of them as far as Edinburgh, where the Parliament was then ſitting. Being thus allarm'd, the Parliament order'd Lieutenat-General David Leſley with a Body of the Army to march directly towards the Marqueſs, leſt he ſhou'd ſoon grow too numerous; and Colonel Straughan, whoſe Valour the States highly approv'd, was order'd with a Body of ſelect Horſe to advance before, to hinder the Marqueſs's Levies, and to fight him, if he ſaw Opportunity. In the mean Time Montroſs mov'd on but ſlowly; and becauſe the World ſhou'd not be ſtartled at this Invaſion, while the King was upon a Treaty, he publiſh'd a pathetical Declaration, to make known ‘ That he came with the King's Commiſſion, and that his Intention was only againſt ſome particular Perſons, who had againſt the Laws of the Kingdom rais'd and maintain'd a War againſt the King's Royal Father, and did now by their ſubtle Practices endeavour to circumvent and deſtroy the Son: That he intended nothing againſt the Generality of the Kingdom; therefore he exhorted all Subjects of that Nation to endeavour to free Themſelves from the Tyranny of thoſe who for the preſent ruled the State, and from the Oppreſſion of the Miniſtry.’ But the Country, partly through Fear of the Danger, and partly over-aw'd by the Earl of Southerland, did not come in as he expected; and the Gentlemen his Friends were intirely diſcourag'd, becauſe his Men were ſo unlike thoſe former Soldiers, with which he had gain'd ſo many wonderful Victories.

He is defeated by Straughan.

In the mean Time Straughan advanc'd with all poſſible Speed towards the Royal Party, while Montroſs cou'd not effect any Thing material, beſides the Fortifying of Dunbar-Caſtle. But the Marqueſs hearing of the Enemies Approach, march'd his Men with more than ordinary Speed, to recover a Paſs; but before they cou'd reach it, the Front of the Army diſcover'd Straughan's Forlorn Hope, who haſtily advancing upon the Marqueſs's Army, found them not only fatigu'd, but out of Breath and Order. However a Body of a Hundred Men were drawn up to meet them, who giving Fire upon them, forc'd them to a diſorderly Retreat; but being ſupported by Straughan's whole Body of Horſe, they made good the Charge ſo furiouſly upon the Highlanders, that moſt of them threw down their Arms, and call'd for Quarter; but the Dutch and Holſteiners, after they had beſtow'd a Volly or two among the Horſe, retreated among ſome Shrubs, where for a while they gallantly defended themſelves, but being overpower'd were forc'd to yield themſelves Priſoners. This was a total Defeat, in which about two hundred were ſlain, and twelve hundred taken Priſoners; for by reaſon of the coming in of the Southerland Men to the Execution, few eſcap'd. The Royal Standard was alſo taken, in which was pourtray'd the Effigies of the late King Charles beheaded, with this Emphatical Motto, JUDGE AND REVENGE MY CAUSE, O LORD! The Marqueſs himſelf, when he ſaw the Day loſt, threw away his Cloak that had the Star on it, deſerted his Horſe, chang'd his Habit with a Highlander, and fled for two or three Days in great Diſtreſs. A Price was ſet upon his Head by the States; but eſpecially the Presbyterian Miniſters exhorted the People to do their utmoſt to take him, as a Thing neceſſary to their Salvation. At length, the Country being in great Search, the Marqueſs threw himſelf upon the Lord Aſton, formerly a Friend and Follower of his; but that Lord, either out of Fear or Covetouſneſs, wou'd not protect him, but ſent him with a ſtrong Guard to David Leſley, who alſo took Poſſeſſion of the reſt of the Priſoners.

He is brought Priſoner to Edinburgh.

He vindicates Himſelf.

The Sentence againſt him.

The unfortunate Marqueſs being now in the Hands of mortal Enemies, wanted not Abuſes and Reproaches; yet being come to the Earl of South-aſhes, his Father-in-Law, he had Liberty to ſee two of his Children. At Dundee, a Place which had moſt ſuffer'd by his Arms, he was leaſt of all inſulted, but rather pity'd: Here he again provided himſelf Cloaths ſuitable to his Quality; from whence being brought to Leith, he was there met by the Magiſtrates of Edinburgh, and from thence conducted with the reſt of the Priſoners of Note, being about forty in Number. At the Cannon-Gate of Edinburgh he was put into a new Cart purpoſely made, and plac'd on a high Seat, that the People might have a full View of him, being bound with a Cord drawn over his Breaſt and Shoulders, and ſecur'd through Holes made in the Cart. Being thus ſeated, the Hangman took off his Hat, and rod himſelf before the Cart in his Livery and Bonnet, the reſt of the Priſoners, ty'd two and two, walking bare-headed before the Cart; while the Streets and Windows were crowded with People to behold the Triumph over a Perſon, whoſe Name had made them tremble ſome Years before, and into whoſe Hands the Magiſtrates had upon their Knees deliver'd the Keys of that City. In this manner he was carry'd to the common Goal, where he was treated as the meaneſt Malefactor. Within two Days after he was brought before the Parliament, where Lowdon the Chancellor, having made a bitter and virulent Declamation againſt his horrible Murthers, Treaſons, Impieties, &c. he, without the leaſt Marks of Trouble or Diſorder, told them, That ſince the King had ſo far own'd them as to treat with them, he had appear'd before them with Reverence and bare-headed, which otherwiſe he wou'd not have willingly done; that he had done nothing of which he was aſham'd, or had Cauſe to repent; and ſo proceeded to vindicate his Actions, his Loyalty to his King, his Fidelity to his Country, and his Mercy to the Conquer'd, of which ſeveral were preſent who ow'd their Lives to Him; and laſtly inſiſted upon the King's own Commands for what he had lately done, and ſo appeal'd from them to the righteous Judge of all the World. Being order'd to withdraw, after a ſhort Space he was brought to the Bar, where the Chancellor pronounc'd this Sentence againſt him, ‘ That on the Morrow, being the twenty firſt Day of May, he ſhou'd be carry'd to the High-Croſs in Edinburgh, and there be hang'd on a Gallows thirty Foot high, for the Space of three Hours, and then to be taken down, and his Head to be cut off upon a Scaffold, and ſet upon Edinburgh Toll-booth; his Legs and Arms over the Gates of the Cities of Sterling, Dundee, Glaſcow and Aberdeen, and his Body to be bury'd at the Place of Execution, except the Kirk ſhou'd take off his Excommunication, and then it might be bury'd at the common Place of Burial.

His Courage.

Being return'd to Priſon, that he might not enjoy any Quiet during the ſhort Remainder of his Life, the Presbyterian Miniſters came immediately to inſult over him, aſſaulted him afreſh with the Aggravation of the Terror of his Sentence, which was to be ſucceeded with Eternal Damnation, and at laſt offer'd to intercede for him to the Kirk upon his Repentance. But he utterly declin'd their barbarous Officiouſneſs, and told them, That they were a miſerable, deluded, and deluding People; and prophetically declar'd, That they won'd ſhortly bring that poor Nation under the moſt inſupportable Servitude, ever People had ſuſtain'd. He couragiouſly told them, He was prouder to have his Head ſet upon the Priſon-Gate, than to have his Picture hung in the King's Bed-Chamber: That he was ſo far from being troubled that his four Limbs were to be hang'd in four Cities of the Kingdom, that he heartily wiſh'd he had Fleſh enough to be ſent to every City in Chriſtendom, as a Monument of his Loyalty to his King and Country. The next Day they executed every Part and Circumſtance of the Sentence againſt him, with all imaginable Inhumanity; all which he bore with the moſt Heroick Courage, and magnanimous Piety, that a good Chriſtian cou'd manifeſt. In his laſt Speech, he magnify'd the Virtue, Goodneſs and Religion of the laſt King, and ſaid, If ever he cou'd wiſh his Soul in another Man's ſtead, it ſhou'd be in his; he highly commended the Juſtice, Candour and Underſtanding of the preſent King, and pray'd, That they might not betray him, as they had done his Father. When he had finiſh'd all he deſign'd to ſay, and was expecting to die, they had yet one Scene more of their Tyranny to act. The Hangman brought the printed Book of his wonderful Actions, while he commanded in that Kingdom; which was order'd to be hang'd about his Neck in a ſmall Cord. The Marqueſs ſmil'd at this new Inſtance of their Malice, and thanking them, ſaid, He was pleas'd that it ſhou'd be there; and was prouder of wearing it, than ever he had been of the Garter. Then, having his Arms tied, he ask'd the Officers, If they had any more Diſhonour, as they conceiv'd it, to be put upon him, he was ready to accept it; and ſo, after ſome devout Ejaculations, he patiently ſubmitted to the laſt Act of the Executioner.

His Execution, And Character.

Thus dy'd the mighty Marqueſs of Montroſs, who after he had too much contributed to the Miſeries of his Nation by the firſt Covenant, gave as ſignal Teſtimonies of Loyalty and Bravery, as any Subject cou'd do; both which brought down his Ruin from the Party he firſt eſpous'd, and afterwards ſtrengthen'd by his great Activity: A ſufficient Caution for leading Men to beware of the Beginnings of any unjuſtifiable, or dangerous Enterprize. He was a Gentleman of very ancient Extract, many of whoſe Progenitors had held the higheſt Places under the King in that Kingdom, and had been ally'd to the Crown it ſelf. He was a Man of very good Parts, which were improv'd by no leſs Education; but he always ſhew'd a great Emulation, or rather a great Contempt of the Marqueſs of Argyle, who, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, wanted nothing but Honeſty and Courage to be a very extraordinary Man. Montroſs was of an intrepid Courage, in his Nature fearleſs of all Danger, and never declin'd any Enterpriſe for the Difficulty of ſurmounting it, and affected thoſe Attempts which to other Men ſeem'd deſperate, and by reaſon of his Succeſſes did too readily believe ſomething in himſelf above other Men; which made him ſhew a more generous Civility towards thoſe who were, or were willing to be, inferior to him, than towards his Superiors or Equals. He was naturally jealous, and ſuſpicious of the good Intentions of thoſe who did not concur with him in his Way; nor was he without Vanity; but his Virtues were much ſuperior, and he well deſerv'd to have his Memory preſerv'd, and celebrated amongſt the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of the Age. His Fall was not the only Tragedy at this Time; for ſoon after, the Officers who had been taken with him, Sir William Hurry, Sir Francis Hay, and many others of as good Families as any in the Kingdom, were executed, to the Number of Thirty or Forty, in ſeveral Parts of the Country.

and

The King reſents his Death.

3. When the News of theſe Executions was brought to the King at Breda, he was extreamly ſtartled, and expreſs'd his Reſentments of their Proceedings by a Meſſage ſent to the States by Mr. Murrey, 'That it could not but 'grieve and perplex him to hear, that notwithſtanding 'thoſe hopeful Overtures of Peace lately made between 'Him and Them, they had ſhed the Blood of ſome of 'his beſt Subjects in Scotland; and that in ſuch a manner, 'that if true as reported, they could not imagine but it 'muſt extreamly incenſe him; he therefore deſir'd an Ac'count of that Buſineſs from themſelves.' In Anſwer to this they profeſs'd, 'That their Affections were ſtill real 'to him, and that it rejoyc'd their very Souls, to hear that 'he would be willing to concur with them in Peace and 'Agreement: That as for the Death of Montroſs, they de'ſir'd it might be no Obſtacle in the Way, for that they 'did nothing in it but with a real Intention to promote his 'Intereſt.' They who were moſt diſpleas'd with Argyle and his Faction, were not ſorry for this monſtrous Proſecution; which at the ſame Time would render him more odious, and had freed them from a more formidable Enemy; and they perſuaded the King, who was ſufficiently afflicted with the News, 'That he might ſooner take Re'venge upon that People by a temporary Compliance with 'them, and going over to them, than by abſenting him'ſelf, which would inveſt them in an abſolute Dominion 'in that Kingdom, and give them Power to corrupt or de'ſtroy all thoſe who yet remain'd faithful to him, and 'were ready to ſpend their Lives in his Service.' And ſo the King, under theſe preſſing Neceſſities, purſued his former Reſolution of embarking for Scotland.

Yet is perſuaded to go Scotand.

His Intentions being notify'd to the Parliament at Edinburgh, there were ſeveral who held a Correſpondence with the Sectaries of England, that propos'd a ſtrange Queſtion, 'Whether they ſhould make any farther Addreſſes to the King,' and Eighteen out of Forty gave their Votes for the Negative. But the Plurality of Voices carrying it in the Affirmative, another Meſſage was agreed to be ſent to him, in which they invited him 'To make all 'poſſible Speed to come to his Kingdom of Scotland, and 'proteſted they would aſſiſt him with their Lives and 'Fortunes, to eſtabliſh him in all his Dominions.' Yet withal they forbore not to let him know, 'That they had 'Teſtimonies to produce of his Actings by Letters to 'Montroſs, contrary to his Promiſes to them at the Treaty 'of Breda; yet however they were willing to diſpenſe 'with what was paſt, ſo that he would without Delay, 'according to the Articles of Agreement, come over into 'Scotland, and comply with the Parliament, and the Kirk.' And having diſpatch'd away this Meſſage, they proceeded to the Preparation of all Things convenient for his Reception, furniſhing two Houſes in Edinburgh for the Reſidence of Him and his Followers, and took into Conſideration the Nomination of Officers for his Houſhold, which they did with ſufficient Arrogance: For they were reſolv'd that he ſhould have none to wait upon him, but ſuch as they ſhou'd appoint; and beſides the Baniſhment of ſeveral of the Cavalier Engliſh Lords from his Preſence, they likewiſe prohibited ſeveral Scots of the higheſt Quality, as the Duke of Hamilton, the Earls of Lautherdale and Seaforth, and others, to have any Reſidence in his Court.

A new Meſſage from the Scots.

Car. 2.

Still the Marqueſs of Argyle hop'd, or believ'd, that the King would never venture into Scotland upon the Conditions he had ſent; therefore he was much ſurpris'd when he receiv'd an Account from the Commiſſioners at Breda, 'That his Majeſty reſolv'd to embark the next Day; that 'he would leave all his Chaplains, and his other Servants 'behind him, and had only deferr'd the taking the Cove'nant Himſelf till he came thither, with a Reſolution to 'ſatisfy the Kirk, if they preſs'd it.' Upon this News he immediately diſpatch'd away another Veſſel with new Propoſitions, which the Commiſſioners were to inſiſt on, and not to allow of the King's coming into Scotland, without he likewiſe conſented to thoſe. But that Veſſel met not with the King's ſmall Fleet, which had ſet Sail on the 12th Day of June; and that it might avoid that of the Engliſh Parliament, which deſign'd to intercept the King's Paſſage, had held his Courſe more Northward; where it was many Days at Sea, toſs'd and perplex'd with ſtormy and contrary Winds, and often in Danger from the Enemy.

The King ſets ſail,

Arrives in Scotland, and takes the Covenant.

4. It was the 23d of June before the King arriv'd on the Northern Coaſts of Scotland, and caſt Anchor at the Mouth of the River Spey; where the firſt Welcome he receiv'd was a new Demand, 'That he would ſign both 'the Covenants Himſelf, before he ſet his Foot on Shore;' to which his Majeſty was perſuaded to conſent, and had notable Sermons and Exhortations made to him by the Miniſters to perſevere therein. The Lords of the other Party, who had prevail'd with him to all theſe Submiſſions, ſoon found that they had deceiv'd both Him and Themſelves, and that no Perſons had any Authority but thoſe who were their mortal Enemies. So that they would not expoſe themſelves to Impriſonment, or any other Diſgrace; but having given his Majeſty the beſt Advice they could, what he ſhould do for Himſelf, and what he ſhould do for Them, they put themſelves on Shore before he diſembark'd; and found Means to retire to thoſe Places, where they might be for ſome Time conceal'd. And ſhortly after Duke Hamilton retired to the Iſland of Arran, which belonged to himſelf; the Earl of Lautherdale conceal'd himſelf among his Friends; and the Earl of Dunfermling was admitted to ſtay at his own Houſe; and from all theſe, and ſeveral others, Satisfaction was expected for being in the late wicked and unlawful Engagement. Among whom the Earl of Braintford, deſiring to be reconcil'd to the Kirk, waited five Days at Edinburgh before he could deliver his Petition; which at length being read, after much ſcoffing at his Titles, Anſwer was return'd him, That as he behav'd himſelf, they would in Time take his Deſires into Conſideraton. All the King's Engliſh Servants of any Quality were remov'd from his Perſon, excepting the Duke of Buckingham; ſome of whom were privately receiv'd into the Houſes of Perſons of Honour, and others of them ſent out of the Kingdom.

His Reception at Aberdeen, and other Places.

After the King had landed, he was attended by a Committee appointed by the States, who waited upon him to the Univerſity of Aberdeen, where, and in all other Places as he paſs'd, he was receiv'd by all People with real Expreſſions of Joy, tho' very few Perſons of Quality were admitted to him, being moſt either Malignants or Engagers. Here he was lodg'd in a Merchant's Houſe oppoſite to the Toll-Booth, on which was fix'd one of the Arms of the Marqueſs of Montroſs; but ſtill the Town ſhew'd their Affection by preſenting him with the Sum of fifteen hundred Pounds. Upon which the States ſent to ſeveral Places, who had the ſame Intentions, enjoining them, 'whatever 'Plate or Mony they had to beſtow, to bring the ſame in'to ſuch a Treaſury as they ſhould appoint;' as if it were of dangerous Conſequence for his Majeſty to be Maſter of his own Purſe. From Aberdeen he paſs'd on to the Univerſity of St. Andrews, where at his Entry Mr. Rutherford, one of the Heads, made him an Oration, in which among other Expreſſions he told him, 'That if he perſiſted not 'in the Covenant, Actum eſt de Rege, & Re Regiâ.' Removing from thence to his own Houſe at Falkland, the Committee there was increas'd by the Arrival of the Marqueſs of Argyle, the Earls of Buclough, Weymes, Sir Archibald Johnſton, Sir John Cheeſely, with the Miniſters Dick, Guthry, and others of the ſame Stamp, who ſhew'd all outward Marks of Reſpect to his Majeſty. Hither came alſo many of the Nobility, Engagers and others, but with Difficulty were admitted to kiſs his Majeſty's Hand, and not ſuffer'd to ſtay any Time. Among others appear'd the Earl of Carnwarth, who coming into the Privy-Chamber, Argyle told him, It was a great Preſumption for one in his Condition to come thither; upon which he went to his Majeſty, and as a Farewel wiſh'd He had none about him leſs faithful than himſelf. Then applying himſelf to the Earl of Caſſels, ſtanding on one Side the Cloth of State, and Johnſton and Cheeſely on the other, Wood the Miniſter, one of the Commiſſioners in Holland, beckon'd to him to come away, which he preſently obey'd; and coming to him ſaid, Sir, God I hope will forgive me, will not you? But Wood diſdainfully turn'd from him without giving him a Word; and Johnſton and Cheeſely order'd the King at Arms to take the Earl and hang him preſently, except he went from Court: Which plainly ſhew'd the Charity of the Clergy, and the Mercy of the Committee, to any of the Royal Party.

Argyle's Management, and the King's Treatment.

The Marqueſs of Argyle was the chief Manager, who us'd all poſſible Addreſs to render himſelf gracious to the King, entertain'd him with very pleaſant Diſcourſes, and with ſuch Inſinuations, that his Majeſty did not only like his Converſation, but often believ'd he deſign'd to oblige and ſerve him: But whenever the King attempted to get ſome of his Servants about him, or to reconcile the two Factions, that the Kingdom might be united, he gather'd up his Countenance, and retired from him, without yielding to any Propoſition made to him. As to the King's Table, it was well ſerv'd, where he ſat in Majeſty, waited upon with Decency: He had good Horſes to ride abroad to take the Air, and was then well attended; and in all publick Appearances, ſeem'd to want Nothing that was due to a real King. But in all other Reſpects, relating to Power to oblige or gratify any Man, to diſpoſe or order any Thing, or Himſelf to remove to any other Place than was aſſign'd him, he had nothing of a Prince, but might well be look'd upon as a Priſoner. He was not preſent at their Councils, nor were the Reſults of them communicated to Him; nor was he in the leaſt Degree conſulted with, in any part of the Government; and yet they made all the Shew of outward Reverence to him. They principally rely'd upon their Clergy, who moſt of all beſieg'd him, and were in ſuch a continual Attendance about him, that he never was free from their Importunities, and their unmannerly Reprehenſions, all under Pretence of inſtructing him in Religion. They likewiſe oblig'd him to their conſtant Hours of their long Prayers, and made him obſerve the Sundays with more Rigour than the Jews uſually did their Sabbath; and very ſharply reprehended him, if he did but ſmile on thoſe Days, and if his Looks and Geſtures did not pleaſe them; while all their Prayers and Sermons, at which he was forc'd to be preſent, were generally Libels and bitter Invectives againſt all the Actions of his Father, the Idolatry of his Mother, and the Malignity of Himſelf. Yet in the midſt of all their Rudeneſs and caſual Reproaches, they ſtill approach'd his Preſence with bended Knees, and in the humbleſt Poſtures.

The King proclaim'd, and an Army rais'd.

In the mean Time, on the 15th Day of July, his Majeſty was ſolemnly proclaim'd King at Edinburgh-Croſs; but the Coronation, tho' much promis'd, was deferr'd to a more proper Seaſon. The Parliament and Committee of Eſtates endeavour'd to form an Army for the King's Service, as they alledg'd, and to that End had publiſh'd an Act for training of every fourth Man, who was capable of bearing Arms, throughout the Kingdom: Of this, old Leſley, Earl of Leven, was made General of the Foot, Holborn Major-General, David Leſley Lieutenant-General of the Horſe, and Montgomery Major-General; the Command of Generaliſſimo being reſerv'd, at leaſt in Name, for his Majeſty Himſelf. With this Army it was ſuppos'd they deſign'd to invade England, and ſecure the Eſtabliſhment of the King in his Throne; and notwithſtanding their earneſt Endeavours to compleat their Levies, and the high Perſuaſions of their Miniſters to engage the People in this Cauſe, yet there were ſeveral Obſtructions by reaſon of their Diviſions among themſelves. For there were at leaſt three Factions amongſt them: Some were diſguſted at the Kingly Authority, the chief of whom were Ker, Straughan, Johnſton and Cheeſely; who tho' they declar'd againſt King and Lords, yet abſolutely expreſs'd their Intentions to oppoſe the Engliſh Sectaries. Another Party was under the young Marqueſs of Huntley, the Earls of Athol and Seaforth, the Lords Ogilby and Newburgh, with the Gordons, who were ready to appear abſolutely for the King, without any Reſpect had to the other Parties. But theſe could by no Means be endured by the Third, now the moſt ruling Party, who compos'd the preſent Parliament and the Kirk, who notwithſtanding all Oppoſitions, had compleated their Levies to about ſixteen thouſand Foot, and ſix thouſand Horſe. But in this they took ſpecial Care not to admit Malignants or Engagers; for the moſt part putting in Command Miniſters Sons, Clerks, and other ſuch ſanctify'd Perſons, who hardly ever ſaw or heard of any Sword but that of the Spirit; and with this ſelect Body they made themſelves ſure of Victory. By theſe Preparations the King's Condition ſeem'd wonderfully advanc'd, eſpecially in Foreign Parts; and his being poſſeſs'd of one Kingdom without an appearing Rival, was look'd upon by great Numbers, as an Earneſt, and a happy Preſage of the Recovery of the other two; and all Perſons who had advanc'd the Deſign of the King's going into Scotland, began now to value themſelves upon their Underſtanding, or their Activity in that Service.

Cromwell his Return and Reception from Ireland.

V. I. During theſe Tranſactions and Preparations in Scotland, the Common-wealth of England, as it was call'd, was not negligent of its own Support and Security; and before the King landed in Scotland, it was thought neceſſary to ſend for Cromwell out of Ireland, where he left his Son-in-law Ireton, his Deputy, to finiſh his Conqueſts in that Kingdom. He made no Delay, but returning home crown'd with Victories and Succeſs, in a triumphant Manner enter'd the City of London amidſt a Crowd of Attendants, Friends, Citizens, and Members of Parliament, guarded by a Troop of Horſe and a Regiment of Foot, and amongſt them Fairfax himſelf, who all went out two Miles to meet him, and congratulate his glorious Return. Being come to Tyburn, the publick Place of Execution, where a great Multitude of Spectators were gather'd together, a certain Flatterer pointing to the Crowd, cry'd out, Good God! What a Number of People come to attend your Triumph? Upon which he, with a ſenſible Smile, made Anſwer, How many more, do you think, would attend here to ſee me hang'd? Tho' there was nothing more unlikely at that Time, yet there ſeem'd a Preſage in theſe Words, which he often repeated and us'd in common Diſcourſe.

He is made General againſt the Scots.

A Juncto of the Council of State were immediately adviſ'd by Cromwell, not to wait for the coming of the Scots, nor to truſt any After-Game, but rather to prevent their Invaſion of England by carrying the War directly into Scotland. But ſome Men of Scruple objected, 'That to begin a War with Scotland wou'd be contrary to the Covenant;' but it was anſwer'd 'That the Scots had already broken the Covenant, and that therefore it was not now binding on the one Side, after it had been diſſolv'd on the other.' So it was at length reſolv'd, 'that having a form'd Army, well provided and experienc'd, they wou'd march it forthwith into Scotland, to prevent the Scots marching into England, and the Miſeries that might thence enſue.' The Lord-General Fairfax was taught by the Preſbyterian Miniſters, and his own Lady, a great Patroneſs of them, to object That he was unſatisfy'd, whether there was a juſt Ground for the Parliament of England to ſend their Army to invade Scotland; But in Caſe the Scots ſhould firſt enter England, he was then ready to oppoſe and engage them in Defence of his own Country. The Council of State were ſo far troubled with theſe Scruples in the General, that they appointed a Committee to give him Satisfaction, Cromwell, Whitelock, Lambert, Harriſon and Saint John; the Debates of which Conference were publiſh'd by one of the Committee, the General concluding thus; As far as my Conſcience will give way, I am willing to join with you ſtill in the Service of the Parliament; but where the Conſcience is not ſatisfy'd, none of you, I am ſure, will engage in any Service; and that is my Condition in this, and therefore I muſt deſire to be excus'd. So the General laid down his Commiſſion; and by a politick Contrivance an Act was immediately paſs'd, 'for conſtituting and appointing Oliver Cromwell Eſquire to be Captain-General in Chief of all the Forces rais'd, and to be rais'd, by Authority of Parliament within the Common-Wealth of England.' Cromwell made no Alteration in the Army; which he had modell'd to his own Mind before, and commanded as abſolutely. But in all other Places he grew more abſolute, and more imperious; and diſcountenanc'd and ſuppreſs'd the Preſbyterians in all Places, who had been very much ſupported by Fairfax. The Independents had all Credit about him; and the Churches and Pulpits were open to all kind of People who wou'd ſhew their Gifts there; and a general Diſtraction and Confuſion in Religion cover'd the whole Kingdom; which rais'd as general a Diſcontent in the Minds of the People, who finding no Eaſe from their former Burthens, but a daily Encreaſe of the Taxes and Impoſitions, grew weary of their new Government; and heartily pray'd that their General might never return from Scotland, but being deſtroy'd there, the King might return victorious into London.

He advances towards Scotland.

Cromwell having receiv'd his Commiſſion, with great Vigour advanc'd towards the Borders of Scotland, at the Head of eleven thouſand Foot, and five thouſand Horſe; which extreamly ſtartled them there, notwithſtanding their great Levies and Preparations. The Scotch Miniſters, and others, made Reports, 'That Cromwell had a Commiſſion to come for Scotland with Fire and Sword, and was to give no Quarter to any Scot, but was to have all he cou'd conquer for himſelf and his Soldiers.' And further it was reported, 'That the Engliſh Army intended to put all Men to the Sword, and to thruſt hot Irons through the Womens Breaſts.' All Methods were us'd to make the Engliſh Army odious; and Whitelock tells us, That the Scots Miniſters in their Prayers ſaid, That if God will not deliver them from the SECTARIES, he ſhall not be their God. However the Scotch Committee of Eſtates ſeem'd much ſurpris'd at this Invaſion without Warning given, and therefore ſent to expoſtulate the Caſe in a Paper to Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, then Governor of Newcaſtle, in another to Cromwell, and a third to the Parliament at Weſtminſter; ‘ in which they complain'd of the Breach of the Act of Pacification, and urg'd the Validity of the Solemn League and Covenant, and the former Union between the two Nations.’ But were anſwer'd by a Declaration, ‘ 1. That the Scots, contrary to their Agreement, had once already invaded England under Duke Hamilton, and were now ready for a ſecond Invaſion; ſo that the Engliſh were advanc'd againſt them only by way of Prevention. 2. That they had made Peace with the common Enemy, and promis'd him Aſſiſtance to regain the other Kingdoms he pretended to. 3. They had reſolv'd to impoſe their Form of Religion upon the Engliſh Nation.’ Cromwell alſo added a Declaration of his own, in which he gave very obliging Words to the Scots in general, and told them, ‘ That he took to Heart all the Concerns of good Men, and that now he drew his Sword only againſt the Authors of Wrongs, who had polluted both England and Scotland with Blood and Slaughter, and who would involve them in new Miſeries, by admitting into their Boſom, an open Favourer of Wickedneſs.

The Scots complain.

Cromwell enters Scotland.

Thus on the 22d Day of July Cromwell croſs'd the Tweede and enter'd Scotland, and march'd almoſt as far as Edinburgh without the leaſt Oppoſition. In all this March the Engliſh ſaw not one Scotchman under ſixty Years of Age, nor any Youths above ſix Years old, and not many Women and Children, who in all Places begg'd for Mercy, and not to be put to any Torments, as their Miniſters had made them believe. All their Goods, Proviſions and Houſhold-ſtuff were remov'd, except a few Oats and Meal, and a little Beer hid under Coals, which the Soldiers made uſe of. Cromwell found the Scots Army encamp'd not far from Edinburgh, upon a very advantagious Ground; and he made his Quarters as near as he cou'd conveniently about Muſſelborough, but ſtill with great Diſadvantages. For the Country was ſo deſtroy'd behind him, and the Paſſes ſo well guarded before, that he was compell'd to ſend for all his Proviſions for Horſe and Foot from England by Sea; inſomuch that the Army was often reduc'd to great Streights; and the Scots really believ'd that that they had them all in their Power, except ſuch as would embark on Board their Ships. And indeed, if they had in Time rais'd what Forces they could, joyn'd with the King's Friends, and acted as real Politicians, and not like Religious Viſionaries, they had probably ruin'd the Engliſh Army.

He meets with a Check near Muſſelborough.

2. In the mean Time the King, tho' upon a double Account Generaliſſimo of the Scotch Army, was not allow'd to come there, but was kept at Falkland, and other Places, leaſt he ſhould have too great an Influence upon the Military Power; 'till on the 27th of July, by the good Will of the General Officers, and the Officiouſneſs of the Earl of Eglanton, he was invited to the Army; but Care was taken that none of the baniſh'd Perſons ſhould attend him thither. He was no ſooner arriv'd, where he was receiv'd with all Expreſſions of Joy, but Cromwell drew a great Body of Horſe down even to the Trenches, and forc'd a Party of the Scots, commanded by Sir James Hacket, to retreat in very great Diſorder. But the next Day a ſtrong Party of Horſe, commanded by Colonel Montgomery, Son to the Earl of Eglanton, fetching a Compaſs fell into Cromwell's Quarters about Muſſelborough, routed ſeven or eight Parties of Horſe, and forc'd, as it was ſaid, Cromwell himſelf in his Drawers to take his Horſe, and paſs over the River. Lambert was hurt in this Action, and ſeveral were ſlain; and it is reaſonably believ'd, that if Montgomery had been well ſupported, he might as well have deſtroy'd Cromwell's Army, as he afterwards did the other.

By this Succeſs, and the King's Preſence, the Army was much encreas'd, many call'd Malignants and Engagers having gotten into Command, his Majeſty was high in the Favour and Affection of the Army, which was then more evident by the Soldiers having in the late Action made an R. with Chalk under the Crown upon their Arms, and generally expreſſing the Goodneſs of their Cauſe, now they had the King with them. This ſtartled the Committees both of Kirk and State, who cry'd out, That the Quarrel was chang'd, and the Cauſe of God neglected! and ſo divers Arguments were us'd to remove his Majeſty from his Army, as ‘ The Danger of his Perſon, the Multitude of People out of Order by reaſon of his Preſence, Want of Proviſions, &c.’ and it is reported the Committee declared, That if he would not retire, they would act no more: And ſo, much againſt his Will, the King was perſuaded, after five or ſix Days Stay, to paſs over the Forth to Dumfermling. Immediately after the Committee commanded away all Malignants and Engagers, and ſo leſſen'd the Army of three or four thouſand of the beſt Men, and diſplac'd all ſuſpected Officers, concluding then, They had an Army of Saints, and that they could not be beaten; for ſo their illuminated Miniſters daily told the People out of the Pulpit. Beſides, the Gentry out of Merche and Teviotdale, who offer'd to diſtreſs Cromwell's Rear, were on Pain of Forfeiture forbidden to embody themſelves, or to attempt any Thing on them, but to come away and leave all to his Power. And Sir Edward Walker tells us, That Offers were made by conſiderable Perſons of the Malignant and Engaging Party, that they would raiſe another Army, to take up the Quarrel in caſe this was beaten; and in the Interim to give their Wives and Children in Hoſtages, that if this was victorious, preſently to lay down Arms; or at leaſt that they might come into the Army, and lead the Van againſt Cromwell: But neither would be accepted; for the prevailing Party, to colour their Malice and Fear of them, by their Inſtruments the Miniſters, declar'd againſt them, ‘ comparing the Sin of Malignancy to the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt; that it was better to fight the Enemies with a Handful of Elect and Godly People, than with mighty Arms loaden with that Sin, which like Achan's Wedge, wou'd ſurely be the Cauſe of their Deſtruction.’ So far were theſe unhappy People infatuated, and ripened for Vengeance and Ruin.

The King's Army weakned.

The Inſolence of the Kirk Party.

Soon after the Committees of Kirk and State ſent their Deputies to the King with a large Declaration of a ſtrange Nature: But his Majeſty at this Time poſitively refus'd to ſign it, and they moſt peremptorily preſs'd to have it paſs in Terminis without any Variation, how barbarous and unchriſtian ſoever the Expreſſions in it were in Relation to his own Father. After one Night's Stay, they return'd to Edinburgh and Sterling; where the next Day being Sunday, they thunder'd out againſt the King, ‘ That he was the Root of Malignancy, and an utter Enemy to the Kingdom of Chriſt, and the Covenant, which he had taken only to gain his Ends; and that they muſt take heed of him, and the Heathen People about him.’ And on Monday the Kirk publiſh'd a Declaration, approv'd by the Committee of Eſtates, in which they declare, ‘ That the Kirk and Kingdom do not own or eſpouſe any Malignant Party, or Quarrel, or Intereſt; but that they fight meerly upon their former Grounds and Principles, and in Defence of the Cauſe of God and the Kingdom, as they have done this twelve Years; and therefore, as they did diſclaim all the Sin and Guilt of the King and of his Houſe, ſo they will not own Him or his Intereſt otherwiſe than with a Subordination to God, &c.’ Two Days after, ſome of the moſt zealous in the Army, in the Name of the reſt, exhibited a Remonſtrance and Supplication, in which they declar'd to the ſame Effect with the Committees of the Kirk and State, and pray'd their Honours ‘ to take ſome ſpeedy and effectual Courſe to put the Laws of the Kingdom in full Execution againſt all Scandalous and Malignant Perſons, without Reſpect to Quality.’ The Committees by Swinton and Colonel Ker ſent their Declaration to Cromwell, who civilly receiv'd them, and return'd an Anſwer in Writing, in which he intimated, as if he thought their Profeſſions not conſiſtent with their Actions, upon which the Life and Hopes of the Malignants depended. But it is reported that his Anſwer to theſe Two, was, That he wou'd not juggle with Them; he came for their King, if they wou'd deliver Him, he wou'd treat, otherwiſe not; but many believe they were too much of an Opinion, to have any Difference during their Negotiations.

The King ſigns a hard Declaration.

In the mean Time, by the Inducement of Argyle and others, the King from Dumfermling ſent a Letter to the Kirk Aſſembly, to deſire ſome of their Numbers to come to him, and ſatisfy him in Point of Conſcience concerning ſome Parts of their Declaration. About four Days after, when they had publiſh'd their Papers, been with Cromwell, and the Chancellor and others had harangu'd to the Army the Senſe of the Kirk and Committee, the Aſſembly ſent two of their Number to ſatisfy his Majeſty, who after many Diſputes were at length induc'd to give way, that ſome Expreſſions relating to the late King ſhou'd be varied. So, by the Importunity of Friends and Enemies, on the ſixteenth of July the King was perſuaded to ſign the hard Declaration, of which this is the Subſtance: ‘ 1. He acknowledges the Providence of God in recovering him from the Snare of Evil Counſellors, and perſuading him of the Juſtice of the Covenant, which he has taken and ſubſcrib'd, and reſolv'd to maintain to the 1650. Car. 2.

‘ utmoſt. He deſires to be deeply humbled for his Father's bloody Actions, and his Mother's Idolatry, acknowleges all his own Sins, and the Sins of his Father's Houſe, and ſays he will account them Enemies that oppoſe the Covenants, both which he took without any Siniſter Intention of attaining his own Ends; and therefore he deteſts and abhors all Popery, Superſtition and Idolatry, together with Prelacy, &c. and reſolves not to tolerate them in any Part of his Dominions. 2. He declares his Sorrow for his great Sinfulneſs in making Peace with the Iriſh Rebels, and allowing them the Liberty of the Popiſh Religion, and for his ſeeking to ſuch unlawful Helps, which here he makes void, reſolving for the future rather to chuſe Affliction than Sin. 3. He declares the Commiſſions he had granted to the French and others, by Sea and Land, were not given to injure any of his harmleſs Subjects, who follow'd the Trade of Merchandiſe; and that he conſtrues well of the Intentions of thoſe who have acted againſt the Covenant, yet he will not now employ them, till they have taken it, and given ſufficient Evidence of their good Affection for the Work of Reformation.' As a Concluſion, again taking notice of his former Guiltineſs and ill Succeſſes, he tells the World, ‘ That the State of the Queſtion is now alter'd, and that he hath obtain'd Mercy to be on God's Side, and therefore hopes that the Lord will be gracious, and countenance his own Cauſe; and that for the future he will do Nothing, but by Advice of the Kirk and State.' Sir Edward Walker, then in Scotland, apologizes for the King's ſigning this ſhocking Declaration, and in the Concluſion ſays, Conſidering the Time when it was done, the Importunity that was upon him, and the ill Conſequences repreſented in Caſe of his Refuſal, with the pretended Advantages on the contrary, it will be found that few Princes in the like Exigent, tho' of much more Years and Experience, wou'd have ſo long reſiſted ſo hard and deſperate Aſſaults. Yet notwithſtanding this, theſe hard and unreaſonable Men were not ſatisfy'd, but prepar'd another Tryal, by framing and ſending him particular Heads for his publick Humiliation, which he was to have made, had not new Accidents and Turns of Affairs prevented it.

3. From this Time, and till the End of Auguſt, the Scotch Army encreaſed and waited on Cromwell's Motions; who variouſly marching to the South of Edinburgh, with conſiderable Oppoſition took the Houſe of Redhaugh, belonging to Sir James Hamilton. In the Interim, contrary to the Practice of oppoſite Armies, ſome of the Committee Officers of the Army, and Miniſters, had Conference with Cromwell's Officers, in order to aſſert the Juſtneſs of their Cauſe, as it was reported; but the Event made many ſuſpect the contrary. Towards the End of the Month both Armies drew very near each other, the Cannon play'd hotly from each other's Quarters, and ſome Parties of Horſe skirmiſh'd, in which Cromwell had the worſt; for as the Scotch Army increas'd, ſo his decreas'd, and grew exceedingly in want of Proviſions, his Stores brought by Sea being now exhauſted. But ſtill the Scots wou'd not fight, as tho' they fear'd a Ruin by gaining a Victory, the Conſequences of which might either have oblig'd them to purſue it into England, and ſo leave all the Malignants and Engagers in a Capacity to have riſen behind them, or elſe to diſband the greateſt Part of their Army, and not to purſue their Victory, but preſerve their own Power at home. So that inſtead of Deſtroying their Enemy, or Strengthning themſelves, a Proclamation was made in the Army, ‘ commanding all Malignants and Engagers thence, under Penalty of Caſhiering the Officers that entertain'd them, and that no Perſon ſhou'd drink or converſe with them.

Cromwell under great Diſadvantages.

On Saturday the 31ſt of Auguſt, Cromwell drew out of his Quarters at Muſſelborough in good Order, his Ships weighing Anchor at the ſame Time; and the Scotch Army followed at a convenient Diſtance. On Sunday they overtook and beat ſome ſmall Parties in his Rear, and had fair Opportunities to have fought him; but the Miniſters wou'd not give way to it, becauſe it was the Lord's Day. The next Day they follow'd him to Dunbar, a Place on the Sea Coaſts, where they had greater Advantages from the Ground, the Courage of their Men, and the fainting of the Enemies, who wou'd not abide a Charge, but fled into the Town; and Cromwell, wanting Proviſions, was ſhipping off his Foot and Cannon, deſigning only the next Day to break through with his Horſe, for he was then hemm'd in on every Side by a greater Number, which hover'd like a Cloud about him upon the Hills; and they had alſo by a ſtrong Party ſecur'd Coberſpath, the only Paſs between him and Berwick. In this great Advantage, which much leſſen'd the Conduct and Fame of Cromwell, the Committee and Miniſters wou'd not conſent to an Attack, ſaying, It was pity to deſtroy ſo many of their Brethren; but ſince they were like to fall into their Hands the next Day, it was better to get a dry Victory, and ſend them back with Shame for the Breach of Covenant. Cromwell had none of thoſe tender and affectionate Conſiderations; but took more than ordinary Care of Himſelf and his Army that Night, which prov'd dreadfully rainy and tempeſtuous. Having refreſh'd his Men in the Town, and above all Things ſecured his Match-Locks againſt the Weather, while his Enemies were careleſs of theirs, early in the Morning, being Tueſday the Third of September, he drew out a ſtrong Party of Horſe, and falling on the Horſe-Guards made them retire; and if his Deſign was formerly but to have made his Way, he now alter'd it, by this Opportunity of the ſupine Security of his Enemies. So immediately his Bodies both of Horſe and Foot advanc'd, and without any conſiderable Reſiſtance took the Scots Cannon, and enter'd their Camp, where preſently there was nothing but Noiſe, Tumult and Confuſion, Men running all Ways they knew not whither, the Cries and Groans of dying Men, Shouts and loud Acclamations of the Conquerors, Flying, Blood and Slaughter. All the general Officers fled in Time, and moſt of the Foot Officers left their poor Soldiers to the Mercy of Cromwell; and moſt of the Horſe, with the Committee and Miniſters, ſav'd themſelves, tho' ſeveral of the latter ſuffer'd. Three thouſand were kill'd, and nine thouſand taken Priſoners; fifteen thouſand Arms, all the Artillery and Ammunition, with above two hundred Colours, fell into the Hands of the Conquerors, and all with the Loſs of ſcarce three hundred Engliſh. Thus in a Moment this Powerful Army, doubly numerous to the other, was totally routed; moſt of the common Soldiers being diſpers'd, crying out, They would never fight again under thoſe Commanders who ſo baſely deſerted them.

The Battel of DUNBAR.

The Scotch defeated.

This Victory brought Cromwell directly to Edinburgh, where he met with good Accommodations, and Refreſhment, which his Army very much wanted. The Priſoners, after the Wounded, Weak, and thoſe of no Value, were ſet at Liberty, were driven like Turkeys to Newcaſtle in England, where about ſixteen hundred of them were ſtarv'd, having nothing to eat but green Cabbage Leaves, and Oats in a ſmall Proportion: The ſtronger Perſons, that out-liv'd this Diet, were condemn'd to the Sugar-Mills, and by the Engliſh Planters tranſported to the Weſt-Indies. So much Kindneſs had Cromwell for his Brethren in Scotland.

All was immediately in a Confuſion and Conſternation at the News of this Overthrow, tho' vaſt Numbers had very little Reaſon to grieve or be concern'd. All the chief Magiſtrates, together with the Committees of the Kirk and State, fled from Edinburgh to Sterling, where they took the beſt Care they cou'd for their Security. Here they and the general Officers accus'd each other, ſome of Neglect, ſome of Cowardiſe, and others of Treaſon. Old Leſley, Earl of Leven, who never was valu'd of late Years, was laid aſide with Diſhonour, and David Leſley for a while laid down his Commiſſion; the Rulers reſolving to model the Army after a more Sanctiſy'd Way. In the Interim great Lamentations were made by the Miniſters, who in the Pulpits told God Almighty, That it was little to Them to loſe their Lives and Eſtates, but to Him it was great Loſs to ſuffer his Elect and Choſen to be deſtroy'd, and many other extraordinary Diſcoveries; and ſtill crying out, Not to take in any of the Engagers, or to aſſert the Kingdom of Chriſt by carnal and ſelfiſh Means. Then preſently they caus'd a Faſt to be kept by his Majeſty, and both in their Prayers and Preachings judiciouſly aſcrib'd all the Defeat to the Sin of the King's Houſe and Family, and to his Hypocriſy in complying with them, not for Conſcience, but for the Love of a Crown. And the Sunday following at Sterling, Mr. Guthrey ſaid, That if his Majeſty's Heart were as upright as David's, God wou'd no more pardon the Sins of his Father's Houſe for his Sake, than he did the Sins of the Houſe of Judah for the Goodneſs of Holy Joſiah. Such were the Notions of the Miniſters, who tho' they oftentimes glory'd That he was the only Covenanted King, yet 'till he ſubmitted his Scepter to that of Chriſt's, or rather was wholly at their Diſpoſal, they wou'd neither truſt, honour, nor obey him.

The Kirk in a great Conſternation.

4. While the Kirk Party more eſpecially were terrify'd with the laſt Victory, the King, who was then at Perth or St. Johnſton, was well pleas'd with it, as a particular Happineſs in the Loſs of ſo ſtrong a Body of his Enemies; who, if they had prevail'd, his Majeſty expected to have been ſhut up in a Priſon the next Day; which had been only a ſtricter Confinement than he now ſuffer'd: For the Lord Lorne, eldeſt Son to the Marqueſs of Argyle, being Captain of his Guard, was ſo watchful over him both Night and Day, that he cou'd not go to any Place without his Permiſſion. But after this Defeat, they all look'd upon the King as a neceſſary Perſon whom they might want: They allow'd his Servants, who had been ſe-queſter'd from him at his firſt Arrival, to attend and wait upon him, and began to declare for the calling a Parliament, and appointing a Time for the King's Coronation; which hitherto had been little ſpoken of. Some Miniſters began now to preach Obedience to the King; and the Officers, who had been caſhier'd for their Malignity, loudly exclaim'd againſt the Miſcarriages in the Government, and that the Kingdom was betray'd to the Enemy for want of Confidence in the King, who alone cou'd preſerve the Nation. They of the Council ſeem'd not to have ſo abſolute a Dependance upon the Marqueſs of Argyle, but ſpoke more freely than formerly; and the Marqueſs apply'd himſelf more to the King, and to thoſe about him. So that the King did, in a good Degree, enjoy the Fruit of this Victory as well as Cromwell, tho' the Benefit was not ſo publickly diſcern'd.

The King in a better Condition.

A Deſign to free the King.

A new Army was appointed to be rais'd; the King interpos'd more than he had done; the Noblemen and Officers came to him with more Confidence; and his Majeſty undertook to expoſtulate, and to complain of what was diſpleaſing to him: Yet ſtill the Power was in Argyle's Hands, who under all the Profeſſions of Humility, ſtill exercis'd the ſame Tyranny; inſomuch that the King grew weary of his own Patience, and reſolv'd to make ſome Attempt to free himſelf, upon this Occaſion. Dr. Frazier, the King's Phyſician and Attendant, and a great Promoter of his Voyage into Scotland, was ſhortly after his Arrival diſlik'd by Argyle, who knew him to be a Creature of the Hamiltonians, and found him to be of an unquiet and over-active Spirit; and thereupon ſequeſter'd him from his Attendance. There were many Officers who had ſerv'd in Duke Hamilton's Engagement, as Middleton and others, who had entire Affections for the King; and who, finding themſelves excluded from any Employment by the Power of Argyle, had retir'd into the Highlands, and there remain'd conceal'd in Expectation of ſome happy Seaſon, in which they might openly appear. With ſeveral of theſe Dr. Frazier had held Correſpondence while he was in the Court, and had often inform'd the King of their Affection and Readineſs to ſerve him, and of their Power to do it, and had return'd his Majeſty's gracious Acceptation of their Service, and his Reſolution to employ them. And now not being himſelf permitted to come to Court, he found Means to meet and confer with many of them, and held Intelligence with the Lord Lauderdale, who had always great Confidence in him; and the Officers undertaking to do more than they cou'd, or the Doctor underſtanding them to undertake more than they did, he gave the King ſuch an Account of their Numbers, as well as Reſolutions, that his Majeſty appointed a Day for their Rendezvous, and promis'd to be preſent with them, and then to publiſh a Declaration, ready drawn up, of the ill Treatment he had ſuſtain'd, and particularly againſt the Perſon of the Marqueſs of Argyle.

The King retires.

And returns,

And gains Advantages.

The Duke of Buckingham, who had given himſelf up to Argyle, not being truſted with this Secret, made a Diſcovery of the Correſpondence, by finding ſome of the Letters that had paſs'd, in the King's Cabinet accidentally left open. But Argyle did not think the Time ſo near; however the King proſecuted his Purpoſe ſo far, that he rode one Day with above a dozen Horſe into the Highlands, and lodg'd one Night at my Lord Dedup's Houſe; neither the Marqueſs, nor any one in Court knowing whither he was gone; which threw them all into great Confuſion and Diſtraction. It was indeed an empty and unprepar'd Deſign, contriv'd and conducted by Dr. Frazier, with little Foundation, and might have turn'd to the King's Ruin. It was afterwards call'd The Start; yet, contrary to Expectation of wiſe Men, it prov'd much to his Majeſty's Advantage. For tho' he was induc'd, or rather compell'd to return the next Day by a Troop of Horſe under Montgomery, yet notwithſtanding, this publick Declaration of his Majeſty's Reſentment, together with the Obſervation of what the People ſaid of it, That the King was not treated as he ought to be, caus'd Argyle to change his Counſels, and to be more ſolicitous to ſatisfy the King. Thereupon a Summons was ſent out, in the King's Name, to call a Parliament, and great Preparations were really made for the Coronation; and the Seaſon of the Year, and the well-guarded Paſſes, hinder'd the Enemies Advance: So that the King reſided ſometimes at Sterling, and ſometimes at St. Johnſton, with ſufficient Security. The Parliament met at the former, which ſhortly brought all the Lords of the other Party thither; who appear'd to have Credit enough to wipe off the Stains of the Engagement, yet with Submiſſion to ſtand publickly upon the Stool of Repentance, and to acknowledge their former Tranſgreſſions; as they all did. Duke Hamilton and Lauderdale were highly welcome to his Majeſty; but not ſo to Buckingham and Argyle. The King himſelf grew very popular, and by his frequent Conferences with the Knights and Burgeſſes, got many Things paſſed in the Parliament which he deſir'd; caus'd ſeveral infamous Acts to be repeal'd, and provided for the raiſing of an Army, of which he himſelf was General; and no Exceptions were taken to thoſe Officers who had formerly ſerv'd the King his Father.

Edinburgh Caſtle ſurrender'd to Cromwell.

While the Diviſions were in ſome Degree cementing, Cromwell was active with his victorious Forces, and had reduc'd moſt of the Fortreſſes in the Southern Parts of Scotland, as the Caſtle of Roſlan, Tantallon, Hume, &c. which he perform'd with great Labour and Induſtry. But his greateſt Difficulty was againſt the Caſtle of Edinburgh, built on a high abrupt Rock, and thought impregnable by Situation and Art. He left no Means untry'd to gain it; and firſt he reſolv'd to force it by Mines; and having employ'd both Engliſh and Scotch Colliers, who were us'd to dig in the Coal-Pits, he by the Force of Fire endeavour'd to ſoften the Stone; but all in vain, becauſe of the Hardneſs of the Rock, which was impenetrable againſt all his Arts. Therefore when he cou'd not blow it up into the Air, he endeavour'd to level it with the Ground; and with mighty Labour and Pains rais'd a Battery, fortify'd with Gabions, and other Contrivances, from whence he inceſſantly play'd with Cannons and Mortars. Till at length Dundaſs the Governor, having his own Wife hurt by a Shell, agreed to ſurrender the Place upon honourable Articles, on the 24th Day of December. In the Caſtle were taken fifty three Pieces of Cannon, ſome of them remarkable both for Size and Beauty, eight thouſand Arms, eighty Barrels of Powder, and all the King's Hangings, Tapeſtry and Jewels. Thus fell that ſtrong and famous Caſtle, that gloried in its Virginity, as having never before ſubmitted to any Conqueror; which was a Thing ſo unexpected by ſeveral, that the Scots cry'd out, It was taken only by Silver Bullets.

Several Acts made at Weſtminſter.

5. During all theſe Tranſactions in Scotland, the Republican Rulers in England were daily exercis'd, not only in ſecuring and perpetuating their Authority, but alſo in making ſeveral new Eſtabliſhments and Laws, under the Name of the Parliament of England. To gain the Reputation of Godlineſs and preciſe Juſtice, on the 10th of May they paſs'd an Act againſt Inceſt, Adultery and Fornication, making the two firſt to be Felony without Benefit of the Clergy, and the latter to be puniſh'd with Impriſonment for the firſt Offence, and Death for the ſecond. This Bill was warmly oppos'd by a notorious Offender, Harry Martin, who argued, That the Severity of the Puniſhment wou'd cauſe the Sins to be more frequently committed; ſince Perſons wou'd learn to be more ſly and cautious in the Commiſſion, and the Parties ſo neceſſitated to mutual Secrecy, that a Conviction wou'd be impracticable. After that they paſs'd another Act againſt Swearing and Curſing, with a Penalty of thirty Shillings on a Lord, twenty on a Baronet or Knight, ten on an Eſquire, ſix and eight Pence on a Gentleman, and three and four Pence on every other Perſon for the firſt Offence; and for the ſecond, the Penalty doubled. Another Holy Act was made for the due Obſervation and Sanctification of the Lord's-Day, and the Days of publick Humiliation and Thankſgiving; wherein the Penalties for profaning the Parliamentary Faſts and Thankſgivings were equal with thoſe for the Profanation of the Lord's-Day; and made ſo by thoſe Men who had abrogated the Church Feſtivals and Faſts, on a Pretence That thoſe Days aſſum'd a Sanctity due only to the Sabbath. But the Matter that occaſion'd the greateſt Debates in the Houſe, was the Project of altering the Forms of Law, and making all Writs and Proceedings to run only in the Engliſh Tongue. This was the ſubject of ſeveral Petitions from the Soldiers and the Country Farmers, who indeed had Reaſon to think themſelves impos'd upon by Languages they did not underſtand. Hence it was at laſt enacted, November 22, ' That all Report Books of the Reſolution ' of Judges, and other Books of the Law of England, ſhall ' be tranſlated into the Engliſh Tongue, and all Writs, ' Proceſs and Returns thereof, Pleadings, Rules, Orders, ' Indictments, Inquiſitions, Certificates, Patents, and all ' Acts, Deeds and Proceedings whatſoever, ſhall be only in ' the Engliſh Tongue, in the ordinary uſual Hand, and ' not in Court-Hand.

Mr. Aſcham murder'd at Madrid.

They acted every thing with the Authority of a free and independent State, and as ſuch they this Year ſent Mr. Aſcham, a Perſon concern'd in the King's Tryal, as their Agent or Envoy to the Court of Spain, tho' the King had before ſent the Lord Cottington and Sir Edward Hyde thither, as his own proper Ambaſſadors. This new Agent was no ſooner arriv'd at Madrid, but the next Morning ſome Engliſh Officers and Soldiers who had ſerv'd in the Spaniſh Armies, went to his Lodgings, and without asking any Queſtions, walk'd up directly into his Chamber, drew their Swords, and, beſides their Intentions, in Diſorder, kill'd a Friar the Interpreter as well as the Agent; and ſo return'd to their Companions with naked and bloody Swords, and ſome Expreſſions of Triumph, as if they had perform'd a gallant and juſtifiable Piece of Service. The King's two Ambaſſadors abhorr'd this Action, but had the Misfortune to have one of their own Servants, Henry Progers, concern'd in it; therefore, in great Concern, they immediately wrote to the prime Miniſter Don Lewis de Haro, to teſtify their Ignorance and Deteſtation of it. Don Lewis at firſt return'd them a dry and ſevere Anſwer; but meeting with them ſome Weeks after, contrary to their Expectation, he us'd this Expreſſion, I envy thoſe Gentlemen for having done ſo noble an Action, how penal ſoever it may prove to them, to revenge the Blood of their King. And he further ſaid, The King his Maſter wanted ſuch reſolute Subjects; otherwiſe he wou'd not have loſt the Kingdom of Portugal, for want of one brave Man, who by removing the Uſurper, might at any Time, during the firſt two Years, have put an End to that Rebellion. The Perſons concern'd in this Aſſaſſination might eaſily have ſecur'd themſelves, but in Confuſion they went into a little Chappel for Sanctuary, from whence in a Day or two they were taken by a Principal Officer, ſent to Priſon, and condemn'd to die; but then were deliver'd back into the ſame Chappel, and were kept there till they had Opportunity to make their Eſcape; only one was afterwards apprehended and ſuffer'd Death.

Several ſuffer in England, as Levens, Andrews, Benſon, &c.

The News of this bloody Fact made a great Noiſe in England; and, like that of the Murther of Dr. Doriſlaus, occaſion'd new Hardſhips and Severities againſt the Cavaliers, and others not Lovers of the preſent Eſtabliſhment. But they were more than ordinary active in ſuppreſſing all Perſons from appearing for the Scots Deſigns and Intereſt: Upon which Account, Dr. Levens, a very learned Gentleman of the Civil Law, being taken with ſome blank Commiſſions from the King, was try'd by their Court Martial, and condemn'd to be hang'd over-againſt the Royal Exchange in London, which was executed on the 13th Day of July. A little above a Month after, Colonel Euſebius Andrews, a Counſellor of Grays-Inn, having been projecting ſome Inſurrection in Behalf of the King, was betray'd by ſome of his Confederates, taken up, and after ſeveral Examinations, brought to his Tryal before the High Court of Juſtice. Here he admirably pleaded his Cauſe; but the Attorney-General Prideaux over-rul'd all, and told him, The Court was not to take Notice of his Law Caſes, but of his Confeſſion; and tho' he had acted no Treaſon, yet he had an Affection for Treaſon, and therefore deſerved Death. Upon this learned Diſtinction the Court proceeded to Sentence againſt him, that he ſhou'd be beheaded; which Sentence this Heroick Gentleman ſuffer'd on Tower-Hill, with no leſs Magnanimity than Chriſtianity, on the 22d of Auguſt. In the following Month, one Mr. Benſon, involv'd in the ſame Deſign with Colonel Andrews, was try'd and condemn'd by the foreſaid Court, and on the 8th of October was hang'd for his Loyalty. About the ſame Time there was a ſmall Riſing of ſome Gentlemen in Norfolk; but upon the Appearance of the Country Forces, and two Troops from Lynne, they diſpers'd, ſome of the Chief being taken and executed. In order to make Diſcoveries, whole Swarms of Informers began to wander about in all Places, both publick and private, ſacred and profane: They liſtned in Churches, attended in Taverns and Ale-houſes, and repair'd to all publick Places of Exerciſe: Noblemen and Gentlemens Servants were corrupted, that they might diſcover their Maſters Diſcourſe at Table; and the chief Vintners, or their Drawers, were brib'd to hearken privately to the free Diſcourſes of their Cuſtomers over their Wine. And ſuch was the Condition of England in the Second Year of the Common-Wealth.

The ſad Condition of Ireland.

6. Ireland, from the Departure of Cromwell, was this Year left to the Government of his Son-in-Law Ireton; a Man who knew the Bottom of all his Deſigns, and was of the ſame, or a greater Pride and Fierceneſs in his Nature. He purſu'd the ſame Methods, rang'd and rag'd about the Country, us'd all the Severities of the Sword and Gallows, and became a new Scourge to that wretched People. At the ſame Time the Plague rag'd all over that Kingdom, as if Human Vengeance were not ſufficient to chaſtiſe the Madneſs of that Nation, without the Concurrence of the Divine. This was the moſt grievous Sickneſs that for fifty Years had afflicted that Kingdom; ſo that there was ſcarce a Houſe free in Dublin, where there dy'd about eight Hundred Perſons in one Week. Beſides this, they were viſited with another uſual Concomitant of War, a dreadful Famine, which was ſo exceſſive in many Parts of the Iſland, that we are aſſur'd ſeveral could not with-hold from Human Fleſh. So that this Nation met with three devouring Plagues at once, a Peſtilence, a Famine, and the mercileſs Sword of Ireton; who, tho' he met with much Oppoſition from the Faſtneſſes and ſtrong Holds, without any ſet Battel, almoſt compleated the Conqueſts began by Cromwell, before he dy'd himſelf in the following Year. In the mean Time, in the latter End of this Year the Marqueſs of Ormond, with the Lord Inchequin, and ſeveral other Perſons of Rank and Honour, were forc'd to quit Ireland to Ireton's Forces, and to retire into France, and other Countries.

The Death of the Princeſs Elizabeth.

On the 8th Day of September this Year dy'd the Princeſs Elizabeth Stuart, ſecond Siſter to the preſent King, in the fifteenth Year of her Age; a Lady of incomparable Abilities, and admirable Virtues, but of a cruel and untimely Fate: For being by Order of the Regicides ſent Priſoner to Cariſbrook-Caſtle, the tedious Priſon of her Royal Father, being more ſenſible of his Murther than the Loſs of her own Liberty, ſhe waſted away, and expired with the Extremity of Melancholy and Grief. This was a moſt ſenſible Affliction to the King in Scotland, which was not long after ſucceeded by a Loſs much more ſubſtantial, tho' perhaps not more affecting, which was the Death of the Prince of Orange; a Loſs of mighty Importance to his Majeſty, towards whom that brave and hopeful Prince gave all the Teſtimony of the moſt unſhaken Affection, and inviolable Friendſhip, that ever had been ſhewn towards any Perſon under ſignal Misfortunes. He was ſnatch'd away by the Small-Pox, on the 27th of October, not without Suſpicion of Poyſon; leaving his diſconſolate Princeſs near the Time of her Delivery, who on the 4th of November brought forth a Son, who has ſince made a much greater Figure in Hiſtory than his Father. The Death of this Prince did not only extinguiſh all Expectations in France of the Reſtoration of the King of England, but very much leſſen'd the Reſpect and Civility, which that Court had always ſhew'd to the Queen her ſelf, as a Daughter of France; towards whom they expreſs'd not that Regard they had formerly done.

And of the Prince of Orange.

The Death of Archbiſhop Williams.

Beſides the Deaths of theſe two illuſtrious Perſons, we are to take notice of ſome others, that deſerve a Name in Hiſtory; as firſt that great Prelate and Stateſman Dr. John Williams, Archbiſhop of York, in the 68th Year of his Age, whoſe Character we have already given; but muſt further obſerve, that, notwithſtanding the World's Opinion of his Principles, he continu'd ſo exact and ſtrict to the Rules of the Church of England, that in his laſt Sickneſs, wanting a regular Presbyter to give him the Sacrament, Abſolution, &c. he purpoſely ordain'd an honeſt and pious Servant of his own to adminiſter to him in thoſe holy Offices. Not long after dy'd another eminent Biſhop, Dr. John Prideaux of Worceſter, a Perſon ſcarcely to be parallel'd for all ſorts of Learning, an admirable Linguiſt, and a moſt profound Divine of the Anti-Arminian Party; who had been twenty ſix Years the Regius Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Oxford; when in the Year 1641 he was remov'd to a Biſhoprick, to the great Detriment of his Fortune and Eſtate; for he was ſoon driven out of all, and compell'd to ſell his excellent Library for Bread, and ſo dy'd very poor, to the ſenſible Concern of many learned Foreigners, who held him in the higheſt Eſteem and Veneration. Next, we ſhall mention Sir Simonds D'ewes, a Gentleman educated at the Univerſity of Cambridge, celebrated for a moſt curious Antiquary, highly eſteem'd by the great Selden, and particularly remarkable for his Journals of all the Parliaments in Queen Elizabeth*'s Reign*, and for his admirable Manuſcript Library he left behind him, now in the Hands of one of the greateſt Genius in the Age. We ought alſo to mention Dr. Alexander Rhead, a very learned Scotchman, and a worthy Member of the College of Phyſicians; a Perſon, who beſides the Publication of ſeveral Writings, honourably practis'd in his Faculty for no leſs than fifty Years. We ſhall laſtly mention two noted Parliamentarians, Thomas May, and John Fry: The former was a Gentleman by Birth, educated in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and a Follower of the Court, where he became famous for his Poetical Performances, and was graciouſly countenanced by the late King and his Royal Conſort; but being diſappointed of Preferment, and particularly of the Bays, which were taken from him by Sir William Davenant, he ſided with the Presbyterians, and vented his Spite in his noted Book call'd The Hiſtory of the Parliament of England, one of the genteeleſt and handſomeſt Libels in thoſe Times. The other, Mr. Fry, was a Parliament Man, of more than ordinary Parts; firſt a Presbyterian, then an Independent, and afterwards an Arian, and what not: His Books rais'd a great Noiſe and Diſturbance in the Parliament Houſe, and were all order'd to be burnt; and when himſelf was in Danger of ſome ſignal Puniſhment, having run through all Religions, his Death put an End to all Proſecution.

VI. 1. The great Hopes of the King were now in Scotland, where it was determin'd, that his Majeſty ſhould be crown'd on the firſt of January at Scone, near St. Johnſton, the uſual Place for that Purpoſe, he being accounted the Forty Eighth Monarch that had been crown'd there.

The Manner of the King's CORONATION at Scone.

The Manner of the Coronation, being the laſt in that Kingdom, and but little known in England, may not be ungrateful to the Reader; the Solemnity of which was thus: Firſt his Majeſty, in a Prince's Robe, was conducted from his Bed-chamber by the Lords Great Conſtable and Marſhal to the Chamber of Preſence, where he was by the Lord Angus, Chamberlain, plac'd in a Chair under a Cloth of State. Then the Nobles and Commiſſioners of Barons and Boroughs enter'd the Room, and having ſhewn themſelves to his Majeſty, Chancellor Lowdon ſpoke to this Effect, 'Sir, your good Subjects deſire you may be crown'ed, as righteous and lawful Heir of the Crown of this 'Kingdom: That you would maintain the preſent pro'feſſed Religion, the National Covenant, and Solemn 'League and Covenant: That you would graciouſly be plea'ſed to receive Them under your Protection, to govern 'Them according to Law, to defend Them in their 'Rights and Privileges by your Royal Power; they of'fering Themſelves in humble Manner to your Majeſty 'with their Vows to beſtow Land, Life, and what elſe 'is in their Power, for the Maintenance of Religion, for 'the Safety of your Majeſty's Sacred Perſon, and Main'tenance of your Crown, which they intreat your Majeſty 'to accept, and pray Almighty God, that for many Years 'you may enjoy the ſame.' To which the King made this Anſwer; I do eſteem the Affections of my good People more than the Crowns of many Kingdoms, and ſhall be ready by God's Aſſiſtance to beſtow my Life in their Defence; wiſhing to live no longer than I may ſee Religion and the Kingdom flouriſh in all Happineſs.

This Ceremony perform'd, the Nobles and Commiſſioners of Barons and Boroughs accompany'd his Majeſty to the Church of Scone; the Spurs being carry'd before him by the Earl of Eglington, the Sword by the Earl of Rothes, the Scepter by the Earl of Crawford and Lindſay: The Crown was carry'd by the Marqueſs of Argyle, immediately before the Perſon of the King; who follow'd, ſupported by the Conſtable and Marſhal; his Train born up by the Lords Montgomery, Ereskine, Newbottle and Machelene, under a Canopy of crimſon Velvet, ſupported by the Lords Drummond, Carnegie, Ramſey, Johnſton, Brechin and Yſter; which ſix were alſo ſupported by ſix Noblemens Sons. Thus they repaired to the Church, which being prepared for the Purpoſe, the Honours were laid on a Table provided for them; and his Majeſty aſcended on a Stage twenty four Foot Square, and ſeated Himſelf on a Chair to hear the Sermon; upon which Stage there was another ſmaller Stage erected, whereon the Royal Throne ſtood. His Majeſty being ſeated on his Chair, a remarkable Sermon was preach'd by Mr. Robert Douglas, Moderator of the Commiſſion of the General Aſſembly, in which he often ſpoke directly to the King, and particularly gave him to underſtand, 'That the chief Cauſe of the 'Judgment upon his Houſe, had been his Grandfather's 'Breach of Covenant with God, and his Father's follow'ing his Steps, in oppoſing the Work of God, and his 'Kirk, within theſe Kingdoms.' Therefore he admoniſh'd him to adhere to the Covenant, and let him know, 'That 'he was oblig'd, not only to maintain Religion as it is 'eſtabliſh'd in Scotland, but, if it ſhould pleaſe God to 'reſtore him, likewiſe to endeavour the ſame Reforma'tion in his other Kingdoms; and not to tolerate any 'Falſe Religion within his Dominions.

The King's Oath.

Sermon being ended, the National Covenant of Scotland, and the Solemn League and Covenant were diſtinctly read, and an Oath adminiſter'd to his Majeſty in theſe Words, I CHARLES, King of Great-Britain, France and Ireland, do aſſure and declare by my ſolemn Oath, in the Preſence of Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, my Allowance and Approbation of the National Covenant, and of the Solemn League and Covenant; and faithfully oblige my ſelf to proſecute the Ends thereof in my Station and Calling; and that I my ſelf, and Succeſſors, ſhall conſent and agree to all Acts of Parliament enjoyning the National Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant, and fully eſtabliſh Presbyterian Government, the Directory of Worſhip, Confeſſion of Faith, and Catechiſms in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are approv'd by the General Aſſemblies of this Kirk, and Parliament of this Kingdom; and that I will give my Royal Aſſent to Acts and Ordinances of this Parliament paſs'd, or to be paſs'd, enjoyning the ſame in my OTHER Dominions: And that I ſhall obſerve theſe in mine own Practice and Family, and ſhall never make Oppoſition to any of thoſe, or endeavour any Change thereof. This done, the National Covenant, the Solemn League and Covenant, and the King's Oath ſubjoyn'd to both, being drawn up in a fair Parchment, the King, in the Preſence of all, ſubſcrib'd the ſame. Then the King aſcended the other Stage, and ſat down in the Royal Throne; when the Lords great Conſtable and Marſhal went to the four Corners of the Stage, Loyon King at Arms going before them, who ſpoke theſe Words to the People, Sirs, I do preſent unto you the King, CHARLES, the rightful and undoubted Heir of the Crown and Dignity of this Realm: This Day is, by the Parliament of this Kingdom, appointed for his Coronation; and are you not willing to have him for your King, and become ſubject to his Commandments? At this Action the King ſtood up, and ſhew'd himſelf to the People on all Sides, who expreſs'd their Conſent by their loud and joyful Acclamations, God ſave King Charles the Second! Then deſcending to the firſt Chair, the Miniſters tender'd him the Coronation Oath, as it was appointed in the firſt Parliament of King James the Sixth, which being read, the King upon his Knees, holding up his Right Hand, ſwore theſe Words: By the Eternal and Almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, I ſhall obſerve and keep all that is contained in this Oath.

He is crown'd by the Marqueſs of Argyle.

Then was the King diſrobed by the Lord Chamberlain of his Princely Robe, with which he enter'd the Church, and inveſted with his Royal Robes; and ſo ſupported as before, he remov'd to the Chair plac'd on the North Side of the Church, whither the Sword was firſt brought by Sir William Cockburn, Gentleman-Uſher, who deliver'd it to the great Chamberlain, and he making a ſhort Speech, deliver'd it to his Majeſty, by whom it was given into the great Conſtable's Hands, and by him girt to the King's Side. Then his Majeſty ſitting down in the Chair, the Spurs were put on him by the Earl Marſhal, and the Marqueſs of Argyle taking the Crown into his Hands, the Miniſter pray'd That the Lord wou'd purge the Crown from the Sins and Tranſgreſſions of them that reign'd before him, &c. and then the Marqueſs put it on his Majeſty's Royal Head. Which done, Loyon King at Arms, the great Conſtable ſtanding by him, call'd the Nobility one by one, who kneeling down, and touching the Crown upon the King's Head with their Right Hand, ſwore theſe Words: By the Eternal and Almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, I ſhall ſupport Thee to my Utmoſt. This obligatory Oath was likewiſe read to the People, who holding up their Hands, teſtify'd their Aſſent. Laſtly, after the Earl of Crawford and Lindſay had deliver'd the Scepter to his Majeſty, he return'd again to the Stage, where he was inſtall'd in the Royal Throne by the Marqueſs of Argyle, and a new Exhortation given him by the Preacher. The Ceremonies being thus ended, his Majeſty and the Nobility were entertain'd at a ſtately and magnificent Dinner at Scone; which done they all return'd to St. Johnſton, the whole Scotch Army ſtanding all the Way as a Guard between thoſe two Places.

The King's Army and Officers.

2. Scotland was now buſily employ'd in Preparations for War, levying of Soldiers, raiſing of Mony, and diſciplining the Forces; while the King himſelf view'd the Frontier Garriſons, and prepar'd for Defence. From whence he viſited the Highlanders, in order to compoſe the Feuds and Diſſenſions that were amongſt thoſe hot People; which cou'd not be effected in any reaſonable Degree, till by Order of Parliament the Names of the Factions were in a great meaſure abrogated, and Perſons promiſcuouſly admitted into the Army. This was violently oppos'd by Argyle, who ſtill ſo well preſerv'd his Greatneſs and Intereſt, that it was judg'd expedient to mollify him with an Imagination, that the King deſign'd to marry one of his Daughters. This had ſome Effect; and Commiſſioners were likewiſe appointed to remove the common Impediments in the Levies, who had alſo Power given them, of Examining and Puniſhing the Friends and Favourers of the Engliſh Parricides; and while ſome receiv'd the condign Puniſhments of theſe Crimes, two Leaders, Johnſton and Cheeſely, made a timely Eſcape to Cromwell's Camp. The King ſet up his Royal Standard at Aberdeen; to which from all Places, Volunteers and Honorary Soldiers flock'd in great Numbers. From thence the King march'd to Sterling; and having muſter'd the Army, he made Duke Hamilton his Lieutenant-General, David Leſley Major-General, Middleton Major-General of the Horſe, and Maſſey General of the Engliſh Troops. The Artillery was in good Order under the Command of Wemmes, a Perſon not thought worſe for his Ingratitude to the King's Father: He was confeſſedly a good Officer; and there were very few celebrated Officers, but ſuch as had drawn their Swords againſt his late Majeſty. Many of the Nobility had rais'd Regiments or Troops; and all the young Gentlemen of the Kingdom appear'd now very hearty in Commands, or Voluntiers: And in all Appearance they ſeem'd a Body Equal or Superior to the Enemy, which advanc'd in ſuch a Manner as ſhew'd they deſir'd nothing more than a Battle. But this was not thought adviſeable for the King's Army to engage in, without very great Advantages, which they had daily Reaſon to expect; for they had a broad and deep River between them; and if they preſerv'd the Paſſes, which were thought eaſy to keep, Cromwell muſt in a ſhort Time want Proviſions, and ſo be compell'd to retire, while the King had all the Advantages of Proviſions, and Opportunity of diſtreſſing his Rear. Amidſt all theſe Cares and Dangers, the King's Birth-day, the twenty ninth of May, was celebrated with all due Solemnity, being then twenty one Years of Age; to the Honour of which the Town of Dundee made ſplendid Preſents; a moſt excellent Pavilion, ſix Field Pieces, with Carriages and Ammunition, and, which procured them greateſt Thanks, a compleat well armed Regiment of Horſe.

Cromwell's Motions.

In the mean Time Cromwell was not idle; but having furniſh'd his Soldiers with new Cloaths, Mony, and other Neceſſaries ſent by Sea, he march'd through Newbridge and Hamilton to Torwood near Sterling; where furiouſly moving ſeveral Ways, he view'd in all Places, if an Attempt might any where be made upon the King's Camp. But when he found it ſo well fortify'd, that it cou'd not be attempted without the greateſt Hazard, he retir'd and took Calendar Houſe. Immediately after, Colonel Overton, having provided Ships, flat-bottom'd Boats, and other Veſſels for tranſporting of Horſe and Foot, with ſixteen Hundred Foot and four Troops of Horſe put out into the Forth, with Orders to land at the North-Ferry in Fife, which he did in ſpight of all Oppoſition. At the ſame Time Cromwell kept with the main of his Army cloſe up to the Scots, deſigning to fall upon their Rear in caſe they mov'd to diſturb this Enterprize. However Colonel Brown and Major-General Holborn were diſpatch'd with four Thouſand Men to drive the Engliſh out of Fife again; but before they cou'd come up to them, Lambert and Okey were got over the Forth, and joyn'd with Overton with two Regiments of Horſe, and two of Foot. And with this unexpected Reinforcement, the Engliſh fell upon Brown and Holborn, defeated their whole Body, kill'd two Thouſand upon the Spot, and took twelve Hundred Priſoners, and among thoſe Brown Himſelf, who liv'd not long after the Battle. Thus the Engliſh got ſure Footing on the other Side of the Forth; and this Defeat, which hapned on the latter End of July, prov'd the Bane of the Scotch Affairs. For ſoon after the Engliſh took in Garriſons almoſt as faſt as they approach'd them; and Brunt Iſland, and a ſtrong Fort call'd Inneſgary, ſituated in an Iſle lying in the Frith, were ſoon reduc'd by Lambert. And Cromwell, without longer waiting upon the King's Army, paſs'd over to Brunt Iſland; from whence ſending Whaley to take in the ſmaller Garriſons upon the Coaſt of Fife, he himſelf march'd towards St. Johnſton, where the King had left the Lord Duffus with twelve Hundred Men for its Defence. But Cromwell having drain'd the Water out of the Ditches, and battering the Walls with his Cannon, forc'd him to ſurrender in a Day's Time.

The Battle of Fife.

The King in great Straits.

This prodigious Succeſs caus'd the King to alter his Counſels, and to project an Irruption into England. He now found himſelf much nearer to England than Cromwell; and that it was not poſſible for the Other to overtake him, till after he had been ſome Days March before him. His Caſe was govern'd by Neceſſity, and his Fate depended upon the Succeſs of one Battle. All the Northern Parts of England had given him Cauſe to believe that they were well affected to his Service; and if he cou'd reach thoſe Countries, he might preſume to encreaſe his Army, which was numerous enough, with an Addition of ſuch Men as wou'd make it much more conſiderable. Hereupon it was reſolv'd that the Army ſhou'd immediately march, with all poſſible Expedition into England by the neareſt Ways that led into Lancaſhire, whither the King ſent Expreſſes to give thoſe Notice of his Purpoſe, who had made greateſt Promiſes, that they might get their Soldiers together to receive him. His Majeſty likewiſe ſent an Expreſs to the Iſle of Man, where the Earl of Derby had ſecurely lodg'd himſelf from the End of the former War, 'that he ſhou'd 'meet him in Lancaſhire.' The Marqueſs of Argyle was the only Man who diſſwaded the King's March into England, with Reaſons which were not frivolous; but the contrary Opinion prevail'd, and he retir'd to his Houſe in the Highlands. Accordingly, on the 31ſt Day of July, the King with his Scotch Army left the Camp at Sterling, and on the 6th of Auguſt enter'd his Native Country of England, by the Way of Carliſle, with an Army of about ſixteen Thouſand Men.

He enters into England.

Here the King began to breath another Air, and to meet with ſome Relaxation from the Severity of the Preſbyterian Diſcipline. But General Maſſey being a ſingular Favourite of that Party in England, his Majeſty ſent him with ſome Troops before, who was always to march at leaſt a Day before the Army, that he might give Notice of the King's coming, and draw the Gentry of the Counties through which he paſs'd, to be ready to attend upon his Majeſty; eſpecially the Presbyterians of Lancaſhire, with whom he had a particular Acquaintance. But it was fatal at that Time to all Scotch Armies, always to have a Committee of Miniſters in them, who ruin'd all: For tho' there had been all poſſible Care taken to chuſe ſuch Men for that Service, as had the Reputation of being the moſt ſober and moderate of that Body; yet theſe very People no ſooner heard that Maſſey was ſent before to call upon their Friends, and found that thoſe about the King now in England ſeem'd to have leſs Regard for the Covenant than formerly, but they ſent an Expreſs to him, without the leaſt Communication with the King, with Letters, and a Declaration; in which Letters they requir'd him 'to publiſh that Declaration, which teſtify'd the Zeal of the 'King, and the whole Army for the Covenant, and their 'Reſolution to proſecute the true Intent of it; and forbid 'him to receive or entertain any Soldiers in his Troops, 'but thoſe who would ſubſcribe that Obligation.' The King had ſoon Notice of this Preſumption, and ſpeedily ſent Maſſey a Command 'Not to publiſh any ſuch Declaration, and to behave himſelf with equal Civility towards all Men who were ready to engage in his Service.' But before the Inhibition was receiv'd, the Matter had taken Air in all Places; and being ſpread over the Kingdom, almoſt all Men fled from their Houſes, or conceal'd Themſelves, who wiſh'd well to his Majeſty's Affairs.

The Strictneſs of the Scotch Miniſters.

A Presbyterian Plot by Love, &c.

3. During the various Tranſactions in Scotland, before the King's Arrival in England, the Republican Rulers at Weſtminſter were buſily employ'd, both in ſecuring their own Authority, and proſecuting a Plot which occaſion'd ſome new Struggles between the Presbyterians and Independents in England. The former meeting with no ſmall Grievances and Oppreſſions from the Latter, began this Spring to have ſome conſiderable Hopes from their Scottiſh Brethren; and for their Sakes, and their own Recovery, were inclin'd to help forwards the Reſtoration of their Soveraign, as a King under ſufficient Limitations, and now in Covenant with them. This Zeal for their own Cauſe carry'd many of the Presbyterian Miniſters in London, and others, into a Correſpondence with the Kirk, and ſo into a Plot for the King, diſtinguiſh'd by the Name of The Presbyterian Plot. This was ſoon diſcover'd by the Vigilance of the Government, by the Intercepting of Letters, and by the Forwardneſs of the Perſons concern'd: So Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Caſe, Mr. Drake, very eminent Presbyterian Divines, beſides ſome others of the Laity, were ſeiz'd by Order of the Council of State, and on May the ſeventh brought before the High-Court of Juſtice. Love had been a great Incendiary againſt the late King at the Treaty of Uxbridge, as was formerly mention'd, and was now look'd upon as the chief Ringleader in this Affair; therefore he was firſt charg'd with 'High-'Treaſon againſt the State and Common-Wealth of England, for holding Correſpondence with the King and 'his Party, and ſupplying them with Arms and Mony, 'contrary to an Act of Parliament in that Caſe provided.' He at firſt diſputed the Authority of the Court, and terrify'd Mr. Jackſon a Miniſter from giving in Evidence againſt him; for which obſtinate Refuſal he was fined five Hundred Pounds by the Court, and committed to the Fleet. At another Appearance, about ſix Weeks after, he did at laſt confeſs, 'That the Conſpirators met at his 'Houſe for promoting the Scots Deſigns; and that Letters were receiv'd, and Anſwers were ſent from thence;' but Equivocated in Excuſes, 'That he did not do it Himſelf, and that he did not Perſonally act any Thing, &c.' In Concluſion, tho' he had the famous Mr. Matthew Hale for an Advocate, and the whole Party for Sollicitors, on July the Fifth he receiv'd Sentence to be beheaded, and the Execution was appointed to be ten Days after. Several others were likewiſe condemn'd to Death, but the whole Storm was like to fall upon Love, and one Gibbons.

The Presbyterians Endeavours to ſave Love.

This threatning a new Blow to the Presbyterian Party, many fervent Petitions were preſented to the Parliament, for Pardon of Mr. Love: 'All his faithful Zeal and memorable Services in former Times were recounted, and 'the Danger of loſing the Presbyterian Intereſt and Kindneſs; and how hazardous it might be to the Common-'Wealth, not yet well ſettled, if by ſuch Severities the 'Presbyterians ſhou'd be provok'd to join with the Malignant Party,' were among other Solicitations repreſented and inſinuated to the Leaders of the Independent Party: But after a long Debate in the Houſe about his Pardon, it paſs'd in the Negative. Hereupon, on the very Day appointed for Execution, ſeveral Miniſters, in and about London, came with a moſt importunate Petition to the Houſe, 'praying earneſtly, and in the Bowels of Jeſus 'Chriſt, who when we were Sinners dy'd for us, if not 'totally to ſpare the Life of our Brother; that yet you 'wou'd ſay of him, as Solomon of Abiathar, that at this 'Time he ſhall not be put to Death.' Upon which the Parliament granted him a Reprieve for one Month; and ſo reſted the Matter, till ſuch Time as Cromwell cou'd be conſulted in Scotland, and his Opinion and Inclination known in this Affair. Cromwell taking the Matter into Conſideration, return'd his Anſwer in a private Letter to one of his Confidents, wherein, according to his Politicks, ' Leſt the Engliſh Presbyterians ſhou'd, in this difficult Juncture, riſe at his Back, and join with the Scotch Kirk Party, with whom he was now engag'd, he was content that Love ſhou'd be repriev'd for a conſiderable Time, and, upon good Security of future Behaviour from him and his Party, at laſt pardon'd.' Here Nalſon takes Notice of a Providential Vengeance upon him: For it hapned that two or three Gentlemen, formerly of the late King's Army, travelling upon the Northern Road, met with the Poſt that carry'd this very Letter; and enquiring of him Whether he had any Scotch Letters? he innocently reply'd, He had. At which, excited by an unuſual Curioſity, they took the Poſt to a convenient Place out of the Road, and opening the Scotch Male, they found this Letter of Reprieve and Pardon for Love; upon the reading of which one of them immediately cry'd out, Oh! that is the Rogue that ruin'd us, by breaking the Treaty at Uxbridge: And thereupon putting that Letter in his Pocket, they reſtor'd the reſt to the Poſt, telling him, There were his Letters again, and immediately mounting, they with all Speed purſu'd their intended Journey.

He is repriev'd.

Yet at laſt is beheaded.

The Male arriving at London, and Letters from Cromwell to ſeveral Perſons, without one Word concerning Love, the Party took it for granted, that this Silence was deſign'd as an abſolute Denial: And therefore not daring to draw the Diſpleaſure of Cromwell upon themſelves, either by a ſecond Importunity to ſave him, or by a Delay of Execution, eſpecially at a Time when the King's Arrival in England had made his Favour moſt valuable, they order'd him to ſuffer upon Tower-Hill upon the 22d Day of Auguſt. The Account of the Man and his Death ſeems beſt given by the noble Hiſtorian, who obſerves, That this poor Man, who had been guilty of as much Treaſon againſt the King, from the beginning of the Rebellion, as the Pulpit cou'd contain, was ſo much without Remorſe for any Wickedneſs committed of that Kind, that he was jealous of nothing ſo much, as of being ſuſpected to repent, or that he ſuffer'd for his Affection to the King. And therefore, when he was upon the Scaffold, he ſeem'd ſo much delighted with the Memory of all he had done againſt the late King, and againſt the Biſhops, that he cou'd not then forbear to ſpeak with Animoſity and Bitterneſs againſt both, and expreſs'd great Satisfaction for what he had acted againſt them, and was as much tranſported with the inward Joy of Mind he felt in being brought thither to die as a Martyr, and to give Teſtimony for the Covenant; Whatſoever he had done being in the Purſuit of the Ends of that ſanctify'd Obligation, to which he was in and by his Conſcience engag'd. And in this raving Fit, without ſo much as praying for the King, otherwiſe than that he might propagate the Covenant, he laid his Head upon the Block with as much Courage as the braveſt and honeſteſt Man cou'd do on the moſt pious Occaſion.

The Parliament in a Fright.

4. Not long before the Execution of this formidable Conſpirator, the Rulers were dreadfully allarm'd with the ſurpriſing News of the King's Arrival in England, and ſtill more terrify'd with the Reports of the Greatneſs of his Army, and his Reſolution of mounting his Foot Soldiers, and riding directly to London. This for a while threw them into ſuch a Conſternation, that they began to look about for Means to eſcape out of the Land, and ſeverely condemn'd Cromwell of Raſhneſs and Precipitation. But Cromwell took Care to give them Eaſe as ſoon as might be, aſſuring them ' That he wou'd overtake the Enemy, and give a good Account of them, before they ſhou'd give them any Trouble.' They were ſoon reliev'd by theſe Promiſes, and other Accidents; yet the Parliament, notwithſtanding his canting Letters, began to grow jealous of him, and us'd ſome ſharp Expreſſions againſt him; which coming to his Ears, he afterwards remember'd to their ſufficient Coſt. He loſt no Time, but gave Orders to Lambert ' to follow the King immediately with ſeven or eight hundred Horſe, and to draw as many as he cou'd from the Country Militia; to incommode the King's March as much as poſſible, not to engage his own Party without extraordinary Advantage, but to keep himſelf intire till he ſhould come up to him.' He next reſolv'd to leave Major-General Monk with a ſtrong Party of Foot, and ſuch Troops of Horſe, as were ſufficient to ſuppreſs any Forces which ſhou'd riſe after his Departure; and gave him Orders, ' to keep Edinburgh and the Harbour of Leith; to ſurpriſe and apprehend as many of the Nobility and Gentry, as he ſuſpected, to keep them under Cuſtody, and to uſe the higheſt Severity againſt all who oppos'd him; and above all, not to ſuffer the Licence of the Preachers in their Pulpits; and to make himſelf as formidable as it was poſſible: In the laſt Place, that as ſoon as conveniently he cou'd, he ſhou'd beſiege Stirling, as the moſt conſiderable Place in the Kingdom;' and charg'd him, ' If in that or any other Place, he found a ſtubborn Reſiſtance, and were forc'd to ſpend much Time, or to take it by Storm, that he ſhou'd give no Quarter, nor exempt it from a general Plunder.' Having given theſe Rules to Monk, who obſerv'd them with the utmoſt Rigour, he with the Remainder of his Army march'd to overtake the King.

The King in Lancaſhire.

His Majeſty was then in Lancaſhire, where at the Head of his Army he was in every Market Town he paſs'd proclaim'd King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland. In order to obſtruct his March the Militia of moſt Counties were drawn into the Field againſt him; two thouſand out of Staffordſhire, and four thouſand out of Lancaſhire and Cheſhire, under Colonel Birch, join'd with Lambert and Harriſon. The Lord Fairfax appear'd in the Field with a formidable Body to flank the Royal Army; the numerous Militia of the City of London was commanded out againſt the King, and all the adjacent Counties were by ſtrict Order of Parliament enjoin'd to ſet out Horſe and Men at their own Charges: So that the whole Force of England was rais'd againſt him, while his own Army daily diminiſh'd by the Deſertion of the Scots. Nor did the Country come in to his Majeſty as was expected, being continually hinder'd by the Republick's Forces that ſpread over all Parts; ſo that all that Way there came in none of Note to the King, but the Son of the Lord Howard of Eſcrick, with about a hundred Horſe, for which the King gave him the Honour of Knighthood. Nevertheleſs there wanted not Courage in the Breaſts of the Nobility and Gentry with his Majeſty, whoſe ſingular Reſolution very much ſupported their Spirits. The Scots ſeem'd moſt apprehenſive of the enſuing Fate; and Duke Hamilton, in a Letter to his Friend, us'd theſe Words: ' We are now laughing at the Ridiculouſneſs of our preſent State; we have quit Scotland, being ſcarce able to maintain it, and now we graſp at all, and nothing but all wou'd ſatisfy us, or to loſe all: I confeſs, I cannot tell whether our Hopes or Fears are greateſt; but we have one ſtrong Argument, Deſpair; for we muſt now either ſtoutly fight, or die.' But David Leſley, the moſt experienc'd Commander, one Day ſhew'd a greater Mark of his Fear and Concern. The King, having obſerv'd him throughout the whole March to be ſad and melancholy, took an Opportunity to aſk him, how he cou'd be ſad, when he was at the Head of ſo brave an Army, that look'd ſo well that Day? The other anſwer'd him with a Sigh and Whiſper, That he was melancholy indeed, for he well knew that Army, how well ſoever it look'd, wou'd not fight.

His bad Condition.

The firſt Attempt made upon the Royal Army was at Warrington in Cheſhire, the Paſſage of which Bridge was ſharply diſputed by Lambert and his Party; but at length was gain'd by the King, with ſuch a haſty Retreat of Lambert's Men, that the Report went that he was defeated. It was not thought fit to purſue Lambert, whoſe chief Deſign was to diſturb and retard the Army's March, which they reſolv'd to continue with the ſame Expedition they had hitherto us'd, which was incredible; till they ſhould arrive at ſuch a Poſt as they might ſecurely reſt themſelves. There was a Belief that they might have continu'd it even to London, which wou'd have produc'd wonderful Effects; but they quickly found it to be impracticable, the Soldiers being ſo fatigu'd with the Length of their March, and the Heat of the Weather: And hoping the Intereſt that Major-General Maſſy had in Gloceſterſhire, wou'd procure a Confluence of Men from thoſe Parts, it was reſolv'd to bend their March that Way. But firſt the King thought upon Shrewsbury for a Reſting Place, where was a ſmall Garriſon under Colonel Mackworth, a Gentleman who it was thought might be prevail'd with to give it up to the King. But his Majeſty ſending a civil Meſſage to him, he return'd a poſitive Denyal; ſo that the King caſt his Eye upon Worceſter, that was ſo little out of his Way to London, that the going thither wou'd not much hinder the March, if they found the Army able to continue it. So with very little Oppoſition, the King enter'd the City of Worceſter upon the 22d Day of Auguſt, the ſame Day that Love was beheaded at London, after a fatiguing March of above three hundred Miles; where he found ſuch Refreſhment and Conveniencies for his Men, and the Place ſo proper for the Protection of his Friends, that it was reſolv'd to continue there, and expect the coming of the Enemy.

He ſettles at Worceſter.

5. The King being ſettled at Worceſter, and ſolemnly proclaim'd there by Liſſens the Mayor, and Bridges the Sheriff of the City, he iſſu'd out a Declaration, ' for ſummoning all the neighbouring Nobility, Gentry, and Many repair to him.

‘others from ſixteen Years of Age to ſixty, upon their Allegiance, to appear in their Perſons with Horſe and Arms at Pitchcroft, near the City of Worceſter, on Tueſday the 26th of Auguſt, where his Majeſty wou'd be preſent himſelf.’ Upon which Summons there appear'd theſe following Loyal Perſons, Francis Lord Talbot, with about ſixty Horſe, Mr. Mervin Touchet his Lieutenant-Colonel, Sir John Packington, Sir Walter Blount, Sir Ralph Clare, Sir Rowland Berkley, Sir John Winford, Mr. Sheldon of Beoly, Mr. Waſhburn of Witchinford, with forty Horſe, Mr. Hornyold of Blackmore-Park, with forty Horſe, three Mr. Blounts, two Mr. Walſhes, with divers others, who were honour'd and encourag'd by his Majeſty's Preſence. Notwithſtanding which Acceſs, the Number of his Army, both Engliſh and Scots, was conceiv'd not much to exceed twelve thouſand Men, about ten thouſand Scots, and about two thouſand Engliſh; and thoſe too not excellently arm'd, nor plentifully ſtor'd with Ammunition. But the King was not without Hopes of Aſſiſtance from other Places, particularly from Wales; but more eſpecially from the Zeal and Activity of the Earl of Derby, who had brought above three hundred Foot and Horſe out of the Iſle of Man into Lancaſhire; and by his Intereſt with ſeveral brave Gentlemen, ſoon increas'd his Number to fifteen hundred Men, with which he was haſtning to Mancheſter to join with five hundred more, ſo that he was in a hopeful Way of raiſing a conſiderable Army.

The Defeat of the Earl of Derby.

But the firſt News the King heard, was of the Defeat of the Earl of Derby, with the total Deſtruction of ſeveral gallant Gentlemen that accompany'd him; who meeting with Colonel Lilburn with three Regiments of Foot and ſome Horſe out of Cheſhire, had a ſharp Engagement near Wiggan for about an Hour, on the 25th of Auguſt. At length the Earl's new-rais'd Forces were put to Flight, and himſelf being wounded, narrowly eſcap'd; and ſeveral Perſons of Quality of his Party were ſlain, as the Lord Withrington, Sir Thomas Tildeſly, Colonel Trollop, Colonel Galliard, with ſome others of good Note: Among the Priſoners were Sir William Throgmorton, Sir Timothy Fetherſtonhaugh, Colonel Bointon, Colonel Legg, Colonel Robinſon, Colonel Gerard, Major Cheſter: Beſides other Officers, four hundred private Soldiers were taken, with all the Arms and Ammunition, with the Earl's George and Garter, with three Cloaks with Stars. The Earl, and Colonel Roſcarrock, after this Overthrow, by the Aſſiſtance of two Gentlemen, with great Difficulty got to his Majeſty at Worceſter. Among thoſe that loſt their Lives in this Action, the Lord Withrington is diſtinguiſh'd as a Man of ſingular Courage and Bravery, and as great and graceful in his Perſon, as any in the Nation, much exalted by Nature above the talleſt Men of the Age: He was a Gentleman of the beſt and moſt ancient Extract of the County of Northumberland, and of a very fair Fortune, of which he expended thirty five thouſand Pounds in the Service of the late King; and for his Gallantry and Loyalty made a Peer of the Realm in the middle of the War. Coming with the King out of Scotland, he took the firſt Opportunity of joining with the Earl of Derby, hoping with him to draw together ſuch a Body of the Royal Party, as might give ſome Check to the unbounded Imaginations of that Nation. But in this unfortunate Action, knowing his Caſe to be deſperate, and his Enemies implacable, he is ſaid to have refus'd Quarter at their Hands; and, as they report it, they were compell'd to kill him in their own Defence.

The Character of the Lord Withrington.

Great Diviſions in the King's Army.

The News of this Defeat exceedingly afflicted the King at Worceſter, and very much abated the Hopes he had of a general Riſing of the Gentry in his Behalf. Beſides, there were ſome other Accidents and Obſervations which adminiſter'd Matter of Mortification to his Majeſty; as the Diviſions in the Army, and particularly the reſtleſs Ambition of the Duke of Buckingham, who, like his Father, knew not how to own any Superior, or ſubmit to any Man but his King. His Behaviour in Scotland, particularly with the Marqueſs of Argyle, had been very unacceptable to the King; and now in England, he thought none ſo proper to command his Forces as himſelf, and gave his Majeſty no little Trouble by his frequent arguing againſt the Scots, and urging and forcing his own Promotion; which being juſtly deny'd him, he abſented himſelf from Court in great Diſcontent. The Scots were jealous and diſcontented at the Engliſh, and particularly complain'd of Mr. Crosby, an eminent Divine, who preaching before the King in the Cathedral, ſtil'd his Majeſty, in all Cauſes, and over all Perſons, next under God, Supreme Head and Governor. Nor was there any good Underſtanding between the Scotch Officers: David Leſley, whom the Duke of Buckingham endeavour'd to undermine, appear'd diſpirited and confounded; gave and revok'd his Orders, and ſometimes contradicted them. He did not love Middleton, and was very jealous that all the Officers lov'd him too well; who was really an excellent Officer, and kept up the Spirits of the reſt, who had but little Eſteem for Leſley. In this unhappy Diſtemper was the Court and the Army, in a Seaſon when they were ready to be ſwallow'd up by the Power and Multitude of the Enemy, and when nothing was like to preſerve them, but the moſt ſincere Unity in their Prayers, and a joint Concurrence in their Counſels; in both which they were miſerably divided. The King endeavour'd to inſpire them with all poſſible Reſolution; and their Neceſſities oblig'd them to uſe Diligence in carrying on the Fortifications at Worceſter, at and near which Place they agreed ſo far as to make the beſt Defence they cou'd.

Cromwell approaches Worceſter.

6. On the other Side the Republick by their new Levies had encreas'd their Forces to a prodigious Number, which according to their own Accounts amounted to above ſixty thouſand Men. Cromwell himſelf, about three Days after the former Victory, march'd up before Worceſter with ſeventeen thouſand Horſe and Foot, beſides the Parties under the Lord Grey of Groby, Lambert and Harriſon, which in all made up above thirty thouſand Men. The firſt Encounter was at Upton-Bridge, ſeven Miles from Worceſter, which the Royaliſts had broken upon News of their coming, only one Plank, through Negligence or Treachery, was left of it; over which Lambert paſs'd ſome Men, who perceiving the Scots took the Allarm, fled into a Church. Whereupon Major-General Maſſey gave a Camiſade to the Church; but in the mean Time Lambert having paſs'd over a Supply of Horſe, fell upon the Back of the Royaliſts, and overpowering them, put them to a Retreat, which was ſupported by Maſſey with great Gallantry, ſometimes marching off, and ſometimes fighting till he arriv'd at Worceſter; in which Service he had his Horſe ſlain under him, and receiv'd a Shot in his Arm, which confin'd him for a Time when his Activity and Induſtry was moſt wanted. After this the Enemies diſpos'd themſelves in a Manner moſt convenient to ſtreighten the Town. To which End, Fleetwood having left a ſufficient Force to ſecure the Paſs at Upton, approach'd nearer to the City; and Cromwell gave Orders for two Bridges to be made, the one of Boats over the Severn under Bun-Hill, a Mile below the City, and the other over the Teame, a leſſer River that falls into the Severn; and this for the better Conjunction of the Army.

The Battel of WORCESTER.

In this Condition was his Majeſty at Worceſter, having about ten Thouſand Scots, and two Thouſand Engliſh with him, and ſurrounded with an Army three Times more numerous, in an ill fortify'd City. Yet on the 30th of Auguſt his Forces made a moſt gallant Sally, and a great Impreſſion upon the Enemy; which might have had extraordinary Effects, had not the Deſign been diſcover'd by the Treachery of one Man. And now appear'd the Fatal Day, the Third of September, on which, the Year before, the Scots receiv'd ſuch a Defeat from Cromwell at Dunbar, as loſt them their Kingdom. In the Morning the King held a Council of War upon the Top of the College-Church Steeple, the better to view the Situation of the Enemy. From whence perceiving a kind of Skirmiſh at Powick-Bridge, he forthwith commanded all to their Arms, and march'd thither in Perſon, where he gave Order for the ſecuring of that Paſs, and oppoſing that of the Enemy over the Severn. Soon after his Return to the City, the Enemy furiouſly attack'd the Bridge, which was valiantly defended by a Brigade of Horſe and Foot under Montgomery and Keyth; till the former, being dangerouſly wounded, and his Ammunition ſpent, was forc'd to retire diſorderly into Worceſter, and the latter was taken Priſoner by the Enemy. This Place won, it was immediately reſolv'd to engage Cromwell Himſelf, who lay at Perry-Wood within a Mile of the City. The firſt Charge was given by the Royaliſts with ſo much Fury, that Cromwell's invincible Life-Guard was unable to ſuſtain the Shock, but was compell'd to give Ground in ſome Diſorder; and their Cannon alſo were for ſome Time in the Power of the Royaliſts. His Majeſty Himſelf led up the Scots Foot in this Battel, and with ſo much Courage and Gallantry, that Cromwell could not but applaud his intrepid Valour. The Fight continu'd for the Space of three or four Hours with great Fierceneſs, during which the King had his Horſe twice ſhot under him, and rally'd the Infantry Himſelf; till by the ſucceſſive Supplies of freſh Forces, they were overpower'd, and in a manner all loſt. The Cromwellians had a mighty Advantage, not only in being more numerous, but in fighting both with Horſe and Foot againſt the King's Foot only; for the Scotch Horſe under Leſley did no ways perform their Duty, being little better than Spectators in the Battel. The Remainder of the abandon'd Royal Army being at length put to Flight, were purſu'd into the City by the Victors; the King was one of the laſt in the Field, and could hardly be perſuaded to out-live that Day.

The King flies.

The City plunder'd.

Duke Hamilton's Death and Character.

Priſoners taken.

The King was forc'd to enter on Foot into the City, and in the Friars-Street he took a freſh Horſe; and perceiving many of the Foot throw down their Arms and decline Fighting, he rode up and down among them, ſometimes with his Hat in his Hand, intreating them to ſtand to their Arms, and ſell their Lives as dear as they could. But ſeeing his Encouragements ineffectual, he cry'd out, I had rather you ſhould ſhoot me, than keep me alive to ſee the ſad Effects of this fatal Day. Nevertheleſs the Earl of Cleveland, Sir James Hamilton, Colonel Carlis, and ſome Officers, rally'd what Force they could, and gave a Check to the Enemy as they were entering in at Sudbury-Gate, and valiantly diſputed that Street with them. Which Action prov'd of mighty Importance for ſecuring the King's Flight out at St. Martin's-Gate, who had otherwiſe been in Danger of being taken in the Town. As ſoon as Cromwell had made his Way through Sudbury-Gate, while ſome of his Forces were furiouſly killing and ſlaying all that were in the Streets, he haſtned with ſome Regiments to the Fort-Royal, commanded by Colonel Drummond, where he met with ſharp Oppoſition, and the Loſs of three Hundred Men; but at length reducing it by a ſuperior Force, he without Mercy put all the Defendents to the Sword, to the Number of fifteen Hundred Men. At the ſame Time there was ſeen the moſt diſmal Spectacle that could be beheld or conceiv'd; the Streets all ſtrew'd with Carcaſſes, and cover'd with Blood, the Houſes broken open and pillag'd, and the whole City fill'd with the Noiſe of the inſolent Victors, and piteous Cries of the wretched Inhabitants, of both Sexes, and all Ages; till having ſatiated their Cruelties and rapacious Deſires, or rather tired themſelves with barbarous Executions and unheard-of Inhumanities, they began to think of ſecuring their Priſoners. The Slain were reckon'd about four Thouſand, among whom was Duke Hamilton Himſelf, who being taken Priſoner, dy'd ſoon after of his Wounds, in the thirty fifth Year of his Age. This unfortunate great Man was one of unqueſtinable Courage, of an excellent Judgment, and a very accompliſh'd Perſon; and, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, was in all Reſpects preferable to his Brother, who had made ſo mighty a Figure, being a much wiſer, tho' perhaps a leſs cunning Man; for he did not affect Diſſimulation, which was the other's Maſter-Piece. He had indeed been driven into ſome unwarrantable Actions, but he made it evident he had not been led by his own Inclinations, and therefore particularly flew to all Opportunities of redeeming it: And at the Point of Death he expreſs'd a great Satisfaction, That he had the Honour to ſacrifice his Life in the King's Service, and ſo wipe out the Memory of his former Tranſgreſſions. The Priſoners taken in the Battel, and in the City, were about ſeven Thouſand; in which Number were the Earls of Carnwarth, Rothes and Kelly, the Lord Sinclare, Sir John Packington, Major-General Montgomery, Major-General Piſcotty, Mr. Richard Fanſhaw the King's Secretary, the General of the Ordnance, the Adjutant-General of the Foot, beſides ſeveral Colonels, and other inferior Officers, a hundred and fifty eight Colours, the King's Standard, Coach and Horſes, with other Things of great Value. In ſum, never was a greater Rout and Diſperſion, never was a more effectual Suppreſſion of the King's Friends, and never ſuch an Extinction of his Cauſe. Therefore Cromwell in his Letter to the Parliament, tells them That the Dimenſions of this Mercy were above his Thoughts; and immediately after intimates that it was a Crowning Mercy.

Captain Lindſey's Narrative concerning Cromwell.

But others accounted it an infernal Judgment; concerning which we have a ſtrange Story in the laſt Part of the Hiſtory of Independency, which the Author ſays he received from a Perſon of Quality, viz. 'It was believ'd, and that not without ſome good Cauſe, that Cromwell the ſame Morning that he defeated the King's Army at Worceſter, had Conference perſonally with the Devil, with whom he made a Contract, that to have his Will then, and in all Things elſe for ſeven Years from that Day, he ſhould, at the Expiration of the ſaid Years, have him at his Command, to do at his Pleaſure, both with his Soul and Body.' This is alſo related in other printed Books; but we have receiv'd a more full Account never yet publiſh'd, which is here inſerted as a Thing more wonderful than probable, and therefore more for the Diverſion than Satiſfaction of the Reader. It is a Relation or Narrative of a valiant Officer call'd Lindſey, an intimate Friend of Cromwell's, the firſt Captain of his Regiment, and therefore commonly called Colonel Lindſey; which is to this Effect. 'On the 3d of September in the Morning, Cromwell took this Officer to a Wood Side not far from the Army, and bid him alight, and follow him into that Wood, and to take particular Notice of what he ſaw and heard. After they had both alighted, and ſecur'd their Horſes, and walk'd ſome ſmall Way into the Wood, Lindſey began to turn pale, and to be ſeiz'd with Horror from ſome unknown Cauſe: Upon which Cromwell ask'd him, How he did, or how he felt himſelf. He anſwer'd, That he was in ſuch a Trembling and Conſternation, that he never felt the like in all the Conflicts and Battels he had been engag'd in; but whether it proceeded from the Gloomineſs of the Place, or the Temperament of his Body, he knew not. How now, ſaid Cromwell, what, troubled with Vapours? come forwards, Man! They had not gone above twenty Yards, before Lindſey on a ſudden ſtood ſtill, and cry'd out, By all that's good, he was ſeiz'd with ſuch unaccountable Terror and Aſtoniſhment, that it was impoſſible for him to ſtir one Step further. Upon which Cromwell call'd him Faint-hearted Fool, and bid him ſtand there and obſerve, or be Witneſs; and then advancing to ſome Diſtance from him, he met with a grave elderly Man with a Roll of Parchment in his Hand, who deliver'd it to Cromwell, who eagerly perus'd it. Lindſey, a little recover'd from his Fear, heard ſeveral loud Words between them; particularly Cromwell ſaid, This is but for ſeven Years; I was to have had it for one and Twenty, and it muſt and ſhall be ſo. The other told him poſitively, it could not be for above ſeven; upon which Cromwell cry'd with great Fierceneſs It ſhould however be for fourteen Years. But the other peremptorily declar'd It could not poſſibly be for any longer Time; and if he would not take it ſo, there were Others who would accept of it. Upon which Cromwell at laſt took the Parchment, and returning to Lindſey with great Joy in his Countenance, he cry'd, Now, Lindſey, the Battel is our own! I long to be engag'd. Returning out of the Wood, they rode to the Army, Cromwell with a Reſolution to engage as ſoon as poſſible, and the other with a Deſign of leaving the Army as ſoon. After the firſt Charge Lindſey deſerted his Poſt, and rode away with all poſſible Speed, Day and Night, till he came into the County of Norfolk, to the Houſe of an intimate Friend, one Mr. Thorowgood, Miniſter of the Pariſh of Grimſtone. Cromwell, as ſoon as he miſs'd him, ſent all Ways after him, with a Promiſe of a great Reward to any that ſhould bring him alive or dead.' Thus far the Narrative of Lindſey Himſelf; but ſomething further is to be remember'd, to compleat and confirm the Story.

When Mr. Thorowgood ſaw his Friend Lindſey come into his Yard, his Horſe and Himſelf juſt tired, in a ſort of a Maze, ſaid, How now, Colonel! we hear there is like to be a Battel ſhortly; what, fled from your Colours? A Battel! ſaid the other, yes there has been a Battel, and I am ſure the King is beaten; but if ever I ſtrike a Stroak for Cromwell again, may I periſh eternally: For I am ſure he has made a League with the Devil, and the Devil will have him in due Time. Then deſiring his Protection from Cromwell's Inquiſitors, he went in and related to him the whole Story, and all the Circumſtances, concluding with theſe remarkable Words, That Cromwell would certainly dye that Day ſeven Years that the Battel was fought. The Strangeneſs of the Relation caus'd Mr. Thorowgood to order his Son John, then about twelve Years of Age, to write it in full Length in his Common-Place Book, and to take it from Lindſey's own Mouth. This Common-Place Book, and likewiſe the ſame Story written in other Books, I am aſſured is ſtill preſerv'd in the Family of the Thorowgoods. But how far Lindſey is to be believ'd, and how far the Story is to be accounted incredible, is left to the Reader's Faith and Judgment, and not to any Determination of our own.

Great Care to ſeize the King.

VII. 1. This laſt Overthrow was juſtly look'd upon as the Deciſion of the grand Cauſe between the King and the Common-Wealth: But it was the Divine Pleaſure that in this mighty Loſs, the Light and Fortune of England ſhould be preſerv'd, whoſe Blood was the only Thing wanting to cement the Foundations of the new Republick. Therefore they us'd all poſſible Methods and Induſtry to ſeize the Perſon of the King; they offer'd a thouſand Pounds to any that would diſcover him, and made it Treaſon and Death without Mercy for any Perſon to conceal Him. The King's Friends were in infinite Perplexity, and were confounded with the various Reports firſt rais'd concerning Him, of his being found among the Dead, of his being taken Priſoner; and all thoſe Imaginations that naturally attend ſuch unfortunate Events. Many who had made their Eſcapes, daily arriv'd in France, Flanders and Holland, but knew no more what was become of the King, than thoſe who had not been in England. The only Comfort that any of them brought, was, That he was among thoſe that fled, and ſome of them had ſeen him that Evening after the Battel ſeveral Miles out of Worceſter. Theſe unſteady Degrees of Hope and Fear tormented them very long; ſometimes they heard he was at the Hague with his Siſter, which was occaſion'd by the Arrival of the Duke of Buckingham in Holland; and it was thought good Policy to publiſh that the King himſelf was landed, that the Search after him in England might be diſcontinued. But it was quickly known that he was not there, nor in any Place on that Side the Sea. And this Anxiety of Mind diſquieted the Hearts of great Numbers of good People for near two Months; when at laſt it was fully known that his Majeſty was ſafely arriv'd in France.

The Hiſtory of the KING's ESCAPE.

The Manner and Particulars of the King's Eſcape are ſo wonderful, and attended with ſuch viſible Marks of the immediate Hand of Heaven, that no Circumſtances, or Names, how mean ſoever, ought to be omitted; tho' in the Relation we ſhall be oblig'd ſometimes to deſcend from the Rules of Hiſtory to the Liberties of Biography. The King having march'd out at St. Martin's-Gate Worceſter, about ſix a Clock in the Evening, with ſeveral of the Nobility, and about fifty Horſe, and finding all loſt, the chief Care among them was to preſerve his Majeſty's Perſon from the Hands of his implacable Enemies. To which purpoſe it was reſolv'd to march for Scotland; and one Walker, formerly Scout-Maſter to Colonel Sands, undertook to be his Guide; but being come almoſt as far as Kidderminſter, and Day-light quite gone, the Guide was at a Loſs which Way to go. Upon which the King making a Stand, and being almoſt ſpent with his extraordinary Action in the Field, and the Toilſomneſs of his Flight, adviſ'd with ſome Lords whither he might march, only to take ſome few Hours Reſt. The Earl of Derby told his Majeſty, that in his late Flight to Worceſter after his Defeat, he had met with a very faithful Perſon, one Penderel, and a great Convenience of Concealment at a Place call'd Boſcobel-Houſe. This is ſeated in Shropſhire, but upon the Confines of Staffordſhire, between Tongue-Caſtle and Brewood: It is a very obſcure Habitation, tho' a fair Building, ſtanding in a beautiful Grove, which accidentally obtain'd the Italian Name of Boſco bello, or Fair Wood. It had now no Inhabitant but William Penderel the Houſe-keeper and his Wife; and to this Place his Majeſty reſolved to go, being accompany'd by the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Derby and Lauderdale, the Lords Talbot and Wilmot, and ſeveral Officers, with Mr. Giffard, who undertook to conduct them by the Aſſiſtance of Francis Yates his Servant, and one very expert in the ways of that Country. Lieutenant-General Leſley with his Scotch Horſe, in the Cloſe of the Evening, took the direct Way Northwards by Newport.

He arrives at White-Ladys.

Tho' Boſcobel was the Place deſign'd for the King's Retreat, yet that the Company might not know ſo much, his Majeſty was conducted by Mr. Giffard to a Houſe within half a Mile of it, call'd White-Ladys, which Name it retain'd ever ſince it was a Monaſtery of Ciſtertian Nuns, whoſe Habit was of that Colour. Here they arriv'd about three a Clock in the Morning, having rid twenty ſix Miles from Worceſter; and having knockt up George Penderel the Servant, Brother to him of Boſcobel, they enter'd the Houſe, where a Conſultation was immediately held, how to eſcape the Fury of the preſent Conquerors: The Reſult of which was, 'That all poſſible Care ſhou'd be taken for 'his Majeſty's Concealment in that Place, till he cou'd 'have a ſafe Opportunity to paſs over into France; that his 'Retinue, both of Lords and Gentlemen, ſhou'd ſhift for 'themſelves ſome other Way.' In the mean Time William Penderel of Boſcobel Houſe was ſent for, and a Brother of his nam'd Richard Penderel, who liv'd very near at Hobbal-Grange, and likewiſe Humphrey Penderel, another Brother, who was the Miller to White-Ladys. Richard came firſt, who was immediately ſent back to bring a Suit of his Cloaths for the King, and being return'd, he and William were both carry'd into the inner Parlour, where the Earl of Derby acquainting them with the Diſaſter, and ſhewing them the King, he deſir'd them for God's Sake, their Loyalty, and all that was Good, to find out ſome Place for his Majeſty's Security. At the ſame Time, to diſguiſe his Majeſty's Perſon, he ſtrip'd Himſelf of all his Ornaments, his Buffe-Coat, fine Breeches, his George and Garter; and blacking his Hands and Face with the Soot of the Chimney, he put on a noggen coarſe Shirt, Richard Penderel's Leathern Doublet, and old green Breeches. And now it was neceſſary for his loyal Followers to leave him, which they did with all the Marks of Sorrow, being more ſenſible of his Majeſty's hard Fate, than ſolicitous for their own Deſtiny; only the Lord Wilmot ſtay'd, and was convey'd by John Penderel, a fifth Brother, to Mr. Whitegrave's Houſe at Moſely. It was high Time for their Departure, for within half an Hour after, ſome of Colonel Aſhenhurſt's Troop, who quarter'd at Cotſal, three Miles diſtant, came to the Houſe. But a little before that, Richard Penderel had convey'd the King out of a private Door into a Wood belonging to Boſcobel-Houſe, call'd Spring Coppice, in the Borders of which, his three Brothers, William, Humphrey and George, carefully ſcouted about to bring Intelligence.

The Death and Character of the Earl of Derby.

The Lords and their Company, being now about forty Horſe, of which Company the King's Pad-Nag was one, took the North Road to Newport, in Hopes to have overtaken or met General Leſley, who was gone that Way with the main Body of the Scotch Horſe. But they had not travell'd far, before a Party of the Parliamentarians, who were in Purſuit of the Lord Levingſton, Captain of the King's Life-Guard, overtook them. The Lords bravely fac'd about and ſtopt their Career, ſome of the Purſuers being ſlain, and the reſt put to Flight. But they had not long Satisfaction in this good Succeſs; for a little beyond Newport, ſome of Colonel Lilburn's Men met them on the Front, and another Party of Parliamentarians from Worceſter fell in upon their Rear; ſo that themſelves and Horſes being extreamly tired with the former Day's Service, and the tedious Night-march with ſcarce any Refreſhment, the noble Earl of Derby, and the Earl of Lauderdale, with Mr. Giffard their Guide, and ſome others, were taken Priſoners. The Earl of Derby was carry'd to Cheſter, and there try'd by a Junto of Officers, and ſentenc'd to be beheaded at his own Town of Bolton in Lancaſhire, with all the Circumſtances of Rudeneſs and Barbarity. He was a Perſon of unqueſtionable Loyalty, great Honour, and clear Courage; and all his Defects and Misfortunes proceeded from his having liv'd ſo little with his Equals, that he knew not how to treat his Inferiors; which was the Source of all the Ill that befell him, having by that drawn ſuch Prejudice againſt him from Perſons of inferior Quality, that they implacably purſu'd him to Death. The Earl of Lauderdale was carry'd to Windſor Caſtle, and there kept Priſoner for many Years. The Duke of Buckingham, the Lords Levingſton and Talbot, with ſome others, made their Eſcapes, and after many Difficulties, got beyond the Sea. And Leſley himſelf was not got far beyond Newport, when he was beſet by his Enemies, and all his Men either diſpers'd, or taken Priſoners; and particularly the Earl of Cleveland, who had overtaken him after the Battle, Kenmore, the Lord Wentworth, and the two great Soldiers Middleton and Maſſey. Moſt of the diſpers'd Straglers were, with great Cruelty, by the Country People knocked on the Head, wherever they were found, being every where known and diſcover'd by the Tone of their Language.

The King in Spring-Coppice.

And Hobbal Grange.

2. To return to the King, who having been convey'd out of White-Ladys, continu'd all the fourth of September in the Wood call'd Spring-Coppice, having a Wood-Bill in his Hand, and accompany'd only by Richard Penderel, the three other Brothers moving about at proper Diſtances. Immediately after his Departure, the Monaſtery was ſtrictly ſearch'd by Aſhenhurſt's Soldiers, who continu'd ſome Time there; but made no Enquiry abroad out of the Houſe, by Reaſon of the ſevere Rains that Day; inſomuch that the Trees afforded not ſufficient Shelter to keep his Majeſty from the Inconvenience of the Wet; nor was there any Thing to reſt Himſelf on, till Richard ſtept to a Neighbour's Houſe for a Blanket, which ſerv'd for both Uſes. He alſo caus'd the Wife of Francis Yates, before-mentioned, who was Siſter to his own Wife, to provide ſomething for his Majeſty to eat, and bring it into the Wood. The Fare was ſuch as the Time and Place afforded; a meſs of Milk, with ſome Eggs and Butter. His Majeſty being ſomewhat ſurpris'd at the Preſence of the Woman that brought his Dinner, ſaid to her, Good Woman, can you be faithful to a diſtreſſed Cavalier? To which ſhe anſwer'd very heartily, Yes, Sir, I will rather dye than diſcover you; which Words gave his Majeſty great Satisfaction. When Night was come, the King went with theſe four faithful Friends to Richard's Houſe at Hobbal-Grange, where their old Mother was tranſported to ſee his Majeſty in Safety, and that her Sons had been happy Inſtruments of it. She heartily treated him with a cleanly Fricaſee of Bacon and Eggs; and farther Care was forthwith taken to conceal him, and he took upon him the Name of William Jones, and pretended to be a Wood-Cutter, newly come thither to Work; and this likewiſe to prevent being ſuſpected by the reſt of that little Family.

Here he prepared for a new Journey; for the King among other Things had ask'd, if he knew any faithful Friend living upon the Severne, who might provide Him a ſecret Place for a ſhort Time, till he cou'd find an Opportunity of paſſing over into Wales; for in that Country he wanted no Friends, by whoſe Means he might tranſport himſelf, or lye more ſecurely among the Rocks and Mountains. Being therefore inform'd of one Mr. Woolf, a Papiſt of Richard's Acquaintance, living at Madeley, five Miles from White-Ladys, and one from the Severne, at nine a Clock at Night He and Richard ſet out on Foot together. But they had not gone two Miles, when they had a Water-Mill to paſs by, where they muſt croſs the River on a wooden Bridge: The Gate which they open'd making a Noiſe, the Miller came out, and in a threatning Tone, ask'd who they were! and bid them Stand! Penderel thinking the Miller had purſu'd him, haſtily quitted the Bridge, and led his Majeſty through the Water at another Place, which much contributed to the chafing and galling his Feet, who, as he afterwards pleaſantly obſerv'd, was here in ſome Danger of loſing his Guide, but the Ruſtling of Richard's Calve's Skin Breeches was the beſt Direction he had to follow him in that dark Night. At Midnight they got to Mr. Woolf's Houſe, and were by him heartily entertain'd, and kept in the Houſe for a good Part of the Night; but Mr. Woolf found it neceſſary to lodge them in a Barn all the next Day, by reaſon of the frequent repairing of Soldiers to his Houſe. In the mean Time they ſent to be inform'd of an Opportunity of paſſing the Severne, and receiv'd an Account, 'That not only Bridges were guarded by Sol-'diers, but alſo the Ferry-Boats were watcht, ſo that it 'wou'd be very difficult and unſafe to paſs the River.' When it was Night, he was receiv'd again into the Houſe, where the good Gentlewoman more effectually ſtain'd his Hands and Face with a Decoction of Walnut-Tree Leaves; and having taken his Leave he return'd back the ſame Way on Foot to Boſcobel, there to ſtay for a more Commodious Opportunity of Travelling.

He returns to Boſcobel, and aſcends the ROYAL OAK.

Being come back long before Day, the King tarry'd in the Wood, till Richard went to ſee if any Soldiers were in Boſcobel-Houſe; where he found the brave Colonel Carlis, who after he had been ſo ſerviceable in the King's Retreat from Worceſter, had with great Difficulty eſcap'd Himſelf into his own Neighbourhood, and for ſome Time abſconding in Boſcobel-Wood, was come that Morning to the Houſe, to get ſome Relief of William Penderel his old Acquaintance. By this means his Majeſty and the Colonel met together in the Wood; where after the moſt joyful Congratulation paſs'd, they return'd to the Houſe, and were entain'd with Ruſtick Fare, as Bread and Cheeſe and a Poſſet, and particular Care was taken to clean and eaſe his Majeſty's Feet, which were miſerably heated and gall'd with Travel. Being thus refreſh'd, it was adviſ'd That his Majeſty ſhou'd go back into the Wood, as ſafer than the Houſe, where the Colonel made choice of a large and thick leafed Oak, into which William and Richard help'd them both up, and brought them ſuch Proviſion as they cou'd get, with a Cuſhion for his Majeſty to reſt on. The King having taken little or no Reſt the preceding Nights, the Colonel humbly deſir'd his Majeſty to ſeat himſelf as eaſily as he cou'd in the Tree, and reſt his Head on his Lap, who was careful that he did not fall; In this Oak they continu'd all that Day, being Saturday, and in that Poſture ſlumber'd away ſome Part of the Time, and bore all theſe Hardſhips and Afflictions with incomparable Patience. This in Time came to be call'd The ROYAL OAK; out of which they ſecurely ſaw many who came purpoſely to ſearch for his Majeſty, and heard all their Diſcourſe, how they wou'd uſe the King Himſelf, if they cou'd take him. At Night they return'd to the Houſe, where William Penderel ſhewed the King a ſecret Place, call'd Prieſt's-Hole, which his Majeſty lik'd ſo well, that he reſolv'd to go no more to the Royal-Oak, which afforded leſs Conveniency. Here he was entertain'd with an Account from Humphrey Penderel, who having been that Day at Shefnal, to pay Taxes, was ſeverely examin'd by a Parliamentarian Colonel, who had heard of the King's being at White-Ladys, and threatned him with the Penalty of concealing the King's Perſon, which was Death without Mercy, and inform'd him of the Thouſand Pounds Reward for the Diſcovery of him. But neither Fear of Puniſhment, nor hope of Reward, was able to tempt this honeſt Miller into Diſloyalty; but pleading Ignorance, he was quietly diſmiſs'd. The next Day being Sunday, the King reſted quietly, and ſpent ſome Part of the Day in Reading, in a handſom retir'd Arbor in the Garden, the loyal Brethren in the mean Time ſcouting abroad for Intelligence. And whether it was through a particular Providence, or becauſe it was known that only ſome Servants kept Boſcobel-Houſe, the ſame was never ſearched all the Time of his Majeſty's Abode there; but White-Ladys, upon the Report of the King's having been there, was often ſearched with the utmoſt Strictneſs.

He removes to Moſely.

3. In the mean Time John Penderel had happily convey'd the Lord Wilmot to the Care of Mr. Whitegrave and Mr. Huddleſton, both Roman Catholicks, the latter being a Prieſt and Tutor to Mr. Whitegrave's three Sons. Theſe having in the Night-time ſent his Horſe to Colonel Lane's, their intimate Acquaintance, who had formerly ſerv'd the King, hoſpitably entertain'd that Lord at Moſely; who in a ſhort time chang'd his Lodgings, and remov'd to Bently, the Houſe of Colonel Lane. The King hearing of Wilmot's Safety, was deſirous to be with him, and ſent to inform him where he was; who thereupon appointed to meet his Majeſty that Night in a Field near Mr. Whitegrave's Houſe, which lay in the mid-way, five Miles from Boſcobel, and five from Bently. The King being diſabled by his former Travel on Foot, was forc'd to make Uſe of Humphrey Penderel's Mill-Horſe for this Journey, leaving behind him his dear Friend Colonel Carlis, who heartily pray'd for his Majeſty's Preſervation. Upon the Way the King was attended by all the five loyal Brothers, William, Richard, Humphrey, George and John, and Francis Yates, each of them being arm'd with a good Bill or Pike-ſtaff, and ſome with Piſtols, intending to have us'd the ſame, in Caſe they had met with a Number not too great to engage. Two of them march'd before, and one on each Side of the King's Horſe; the other two at a Diſtance behind; and they took all the By-Ways they cou'd. His Majeſty being arrived at the appointed Place, met with Mr. Huddleſton there, ready to conduct him into Mr. Whitegrave's Houſe. But before he enter'd, he gave the honeſt Brothers his Hand to kiſs, and thanking them for their Fidelity, promis'd to reward it, if it pleas'd God, and ſo diſmiſs'd them with the Horſe.

The Lord Wilmot teſtify'd the moſt extream Joy at the Sight of his Majeſty, who alſo heartily embrac'd him; and after ſome Refreſhment given to the King, and civil Expreſſions which he was pleas'd to uſe to Mr. Whitegrave and Mr. Huddleſton, he was conducted to the ſecret Place deſign'd for his Lodgings, which was more ſecure than commodious for Reſt. At his going, the King chearfully ſaid, I am now ready for another March; and if I were once more plac'd at the Head of eight or ten thouſand Men, good and unanimous, I ſhou'd not doubt to drive theſe Rogues out of my Kingdom. The Lord Wilmot had a private Conſultation with the two Gentlemen, concerning the watching of all Avenues; and moſt generouſly ſaid to them, If it ſhou'd ſo fall out, that the Rebels ſhould ſuſpect your harbouring of any of the King's Party, and ſhou'd therefore put you to any Torture for Confeſſion, be ſure you diſcover me firſt; which may perhaps ſtop their further Search, and preſerve the King. The very next Day Notice was given to Mr. Whitegrave, that ſome Soldiers were in the Neighbourhood, with Intention to apprehend him for having been with the King at Worceſter. This was a ſurpriſing Allarm: But the Gentleman immediately ſecur'd the Royal Gueſt, and the Lord Wilmot in the Secret Place; and then ſetting open all the Chamber Doors, went boldly down to the Soldiers, convincing them by the Teſtimony of his Neighbours, that he had not been from his own Houſe in the laſt Fortnight. With which the Soldiers being ſatisfy'd, they never went up the Stairs; and ſo this imminent Danger was avoided. At Night the Lord Wilmot repair'd to Colonel Lane's at Bentley, in order to remove his Majeſty thither; and during his Abſence the King ſpent the next Day in Converſation with the two Gentlemen of the Houſe, concerning the News and the Diſtractions of the Kingdom; in diſcourſing of which the King intimated, That his Counſels had been by ſome treacherous Inſtruments often diſcover'd to the Rebels, before they were put in Execution by his Loyal Subjects. At Midnight Colonel Lane came from Bentley to attend his Majeſty thither; whereupon ſaluting Mrs. Whitegrave, he took Leave of her, and gave her Thanks for her Entertainment: He expreſs'd himſelf alſo with much Gratitude to her Husband and Mr. Huddleſton, adviſing them to be very careful of avoiding the Dangers of a Diſcovery; and therefore directed them to a Merchant in London, to receive Monies for their Tranſportation beyond Sea, if they thought fit: And laſtly promis'd them to remember both their Civility and Fidelity, whenever it ſhou'd pleaſe God to reſtore him to his Dominions.

From thence to Bentley.

He rides before Mrs. Lane.

The King arriv'd ſafely at Bentley on Tueſday Night the 9th of September, where Colonel Lane, and the good old Gentleman his Father, form'd a Scheme to convey his Majeſty as far as Briſtol, near a hundred Miles diſtant, where he had many Friends, and the greateſt Hopes of a Paſſage. It hapned that a few Days before, Mrs. Jane Lane, Siſter to the Colonel, had procured from ſome Parliament Commander a Paſs for her ſelf, a Gentleman and his Wife, with one Servant, mounted upon two Horſes, that they might without Moleſtation travel to the Houſe of one Mr. Norton near Briſtol, whoſe Wife was a near Relation to this Lady, and ready to lye in. It was therefore agreed, that the King ſhou'd perſonate the Servant, and ride before the Colonel's Siſter; in order to which he chang'd his Leather Doublet and green Breeches, for a new grey Cloth Suit, as near as cou'd be contriv'd like the Holy-Day Suit of a Farmer's Son; and likewiſe forſook his former Name of Will. Jones, for that of Will. Jackſon. Accordingly he was mounted before the Lady upon a good double Gelding, and ſet out on Wedneſday Morning, accompany'd by her Couſin Mr. Laſſels and his Wife, who follow'd upon another Horſe at a little Diſtance: But the Lord

Lord Wilmot rod before with a Hawk upon his Fiſt, and Spaniels, as a Stranger who had accidentally met them on the Road; reſolving as ſoon as he came near Briſtol, to ſtrike off to the Houſe of his Friend Sir John Winter, there to expect the Iſſue of Things.

The firſt Accident of Note that happen'd was at Bromſgrove, where the King's Horſe loſing a Shoe, his Majeſty was to carry him to a Smith to be ſhod. The King asking him What News he heard? Nothing, anſwer'd he, but that Cromwell had routed the Scots, and that tho' all the reſt were kill'd or taken, yet the King had made his Eſcape. Perhaps, reply'd the King, he is got by private Ways into Scotland. No, ſaid the Smith, that is not probable; he rather lies ſomewhere hid in England, and I wiſh I knew where he was, for I might get a thouſand Pounds by taking him. After the Horſe was ſhod, the King departed, and upon the Road told his Miſtreſs, what Diſcourſe he had held with the Smith. Coming near Stratford, they deſign'd to ford the River Avon about a Mile below the Town. But drawing nearer, they perceiv'd Soldiers Horſes feeding in the Meadows on the other ſide, and the Troopers lying upon the Ground. The King was for paſſing forwards with Confidence; but Laſſels thought it ſafer to turn aſide to the next Town; but while they rode along the Streets, they met with the ſame Soldiers they had avoided; yet without any Moleſtation, they open'd to the Right and Left, and ſo let them paſs. The firſt Night Mrs. Lane and her Company took up their Quarters at Mr. Tomb's of Longmarſton, with whom ſhe was well acquainted: Here the King being in the Kitchin, in purſuance of his Diſguiſe, and the Cook Maid being buſie in providing for her Maſter's Friends, ſhe deſir'd William to wind up the Jack; which he obediently attempted, but awkwardly miſs'd of the Way: This caus'd the Maid in a Paſſion to ask, What Country-Man are you, that you know not how to wind up a Jack? The other anſwer'd, I am a poor Tenant's Son of Colonel Lane in Staffordſhire; we ſeldom have Roaſt-Meat, but when we have, we don't uſe a Jack. The next Night they ſafely arriv'd at the Crown in Cirenceſter, where the King pretending to have an Ague, was preſently brought to his Chamber, where a good Bed, and good Meat was provided for him. The third Night, they rode through Briſtol, and ſo got to Mr. Norton's Houſe at Leigh, three Miles from that City, on the 12th of September; which was the deſired End of this perillous Journey; in all which Mrs. Lane carry'd her ſelf not only with the utmoſt Fidelity and Tenderneſs, but alſo with admirable Prudence and Diſcretion.

And arrives at Leigh, by Briſtol.

4. At this Place the King ſtaid four Days, where particular Care was taken of him by Mrs. Lane, who caus'd a Bed to be made in a private Chamber for his Majeſty, who ſhe ſaid was the Son of one of her Father's Tenants, and was ſick of an Ague, getting Dr. Gorges, a Divine and a Phyſician, to give him ſomething for his Diſtemper. As the Doctor came out of his Chamber in the Morning, he ask'd him What he heard of the King and the Battel? But ſeeing he a little heſitated, I am afraid, ſaid he, you are a Round-Head; but I will try what Metal you are made of; and taking him into the Buttery, he drank the King's Health to him in a Glaſs of Wine, which the King pledging, aſſur'd him, He was never a Man of that Stamp. The next Morning, the King eating ſomething in the Buttery, he there fell into Diſcourſe with a bragging Fellow, who boaſted of his Actions at Worceſter Fight: Upon which his Majeſty ſaid to him, Have you ever ſeen the King? Twenty Times, anſwer'd he; What kind of Man is he then? Then looking more ſteady on the King, He is, ſaid he, four Fingers Breadth taller than you. Afterwards, moving his Hat to the Miſtreſs of the Houſe as ſhe paſs'd through the Parlour, the Butler viewing him more attentively, and obſerving his Countenance, knew him to be the King; and finding a private Occaſion, fell upon his Knees, and with Tears of Joy acknowledg'd his Majeſty. The King in a great Surpriſe enjoin'd him Silence, which he exactly obſerv'd. This Man's Name was John Pope, who five Years before had been a Soldier under the King in the Weſt, when he was Prince of Wales; and from this Time he perform'd a great many good Offices to his Majeſty with extraordinary Fidelity. And firſt he was ſent to Briſtol to find out a Ship; but cou'd not find any there, that within a Month was to ſail either to France or Spain. While he diſcours'd with the King of ſeveral that had ſerv'd his Majeſty, he fix'd upon Colonel Francis Windham, of Trent, whom he thought fit to try in this preſent Emergency.

The Lord Wilmot coming, according to Agreement, to Mr. Norton's Houſe, was by Pope introduc'd to the King at Night; and after they had conſulted together, the Lord was ſent to Trent, a Place near the Borders of Dorſetſhire, to enquire if Colonel Windham cou'd receive and conceal the King in his Houſe, till he cou'd find an Opportunity of paſſing over the Sea. The loyal Colonel return'd Anſwer, That he thought himſelf extreamly happy to be reckon'd worthy of that Honour; and was ready not only to venture his Life, Family and Eſtate, but even to ſacrifice all to his Majeſty's Service: But withal begg'd Leave to impart the Secret, not only to his Mother and Wife, but alſo to four of his Servants, of whoſe Fidelity both to his Majeſty and himſelf, he was fully aſſur'd. The Lord Wilmot conſented, and aſſuring him that the King would be there three Days after, he return'd to Leigh. But the Night before, Mr. Norton's Wife was brought to Bed, after a hard and dangerous Labour, and was not decently to be left by her neareſt Relation Mrs. Lane, in that Condition. Therefore that ſhe might have a civil Pretext of departing, a Letter was pretended to have been juſt then brought from her aged Father, acquainting her, 'That ſince her Departure he had 'been dangerouſly ill, and that he ſtood in need of her pre'ſent Aſſiſtance; and therefore bid her, if ſhe tender'd her 'Father's Life, to haſten home.' The Letter being produc'd, and the Rumour ſpread over the Family, Mrs. Lane and Mr. Laſſels took their Leaves, leaving Mrs. Laſſels with the ſick Lady; and ſo, with the Royal Servant, departed for Trent. Rogers, who had privately conducted the Lord Wilmot from Sir John Winter's Houſe to Leigh, was their Guide; and they lodg'd the firſt Night at Caſtle-Cary, ſix Miles from Trent. The appointed Hour of their coming approaching, Colonel Windham and his Lady, under the Pretence of a Walk, went out to meet them. At the firſt Sight of the Colonel the King familiarly call'd, Frank, honeſt Frank, how doſt thou do? The Colonel, without Ceremony, ſent the King privately into the Houſe, by one whom he had choſen for that Purpoſe. Mrs. Lane and Mr. Laſſels in the mean Time were publickly receiv'd as Relations, who coming from a Place far diſtant, were to depart the next Day, which was the 18th of September, when they humbly took their Leaves of his Majeſty, who ſaluted and embrac'd them with all the Marks of Gratitude and Friendly Affection.

1651. Car. 3.

From thence he removes to Trent.

5. At Trent the King had, with ſome Intermiſſion, a ſecure and long Stay of nineteen Days, being moſtly lodg'd in the Chamber of the good old Lady Windham, who declar'd to his Majeſty, She accounted it her higheſt Honour, That ſhe had three Sons and one Grand-Child ſlain in the Defence of his Father, and that ſhe in her old Age ſhou'd be inſtrumental in the Preſervation of himſelf. Here conſulting with the Lord Wilmot, and Colonel Windham, the latter entertain'd and encourag'd his Majeſty with a remarkable Paſſage of Sir Thomas Windham his Father, 'Who in the 'Year 1636, a little before his Death, call'd to him his 'five Sons, and diſcourſing to them the Miſeries and Ca'lamities of former Reigns, and the Peace and Proſperity 'of this Kingdom under its three laſt glorious Monarchs; 'he ſaid, he fear'd the beautiful Garment of Peace wou'd 'ſhortly be torn in Pieces, through the Neglect of the Magi'ſtrates, the general Corruption of Manners, and the Pre'valence of a Puritanical Faction, which, if not prevented, 'wou'd undermine the Pillars of Government. My Sons, 'continu'd he, we have hitherto ſeen ſerene and quiet Times; 'but now prepare your ſelves for Clouds and Storms. I com'mand you to honour and obey our Gracious Sovereign, and 'in all Times to adhere to the Crown; I charge you never to 'forſake the Crown, THOUGH IT SHOU'D HANG 'UPON A BUSH.' The Colonel told the King, That theſe laſt Words had made ſo deep an Impreſſion in all their Breaſts, that the numerous Afflictions of theſe ſad Times cou'd never efface their indelible Characters. After which he propos'd to conſult with Sir John Strangeways, a loyal Gentleman four Miles diſtant, where meeting privately with the Colonel his Son, he brought a Preſent back to his Majeſty of a hundred Pounds in Gold, which was thankfully receiv'd. Shortly after it happened, that the Country People fell to making of Bonfires, and ringing of Bells, with more than uſual Solemnity; and the King enquiring into the Cauſe of this great Rejoicing, was told, That it was for the joyful News of the King's Death, which was then confidently reported; at which the King only ſaid, Alas poor People!

Where he continues ſeveral Days.

While they conſulted, and projected for a Paſſage over the Sea, Colonel Windham bethought himſelf of one Elleſden a Merchant, formerly a Captain under the late King, who ſince that drove a conſiderable Trade at Lyme, that poſſibly might procure a Veſſel, ſince he had before carry'd over Sir John Berkley in the like Diſtreſs. Therefore the Colonel was diſpatch'd to him to learn, 'Whether he cou'd pro'cure a ſafe Paſſage for the Lord Wilmot, and another Ca'valier, who had made their Eſcape from Worceſter Fight.' He readily harken'd to it, and immediately went to Charmouth, a little Place near Lyme; where having ſent for one Limbry a Maſter of a Veſſel, he ask'd him under Promiſe of Secrecy, 'If he durſt venture to carry the Lord 'Wilmot and his Servant ſafely over to France.' Limbry undertook it, and bargain'd with the Colonel, under the Name of Captain Norris, for threeſcore Pounds, which

Elleſden

He tries to get a Paſſage from Charmouth,

Elleſden oblig'd himſelf under Hand and Seal to pay, after he had carry'd the Paſſengers over to France. The 22d of September, at Night, was the preciſe Time appointed for putting them on Board. That there might be no Miſcarriage in the Proſecution, and that they might not want a Pretext of ſtaying in Lodgings, till all Things were ready for their Paſſage, Henry Peters, Servant to the Colonel, was before employ'd to pave the Way. He apply'd himſelf to an Hoſteſs at Charmouth; and, among other Diſcourſes, told her, 'That he was a Servant to a worthy 'Nobleman, who was deeply in Love with a young Lady, without Father or Mother, who was as much in 'Love with Him; but her Guardian unjuſtly oppoſing the 'Marriage, he reſolv'd to ſteal her away by Night.' He therefore ask'd her, 'If ſhe would for ſome Hours entertain them in her Houſe;' and at the ſame Time gave her a ſmall Gratuity as a Pledge of a greater deſign'd, and drank a Glaſs of Wine with her. The Woman mollify'd by the Preſent, and mov'd with Compaſſion for the Lady, promis'd to ſerve them to the beſt of her Power.

This being fix'd, it was thought proper for the King to ride before ſome Woman, and accordingly Mrs. Julian Coningsby, Neice to the Lady Windham, had the Honour to ride behind his Majeſty, who with the Lord Wilmot, Colonel Windham, and Peters the Servant, at convenient Diſtances, were met by Captain Elleſden, who carry'd them into a private Houſe, whither he went under Pretence of viewing a little Farm. Here the King diſcover'd himſelf to him, giving him a ſmall Preſent, as an Earneſt of future Gratitude; and while he repair'd to Lyme to give Notice to the Maſter of the Veſſel, to be ready to put to Sea at the appointed Time, the King with the reſt went to their Lodgings at Charmouth. Peters was appointed to ſtay for the coming of the Long-Boat; but having waited till almoſt Day, he return'd without any News or Knowledge of a Boat. This put them all into Confuſion, and made them think of taking other Meaſures; but there was no ſafe Place here to continue, and the King was reſolv'd not to loſe any more Time. Therefore after a ſhort Conſultation, it was determin'd that the King with Mrs. Coningsby, accompany'd by the Colonel, ſhould advance towards Bridport, there to expect the Lord Wilmot and Peters at an appointed Inn; Peters being to go to Lyme to learn from Captain Elleſden the Reaſon of the Diſappointment; and Wilmot ſtaying behind in the Inn, upon Pretence of new ſhoeing his Horſe. Elleſden, who thought that by this Time they had made half their Voyage, could not imagine the Reaſon of this Breach of Promiſe, nor could he attribute it to any Thing, but that the Man, taking Leave of his Friends upon a Fair-Day, had by Drinking forgot his Time. But it was afterwards known, that the Maſter of the Veſſel being come home to take clean Cloaths, and other Neceſſaries for his Voyage, was lock'd up by his Wife, and ſecured in his Chamber. For that very Day the former Proclamation was publiſh'd in Lyme, which promis'd a thouſand Pounds to the Diſcoverers, and denounc'd Death to the Concealers of the King; which threw the Woman into a terrible Fright, leſt her Husband in performing this Office, of which ſhe had ſome Notice, might ſuffer Shipwreck on Shoar: She therefore us'd Entreaties, Tears, Out-cries, and at length ſo much Violence, as totally defeated the Attempt.

But is diſappointed.

Upon the Way to Bridport, Colonel Windham went a little before the King, to view the Road; and coming near the Town, he found it to be full of Soldiers. The Colonel was therefore for the King's going to another Place; but he laying aſide all Fear, wou'd needs enter the Town, partly that he might not deceive the Lord Wilmot, and partly to refreſh himſelf after the Fatigue of Night-watching and Travelling. Thereupon Windham took care to provide a Chamber and Victuals; which was not eaſy to be effected among ſo many Gueſts. The King, in the mean Time, was employ'd in carrying the Horſes into the Stable, and looking after them; nor could he avoid diſcourſing with the Soldiers in the Yard about his Journey. But the Hoſtler looking him in the Face, as he receiv'd the Horſes, ſaid, You are welcome, I know you very well. Where did you know me? anſwer'd the King; at Exeter, ſaid he; for I liv'd two Years in an Inn there. The King well knowing that City, freely reply'd, And ſo did I, in the Service of Mr. Porter: I am glad I have met with a Countryman, but I find you are ſo buſy, you have no Time to drink with me; when I come back from London, we'll talk of old Stories. After this Eſcape, and a little Refreſhment, the Lord Wilmot paſſing through the Town, they took Horſe, and following the ſtrait Road to London, they met with ſeveral Travellers in the Way, and among thoſe a particular Servant of the late King: Therefore thinking it more convenient to turn out of the Road, they follow'd the next Way upon the left Hand; and having rid a long Time, towards Night they came to a Village call'd Broad-Windſor. The Colonel going to enquire the Name of the Place, and whither the Way led, by good Fortune met with an Inn-Keeper an old Servant of his own; and becauſe it grew dark, he eaſily obtain'd Lodging that Night for him and his Company. They were ſcarcely ſettled, before the Conſtable came, attended with forty Soldiers, who marching to the Sea-Coaſt for the reducing Jerſey, muſt be quarter'd there. The Houſe being fill'd and throng'd with them, his Majeſty had but a very narrow Lodging, yet that was not all the Inconvenience: For about Midnight a Woman belonging to the Soldiers fell in Labour; which being nois'd about, the Inhabitants flock'd to the Place, to prevent the Charge of the young Child, with ſo much Noiſe and Diſturbance, that the King got very little Reſt that Night, no more than he did before at Charmouth.

He returns to Trent.

He had now Time to reflect upon his Eſcape that Day at Bridport, but by the Time he arriv'd again at Trent, he found that the Danger had been much greater at Charmouth, and that it was happy that his Jealouſy haſtned him from the Inn in that Place. For he had not been long gone, when an unfortunate Diſcourſe was ſtarted between the Hoſtler, and one Hamnet a Smith, while he was ſhoeing the Lord Wilmot's Horſe. The Smith asking, From whence came theſe Gentlement? the Hoſtler anſwer'd, From Exeter, as they ſay: To whom the Smith reply'd, But I dare ſwear that theſe laſt Shoes were ſet on in the North. All other Circumſtances being conſider'd, namely, 'That the Saddles were not taken off in the Night-'time, that, tho' Travellers, they had ſat up all Night, 'and that the Servant went out of the Inn early in the 'Morning, they preſently concluded that they were Per-'ſons of Quality, who flying after the late Battel of 'Worceſter, had wander'd thither, and that probably the 'King was amongſt them.' So that the Hoſtler, hoping to make his Fortune, went to conſult the Miniſter of Peace, a Weaver, and formerly a Soldier, who was now preaching to his Congregation upon a ſolemn Occaſion. But not daring to diſturb him in his tedious Morning Exerciſe, and unwilling to loſe his Reward at the Gentleman's taking Horſe, he return'd without effecting his Deſign. As ſoon as the Lord Wilmot was mounted and gone, the Preacher, by the Smith's Information, came immediately to the Inn; and, almoſt out of Breath, ask'd What Gueſts ſhe had entertain'd that Night? ſhe ſaying they were all Strangers to her, ſhe knew them not; he cry'd out, I tell you then, one of them was the King. Then haſtily he ran to Butler, the next Colonel, for obtaining a Warrant to raiſe the Country and Soldiers for apprehending the King. The Colonel refuſing, Captain Maſſey, who quarter'd hard by, having gather'd together as many Horſe as he could on a ſudden, purſu'd on the London Road as far as Dorcheſter; but the King, by Divine Providence, having quitted the Road, he return'd diſappointed of his fair Hopes. This Report put all the Soldiers upon ſearching of ſuſpected Houſes; and twice they rifled that of Sir Hugh Windham, Uncle to the Colonel, where they left not a Cheſt or Corner unſearch'd; and having made the whole Family Priſoners, they ſeiz'd upon a lovely young Lady, ſaying, She was the King diſguis'd in Woman's Apparel; nor would they let her go, till by ſome rude Experiment they diſcover'd their Miſtake.

6. The King being once again ſettled in Trent, where he was under great Reſtraint, began to conſult about new Expedients; and after ſeveral Propoſals, it was reſolv'd that the Lord Wilmot, attended by Peters, ſhould go to Salisbury to Mr. John Coventry, Son to the late Lord-Keeper, who was known to be a prudent and loyal Gentleman, and adviſe with him about the King's Tranſportation into France. Mr. Coventry having conſulted with Dr. Humphry Henchman, a worthy Divine of Salisbury, and afterwards Biſhop of that See; the Reſult was, That his Majeſty ſhould be deſired to remove to Hele, three Miles from Salisbury, a very private Houſe belonging to Mrs. Mary Hyde, the Relict of the elder Brother of Serjeant Hyde, afterwards Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, a Lady whom they knew to be as diſcreet and as loyal as any of her Sex. With this Reſolution and Advice Mr. Coventry diſpatch'd his Chaplain, Mr. Selleck, to Trent with a Letter, roll'd up into the Bigneſs of a Muſquet Bullet, which the faithful Meſſenger was order'd to ſwallow, in Caſe of any Danger. In the mean Time Mr. Coventry had found a truſty Seaman at Southampton, who undertook to tranſport whom he pleas'd; but upon Re-conſideration with the Lord Wilmot, it was not thought ſafe for the King to take Shipping there, in regard of the many Caſtles the Veſſel muſt paſs, and their frequent Examination of Paſſengers; ſo that ſome of the ſmall Ports of Suſſex were concluded to be the ſafer Places, for effecting this great and difficult Work. In the Interim Mr. Selleck return'd with the King's Reſolution to come to Hele, ſignify'd by the like Paper Bullet: And by this Time his Majeſty thought fit to make uſe of the Service and Aſſiſtance of Colonel Robert Philips, who had ſerv'd under the late King, who liv'd in thoſe Parts, and was well acquainted with the Ways of the Country, and known to be inviolably faithful. This Colonel undertook to be his Majeſty's Conductor to Hele, which was about thirty Miles diſtant from Trent.

He removes from Trent to Hele near Salisbury.

On the ſixth of October the King took his Leave of Colonel Windham, and thoſe of the Family who knew him, with particular Thanks for their great Care and Fidelity; but to the good old Lady Windham he ſhew'd more than ordinary Reſpect. Thus he left Trent, and began his Journey towards Hele, with Colonel Philips, perſonating a Tenant's Son of his, attended by honeſt Peters, and riding as formerly, before Mrs. Julian Coningsby. The Travellers about Noon arriv'd at Mere, a little Market-Town in Wiltſhire, and dined at the George-Inn, the Keeper of which was known by the Colonel to be faithful. He ſat at the Table with the King, and diſcourſing with the Colonel, told him for News, 'That he heard 'the Men of Weſtminſter, notwithſtanding their Victory 'at Worceſter, were in a great Maze, not knowing what 'was become of the King; but the moſt receiv'd Opinion 'was, That he was come in Diſguiſe to London, and 'many Houſes had been ſearch'd for him there:' At which his Majeſty was obſerv'd to ſmile. After Dinner he familiarly ask'd the King, If he were a Friend to Cæſar? to which his Majeſty anſwering Yes; then, ſaid he, here is a Health to King Charles in a Glaſs of Wine; which his Majeſty and the Colonel both pledg'd; and ſo taking Horſe, at Night they arriv'd at Hele. Here the King ſupp'd with Dr. Henchman, and other Gentlemen accidentally in the Houſe. After Supper he privately diſclos'd himſelf to the Miſtreſs of the Houſe, the Widow Hyde, and begg'd for Shelter. The diſcreet Lady, tho' juſt tranſported with the Diſcovery, advis'd him 'early in the Morning to depart to'wards London, but turning out of the Way to come back 'about One in the Afternoon; for that being a Market-Day 'at Salisbury, and all her Servants and other Witneſſes be'ing gone thither by her Order, ſhe her ſelf would be 'ready to let him in at a Back-Door.' This was accordingly done; and the King and Colonel Philips taking formal Leave of the Lady, mounted on Horſeback; but at the appointed Time return'd back again. Here the Colonel, carrying away the Horſes, the King was convey'd to a ſecret Place, made in the Time of War for ſecuring Goods of the greateſt Value; where his Majeſty lay conceal'd for about ſix Days, and was carefully attended by the good Widow.

In the mean Time the Lord Wilmot, who went by the Name of Mr. Barlow, rode to ſuch faithful Gentlemen as were of his Acquaintance in Hampſhire; and firſt to Mr. Laurence Hyde, and then to Mr. Thomas Henſlow, to whom he communicated his great Buſineſs, and deſir'd their Aſſiſtance in procuring a Bark for the King's Tranſportation. Mr. Henſlow, in Zeal to this Service, immediately acquainted the excellent Earl of Southampton, then at his Houſe at Tichfield, who immediately apply'd himſelf to the important Work; being the only Perſon of that Condition, who had the Courage to ſolicite ſuch a Danger. Mr. Hyde recommended the Lord Wilmot to Colonel George Gunter, at Rackton near Chicheſter in Suſſex; and among the many Solicitors for the long expected Veſſel, this Colonel hapned to be the fortunate Man, who procured it at Bright-helmſton, a ſmall Fiſher-Town in Suſſex, by the Aſſiſtance of Mr. Francis Manſel, a Merchant of Chicheſter, and the concurrent Endeavours of Mr. Thomas Gunter, Kinſman to the Colonel.

Upon this happy News, early on Monday the 13th of October, the King, after a grateful Acknowledgment to Mrs. Hyde, attended by Dr. Henchman, departed from Hele on Foot for two Miles to Clarendon-Park Corner, and then took Horſe with Colonel Philips; and at an appointed Place the Lord Wilmot, Colonel Gunter and his Kinſman, met his Majeſty with a Brace of Grey-hounds, the better to carry on the Diſguiſe. That Night they were entertain'd and lodg'd at Hambledon in Hampſhire, at the Houſe of Mr. Thomas Symons, who marry'd the Colonel's Siſter; where a good Supper was provided, tho' the Royal Gueſt was unknown to any of the Houſe. The next Night, after thirty five Miles Travel, and ſome Hazards in paſſing by many Soldiers, they arriv'd at the George Inn, in the deſired Port of Bright-helmſton. Here at Supper ſat at the Table the King, the Lord Wilmot, Colonel Gunter, Manſel the Merchant, and Teterſhal Maſter of the Veſſel, oppoſite to his Majeſty. The Maſter of the Veſſel, riſing ſuddenly from Supper, call'd the Merchant aſide, and expoſtulated with him 'for deceiving him, in 'recommending the King to him, inſtead of another Per'ſon pretended.' The Merchant confidently deny'd it, and urg'd him to be true to his Promiſe. But he affirm'd, 'That he certainly knew him to be the King, tho' in a 'mean and ordinary Habit he paſs'd for a Servant, and 'that he very well remember'd him ſince the Time that at 'his own and others Interceſſion, he had clear'd a Fleet of 'Colliers bound thither from Newcaſtle, which were 'ſtopp'd in the Downs.' Manſel perceiving the Man underſtood the Deſign, immediately addreſs'd himſelf to the King; who being inform'd of the Humour and Honeſty of the Maſter, his Majeſty and Wilmot ply'd him with Promiſes, and immediately made him a conſiderable Preſent. Upon which the Man promis'd all Fidelity, and haſtned to make all Things ready for their Paſſage. The Man was no ſooner gone, than the King receiv'd a private Meſſage from the noble Earl of Southampton, that he had procur'd a Ship, and if his Majeſty came to him, he ſhou'd be ſafe; but he reſolv'd to loſe no Time, but to make uſe of the preſent Opportunity.

And laſt of all to Bright-helmſton,

The Veſſel lay at Shoreham, four Miles from thence, as yet half laden with Coals, which the Maſter had not ſold, moſt of the Sea-Men being at Bright-helmſton: Thoſe he knock'd up in the Night-time, bidding them make all Haſte to the Veſſel, which having ſlipt its Anchors was at Drift, and might be ſtranded or daſh'd upon the Rocks; that he Himſelf wou'd preſently follow after. In the mean Time he order'd his Wife to go and buy a Bottle of Brandy, and another of Sack, and to give him clean Cloaths to take along with him. But why ſo late in the Night? ſaid ſhe, wou'd it not do as well in the Morning? He ſtill urging her, and cutting off all Delays, It is the King, ſaid the Woman, that I ſuſpect you are to carry over: I pray God you may carry him ſafe, tho' I and my ſmall Children ſhou'd for ever after go a Begging, The Inn-Keeper alſo being by that Time got Drunk, and addreſſing himſelf to the King, took his Hand and kiſs'd it, ſaying, Who you are, whence you come, or whither you are going, I know not; yet I pray God he may bleſs and preſerve you: If I gueſs right, I ſhall be an Earl, and my Wife a Counteſs. And the Truth is, ſome diſcover'd it was the King; ſo that preſently after his Eſcape, the News of it was whiſper'd all about the Country. The Hour of Departure approaching, they took Horſe and went to the Shoar, the Maſter pretending that they were Merchants of the Iſle of Wight, that had bought the reſt of his Coals, and that they were to carry them thither. About five in the Morning, on the fifteenth of October, they went on Board, and ſpent a great Part of the Day coaſting along the Shoar. Towards Sun ſetting the Maſter ſteer'd and ſtood off, as directing his Courſe towards the Iſle of Wight: But Wilmot, who appear'd to be the chief Paſſenger, as if his Mind had chang'd with the Wind, after a pretended Squabble with the Maſter in the Preſence of the Sea-men, as before agreed, alter'd his Bargain, and inſtead of the Iſle of Wight, order'd him to run over to France; ſo that in the Dusk of the Evening, they arriv'd at Feſcan, an inconſiderable Port in Normandy near Havre de Grace, and at length gain'd the much long'd-for Shore. From thence going to Roan, he gave Notice to the Queen of his ſafe Arrival, which ſoon freed his Loyal Subjects in all Places from their diſmal Apprehenſions.

Where he took Shipping, and arriv'd in France.

A general Obſervation

Such were the Particulars of the King's wonderful Eſcape and Deliverance, from ſuch Variety of Dangers and Difficulties as cannot be parallel'd in Hiſtory; ſo that he ſeem'd to have been all the Way guided and guarded by Angels from Heaven. It muſt be amazing to all Poſterity, That among ſo many Perſons of mean Condition, of ſo contrary Religions, among ſo many Women, naturally more talkative, and ſo many timorous People, who were frightned at the very Name of Death, and in a Word, that among ſo many broken and indigent Perſons, to whom a great Reward was ſo tempting, not a ſingle Perſon offer'd to betray him. From the third of September at Worceſter, to the fifteenth of October at Bright-helmſton, the Space of one and forty Days, he is ſaid to have paſs'd through much more Dangers than he travell'd Miles, which were not much leſs than three Hundred, in which he met with innumerable Cauſes of Uneaſineſs. Nor was it the leaſt of his Afflictions daily to hear of the Earl of Derby, and other his moſt loyal Subjects, ſome murder'd, ſome impriſon'd, and others ſequeſter'd in Multitudes, only for performing their Duty to their lawful Sovereign. In ſum, there was no Kind of Miſery, excepting Death it ſelf, of which his Majeſty, in this dreadful Perſecution, did not in ſome Meaſure, both in Body, Mind and Eſtate, bear a very great Share; and all with ſuch Heroick Patience and uncommon Prudence, that it may juſtly be ſaid to have been the moſt Glorious, as well as wonderful Part of his Life.

gate the Supreme Power to Himſelf; which firſt appear'd by his offering to Knight Lambert and Fleetwood in the Field of Battle; which he had alſo perform'd, if he had not been diſſwaded by ſome of his Confidents. After an inſulting Manner, he order'd the Walls of Worceſter to be levell'd with the Ground, and the Dike to be fill'd up; and then march'd up triumphantly to London, driving four or five Thouſand Priſoners like Sheep before him; making Preſents of them, as Occaſion offer'd, as of ſo many Slaves; and ſelling the reſt for that Purpoſe into the Engliſh Plantations abroad. He was met beyond Aylesbury by four ſelect Members of Parliament, ſent from the Houſe to pay him all marks of Favour and Honour. When he came to Acton, he was ſolemnly receiv'd by the Speaker and the reſt of the Members, and the Council of State; and after that by the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, the Militia, and Thouſands of People, with Vollies of great and ſmall Shot, and loud Shouts and Acclamations. On the ſixteenth of September he took his Place in Parliament, where he had exceſſive Compliments from the Speaker in the Name of the Houſe; and was the ſame Day feaſted in the City of London with all poſſible State and Magnificence. After that two Acts were drawn up in Honour of him; ‘One for a Solemn Thankſgiving ‘Day, and another for an annual Obſervation of the third ‘Day of September in the three Kingdoms, with a Narrative of the Grounds thereof.’ Then for Rewards to the Officers, they ſettled a Thouſand Pounds a Year upon Lambert, five Hundred on Reynolds, three Hundred upon Pride, as much upon Whalley, and the ſame upon Overton. They alſo ſettled four Thouſand Pounds a Year upon the Lord General himſelf, out of the Eſtates of the Duke of Buckingham and the Marqueſs of Worceſter, beſides the two Thouſand five Hundred formerly granted to him: A large Reward for a Perſon, who, in the Beginning of the Parliament, was almoſt or altogether without any Eſtate. And two Thouſand Pounds per Annum was deſign'd for Ireton, then in Ireland. That Puniſhments might not be wanting, as well as Rewards, beſides the Earl of Derby, they beheaded Sir Timothy Fetherſton-haugh at Cheſter, and Captain Brown Buſhell at London, with ſeveral others. They had many Priſoners, both Scots and Engliſh, at their Mercy; but the two chief deſign'd for Sacrifice by Cromwell himſelf, Middleton and Maſſey, had the extraordinary good Fortune to eſcape out of the Tower. At length being a little ſatiated with Blood, an Amneſty, or Act of Oblivion was publiſh'd, but with many intricate Exceptions; which gave Hopes to ſuch who liv'd quietly and peaceably, of being in Time admitted to the Publick Employments in the Common-wealth.

Cromwell's triumphant Return to London.

His Meeting and Diſcourſe with ſeveral Officers and others.

It was not impolitick in theſe Republicans, to pretend to a Continuance of their Uſurpation, by endeavouring at laſt to allay the Heats and Hatred of all Parties. But their Precaution prov'd ineffectual; for an unexpected Adverſary of their Creation, ſtarting up amongſt themſelves, did as ſuddenly ſuppreſs them. This was Cromwell their General, whoſe particular Care was to improve all his Victories to his own Intereſt; and for this Purpoſe he deſired a Meeting with ſeveral Members of Parliament, and ſome chief Officers of the Army, at the Speaker's Houſe. Where, as Whitelock, one of the Number, informs us, he propos'd to them, ‘That now the old King being dead, ‘and his Son defeated, he held it neceſſary to come to a ‘Settlement of the Nation: In order to which he had requeſted this Meeting; that they together might conſider ‘and adviſe what was fit to be done, and to be preſented ‘to the Parliament.’ When the Speaker and Colonel Harriſon had deliver'd themſelves in general Expreſſions, Whitelock, who was thought to know Cromwell's Mind, offer'd a Queſtion, ‘Whether the Settlement deſired ſhou'd ‘be by Way of an abſolute Republick, or with any mixture of Monarchy? Upon which Cromwell took the Hint, and anſwer'd, My Lord Commiſſioner Whitelock hath put us upon the right Point; and indeed it is my Meaning, That we ſhou'd conſider whether a Republick, or a mixt Monarchical Government will be beſt to be ſettled; and if in any thing Monarchical, then in WHOM that Power ſhall be placed. When he had heard Colonel Deſborough and Whaley on one Side declaring for a ſtrict Republick, and Sir Thomas Widdrington pleading for a mixt Monarchical Government, to be plac'd upon Terms in one of the King's Sons; Cromwell reply'd, That will be a Buſineſs of more than ordinary Difficulty: But really I think, if it may be done with the Safety and Preſervation of our Rights, both as Engliſhmen, and as Chriſtians, that a Settlement with ſomewhat of MONARCHICAL Power in it, wou'd be very effectual. In Concluſion, the Company parted without coming to any poſitive Determination; only Cromwell by this Meeting diſcover'd the Inclinations of the Perſons that ſpoke, which was a great Part of his Buſineſs, and of which he afterwards made a proper, and extraordinary Uſe.

He cauſes the Parliament to limit Themſelves.

This aſpiring Man alſo made another Step towards his Deſigns, by artfully bringing the Houſe into a popular Vote, on the eighteenth of November, ‘That the Time ‘for Continuance of this preſent Parliament, beyond ‘which they reſolve not to ſit, ſhall be the third Day of ‘November, 1654.’ This politick Management help'd much to draw off the Eyes and Hearts of the People from a Parliament that was to have a certain Period, and fix'd them upon the General and his Army, the Diſſolution of whoſe Power was altogether uncertain. So that from this Time all Petitions, and other Applications, were made to the General and his Officers, and not to the Speaker and the Commons; who did little in the Remainder of this Year, beſides appointing a Committee ‘To conſider of ‘the Inconveniencies and Delays in the Proceedings of ‘Law:’ In which, one of the Council to this Committee tells us, That none of them was more active in the Buſineſs than Hugh Peters the Miniſter, who underſtood little of the Law, but was very opiniohative, and wou'd frequently mention ſome Proceedings of Law in Holland, wherein he was altogether miſtaken. This Committee for regulating the Law, preſented to a Committee of Parliament, to be reported to the Houſe, the Draughts of ſeveral Acts; as ‘1. For taking away Fines upon Bills, ‘Declarations and Original Writs. 2. Againſt cuſtomary Oaths of Fealty and Homage to Lords of Manors. 3. For taking away common Recoveries, and the ‘unneceſſary Charge of Fines, and to paſs and charge ‘Lands Entailed, as Lands in Fee-Simple. 4. For aſcertaining Arbitrary Fines upon Deſcent, and Alienation of ‘Copyholds of Inheritance. 5. For the more ſpeedy Recovery of Rents. 6. Touching Pleaders, and their ‘Fees. 7. For the more ſpeedy Regulating and eaſy Diſcovery of Debts and Damages, not exceeding four ‘Pounds, and under. 8. For Marriages to be made before Juſtices of the Peace.’

Jerſey, Guernſey, Scilly and Man, reduc'd.

In the mean Time the Complaints of the Engliſh Merchants caus'd the Parliament to think of reducing to their Obedience the Iſlands of Jerſey, Guernſey, Scilly, and Man, which Places ſtill remain'd under the King's Command, and from whence his Frigats infeſted the Engliſh Coaſts. They had long ſince been Maſters of Guernſey, only the chief Fort call'd Cornet-Caſtle, ſituated in the Sea, and being reliev'd by Shipping from France, and the Neighbouring Iſles, was very long defended by Roger Burges the Governour; but finding all loſt, he ſurrender'd it on the latter End of October upon very good Articles. To Jerſey Colonel Haynes ſet Sail in the middle of October, with two Regiments of Foot, and four Troops of Horſe; and landing with ſome Oppoſition, ſoon got Poſſeſſion of the Iſland. There were two Caſtles in it almoſt impregnable; but nothing is ſo where Fear is predominant. Mount Orgueil made no Reſiſtance; and Caſtle Elizabeth, ſurrounded with Rocks and the Ocean, tho' it held out for a conſiderable Time, follow'd the Fate of the Iſland; Sir George Cartaret the Governour, having obtain'd Conditions for Himſelf to paſs into France, and Impunity for the Iſlanders that return'd to their Houſes. The Scillys, which were the chief Harbour for the King's Men of War, had ſome Time before been taken by a Part of the Parliament's Fleet, the ſtrong Caſtle upon the Iſle of St. Mary's being likewiſe ſurrender'd upon Articles. Finally the Iſle of Man, hitherto kept by the Heroick Counteſs of Derby, who had ſo bravely defended Lathom-Houſe, clos'd this fatal Roll; by ſo much the more illuſtrious, as being the laſt, who fell in Defence of her King and her Country.

Monk's Proceedings in Scotland.

2. Such were the Succeſſes of the Common-wealth in England; which were no leſs in Scotland, where Major-General Monk obſerv'd the ſevere Rules that Cromwell had preſcrib'd to him, for the curbing of the unruly People of that Kingdom. At the Head of ſix Thouſand Men, he immediately march'd to that important Paſs of Sterling, the Caſtle of which was one of the ſtrongeſt, and moſt magnificent of any in Scotland. The Governor was Colonel Cunningham, who was ſo ſurpris'd at the ſudden Approach of the Engliſh Army, whoſe Strength he believ'd to be greater than it really was, that after a ſhort Siege, on the fourteenth of Auguſt, he ſurrender'd the Town and Caſtle, where the King's Royal Robes, the Sword, the Chair and Cloth of State, and all the Records of Scotland, were found and ſeiz'd, together with five Thouſand Arms, forty Pieces of Ordnance, and a great Store of Ammunition. Thus that Caſtle, on which King James had fix'd this lofty Inſcription, HÆC NOBIS INVICTA TULERUNT CENTUM SEX PROAVI, 1617, declaring it had in his Time remain'd unconquer'd during the Reign of a hundred and ſix

Kings, was yielded to the Engliſh in the Reign of his Grandſon.

His great Succeſſes.

Having gain'd this Advantage, Monk advanc'd directly to Dundee, to which Place the chief of the Inhabitants of Edinburgh, and many other Towns, had convey'd the beſt Part of their Moveables, as a ſecure Repoſitory, ſo that there were vaſt Riches and Spoils in the Town. Major Lumſdain was the Governor, who had a Garriſon of eight hundred effective Men, beſides ſome Companies of armed Inhabitants, by which he thought himſelf in ſo good a Condition, that when Monk ſent him a Summons, he return'd a very ſlighting Anſwer. Upon which that General regularly inveſted the Town: But at his firſt Appearance there, hearing that old General Leſley, and ſeveral of the Lords of Scotland were met at Ellet, fourteen Miles diſtant, to raiſe Soldiers for the Relief of the Place, he ſent Alured and Morgan, with a thouſand Horſe and Dragoons to diſturb the Levies, privately leaving the chief Management of the Deſign to the latter, who was his Confident, and moſt proper for the Service. Theſe march'd carefully in the Night, and took Scotch Guides to conduct them to the Town, and by the Help of ſome few of their Soldiers who had revolted to the Engliſh, they made ſuch Feints in their March, that the Country took them for Part of their own Forces moving towards Ellet; ſo that about three in the Morning they were got undiſcover'd beyond the Town, into which they march'd with little or no Reſiſtance, and took three hundred Noblemen, Gentlemen and Miniſters, with about ſeventy of their Servants; the chief of which were General Leſley, the Earl Marſhal, the Earl of Crawford, the Lords Leith, Ogilby, Burgenny, Hume and Lee, with many other Knights, and Gentlemen of Note. Theſe were all ſhipp'd off for London; only old Leſley, putting in at Newcaſtle, was by the Favour of Sir Arthur Haſlerigg the Governor, permitted to ſtay in Northumberland with one De-la-val his Son-in-law, upon Promiſe to be a true Priſoner. By this Means Monk had prevented all Poſſibility of Diſturbance in his Siege; and ſeeing he cou'd not by fair Words prevail with the Governor to yield up the Town, tho' he knew the Surpriſe of Ellet had cut off all Hope of Relief, on the firſt of September he took it by Storm, and put the whole Garriſon to the Sword. The Governor with ſome few for a while ſav'd themſelves in a Steeple, but were ſmother'd out by the burning of wet Straw, and then they yielded on Mercy to one Captain Kelly, who was carrying him to the General to intercede for his Life upon the Account of his gallant Defence, but as he was going with him, one Major Butler barbarouſly ſhot him dead. They took ſixty Sail of Ships in the Harbour, and a very rich Booty, ſo that ſeveral of the Engliſh Common Soldiers got five hundred Pounds a Man.

Scotland reduc'd, and the People, in a manner, enſlav'd.

This Example ſtruck ſuch a Terror, that St. Andrews, Aberdeen, Dunbarton and Dunnoter Caſtles, with other Towns, Caſtles and ſtrong Places, either voluntarily ſubmitted, or ſurrender'd upon Summons. Yet the Scots made one Attempt more under Middleton, Huntley, Glencarne, and other Highlanders; but they were not long after ſuppreſs'd by the Valour and Vigilance of Colonel Morgan; ſo that the Engliſh carry'd on their Conqueſts in all Parts of the Kingdom, even to the Iſles of Orkney and Shetland. For the better ſecuring of which, four ſtrong Citadels were erected in four Principal Parts of the Country, at Leith, Ayre, Inverneſs and St. Johnſton. And beſides thoſe of Edinburgh and Sterling, in every County they kept a Garriſon in ſome Caſtle or other, that if any new Rebellion ſhou'd ariſe, they might have immediate Opportunity to ſuppreſs it. New Judicatures and Courts of Juſtice were now open'd in Scotland; a Council of State was alſo made up of Engliſh, not of the beſt Quality, who were match'd by ſome Scots mingled with them; and in every Shire a Meeting was call'd, in which, with a Renunciation of the King, they were oblig'd to ſubſcribe to the Engliſh Government, and to be Subjects to one Common-wealth. And at length they were allow'd to ſend thirty Commiſſioners to the Parliament of England; and this was ſo manag'd, that they were almoſt all Engliſh, ſcarce any of that Nation being permitted to ſit there, beſides the Marqueſs of Argyle, and the Laird of Swinton. The Uſe of Arms was likewiſe deny'd to that Nation, and alſo of Horſes, except only for ſome neceſſary Ends and Uſes. Beſides, their Commerce and Negotiations with Foreigners were narrowly watch'd and inſpected, leſt under that Pretext they might form ſome Miſchief againſt the Common-wealth of England. Their Kirk was deſpis'd, and their Idol Covenant trampled upon; and as to their great and honourable Records of the Kingdom, they were attended by a particular Fatality; for being after the Reſtoration order'd to be ſent back to Scotland, the Ship that carry'd them was caſt away, and ſo they were irrecoverably loſt in the bottom of the Sea. So much did they gain by their ſeditious and ungovernable Spirits, and their infamous Bargains and Rewards made with, and receiv'd from, their Brethren in England; ſo that they now found their own Proverb providentially verify'd, One was the Day of the Account, but Another of the Pay.

The Death and Character of Lieutenant-General Ireton.

3. The Succeſs of the Engliſh Common-wealth was no leſs in Ireland, where Perfidiouſneſs and Barbarity had reach'd to the moſt flagrant Degree. Ireton was the Chief Commander there, who carry'd on and purſu'd his bloody Chaſtiſement through innumerable Oppoſitions. After he had taken ſeveral Places, given Articles to ſome, and made Examples of others, he undertook the ſtrong City of Limerick, which, tho' well garriſon'd and provided, being weaken'd with Diſſenſions, the preſent Bane of that Kingdom, it ſurrender'd upon Articles; the Garriſon being allow'd to march out without their Arms, leaving four and twenty of the Principal in it to Mercy. Of theſe, the Biſhop of Fearn, and ſeveral others active in the firſt Part of the Rebellion, were hang'd as a Terror to all Traytors. This Victory was no leſs fatal to this terrible Conqueror, who here got the Plague, and dy'd raving on the 26th of November; the chief Command of whoſe Army at preſent devolv'd upon Colonel Ludlow, a Man every way bold and daring, to whom three more Collegues were afterwards aſſociated. Ireton was a Man bred up to the Law, of a Nature active and vigilant, proud, fierce and immoveable; of a melancholick, reſerv'd and dark Temper, who communicated his Thoughts to very few; ſo that he moſtly reſolv'd by himſelf, but was never diverted from his Reſolution; and was often thought by his Obſtinacy to prevail over his Father-in-law Cromwell, and to extort his Concurrence contrary to his Inclinations. But that, ſays the noble Hiſtorian, proceeded only from his diſſembling leſs; for he was never reſerv'd in the owning and communicating his worſt and moſt barbarous Purpoſes, which the other always conceal'd and diſavow'd. It was generally conceiv'd that he was a Man ſo radically averſe to Monarchy, and ſo true to a Common-wealth, that if he had liv'd, he wou'd by ſome Means have prevented thoſe Exceſſes in Cromwell, or publickly declared againſt them, and carry'd the greateſt Part of the Army with him; and that Cromwell, who beſt knew his Thoughts and Temper, had therefore remov'd him into Ireland, that he might be freed from his Counſels or Importunities, when he ſhou'd find it neceſſary to put off his Mask. His Juſtice and Integrity have been highly extoll'd by Ludlow, and ſome others, but none can vindicate his ſanguinary Proceedings; for no one had been more deeply involv'd in the Blood of the Nation, and alſo in that of his Sovereign, than himſelf. His Death was like his Life, and he expired with the Word in his Mouth, in his raving Fits crying out, I will have more Blood, Blood, Blood! as Sir Philip Warwick tells us from one that was preſent. His Death was a great Loſs to the Engliſh Republick, who to ſhew their Gratitude for his many Services, caus'd his Body to be brought into England, and, being firſt laid in State in Somerſet-Houſe, to be interr'd at Weſtminſter, among the Kings of England, with a Pomp and Magnificence ſuitable to the moſt exalted State in the Nation.

The Death of Dr. Steuart.

Dr. Collins.

Mr G. Walker.

Mr. C. Walker.

Beſides this great Republican, there dy'd this Year ſeveral conſiderable Men that ought to be remember'd; of whom we ſhall mention two Church of England Divines, two Presbyterians, one Judge, one Civilian, one Phyſician, and an Architect. The firſt was Dr. Richard Steuart, Dean of St. Paul's, and Provoſt of Eaton College, a Man celebrated both for his Loyalty and his Learning; who ſuffer'd much in the Beginning of the Rebellion, and at length loſing all, he retir'd into France, where at Paris he became a notable Champion for the Proteſtant Cauſe, and the Engliſh Reformation, and dy'd ſoon after the King's Eſcape into France, much lamented both by his Majeſty himſelf, and many others, who were ſenſible of his Virtues and Piety. The next was Dr. Samuel Collins, Provoſt of King's College in Cambridge, and Regius Profeſſor of Divinity in that Univerſity, who for above forty Years fill'd the venerable Chair with the higheſt Reputation and Glory; ſhewing an admirable Command both of Senſe and Language, not only to the Confutation of all Opponents, but alſo to the Converſion of many Papiſts and other Diſſenters: Being a firm Loyaliſt, he loſt his Provoſtſhip; but none being thought proper to ſucceed him in the Chair, he continu'd that Preferment to the Day of his Death. The two Presbyterians were Mr. George Walker, and Mr. Clement Walker: The former was educated Batchellor of Divinity in St. John's College in Cambridge, where he attain'd to be well ſkill'd in the Oriental Tongues, and to become an excellent Logician, and Theologiſt: He became very much noted for his Diſputations with the Jeſuit Fiſher, and others of the Romiſh Church, and afterwards for his ſtrict Sabbatarian Principles, his munificent Diſpoſition, and his publick Behaviour in that call'd The Aſſembly of Divines. The other, Mr. Clement Walker, was a celebrated Gentleman of Dorſetſhire, and a Member of the Long-Parliament, well skill'd in Law and Politicks; an inſeparable Friend of the violent Mr. Prynne, often mention'd, and a ſtrenuous Champion for the Preſbyterian Faction againſt that of the Independents, whoſe Hiſtory he wrote with unuſual Sharpneſs and Severity: For which, and other Writings, he was by Cromwell's Power committed to Priſon, where he dy'd, after he had ſeen all his fine Projects defeated, and himſelf a ſeven thouſand Pounds Loſer in his Eſtate. The Judge was Sir Richard Lane, a very worthy Perſon of the Law, who gain'd much Reputation in his Pleadings in a dangerous Time for the Earl of Strafford, and who afterwards was made one of the Barons of the Exchequer, and laſtly had the Great-Seal given him: But he had but ſmall Enjoyment of it; being, after many Services for the unfortunate King his Maſter, forc'd to retire to the Iſle of Jerſey, where he finiſh'd his troubleſome Life. The Civilian was Sir Thomas Ryves, and Doctor of the Faculty, Advocate to the late King, a Maſter of all polite Learning, and eminent for his Skill both in the Common, as well as the Civil Law: Upon the late Troubles he became ingag'd in the Cauſe of the King, both in his Treaties and Battels; in the latter of which, notwithſtanding his Age, he ſignaliz'd his Valour, and receiv'd ſeveral Wounds; and after many Sufferings, both in his Eſtate and Perſon, he left the World in Peace and Honour. The Phyſician was Dr. Peter Turner, a Perſon not only eminent in his own Faculty, but admirably acquainted with all Kinds of Learning, being an exact Linguiſt, a compleat Mathematician, perfectly read in the Fathers and Councils, a moſt curious Critick, a Politician, a Stateſman, &c. He was both Profeſſor of Greſham College in London, and Geometry Profeſſor in Oxford Univerſity, and in the flouriſhing Part of the late Reign, was offer'd great Places in the State, which he modeſtly declin'd; and laſtly, after many Troubles and Sufferings for the Royal Cauſe, he dy'd in great Obſcurity, in a poor Place in Southwark. The laſt Perſon Perſon, was Mr. Inigo Jones, the moſt excellent Architect that the Nation had ever ſeen; who was educated by William Earl of Pembroke, at whoſe generous Charge he travell'd much abroad, eſpecially into Italy, and ſtudy'd at home, till he became highly in Favour with the late King, Queen, and all the Nobility, for his incomparable Skill, which he ſignally diſplay'd in the Banqueting-Houſe, Covent-Garden, and other laſting Monuments of his rare Abilities and Perfections.

An Embaſſy ſent into Holland.

A Rupture between the two Common-Wealths.

IX. 1. And now for the new Common-Wealth of England, as the Rulers were great at home, ſo they became formidable abroad; being acknowledg'd by all, courted by ſome, and eſteemed as very conſiderable by ſuch as had leaſt Affection for them. Before they had intirely reduc'd either Scotland or Ireland, which were both compleated this Year, they exerted themſelves in Foreign Affairs, and particularly againſt the elder Common-Wealth, the States of Holland, and became a Scourge to thoſe whoſe Aſſiſtance they had formerly begg'd, and whoſe Alliance had too much contributed to their Greatneſs. The Beginning of which Conteſt aroſe the laſt Year, when the Parliament had ſent over their Chief-Juſtice Saint-John and Mr. Strickland, as their Ambaſſadors with great Pomp, 'to invite the States into a ſtricter Alliance with them, 'and to a Coalition or Incorporation of the two Nations 'into one.' They were receiv'd in Holland with all imaginable Reſpect, and as high Expreſſions made 'of an equal Deſire that a firm Union might be eſtabliſh'd between the two Common-Wealths:' For the forming of which, Perſons were appointed to treat with the Ambaſſadors; which was look'd upon as a Matter that would eaſily ſucceed, ſince the Prince of Orange was dead, who wou'd have given powerful Obſtructions in ſuch Caſes. In this Treaty, Saint-John, the known Confident of Cromwell, and commonly call'd his Dark Lanthorn, preſs'd ſuch a kind of Union as would have diſunited them from all their other Allies; ſo that for the Friendſhip of England, they muſt loſe that of other Princes, and alſo many other Advantages in Trade, which they ſaw the younger and more powerful Common-Wealth wou'd in a ſhort Time wreſt out of their Hands. This cou'd not be digeſted by the States, who us'd all Methods to divert them from inſiſting upon ſuch unreaſonable Conditions, and made many large Overtures and Conceſſions, which they had never granted to the greateſt Kings, were willing to quit ſome Advantages they had enjoy'd by all the Treaties with the Crown of England, and to yield other conſiderable Benefits, which before they had ever refus'd to grant. But this wou'd not ſatisfy Saint-John's haughty Spirit, nor wou'd the Ambaſſadors recede from any Particular they had propos'd: So that after ſome Months Stay, during which Time they receiv'd many Affronts from ſome Engliſh and others, they return'd with great Preſents from the States, but without any Effect from the Treaty, or entering into any Terms of Alliance, and with the extream Indignation of Saint-John, which he manifeſted as ſoon as he return'd to the Parliament.

The Parliament likewiſe thinking themſelves not ſufficiently valu'd, immediately enter'd upon Counſels how they might abridge the Trade of Holland, and encreaſe their own. Hereupon they made a new Law, commonly call'd The Act of Navigation, 'which inhibits all Foreign 'Ships from bringing in any Merchandiſe or Commodities 'into England, but ſuch as were the Proceed or Growth 'of their own Country, upon the Penalty of Forfeiture 'of all ſuch Ships.' This indeed concern'd all other Countries; but in Effect it totally ſuppreſs'd all Trade with Holland, which had very little Merchandiſe of the Growth of their own Country, but had made it their Buſineſs to bring hither in their Ships, the Growth of all other Kingdoms in the World; from which Benefit they were now excluded. Beſides, the Engliſh by Virtue of this Law, often took Occaſion to ſearch the Dutch Veſſels, and frequently to make Prize of them. Upon which the States of Holland ſent over four Ambaſſadors to pacify the Parliament, who expoſtulated this Matter very warmly, 'as a Breach of Commerce and Amity, which could not 'conſiſt with the Peace between the two Nations; and 'that their Maſters could not look upon it otherwiſe than 'a Declaration of War.' The Parliament ſuperciliouſly anſwer'd them, 'That their Maſters might take it in what 'Manner they pleas'd; but that they knew what was beſt 'for their own State, and wou'd not repeal Laws to gratify their Neighbours.' Moreover they demanded of them, 'the Arrears for the Dutch Fiſhing upon the Coaſts of 'England and Scotland; that the Survivers of thoſe who 'were aſſiſting in the Maſſacre of the Engliſh at Amboyna 'ſhould be deliver'd up to Juſtice; and that the Engliſh 'might have a free Trade in the Schelde, from Middleburgh 'to Antwerp.

Orders given to the Dutch Ships.

The States now fully perceiv'd, that they had help'd to raiſe an Enemy that was able to overpower them, and that would not treat them, or be treated, like the Crown of England. Yet ſtill they could not believe it poſſible, that in the Infancy of their Republick, and when their Government was ſo odious to all the Nobility and Gentry of the Kingdom, and their Taxes ſo heavy upon the whole Body of the Nation, the Parliament would venture to increaſe the preſent Impoſitions for the Support of their Land Armies, to maintain a new War at Sea, of ſuch vaſt Hazard and Conſequence; and therefore they conceiv'd that they only made a Shew of this Courage, to amuſe and terrify their Neighbours. However, in the Spring they ſet out a Fleet ſtronger than of Courſe they us'd to do; but this gave no Allarm to England, whoſe Naval Power had been ſo well encreas'd in the late King's Reign, as to fear no Foreign Invaſion. The Rulers never ſuſpected that the Dutch durſt enter into a War with them, or that they were willing to undertake it; eſpecially ſince ſeveral of their States were really devoted to them. And therefore they encreas'd not their Expence, but at the Seaſon they ſent out their uſual Fleet for the Guard of the Coaſts, and without any new and particular Inſtructions. But the Council of the Admiralty of Holland, who govern'd the Maritime Affairs, without Communication with the States General, gave their Inſtructions to their famous Admiral Van Tromp, 'That when he met with any of the Engliſh 'Men of War, he ſhou'd not ſtrike to them, nor ſhew 'them any other Reſpect than what they receiv'd; and if 'any of the Engliſh ſhou'd complain, they ſhou'd freely 'anſwer, That the Reſpect they had formerly ſhewn upon 'thoſe Occaſions, was becauſe the Ships belong'd to the King, 'and for the good Intelligence they had with the Crown; 'but they had no Reaſon to continue the ſame in this Change 'of Government, without ſome Stipulation for that Purpoſe; 'And if this Anſwer did not ſatisfy, but that Force was 'us'd towards them, they ſhou'd defend themſelves with 'their utmoſt Vigour.' Theſe Inſtructions were very ſecret, and never imagin'd by the Engliſh Commanders; who had their old Inſtructions to oblige all Foreign Veſſels to ſtrike Sail to them, which no Nation had ever refus'd; this being call'd The Honour of the FLAGG.

2. In the Month of May began the firſt Acts of Hoſtility; a little before which, our Chroniclers tell us of ſeveral Diſaſters and Prodigies, and particularly Sea-Fights ſeen in the Air at Noon Day, with Engliſh and Dutch Colours, at the Mouth of the Maes, as ſo many diſmal Prognoſticks of a new and bloody War. In the Beginning of the Month, the Dutch Fleet, conſiſting of forty two Sail, under the Command of Van Tromp, rode at Anchor in Dover Road, being driven, as they alledg'd, by a ſtrong Wind from the Coaſt of Flanders; when the Engliſh Fleet, The firſt Sea Fight between the Engliſh and the Dutch.

much leſs in Number, appear'd in View, May the 19th, under the Command of Admiral Blake. Whereupon the Dutch weigh'd Anchor, and put out to Sea, without ſtriking the Flag; which Blake obſerving, gave him three Guns without any Ball. It was obſerv'd, that at the very ſame Time an Expreſs Ketch from Holland came on Board their Admiral; and it was believ'd that he had then receiv'd more poſitive Orders to fight. For in the ſame Inſtant, he tack'd about, and bore directly upon the Engliſh Fleet, and Blake's three Guns were no ſooner fired, but in Contempt of the Notice, he diſcharg'd a ſingle Gun, and hung out a red Flag; and coming up to that Admiral, he pour'd in a Broad Side upon him, kill'd many of his Men, and damnify'd his Ship. Upon which Blake, tho' altogether ſurpris'd, immediately gave him the like rude Salutation; and ſo both Fleets were forthwith engag'd in a very fierce Encounter; which continu'd for the Space of four Hours, till parted by the Night, after the Loſs of much Blood on both Sides. The Dutch loſt two Ships, of which one was ſunk, and the other taken, with both the Captains, and near two Hundred Priſoners. On the Engliſh Side, there were many ſlain, and more wounded, but no Ship loſt, nor Officer of Note. And thus the War inſenſibly began, before it was ſuſpected in England.

The Dutch Meſſage.

The Engliſh Anſwer.

With what Views ſoever the Dutch had undertaken this ſudden Enterpriſe, it ſoon appear'd they had taken ill Meaſures of the Affections of the People. For the News of this Conflict was no ſooner arriv'd in Holland, but there was a general Conſternation among all Sorts of Men; and the States themſelves were ſo much concern'd at it, that with all Expedition they diſpatch'd two extraordinary Ambaſſadors into England; by whom they proteſted, 'That the late unhappy Engagement between the two Fleets of the two Common-wealths had hapned without their Knowledge, and contrary to the Intention of the Lords the States-General: That they receiv'd the fatal Tidings of ſo raſh an Attempt and Action, with Amazement and Aſtoniſhment; and that they had immediately enter'd into Conſultation, how they might beſt cloſe this freſh bleeding Wound, and to avoid the farther Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, ſo much deſir'd by the Enemies of both States: And therefore they moſt earneſtly deſir'd them, by their mutual Concurrence in Religion, and by their mutual Love of Liberty, that nothing might be done with Heat and Paſſion, which would widen the Breach; but that they might ſpeedily receive ſuch an Anſwer, as there might be no farther Obſtruction to the Commerce of both Common-wealths.' To which this Anſwer was preſently return'd to them, 'That the Civility which they had always ſhew'd towards the States of the United Provinces was ſo notorious, that nothing was more ſtrange than the ill Return they had made to them: That the extraordinary Preparations they had made of a hundred and fifty Ships, without any apparent Neceſſity, and the Inſtructions they had given to their Sea-Officers, had given too much Cauſe to believe, that the Lords the States-General had a Purpoſe to uſurp the known Right which the Engliſh have to the Seas, and to deſtroy their Fleets, which, under the Protection of the Almighty, are their Walls and Bulwarks; ſo that they might be expos'd to the Invaſion of any Powerful Enemy: Therefore they thought Themſelves oblig'd to endeavour, by God's Aſſiſtance, to ſeek Reparation for the Injuries and Damage they had already receiv'd, and to prevent the like for the future: However they wou'd never be without an Intention and Deſire, that ſome effectual Means might be found to eſtabliſh a good Peace and Union, and right Underſtanding between the two Nations.

The Second Sea-Fight.

With this imperious Anſwer they vigorouſly proſecuted their Revenge, and order'd Blake immediately to ſail to the Northward, it being then the Seaſon of the Year for the great Fiſheries of the Dutch upon the Coaſts of Scotland, and the Iſles of Orkney; where he now found their Multitude of Fiſhing-Boats, guarded by twelve Men of War; moſt of which, with all the Fiſh they had taken, he brought away with him as good Prize. About the ſame Time Sir George Ayſcough, being juſt return'd from the Weſt-Indies, where he had reduc'd Barbadoes and other Places, was ſent with another Part of the Fleet to the South; who preſently met with thirty Sail of their Merchants between Dover and Calais; a conſiderable Part of which he took, or ſunk, and forc'd the reſt to run on Shoar upon the Coaſt of France. From thence he ſtood Weſtward; and on the 16th of Auguſt, near Plymouth, with thirty Sail of Men of War, he engag'd the whole Dutch Fleet, conſiſting of ſixty Ships of War, and thirty Merchant Men, under the Command of De Ruyter. It was near four in the Afternoon when both Fleets began to engage, ſo that the Night quickly parted them; yet not before two of the Holland Men of War were ſunk, and moſt of the Men loſt. The Dutch in that Action applying themſelves chiefly to ruin the Tackling and Sails of the Engliſh, they found ſuch good Succeſs, that the next Morning they were not able to give them further Chace, till their Sails and Rigging cou'd be repaired. But ſcarce a Day paſs'd without the taking and bringing in many valuable Dutch Ships into the Ports of England; which, having begun their Voyages before any Notice given to them of the War, were haſtning home without any Fear of their Security: So that now, there being no Hope of Peace by the Mediation of their Ambaſſadors, who could not prevail in any Thing they propos'd, they return'd; and the War was proclaim'd, as well as proſecuted, on both Sides.

The King's Offer to the Dutch.

The French ſue to the Engliſh.

3. The King, then at Paris, finding Things in this Manner come to an open Rupture between the two Nations, thought this a proper Seaſon to interpoſe, and that if he himſelf was on Board the Dutch Fleet, he might occaſion the Revolt of many of the Engliſh, who he believ'd had engag'd Themſelves chiefly to gain an Opportunity of ſerving Him. Upon which he made a particular Offer to the Dutch Ambaſſador at Paris, to join Intereſts with his Maſters, and venture his Perſon in the Dutch Fleet; which Propoſal was indeed magnify'd in Holland, as a moſt generous Offer, but, chiefly by the Intereſt of the Penſioner De Wit, it was laid aſide by a Majority of Voices; they deſiring nothing more than to make Peace upon any Conditions. Nor can it appear very ſtrange that the Dutch made Shew of ſo much Flegm in this Affair, when the very Choler and Pride of the French, about the ſame Time, was ſo humbled by the over-ruling Spirit of the Engliſh, that tho' they took their Ships every Day, and made them Prize, and had lately ſeiz'd upon their whole Fleet that was going to the Relief of Dunkirk, by which means that Place fell into the Hands of the Spaniard; yet the Frenth cou'd not be provok'd to be angry with them, or to expreſs any Inclination to the King; but ſent an Ambaſſador, which they had not done till this Time, to expoſtulate civilly with the Parliament for having been ſo Unneighbourly, but in reality to deſire their Friendſhip upon what Terms they pleas'd; the Cardinal fearing nothing ſo much, as that the Spaniard wou'd make ſuch a Conjunction with the new Common-wealth, as ſhou'd diſappoint and break all his great Deſigns.

The Third Sea-Fight.

In the mean Time the War was carry'd on with great Fury and Vigour by the two Common-wealths; every Engagement becoming more fierce and bloody than the former. On the Dutch Side, Van Tromp, upon ſome Diſcontent, deſir'd to leave his Charge and retire; upon which De Wit was appointed in his Place, to whom De Ruyter was join'd in Commiſſion. Theſe two Commanders us'd all Expedition in getting their Fleet to Sea, and in October they appear'd not far from the Kentiſh Coaſt. Blake upon Notice of it haſtned with his Fleet towards them, having been on the Weſtern Coaſt to convoy ſome Merchant Ships homewards, and taken in his Way five Dutch Eaſt-India Ships of great Value, and ſix Streights Men worth two hundred thouſand Pounds. He divided his Fleet into three Squadrons, one commanded by Himſelf, the other by Pen the Vice-Admiral, and the third by Rear-Admiral Bourn; and on the 28th Day of October the Third Fight began between the two Rival States, and was continu'd for ſome Time with vaſt Thunderings and Bravery on both Sides. The Rear-Admiral of the Dutch was boarded and taken, and two more of their Ships were ſunk, and one blown up, ſo that De Wit thought it beſt to give over the Conflict, and by plying his Sails to get off; being purſu'd by the Engliſh Fleet within twelve Leagues of the Maes, and he, with the Remainder of his torn and ſhatter'd Ships, came into Goree. The Engliſh preſerv'd all their Ships, tho' many of them were much batter'd, and Blake came in much Triumph into the Downs. The Dutch were much afflicted with the Loſs of this Battel, which was by De Wit imputed to the Cowardiſe of ſome of his Commanders, and the Advantage of the Engliſh Ships over them, both in Number and Strength. But the Engliſh had had not ſuch good Succeſs in the Levant, where Captain Bodily with four or five Engliſh Frigots was ſet upon by Van Galen, who there commanded a Fleet of ſixteen Dutch Men of War; in which Encounter the Phœnix was taken by the Dutch, and the reſt of the Engliſh were forc'd to retire under the Protection of the Port of Leghorn: But Van Galen bought this Victory with the Loſs of his Life, and the Phœnix was ſhortly after regain'd by the Valour and Policy of Captain Cox, a former Lieutenant to the ſame Ship.

Both the Engliſh and Dutch, in the Beginning of the War, had ſent to the Swedes and Danes to invite them to their Party, becauſe the Materials for Shipping came from thoſe Princes Dominions: The Swedes were compliant with the Engliſh, and their Queen ſent an Ambaſſador for that Purpoſe; but the Danes declar'd againſt them, and for the States of Holland; and their King likewiſe ſent a Meſſage to them, ‘That he was ready to aſſiſt them with twenty good Ships of War, provided they would re-eſtabliſh Van Tromp in his late Employment as Admiral.’ This Offer was willingly embrac'd, and that great Commander prevail'd with to reaſſume his former Charge. He was very ambitious to give new Proofs of his Courage by ſome valiant Enterpriſe; and to that Purpoſe having got together eighty Men of War, and ten Fire-Ships, he made directly to the Back-ſide of the Goodwin, near the Place where the laſt Battel was fought. Blake was in the Downs with few more than forty Sail; but however was reſolv'd not to decline an Engagement, and therefore mov'd forwards to meet the Dutch Fleet. On the 29th Day of November, the Fourth Battel began, which laſted with great Fury, Terror and Confuſion, from two in the Afternoon, till ſix in the Evening. Here the two brave Admirals exerted all their Courage and Abilities: The Triumph, in which Blake himſelf commanded, with the Victory and Vauntguard, bore moſt of the Diſtreſs, being engag'd at one Time with twenty of the Dutch Ships; and tho' it was long doubted on which Side Fortune would decline, yet at laſt the Numbers of the Dutch drew it on their Side, with the Loſs of the Garland and Bonaventure which were taken, and one that was burnt, and three ſunk; and indeed if the Night had not been favourable to the Engliſh Retreat, the whole Fleet might have been in much Danger. The Dutch bought this Victory very dear, for they loſt many Men, and one of their Flag-Ships was blown up, and all the Seamen and Soldiers loſt; and the Ships of Van Tromp and De Ruyter were exceedingly damag'd. Blake, after this Defeat, drew his ſhatter'd Fleet into the Thames to be repaired; and it is ſaid, that Van Tromp triumphantly ſail'd through the Channel with a Broom on his Main-Top-Maſt, pretending to ſweep the Channel of all Engliſh Veſſels.

The Fourth Sea-Fight.

Cromwell his Deſigns.

4. During the Tranſactions of this bloody War abroad, Cromwell was exerciſing his Skill, and projecting how to compleat his ambitious Deſigns at home. He was no great Promoter of this War, which was likely to divert his Deſigns, and aggrandize the Common-wealth, if it met with any Succeſs; and he ſeem'd to have been led into it, principally to gratify his great Friend Saint-John, who muſt of Neceſſity be oblig'd. He daily found and perceiv'd the vaſt Expence of the War; and well knew, that all Parties, Friends and Foes, Presbyterians, Independants, Levellers, were all united in promoting it; which, he judg'd, could proceed from nothing ſo much, as that the Exceſs of the Expence might make it neceſſary to diſband a great Part of the Land-Army, to ſupport the Naval Power, which they could not now be without. He had full Authority in the One, but he had little or no Intereſt to place his own Creatures in the Fleet; all the Officers there being ſtill nominated and appointed ſolely by the Parliament. Therefore he had nothing more to do, but to make one bold Puſh, and maſter the Parliament it ſelf, and ſo diſſolve the Common-wealth.

A private Conference between him and White-lock.

Upon this nice Juncture he firſt took an Opportunity to adviſe and diſcourſe with Commiſſioner Whitelock, how to maintain all Things in Order and Obedience; between whom there paſs'd a remarkable Conference: After ſome general and inſinuating Talk, Cromwell put this ſhort Queſtion, What if a Man ſhould take upon him to be King? The other anſwer'd, I think that Remedy wou'd be worſe than the Diſeaſe. Upon asking him Why he thought ſo? the Commiſſioner proceeded, As to your own Perſon, the Title of KING wou'd be of no Advantage, becauſe you have the full Kingly Power in you already; concerning the Militia, as you are General. As to the Nomination of Civil Officers, thoſe whom you think fitteſt are ſeldom refus'd; and tho' you have no Negative Vote in the Paſſing of Laws, yet what you diſlike will not eaſily be carry'd; and the Taxes are already ſettled, and in your Power to diſpoſe the Mony rais'd. As to Foreign Affairs, tho' the Ceremonial Application be made to the Parliament, yet the Expectation of good or bad Succeſs in it, is from your Excellency; and particular Sollicitations of Foreign Miniſters are made to you only. So that I apprehend indeed leſs Envy and Danger and Pomp, but not leſs Power and real Opportunity of doing Good, in your being General, than it wou'd be if you had aſſum'd the Title of King. Cromwell proceeded to argue, That whoever was actually King by Election, the Acts done by him were as lawful and juſtifiable, as if done by a King who had the Crown by Inheritance; and that by an Act of Parliament in Henry the Seventh's Reign, it was ſafer for the People to act under a King, let his Title be what it will, than under any other Power. The Commiſſioner agreed to the Legality, but much queſtion'd the Expediency of it; and being particularly ask'd concerning the Danger of it, he anſwer'd thus, The Danger I think would be this: One of the main Points of Controverſy between us and our Adverſaries, is, ‘Whether the Government of this Nation ſhall be eſtabliſh'd in Monarchy, or in a Common-wealth?’ and moſt of our Friends have engag'd with us upon the Hopes of having the Government ſettled in the Latter; and to effect that, have undergone all their Hazards and Difficulties. They being perſuaded, tho' I think much miſtaken, that under the Government of a Common-wealth, they ſhall enjoy more Liberty and Right, both as to the Spiritual and Civil Concerns, than they ſhall under Monarchy, the Preſſures and Diſlikes whereof are ſo freſh in their Memories and Sufferings. Now if your Excellency will take upon you the Title of King, this State of your Caſe will be wholly determin'd, and Monarchy eſtabliſh'd in your Perſon; and the Queſtion will be no more, ‘Whether our Government ſhall be by a Monarch, or by a Free-State;’ but ‘Whether CROMWELL or STUART ſhall be our King and Monarch?’ And that Queſtion, wherein before ſo great Parties of the Nation were engag'd, and which was Univerſal, will by this Means become a private Controverſy only. Before it was National, ‘What Kind of Government we ſhall have?’ Now it will become particular, ‘Who ſhall be our Governor, whether the STUARTS, or the Family of the CROMWELLS?’ Thus the State of our Controverſy being totally chang'd, all thoſe many who were for a Common-Wealth, having their Hopes therein fruſtrate, will deſert you; your Hands will be weakened, your Intereſt ſtraitned, and your Cauſe in apparent Danger to be ruin'd. Here Cromwell confeſs'd he ſpoke Reaſon, and deſir'd to know if he cou'd find any other Expedient. Whitelock, after ſuggeſting the Dangers he was in from his own Officers, and from the Parliament, who were plotting to bring him down, or to leſſen his Authority, proceeded thus; Permit me, Sir, in the next Place, a little to conſider the Condition of the King of Scots. This Prince, being now by your Valour, and the Succeſs which God has given to the Parliament, reduc'd to a very low Condition, both he, and all about him, cannot but be very inclinable to hearken to any Terms, whereby their loſt Hopes may be reviv'd of his being reſtor'd to the Crown, and they to their Fortunes and native Country. By a private Treaty with him, you may ſecure your ſelf, and your Friends, and their Fortunes: You may make your ſelf and Poſterity as great and permanent, to all Human Probability, as ever any Subject was, and provide for your Friends: You may put ſuch Limits to Monarchical Power, as will ſecure our Spiritual and Civil Liberties; and you may ſecure the Cauſe in which we are all ingag'd: And this may be effectually done, by having the Power of the Militia continu'd in your ſelf, and whom you ſhall agree upon after you. I propound therefore for your Excellency to ſend to the King of Scots, and to have a private Treaty with him for this Purpoſe.

Cromwell adjourn'd the Diſcourſe to a more ſeaſonable Time, and went off with a Countenance and Carriage of Diſpleaſure; his Behaviour to Whitelock from that Time was much alter'd, and his adviſing with him not ſo frequent and intimate as before; and not long after, he found an Occaſion, by an honourable Employment, to remove him out of the Way, that he might be no Impediment to his ambitious Deſigns. For it is more than probable, that in his Thoughts and Intentions, he was for bringing the Crown upon his own Head; and it was a remarkable Providence that his Friends wou'd not permit him to follow his own Way. We are told from the noted Harry Nevill, that Cromwell upon this great Occaſion ſent for ſome of the chief City Divines, as if he made it a Matter of Conſcience, to be determin'd by their Advice; among whom was the leading Mr. Calamy, who very bravely oppos'd his Project of ſingle Government, and offer'd to prove it both Unlawful and Impracticable. Cromwell readily anſwer'd upon the firſt Head of Unlawful, and appeal'd to the Safety of the Nation, as being the Supreme Law: But, ſaid he, pray, Mr. Calamy, why Impracticable? The other as readily reply'd, Oh, 'tis againſt the Voice of the Nation; there will be Nine in Ten againſt you! Very right, ſays the intended Uſurper, but what if I ſhou'd diſarm the nine, and put the Sword into the tenth Man's Hand, wou'd not that do the Buſineſs? By which Anſwer he ſeem'd both to thank, as well as to ridicule his Adviſer.

However, to carry the Point as far as it wou'd bear, he and his Officers were daily complaining of the Grievances of the Long Parliament, and were loud and zealous ‘in recommending to the People the common Pretences of Right and Juſtice, and Publick Liberty, to put a Period to their Seſſion; and if they wou'd not ſhortly do it themſelves, the Army and the People muſt do it for them.’ There was ſtill one Obſtacle to be remov'd, and that was the young Duke of Gloceſter, now twelve Years of Age, a Priſoner in Cariſbrook Caſtle, who had been often thought of as a Perſon fit to receive the Crown, with particular and proper Limitations. Therefore, under the Pretext of ſaving a publick Expence, Means were found to ſet him at Liberty, the latter End of this Year; he being ſent with two Servants to Dunkirk, and promis'd a ſmall Exhibition, provided he wou'd not come near his Brother, or any of his Relations. But being got on that ſide the Water, he was receiv'd according to his Birth, and from Bruſſels attended to his Siſter the Princeſs of Orange at Breda, who receiv'd him with infinite Joy, having been in continual Fear, that his Life wou'd be ſacrific'd by thoſe who ſpar'd not that of his Royal Father. Nor was he receiv'd with leſs Joy at Paris, by the King his Brother, and the Queen his Mother, to whom he was welcom'd and treated as one riſen from the Dead.

The Death of Mr Greaves,

Sir Nathaniel Brent,

Mr. Jacob,

Mr. Wilſon,

Patrick Young,

The Lords Hopton and Aſhley,

The Earl of Briſtol,

And the Lady Davies.

In this Year there dy'd ſeveral Perſons of Note and Worth, but generally of different Talents and Qualifications, and particularly three of the ſame College: As firſt, Mr. John Greaves, a Man of a ſingular Genius, who tho' he had no greater Preferment than a Fellowſhip of Merton College in Oxford, and the Aſtronomy Profeſſorſhip in that Univerſity, was an admirable Proficient in Philoſophy, Languages, and all Sorts of Critical Learning, which he vaſtly improv'd by his Travels into Ægypt, and many other Foreign Countries: Afterwards, being ejected by the Viſitors of thoſe Times, he retir'd to London, and dy'd in the fiftieth Year of his Age, to the ſenſible Affliction of Mr. Selden, and other great Men, and no leſs to the Loſs of the Learned World. Next, Sir Nathaniel Brent, Doctor of the Civil Law, Vicar-General, and Judge of the Prerogative Court, was Warden of the ſame College with Mr. Greaves, who in King James's Reign underwent great Dangers in Italy to procure the Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, which he tranſlated into Engliſh, for which he is honourably mention'd by Poſterity: He was much in Favour with Archbiſhop Abbot, and likewiſe with the late King; but upon the Turn of the Times, he ſided with the Presbyterians, became a Witneſs againſt Archbiſhop Laud, and an Arch-Viſitor of his own Univerſity, which he left, and dy'd in London, where he was bury'd with extraordinary Solemnity. Mr. Henry Jacob, Fellow of the ſame College, was a Perſon altogether of another Stamp and Genius, and the Prodigy of his Age for Philological and Oriental Learning, who was preſented to the Univerſity, at twenty two Years of Age, by William Earl of Pembroke, as a great Rarity: Being afterwards ejected by the Parliament Viſitors, be retired to London, being a Perſon in his Nature altogether helpleſs and ſhiftleſs, where he was reliev'd by the great Selden, in Gratitude for his former Aſſiſtances, and dy'd in the forty ſixth Year of his Age, being often call'd by the Name of Selden Junior. We are likewiſe to mention Mr. Arthur Wilſon, a Gentleman of Norfolk, who had travell'd into ſeveral Countries as a Retainer to the late Earl of Eſſex, who had a particular Reſpect for him; a Perſon of ſufficient Command of Senſe and Expreſſion, and well skill'd in the Mathematicks and Poetry; but is chiefly mention'd here for his Hiſtory of the Life and Reign of King James, which, tho' written not without ſome Prejudices and Rancour in reſpect to ſome Perſons, and too much with the Air of a Romance, is thought to be the beſt of that Kind extant. We muſt not forget Mr. Patrick Young, or Patricius Junius, a Perſon worthy of Note, Library-Keeper to the late King, a moſt learned Scotch-man, and the moſt eminent Grecian of his Time, whoſe Name is remember'd by the Learned of all Nations, for his explaining and bringing to Light the two Epiſtles of St. Clement to the Romans, and the Alexandrian Copy of the Septuagint, &c. which in the Year 1628 had been preſented to King Charles the Firſt by Cyril Patriarch of Conſtantinople. Beſides theſe Men of Letters, there dy'd the two incomparable Lords for Valour, Honour and Loyalty, Ralph Lord Hopton, and Jacob Lord Aſhley, of whom Mention has been often made. Laſtly dy'd that eminent Stateſman and Peer John Digby Earl of Briſtol, at the City of Paris; of whoſe Actions and Character ſufficient has been ſaid already; only we are to obſerve, that notwithſtanding the Diſobligations, or rather Hardſhips he met from the Court of the late King, he publiſh'd one of the beſt Apologies for that Prince, that is extant. Beſides theſe eminent Men, we are not to forget a celebrated Female, the Lady Eleanor Davies, Daughter to the Earl of Caſtlehaven, and the Relict of Sir John Davies, the late King's firſt Serjeant at Law, formerly mention'd; a Lady that is ſaid to have been learned above her Sex, humble below her Fortune, whoſe Mind was ſo truely great, that no Proſperity cou'd corrupt it, nor Adverſity deject it; but ſhe was moſt of all diſtinguiſh'd by her uncommon Predictions, for which by many ſhe was accounted a Propheteſs, and by others an Enthuſiaſt, or Mad-Woman: However, no Pretenders of that Kind ever met with ſuch fortunate Hits; and, beſides the Death of the Duke of Buckingham, in the moſt flouriſhing State of the Nation, ſhe foretold the happy Reſtoration, and all with ſurpriſing Marks of Diſtinction.

5. All this Time the War was carry'd on with great Violence and Fury between the two Common-wealths; and the Engliſh were more than ordinary vigorous and active, in fitting out their Fleet, and repairing the Diſhonour of their laſt Defeat. Particular Encouragement was given, and new Rewards promis'd to the Sea-Men and Soldiers, and all Induſtry us'd to haſten out to Sea, under the Command of the Admirals, Blake, Dean and Monk, which laſt lately came from Scotland. The States of Holland, hearing of theſe Preparations, ſent an Expreſs to Van Tromp, then at Rhee, to haſten away with what Merchant Men were ready, and to block up the River Thames to prevent the Engliſh from coming out. But contrary to their Expectation, and even to their Amazement, the Engliſh Admirals ſet Sail on the eighth of February from Queensborough with ſixty Sail of Men of War, to which they were joyn'd on the eleventh of the ſame Month, with twenty Sail more from Portſmouth. With his brave Fleet they ſail'd over againſt Portland, where they lay extended croſs the Channel, Half-Seas over, to diſcover the Dutch Fleet; and on Friday the eighteenth of February by Break of Day, the Southern Ships of the Engliſh deſcried the Enemies Fleet, conſiſting of about ſeventy ſix Men of War, who had the Charge of near three Hundred Merchant Ships to convoy homewards. On the one Side Blake was fir'd with a Reſolution to regain his former Reputation, and Van Tromp on the other Side was inflam'd with no leſs Paſſion to preſerve the Glory he had won, and the vaſt Riches he had now under his Charge.

The fifth Sea-Fight between the Engliſh and the Dutch.

Accordingly the two Admirals, having ſingled out each other, about Ten in the Morning encounter'd with the utmoſt Courage and Bravery; which being ſoon after ſucceeded by the Conjunction and Intermingling of both Fleets, the Battle grew ſo fierce and furious, that there was ſcarce any Thing to be ſeen but Maſts overturn'd into the Sea, Splinters flying on all Sides, Sails rent and torn in Pieces, Cables and Cordage cut in Sunder; in one Place a Veſſel boarded, and in a Moment the Men chac'd off, or blown up, with the Decks, into the Air; and in another was ſeen a Ship ſwallow'd up by the Waves with ſeveral Hundreds of Men, and the Sea turn'd red with Human Blood, and cover'd with dead Bodies, and floating Parts of ſhatter'd Ships: All which, inſtead of diſmaying the Combatants, ſerv'd only to excite their Rage, and inflame them to a more cruel and implacable Slaughter; and the continual Outcries of miſerable wounded Wretches render'd them but the more bloody-minded, and rous'd them to a more cruel and remorſeleſs Revenge. The riſing Coaſts on both Sides the Channel were violently ſhaken with the reſounding Thunders of the roaring Guns; and thoſe ingag'd, ſeem'd to have been involv'd in the Wreck of Nature. Blake's Ship, the Triumph, receiv'd above ſeven Hundred Shot in her Hull, from the Vigour of the Dutch Admiral. This dreadful Fight laſted three Days, with wonderful Bravery; in the two laſt of which, Van Tromp, endeavouring to ſave his Merchant Ships, fought retreating, and putting them before him; till at length, the Winds being croſs to the Engliſh, he got to Calais Sands, and ſo Tyded it home. The Dutch loſt eleven Men of War, and thirty Merchant's Ships, and above two Thouſand Men, beſides fifteen Hundred Priſoners: But the Engliſh, tho' many Ships were ſhatter'd, had but one Sunk, nam'd the Southampton; their Slain were not many leſs than the Enemy.

The Dutch ſue for Peace.

The States of Holland and Weſt-Friezland were ſo ſenſibly affected with this great Loſs, that they ſent Letters to the Parliament in England, to endeavour after ſome Means to terminate theſe bloody Conteſts: But the Letter being ſubſcrib'd only by the two afore-mention'd States, the Parliament return'd Anſwer, 'That they ſhou'd be willing to 'embrace any Way propos'd to them by all the Lords of 'the United Provinces, to conclude theſe Differences in 'an amicable Way.' But the Negotiation produc'd no Effect, by reaſon of unforeſeen Accidents and Changes; and yet it was particularly encourag'd and promoted by Cromwell himſelf, who for his own private Advantage very much deſir'd a Peace. So that when this Addreſs was made by the Dutch, he ſet up his whole Reſt and Intereſt, that it might be well accepted, and a Treaty thereupon begin; which when he cou'd not bring to paſs, he deferr'd not long to take Vengeance upon the Parliament, by a Way they leaſt of all expected. The Dutch had offer'd to acknowledge to the Engliſh the Sovereignty of the Britiſh Seas, and to pay three Hundred Thouſand Pounds to the Engliſh Common-wealth; but when they found it did not ſucceed, they more immediately apply'd themſelves to Cromwell, with the Promiſe of vaſt Sums to him, in caſe he wou'd venture to depoſe and diſſolve the Parliament, as we find it in Stubbe. Therefore it is juſtly believ'd, That that daring Action, ſoon after, was in a great meaſure owing to the private Promiſes and Solicitations of the States of Holland.

Cromwell's Policy.

6. And now all Things drew near to a Criſis, and the great Common-wealth to a Period, by Means altogether unforeſeen, or ſuch as were not to be prevented, by the Republican Governors. There having been no Union between the Army and the Parliament, but what Cromwell had cunningly made and ſupported, it was eaſy for him to break it; and by ſetting thoſe two great Bodies at Variance, to employ the One for the Deſtruction of the Other. The Common-wealth owed not only its Authority, but its Subſiſtance to the Power of the Army; therefore to this Purpoſe he only needed to give Way to a private Jealouſy, that the latter had conceiv'd againſt the Former. For the Officers of the Army began more and more to complain, ‘ That the Parliament diſpos'd of all Things at Will, and diſtributed among themſelves all valuable Employments; That they were ſo many Kings, and inſtead of one Sovereign, England had many, who leſs valu'd the Laws, than him they had deſtroy'd; That they embru'd the Kingdom in Blood, upon Pretence of Puniſhing the Oppoſers of the Government, but in reality to gratify their own private Revenge; That they had endeavour'd to perpetuate Themſelves in an Employment which ought to be Temporary, ſo that all the good Subjects of the State might Share in it; That the Parliament ought to be diſſolv'd, and a new Repreſentative Choſen by the Univerſal Conſent of the People, according to the Scheme laid when Monarchy was aboliſh'd to ſet up a Common-wealth.' Theſe Complaints, which Cromwell had ſuppreſs'd, as long it was convenient to preſerve a good Underſtanding between the Parliament and the Army, broke out as ſoon as it was his Intereſt to have them divided.

His Dealings with the Army Officers.

To this End that artful Uſurper held ſeveral Conſults with the Officers of the Army, attended with much Faſting and Praying, there being ſome extraordinary Work to be done. The Officers being of two Parties and different Intereſts, it was ſcarce believ'd they cou'd agree in the Deſign; but Cromwell knew how to inſinuate himſelf ſo as to pleaſe them all, that he might by them accompliſh his Ends. Harriſon, who was one of the Heads of that Sect now known by the Name of Fifth-Monarchy Men, had gain'd many from the Congregations of Feak, Rogers, Sympſon, and the reſt of that Tribe, with a conſiderable Part of the inferior Officers; and theſe were ſo intoxicated with that Notion, that they cou'd approve of no Government, but Where Chriſt was to rule, which, they ſaid, was a Dominion to be exercis'd only by Saints under him; and of this Sort they reſolv'd to chuſe by Nomination a new Repreſentative. Cromwell very artfully mingled with theſe Zealots in their Projection; he had ſecured Monk, and deceiv'd Lambert into the Hopes of ſucceeding him in all his Greatneſs: So that to help forwards the grand Deſign, there came out daily from the Army Petitions, Addreſſes, Remonſtrances, and ſuch like Papers, ‘ for the Payment of their Arrears, the putting an End to this Parliament, and the Summoning a more equal Repreſentative; which wou'd be the moſt popular Action they cou'd perform. On the other Side, many of the Officers perceiving the deep Deſign of Cromwell, of getting the Monarchy into his own Hands, were exceedingly concern'd, and ſome of them openly proteſted againſt it. The chief of this Party were Colonel Venables, Downing, and Major Streater; the latter of whom ventur'd to declare, That the General deſign'd to ſet up Himſelf, and that it was a Betraying of their moſt glorious Cauſe, for which ſo much Blood had been Spilt: But Harriſon interrupted him, and told him, He was aſſured, the General did not ſeek Himſelf in it, but did it to make Way for the Rule of Jeſus, that he might have the Sceptre. To whom Streater made this Reply, That unleſs Jeſus came very ſuddenly, he wou'd come too late; for which Oppoſition, Cromwell took an Opportunity to ſend him to Priſon.

Debates in Parliament.

The Parliament was very ſenſible of theſe Actings, but knew not well how to prevent or divert them; yet they us'd Methods to make the Officers underſtand, ‘ The great Inconveniences that wou'd happen from a ſudden Diſſolution; and that the only Way to preſerve the Nation, wou'd be to fill up the preſent Houſe with new Elected Members, properly qualify'd; which wou'd pleaſe the People, and their Acts wou'd be receiv'd with greater Reſpect and Authority.' The Officers on the other ſide anſwer'd them, ‘ That they were grown ſo Carnal and Corrupt, that the People of God cou'd expect no Good from them; therefore They themſelves ought to take Care, that the ſupreme Government of the Land ſhou'd be plac'd in the Hands of ſuch as truely fear'd God, and were of approv'd Integrity.' Upon this Subject there aroſe a great Debate in the Houſe of Parliament, where ſeveral of the Members, out of Juſtice, Reaſon, or a foreſeen Neceſſity, were for a Diſſolution, and a new Election: But Harry Martin told them, ‘ That in this Particular, he thought they might find the beſt Advice from the Scripture: That when Moſes was found upon the River, and brought to Pharoah's Daughter, ſhe took Care that the Mother might be found out, by whom the young Child might be nurſed; which ſucceeded very happily. He ſaid, their Common-wealth was yet an Infant, of a weak Growth, and a tender Conſtitution; therefore no Body cou'd be ſo fit to nurſe it, as the Mother that brought it forth; and that they ſhou'd not think of putting it under any other Hands, till it had obtain'd more Years and Vigour.' The Nation look'd upon it as a ſpurious Iſſue, not fit to be nouriſh'd, or brought up; but the Parliament thought it moſt neceſſary to be preſerv'd, and in Order to that, they ſhou'd not think of diſſolving, though their Continuance had before been determin'd to the 3d Day of November 1654. Therefore they declar'd it a Matter too high for any private Perſons to meddle with; and to put a ſeaſonable Stop to any farther Preſumption of that Kind, they appointed a Committee, with all Expedition to prepare an Act of Parliament, ‘ For filling up of their Houſe, and for ſettling their Qualifications; and by which it ſhou'd be declar'd to be High-Treaſon, for any Man to propoſe, or contrive the Changing of the preſent Government ſettled and eſtabliſh'd.'

1653. Car. 5.

Cromwell now clearly diſcern'd that they wou'd never be perſuaded to part with that Authority and Power, which was ſo profitable and pleaſant to them; therefore he reſolved upon the moſt bold and expeditious Way with them. In Order to this, on the ninth of April, he held a Conſultation with the choiceſt of his Friends at Whitehall, ‘ To find out ſome Expedient for the better carrying on the Government of the Common-wealth, and to put a Period to the preſent Parliament.' Some few, particularly Whitelock and Widdrington, repreſented the Danger of diſſolving the Parliament, and the Difficulties of erecting any other Form of Government: But Saint-John, and ſeveral Members, and Officers, let into the Secret, declar'd their Opinion, ‘ That it was neceſſary to take ſome new Meaſures; and that it was not fit the preſent Aſſembly of Parliament ſhou'd be permitted to prolong their own Power.'

Cromwell enters the Houſe in a military Way.

No Concluſion being made, the Junto was adjourn'd to the next Morning; when, in the midſt of the Debate, Cromwell, hearing that the Houſe, inſtead of diſſolving themſelves, as many expected, were going upon their new Act of Eſtabliſhment, in a great Heat commanded ſome of the Officers to ſend for a Party of Soldiers, with which he march'd directly to Weſtminſter; and placing his Men, ſome at the Door and ſome in the Lobby, and others on the Stairs, he led one File of Muſqueteers into the Houſe with him: And then, without moving his Hat, according to Dugdale, he firſt addreſs'd himſelf to his Friend Saint-John, telling him, That he then came to do that which grieved him to the very Soul, and what he had earneſtly, with Tears, pray'd to God againſt: Nay that he had rather be torn in Pieces than do it: But that there was a Neceſſity laid upon him therein, in Order to the Glory of God, and Good of the Nation. To which the other anſwer'd, That he knew not what he meant; but did pray, that whatever muſt be done, might have a happy Iſſue for the General Good. Then calling Harriſon to him, he told him, The Parliament is ripe for a Diſſolution; this is the Time, I muſt do it. So looking furiouſly upon the Speaker, he bid him leave the Chair, and told the Houſe, They had ſat long enough, unleſs they had done more good; crying out, You are no longer a Parliament, I ſay you are no Parliament! When ſome of the Members began to ſpeak, he ſtopp'd them, and call'd Sir Harry Vane a Juggler, Harry Martin and Sir Peter Wentworth, Whore-Maſters, Tom Challoner a Drunkard, Allen the Gold-Smith, a Cheater of the Publick: And having in effect call'd them all Rogues and Raſcals, he ſtamp'd with his Foot, and bad them For Shame be gone, and give Place to honeſter Men! Upon this Signal the Soldiers came in; and he bad one of them To take away that Fool's Bauble the Mace; and Harriſon taking the Speaker by the Arm, remov'd him out of the Chair, and put an End to the Parliament. After which, according to Ludlow, he cunningly Addreſs'd himſelf to the Members, and told them, It is you that have forc'd me to this, for I have ſought the Lord Night and Day, that he wou'd rather ſlay me, than put me upon this Work. So ſeiſing upon all their Papers, he turned them out of the Houſe, and lock'd up the Doors; and returning to his Council of Officers, he told them of his Exploit, and ſaid, When he went to the Houſe, he did not think to do it; but perceiving the Spirit of God ſo ſtrongly upon him, he wou'd no longer conſult Fleſh and Blood; ſince the Parliament intended to have perpetuated Themſelves. Then going to the Council of State, which ſat in the Afternoon,

He diſſolves the long Parliament and the Common-Wealth.

he let them know, That the Parliament was diſſolv'd, and that was no Place for them, and ſo civilly diſmiſs'd them.

A general Reflection.

Thus the unwieldy and formidable Common-wealth of England, an unknown Fabrick, founded upon the Ruins of the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, erected by an infinite Expence of Blood and Treaſure, and ſupported by an unnatural and ungovernable Power, was in a Moment blown down and deſtroy'd, by the Breath of one of its chief Architects; and all this without any Noiſe or Tumult, a Queſtion ask'd, or a Vote put, or a bloody Noſe, or a broken Head. And what is further amazing, is, That after the Members were with the laſt Infamy and Contempt expell'd, they never in Cromwell's Time offer'd to meet in a Body, even that of a Club, to endeavour at their Re-union; but ſneak'd and crumbled away to their Reſpective Habitations, with a Silence that confeſs'd both their Guilt, and their Puniſhment: Nay, and the common People, in which they confided, never once interpos'd by the leaſt Inſurrection, or ſo much as Petition, but let them drop without a Word or a Wiſh to ſave them. So as they, who had commanded the Mob, in Riots and Libels, againſt their King, Biſhops, and Nobility, were now deſerted by them in their extream Agonies, and ſuffer'd to expire without one Sigh or Groan. Such was the Judgment of Heaven againſt thoſe, whoſe Pride had rais'd them above all Kings, and whoſe Actions began to make all Europe tremble.

CHAP. II.

The PROTECTORATE of OLIVER CROMWELL.

From his forcible Diſſolution of the Long-Parliament, and Common-wealth of England, to the Death of that fortunate Uſurper.

Containing the Space of 5 Years, 4 Months, and 14 Days.

I. 1. WE have paſs'd over the Rule and Government of many Uſurpers, and are now entering upon the Dictatorſhip or Protectorate of one Man, Oliver Cromwell; who, tho' he did not aſſume the Title of Protector, till ſeveral Months after, yet his Power was in Effect the ſame, from the Moment that he had diſſolv'd and diſpers'd that formidable Body of Men at Weſtminſter. That ſingle Action made him Maſter of three Kingdoms, the Undertaking of which was the more amazing, ſince there was no Example or Precedent in the Chriſtian World, that could raiſe his Ambition to ſuch a preſumptuous Enterprize; which he boldly attempted without any rational Dependence upon the Friendſhip of one Man, who had any other Intereſt to advance his Deſigns, but what he had given him by preferring him in the War. The Steps he had made towards this vaſt Height, were uncommon, bold and fortunate: Many have acquir'd the like Dominion by Fortitude and Virtue, and ſome by daring and flagrant Crimes, and ſome few by Cheating and Couſenage; but ſcarce any beſides Himſelf ever mounted to the Supream Power, by Tears, and Sighs, and Lyes, and Pretences to Religion. He ſeems to have had very peculiar Encouragement from Abroad, and particularly the States of Holland, to attempt this bold Work, beſides the Incitement of his own natural Ambition: Nor could he be inſenſible how the Actions of the Parliament Men had render'd them odious to the laſt Degree to the People; and that he could not do a more popular Act, or give a more hopeful Proſpect to the Nation, than to put an immediate Period to their exorbitant Authority. This he ſoon found by the general Joy among all Sorts of People, who now treated them with as much Contempt and Scandal, as they had formerly with Reſpect and Veneration. They ridicul'd them ſeveral Ways, and fix'd a Bill upon the Parliament Doors, with THIS HOUSE IS TO BE LETT; and lampoon'd them by the common Ballad-Singers, who cry'd about the City, Twelve Parliament Men for a Penny! with innumerable other Indignities offer'd both to their Perſons and Qualities.

Cromwell*'s great Attempt.*

Not long before this great Change, Ludlow tells us, That Cromwell had made the moſt ſolemn Profeſſions of Fidelity to the Parliament, aſſuring them, That if they wou'd command the Army to break their Swords over their Heads, he wou'd undertake they ſhou'd do it: And immediately after he had effected it, he carry'd on the ſame Degree of Diſſimulation, and ſent for Major Salloway and Mr. Carew, to whom he complain'd of the great Weight of Affairs that, by this Undertaking, was fallen upon him; affirming, That the Thoughts of the Conſequences thereof made him to tremble, and therefore deſired them to free him from the Temptations that might be laid before him; and for that Purpoſe to go immediately to the chief Juſtice Saint-John, Mr. Selden, and ſome others, and endeavour to perſuade them to draw up ſome Inſtrument of Government, that might put the Power out of his Hands. To which Major Salloway anſwer'd, The Way, Sir, to free you from Temptation, is for you not to look upon your ſelf to be under it; but to reſt perſuaded, That the Power of the Nation is in the Good People of England, as formerly it was. Cromwell perceiving by this that he was better underſtood than he deſir'd, fell upon another Expedient, before he wou'd fully diſcover Himſelf, appointing a Meeting of the chief Field Officers to be at Whitehall, in order to conſider what was to be done in this Exigency. He and his Council of Officers did not ſo much want a Vindication of what they had done, as a quieting Declaration of what they did intend to do. Hence they publiſh'd a long Account of their Proceedings and Intentions, 'Beginning with ſufficient 'Intimation, That the whole Government was devolv'd 'upon the General and his Army, by a Conqueſt of an 'extraordinary kind: Then caſting very abundant Reflections upon the Members who had preſumptuouſly deſign'd to perpetuate Themſelves; and ſo juſtifying the Neceſſity of putting an End to ſuch a Self-Seeking Parliament, promiſing to put the Government into the Hands 'of Perſons of approv'd Fidelity and Honeſty.' Then after they laid all their Actings upon Neceſſity and Providence, they at laſt declare, 'That all Magiſtrates and Officers 'whatſoever ſhall proceed in their reſpective Places and 'Offices, and Obedience ſhall be paid to them as fully, as 'when the Parliament was ſitting.' Signed by the Lord-General, and his Council of Officers, Whitehall, April 22, 1653. This Council of Officers, with ſome others, which was form'd in Imitation of the late Council of State, conſiſted of thirty Perſons, Cromwell, Fleetwood, Lambert, Liſle, Harriſon, Desborough, Pickering, Wolleſley, Aſhley-Cooper, Hope, Hewſon, Norton, Montague, Benet, Stapeley, Sydenham, Tomlinſon, Jones, Tichburn, Strickland, Carey, Howard, Broughton, Lawrence, Holiſter, Comptney, Major, St. Nicolas, Moyer, and Williams.

His Diſſimulation.

1653. Car. 5.

His and his Officers Declaration.

This Declaration was immediately ſupported by the ready Conſent of all the Admirals at Sea, and all the Captains of Ships, and by the Commanders of all the Land Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and was look'd upon as very reaſonable. And within a few Days after, a ſecond Declaration, 'by which the People were required to live 'peaceably, and quietly ſubmit themſelves to the new 'Council of State, to be nominated by the General, until 'ſuch Time as a Parliament, conſiſting of Perſons of approv'd Fidelity and Honeſty, could meet, and take upon 'them the Government of theſe Nations,' found an equal Submiſſion and Obedience. All this while Cromwell pretended an extraordinary Affection for a Republick; and having made himſelf Acceptable, he reſolv'd to ſhew that he was Neceſſary, and to put Things into ſuch a Condition, that it ſhou'd be a Favour in him to accept of what they ſhou'd be neceſſitated to confer, inſtead of being Himſelf oblig'd, by demanding what was none of his Due. The Method he obſerv'd for forming a Government, by firſt throwing it into an unaccountable Confuſion, and by diveſting himſelf of all Pretences to Authority, and putting what he had no Title to keep, into the Hands of ſuch Men, as wou'd certainly delegate the Power to him in a Form of Law, was really admirable. He was ſenſible that a Parliament was ſtill a Name of greater Veneration than any other Aſſembly; and the Contempt to which the laſt was reduc'd, wou'd probably teach the next to behave it ſelf with more Caution; however the Way was paved for diſſolving them, whenever they ſhould act otherwiſe. He reſolv'd to ſummon a Body of Men, and call them a Parliament, that whenever they ſerv'd Him, their Acts might carry ſome Authority; but he reſolv'd alſo to chuſe them Himſelf, that when they did not, he might diſſolve them with the more Juſtice.

A Second Declaration.

Accordingly he reſolv'd to make Choice of a Number of Men, conſiſting of about a hundred and forty Perſons, who ſhou'd meet as a Parliament to ſettle the Nation; ſuch Men who, in general, were like to bring the Name and Reputation of Parliaments lower than it was at preſent. It can hardly be believ'd that any Man cou'd produce ſo wild a Notion, that ſuch Perſons ſhou'd contribute towards any Settlement, or that their Actions cou'd any Ways advance his particular Deſign: Yet upon the View and Conſideration of the Men elected, many did conclude, That he had made his own Scheme entirely to Himſelf; and tho' he communicated it to no Man that was known, he believ'd it the moſt natural Way to ripen, and produce the Effects that afterwards appear'd. For the bringing together of the new Men, a new Way was thought on; which was by a Warrant under Cromwell's own Hand, directed to every one of them in particular, telling them ‘ Of the Neceſſity of diſſolving the late Parliament, and of an equal Neceſſity, that the Peace, Safety, and good Government of the Common-wealth ſhou'd be provided for, and therefore that he had, by the Advice of his Council of Officers, nominated divers Perſons fearing God, and of approv'd Fidelity and Honeſty, to whom the great Charge and Truſt of ſo weighty Affairs was to be committed, and that having good Aſſurance of their Love to, and Courage for God, and the Intereſt of his Cauſe, and the good People of this Common-wealth;' he concluded in theſe Words, ‘ I Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General and Commander in Chief of all the Forces rais'd, or to be rais'd within this Common-wealth, do hereby ſummon and require you perſonally to be, and appear at the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, upon the fourth Day of July next, then and there to take upon you the ſaid Truſt: And you are hereby call'd, and appointed to ſerve as a Memher of the County of, &c. Dated the 8th Day of June, 1653.

Cromwell's Way of ſummoning a Parliament.

His FIRST PARLIAMENT.

2. Upon this unheard-of Summons, on the fourth of July, ten Weeks after the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament, the Perſons nominated appear'd at the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, (where Cromwell and his Council of Officers were ready to receive them,) to the Number of above a hundred and twenty; being for the moſt Part a Body of illiterate, weak and obſcure Fellows, of a great deal of Heat and Enthuſiaſm, and very little Light and Knowledge. According to which Diſpoſition Cromwell made them a long Diſcourſe ‘ of the Fear of God, and the Honour due to his Name, fill'd with Texts of Scripture; and remember'd the wonderful Mercies of God to this Nation, and the continu'd Series of Providence, by which he had appear'd in carrying on his Cauſe, and bringing Affairs into that preſent glorious Condition, they now were in. He put them in Mind of the noble Actions of the Army in the famous Victory of Worceſter, and of the Applications he had made to the Parliament, for a good Settlement of all the Affairs of the Common-wealth, the Neglect of which made it abſolutely neceſſary to diſſolve it.' He aſſured them by many Arguments, ſome of which were brought from the Scripture it ſelf, ‘ That they had a very Lawful Call to take upon them the Supream Authority of the Nation; that he never look'd to ſee ſuch a Day, when Jeſus Chriſt ſhou'd be ſo owned, as this Day was; and he had not allow'd Himſelf in the Choice of one Perſon, in whom he had not this good Hope, That there was Faith in Jeſus Chriſt, and Love unto all his Saints and People:' And concluded with an earneſt Deſire, ‘ That great Tenderneſs might be us'd to all conſcientious Perſons, of what Judgment ſoever they appear'd to be.' His Diſcourſe finiſh'd, he deliver'd to them an Inſtrument in Parliament under his Hand and Seal, whereby, with the Advice of his Council of Officers, he did devolve, and intruſt the Supreme Authority of this Common-wealth into the Hands of thoſe Perſons therein-mention'd, and declar'd,

His Speech to the Members.

And Powers given to them.

‘ That They, or any Forty of Them, were to be held and acknowledg'd the Supream Authority of the Nation, to which all Perſons within the ſame, and the Territories thereunto belonging, were to yield Obedience and Subjection, to the third Day of November, which ſhou'd be in the Year 1654; and three Months before the Time preſcribed ſhou'd expire, they were to make Choice of other Perſons to ſucceed them, whoſe Power and Authority ſhou'd not exceed one Year; and then they were likewiſe to provide, and take Care for a like Succeſſion in the Government.

Being thus veſted with this Authority, they repair'd to the Parliament Houſe in Weſtminſter, where they began with Seeking God by Prayer, which was perform'd by eight or ten gifted Men in the Aſſembly; and with that Succeſs, that a Member of it tells us, That much of the Preſence of Chriſt appear'd that Day, to the great gladding of the Hearts of many, ſome affirming, They never enjoy'd ſo much of the Spirit and Preſence of Chriſt in any of the Meetings and Exerciſes of Religion in all their Lives, as they did that Day. This done, they at once voted Themſelves ‘ To be THE PARLIAMENT OF ENGLAND, and that all Addreſſes ſhou'd be made to them under that Title;' and accordingly they made Choice of one Rouſe to be their Speaker, an old Gentleman of Devonſhire, who had been Member of the former Parliament, and in that Time been preferr'd and made Provoſt of Eaton-College, which Office he then enjoy'd, with an Opinion of having ſome Knowledge in the Latin and Greek Tongues, but of a very mean Underſtanding, but throughly engag'd in the Guilt of the Times. Next they reſolv'd, ‘ That no Perſon ſhou'd be employ'd or admitted into the Service of the Parliament, but ſuch as the Houſe ſhou'd be firſt ſatisfy'd of his Real Godlineſs.' By which Means this Aſſembly, which was by ſome call'd the Little Parliament, came to call'd The Godly Parliament; but was more often known by the Name of Barebone's Parliament, from one Praiſe-God Barebones, a Leather-Seller in Fleetſtreet, who had diſtinguiſh'd Himſelf by being an eminent Stickler and Speaker in the Houſe.

Their uncommon Proceedings.

Having ſettled the Ceremonial and Circumſtantial Parts of the Aſſembly, they proceeded vigorouſly towards a Thorough Reformation; imagining, or diſcourſing of nothing leſs, ‘ Than that Jeſus Chriſt muſt ſhortly reign with them here on Earth.' To prepare the Way therefore to his Perſonal Appearance, they conſider'd of aboliſhing the Miniſterial Function, as favouring totally of Popery. They were not content with the Removal of Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Arch-deacons, Deans, Chapters and Prebendaries; but they ſaid that Parſons, Vicars, Curates, Rectors, Donatives, and Incumbents, ought to be taken away, as Strangers to the Goſpel. Then they were for taking away of all Tythes, as the Reliques of Judaiſm: Next, for the Abrogation of the old Engliſh Laws, as Badges of the Conqueſt, and Norman Slavery; and laſtly for the Suppreſſion of the Univerſities, and all Schools for Learning, as Heatheniſh and Unneceſſary, together with all Titles of Honour and Diſtinctions, as not agreeable to the Chriſtian Purity. All which they had probably effected; but that ſome few of them, of better Judgments, gave a ſtop to this uncommon Career. But for the Court of Chancery, they really voted it down; and then paſs'd an Act for the ſolemnizing of all Marriages by Juſtices of Peace, after Publication made for that Purpoſe in the Church, or open Market; and another that the Birth and not the Baptiſm of Children ſhou'd be thenceforth regiſter'd, which ſhew'd of what Judgment they were in that Point. The Act likewiſe for ſubſcribing that Inſtrument, call'd The Engagement, which had paſs'd not long after the late King's Death, they voted unfit to continue, and totally repeal'd it: And for the Tryal of what they call'd Treaſon, or High-Crimes, they erected a new High Court of Juſtice. And thus they continu'd for above five Months, tyring and perplexing themſelves in innumerable Debates, to the Amazement, and even Mirth of the People.

During theſe Tranſactions, the furious John Lilburn, formerly mention'd, who had been an Incendiary under every Government, and had been particulary baniſh'd in the latter End of the Long Parliament for writing ſeveral ſeditious Pamphlets, againſt them, now finding their Power at at End, came over into England, and caſt himſelf upon the Protection of General Cromwell, who had more than once ſkreen'd him from the Power of the Parliament: But knowing him to be a Perſon of a turbulent ungovernable Spirit, and in a little Time finding him to begin to blazon his Actions with all the Truth and Virulence that they deſerv'd, he committed him to Newgate, and referr'd him to the Law. He was brought ſeveral Days to the Old-Baily, and being accus'd of High-Treaſon, he ſhew'd his Parts and Subtlety by the Variety of his Pleas, and his invincible Temper by the Boldneſs of his Replies: So at length being brought to a Tryal before a Jury, he pleaded ſo ſtrenuouſly and movingly for the Liberties of the Nation, as caus'd the Jury to bring him in Not Guilty, contrary to the Opinions and Inſtructions of the Judges, and the earneſt Deſire of Cromwell himſelf; who, with no little Mortification to himſelf, kept him in Priſon for ſeveral Years after.

John Lilburn try'd and acquitted.

3. The great Changes and Alterations in England, gave ſome Hopes to the Dutch of meeting with better Succeſs at Sea than before; and accordingly they mann'd out a gallant Fleet, with which they began to inſult the Engliſh Coaſts, and more particularly the Town of Dover. But the new Government omitted nothing that might advance the Maritime Preparations, but in May ſent out another brave Fleet, which on the ſecond of June ſtood before the Dutch, under Van Tromp, aſſiſted with De Ruyter, De Wit, and the two Evertſons, conſiſting of a hundred and four Men of War, twelve Galliots, and nine Fireſhips. The Engliſh Fleet was under the Command of Monk and Dean, who were both in one Ship, aſſiſted by Vice-Admiral Pen, and Rear-Admiral Lawſon, conſiſting of a hundred Ships of all Sorts. It was near Noon, and not far from the Coaſts of Flanders, when theſe two formidable Armadoes engag'd without Fear or Mercy; and ſo fatal was the Beginning of the Fight, that at the firſt Broad-ſide of the Enemy, Admiral Dean was ſhot off almoſt in the Middle by a Cannon Ball, as he ſtood by Monk; but he without any Diſturbance cover'd his Body with his Cloak, and proſecuted the Battel with all poſſible Reſolution. The Noiſe and Thunder of the Cannon was great and terrible, and nothing was to be ſeen but Smoak,

Fire, and the moſt diſmal Spectacles, that ever Eyes beheld. Lawſon bore ſo hard upon De Ruyter with his Squadron, that he had carry'd him, had not Tromp himſelf come in to his Relief; but he cou'd not prevent Lawſon's ſinking a Ship of Holme of two and forty Guns, with all the Men in her. Monk with his Squadron was in the thickeſt of the Fleet; and greater Execution had been done, but the Wind blew croſs to the Engliſh, and ſo favour'd their Enemies, that they bore away before it. The next Morning early Monk found himſelf near the Enemy, but the Wind was ſo ſlack, that he cou'd not come to engage their Fleet till Noon; and then the Battel began with greater Rage and Fury than at any Time before, and continu'd till ten at Night. Tromp himſelf was in great Danger of being boarded, which he eſcap'd by blowing up the Decks, after a moſt ſurpriſing Manner. Moſt of his Fleet, in the Heat of the Engagement, were in ſuch Confuſion, and ſo unwilling to ſtand the Fight, that he fired upon them, and ſent his Boat to command them to come up to him; but he cou'd not prevail with above twenty of them to return: The reſt ſteering away, the Engliſh preſs'd ſo hard upon them, that they ſunk ſix of their beſt Ships, and two were blown up, and eleven were taken, with thirteen hundred and fifty Priſoners, without any conſiderable Loſs on their Side. At the End of this bloody Day, Admiral Blake came in with eighteen freſh Ships; and if the Dutch had not ſav'd themſelves upon the Flats of Dunkirk and Calais, where the Engliſh cou'd not come up to them, moſt of their Fleet had been deſtroy'd or taken.

The Dutch Preparations.

Van Tromp imputed this Overthrow to the Ignorance and Unskilfulneſs of his Captains; but his Maſters were ſo humbled by it, that a Reſolution for Peace was immediately taken up, and a Veſſel with a white Flagg, and a Meſſenger to prepare a Way for two Ambaſſadors, was ſent into England. Cromwell ſhew'd no Averſion to a Treaty, but wou'd admit of no Ceſſation, till all was concluded; which being known in Holland, they wou'd not ſtay ſo long under the Reproach and Diſadvantage of being beſieg'd, and ſhut up in their Ports; but made all poſſible Haſte to prepare another Fleet, ſtrong enough to remove the Engliſh from their Coaſts, which they believ'd to be the beſt Expedient to advance their Treaty. And there cannot be a greater Inſtance of the Opulency and Induſtry of that People, than that they ſhou'd be able, after ſo many Loſſes and ſo great a Defeat, in ſo ſhort a Time to ſet out a Fleet, able to cope with the moſt powerful Enemy they had at Sea. Their Admiral Tromp had with wonderful Dexterity caus'd his damag'd Ships to be repair'd; and more ſevere Puniſhments to be inflicted on thoſe who had behav'd themſelves cowardly, than had ever been us'd by that State. And the States publiſh'd ſo great and ample Rewards to all Officers and Sea-Men, who wou'd immediately repair to their Service, that by the End of July, within leſs than two Months after their Defeat, they prepar'd a Fleet to the Number of a hundred and twenty five Sail; with ſo much Confidence of Succeſs, that they ſent Van Tromp out of the Wierings with ninety five Ships before the reſt were ready, which were ſoon after brought up to him by De Wit from the Texel. In a little Time the Engliſh Fleet appear'd; but ſtood off, by reaſon of the high Winds, and the Danger of falling upon the Flats, which many of the Dutch believ'd to be no better than a Flight; and one of the Captains ſaid to Van Tromp, Sir, theſe Dogs durſt not abide one Broadſide from your Excellency, and deſir'd him to make Uſe of the Opportunity. But that Admiral knowing the Engliſh, and the Reaſon of their ſtanding off, generouſly reply'd, Do you look to your Charge; for if the Engliſh were but twenty Sail, I am ſure they wou'd fight us.

The Seventh and laſt Sea-Fight.

On the 29th of July the two mighty Fleets fac'd, and came up to each other, the Engliſh being commanded by Monk as Chief, who order'd his Captains, neither to give nor take Quarter, but to make the utmoſt Deſtruction they cou'd. The Ocean was never adorn'd with a more gallant Sight in the Beginning of the Day, nor cover'd with a more diſmal one in the latter End; and never was any Fight carry'd on with a more cruel Obſtinacy and Fury than this for ſeveral Hours together. It is thus deſcrib'd by a Foreign Pen: 'One might have ſaid at firſt View, that 'the Sun being cover'd with a thick Smoak, endeavour'd 'to hide his Face, that he might not behold ſo dreadful a 'Slaughter: The Noiſe of the Cannon, much louder 'than that of Thunder, made all the neighbouring Shores 'to tremble, which being redoubled by the various Echos, 'became ſtill more hideous: And the Sea being all di'ſtain'd with the Blood of ſo many Butcheries, with equal 'Greedineſs ſwallow'd up both Men and Ships.' In the midſt of this dreadful Battel, Van Tromp himſelf, the Glory of the Dutch Nation, ſtanding upon his Quarter Deck, with his drawn Sword bravely encouraging his Men, was ſhot with a Muſquet Ball into the Heart, of which he fell dead without ſpeaking a Word. This great Blow broke the Courage of the reſt; who ſeeing many of their Companions burnt and ſunk, after they had been diſmally ſhatter'd, before the Evening, fled, and made all the Sail they cou'd towards the Texel. The Engliſh were not in a Condition to purſue them; but found themſelves obliged to retire to their own Coaſts, to repair their damag'd Ships, and refreſh their wounded Men. On the Hollanders Part, between twenty and thirty of their Ships of War were fired, or ſunk, and a great many Priſoners taken. The Victory coſt the Engliſh dear; but they only loſt one Ship, which was burnt; and two or three more, tho' carry'd home, were diſabled for farther Service. This was the ſeventh and the laſt Sea-Fight between the Engliſh and Hollanders, all which happen'd in a little above a Year's Time: And it is very obſervable, that in all the Advantages gain'd, the main Body of the Engliſh Firſt and Second Rate Ships, which in all the Fights ever turn'd the Scale, were thoſe built by the late King, out of that noted Tax call'd Ship-Mony.

The Dutch ſue for Peace.

The Parliament's Anſwer.

4. The Dutch were totally diſpirited by this laſt Defeat, and the Loſs of their glorious Admiral, to whoſe Memory they ſhew'd great Honours: All was in Confuſion and Diſtraction in Holland; the Common-People no longer obey'd the Government: The Placarts of the States-General were deſpiſed, and they in Danger to be ruin'd and plunder'd by the ignorant and impetuous Rabble. They therefore apply'd themſelves by their Plenipotentiaries, with all Submiſſion and Diligence, to the Engliſh Council of State: But there they cou'd be allow'd no other Terms of Peace than 'by a Coalition, Satisfaction 'for Damages receiv'd by the Engliſh, and Security againſt 'the like for the future, and by the Dutch's taking a Leaſe 'for twenty one Years for Fiſhing, and paying an annual 'Rent.' Upon theſe Reſolutions of the Council, the Plenipotentiaries reſolv'd to try what Terms of Peace might be had from the ſanctify'd Members at Weſtminſter, call'd Barebone's Parliament, from whom they expected a more eaſie Compliance. But here they met with very ſtrange Diſappointments; for theſe Heavenly Men took the Dutch to be the Outworks of Babylon, which muſt be taken down before there cou'd be any coming at the main Fort: They ſaid, 'The Dutch were carnal and worldly 'Politicians, Enemies to the Kingdom of Chriſt, and ſuch 'as wou'd upon all Occaſions retard the Progreſs of the 'Saints and People of God, in overturning the Powers of 'this World: That Antichriſt, the Man of Sin, cou'd never be deſtroy'd in Italy, while the Dutch retain'd any 'conſiderable Strength in the United Netherlands. They 'did not inſiſt upon the Flagg, nor Dominion of the Seas; 'but held it neceſſary, in order to the Coming of Chriſt, 'and his Perſonal Reign, that the Seas ſhou'd be ſcoured 'and preſerv'd as peaceably as the Land, that both ought 'jointly to ſubmit to the Power of King Jeſus, whoſe 'Way They, and not the Hollanders, were to prepare. 'They allow'd the Procedure of the Dutch by Petition, 'ſince the Power of the Council of State was all one 'with the Saints, and theirs deriv'd from Him to whom 'all Power is given; and upon that Account the Dutch 'ought to continue their Addreſſes of Meſeignours, and 'Tres Illuſtres Seignours, to the Council of State, not in the 'Senſe they are forbidden in the Goſpel, but that whereby our Lord Chriſt aſſumes ſuch Titles, and confers 'them on the Saints: That the Saints therefore might tolerate them, and the Dutch ought not to refuſe them, 'leſt it ſhou'd be a Rejection of the Kingdom of Chriſt, 'which was now approaching: That the Dutch ought to 'kiſs the Son, leſt he be angry, and ſhou'd have a Care how 'they contemn his Holy Ones, leſt they be chaſtiz'd with the 'Rod of Iron.'

The Dutch were now more confounded and perplex'd than ever; it was difficult to treat with, and impoſſible to prevail upon, theſe Men: They run high indeed in their Declarations 'of their Zeal for the true Reformed Religion; and call'd God, the Searcher of all Hearts, to 'witneſs the ſincere Affections of the States towards the 'Common-wealth of England; and likewiſe pray'd, That 'the Great, moſt Good, and moſt Merciful God wou'd 'preſide in their Councils with his Spirit of Peace;' but cou'd not come up to the Flights of theſe new Saints. They now fouud themſelves in Danger to be ruin'd as Enemies to Chriſt, rather than England; and a Coalition with England wou'd not ſatisfy, except they likewiſe annex'd their Provinces into the Fifth-Monarchy. Upon a Conſultation among the States, the Opinion of Holland was, never to enter into a Coalition with England, but that a ſtrict League defenſive ſhou'd be proffer'd; that they ought to contract Foreign Amities, eſpecially with France, to equip out a Fleet with all poſſible Expedition. The other Provinces were for entering into a League with the Elector of Brandenburgh, and other German Princes, and giving Aſſiſtance to the Scots; for at this Time Major-General Middleton was raiſing ſome Tumults there. But their Neceſſities were preſent, and their Treaties remote and dangerous; therefore they gave Orders to their Plenipotentiaries ‘ To protract Time according as they ſaw Diſorders to encreaſe between Cromwell and his Supreme Authority; to be ample in the Generals concerning the Defence of the Reformed Religion, and of the Houſhold of Faith, to reject the Coalition, to offer to enter into a ſtrict and intimate League, but deal as tenderly as was poſſible in Point of Reparation, Satisfaction, or Security.’ All theſe Things being known to Cromwell's Council of State, they reſolv'd to treat them accordingly; and when theſe were communicated to the Members at Weſtminſter, they ſaid, ‘ That it was no more than was propheſy'd in Scripture, and in courſe to be expected, That the Gentiles ſhould rage, and the Kings of the Earth ſet themſelves againſt the Kingdom of Chriſt; but they ſhould fall before him, and be broken in Pieces: That they were fierce to encounter Gog and Magog, and by a Series of Victories, inflam'd to encounter this Antichriſtian Hoſt.

The Dutch Inſtructions.

The Council of State, ſince the Dutch entirely refus'd a Coalition, reſolv'd to humble them without it, and impos'd very hard and mortifying Articles upon them; ſo that they found themſelves in no better Condition, than they were before the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament. But two Things, out of their Power, contributed to their Deliverance from the dangerous State to which they were reduc'd; one was the Ambition and private Intereſt of Cromwell, and the other, the Frenzy of the preſent pretended Parliament. The Former, without any Regard to the Honour or Intereſt of the Engliſh Nation, took the Advantage, and now made it his Buſineſs to join in a Defenſive League with the Dutch, againſt the King and the Royal Family, to ſet up Himſelf, and his Poſterity. He found that his Parliament, tho' all of his own chuſing, were unweildly and unmanageable; and their Actings were ſo uncommon and unaccountable in many Particulars, that no Man could judge of their Deſigns, or where they would end; and therefore he reſolv'd by ſome Means to put an End to their Power and Being. The Dutch dreaded them, as Perſons immoveable by Arguments, and not to be treated with; and therefore their Plenipotentiaries aſſured Cromwell, ‘ That in Caſe he wou'd depoſe them, and aſſume the Government to Himſelf, they wou'd be ready to accord with him upon more moderate Terms, and enter into ſuch a Defenſive Alliance, as wou'd ſecure him againſt all his Foreign and Domeſtick Enemies.’ This Matter was ſoon reſolv'd upon, upon both Accounts, and the Way concerted with Rouſe the Speaker, and ſome ſelect Friends of his in the Houſe, who were to bring it to bear with as little Diſturbance as might be.

They treat privately with Cromwell.

On the twelfth Day of December, in the Morning, a little ſooner than uſual, thoſe Members that were intruſted came to the Houſe; where then finding but few of the Anabaptiſts, an eminent Member ſtood up, and told the Speaker, That he muſt disburthen Himſelf of ſome Things that had a long Time lain upon his Heart: That he was now to ſpeak to the Eſſe, or Being, rather than the Bene Eſſe, or Well-Being of the Common-wealth, which was ready to ſink under them; and, that for his own Part, he muſt reſign the Power from whence he had it; foreſeeing clearly That their Waitings and Expectations of ever coming into Things of Publick Good, were more and more diſappointed: And ſo proceeded to enumerate their Failings; as ‘ 1. They had dealt diſingenuouſly with the Army, in moving, That the Officers ſhou'd ſerve a Year without Pay; and when they could not effect that, the Bill of Aſſeſsments was endeavour'd to be caſt out. 2. That they had not the Spirit of Juſtice, which appear'd in their Act for confirming the Sale of Sir John Stowell's Eſtate, tho' he was reliev'd by the Court of Articles. 3. That they had a Principle among them of deſtroying and pulling down, tho' nothing was ſet up in the Stead; which appear'd from their Vote for the removing the Chancery, and total Alteration of the Laws of the Land. 4. That tho' they call'd Themſelves a Parliament, they acted contrary to it in their Endeavours to deſtroy Propriety, in attempting to take off the Power of Patrons to preſent to Church-Livings. 5. That they would deſtroy the Miniſtry it ſelf, as appear'd by their Saturday's Votes.’ For all which Conſiderations they ought to ſit no longer, and be guilty of bringing Confuſion and Deſolation upon the Nation. But if any wou'd yet be ſo hardy as to continue there, he would ſay unto them in the Words of the Prophet, Ephraim hath join'd himſelf to Idols, let him alone. This being ſeconded, and urg'd by Sydenham, Wolſey, and others, the Anabaptiſts were much ſtartled, and ſpoke fiercely againſt it. Inſomuch that thoſe who appear'd for the Diſſolution, fearing, that by delaying Time, more might come in, and out-vote them, mov'd, ‘ That all who were for a Diſſolution, ſhou'd riſe and walk out:’ Accordingly the Speaker, and divers others, forthwith left the Houſe. But Squib, Moyer, St. Nicholas, and others to the Number of above Twenty, ſat ſtill; and having plac'd Mr. Moyer in the Chair, fell to proteſting againſt what the reſt had done, profeſſing, in the Preſence of the Lord, the Call of God to that Place, was the principal Motive that drew them thither; and that they apprehended their ſaid Call was chiefly for promoting the Intereſt of Jeſus Chriſt. Whereupon they continu'd there till Colonel White, with ſome Muſqueteers came, and ask'd them What they ſat there for? They anſwer'd To ſeek the Lord. Phoh! ſaid he, is that all? that's to no Purpoſe; for the Lord has not been within theſe Walls theſe twelve Years: And ſo they were contented to go out, and moſt of them to ſign an Inſtrument at Whitehall, to which ſome others had ſet their Hands before, to ſurrender their Power into the Hands of Him that gave it. And thus expired that Enthuſiaſtick Levelling Aſſembly, after it had ſat five Months and eight Days; which was ſeven Months and three Weeks after the Diſſolution of that Part of the Long Parliament call'd the Rump, or Common-wealth.

The pretended Parliament diſſolv'd.

5. By this laſt Donation, which was accepted with great Appearance of Modeſty and Unwillingneſs, Cromwell and his Council of Officers were once more poſſeſs'd of the Supreme Sovereign Power of the Kingdom. And very ſhortly after, chiefly by the Management of Lambert, his Council were willing to give up their Part of the Royal Authority, and declar'd, ‘ That the Government of the Common-wealth ſhou'd reſide in a ſingle Perſon: That that Perſon ſhould be Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General of all the Forces of England, Scotland and Ireland, and that his Title ſhou'd be LORD PROTECTOR of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and of the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging: And that he ſhou'd have a Council of one and twenty Perſons to be Aſſiſtant to him in the Government.’ And now moſt Men concluded, that the Weakneſs and Folly of this laſt Aſſembly was ſo much foreſeen, that from their firſt Meeting it was determin'd what ſhou'd follow their Diſſolution: For the Method that ſucceeded cou'd hardly have been compos'd in ſo ſhort a Space, by Perſons who had not a conſiderable Time conſulted upon the Contingency.

The Declaration of the Council.

All Things being ready for ſomething Extraordinary, upon the ſixteenth of December at One in the Afternoon, five Regiments of Foot and three of Horſe were drawn out as a Guard from Whitehall to Weſtminſter-Hall; of which that of Colonel Goff was plac'd within the Precincts of the Hall. This done, Cromwell with the Captain of his Guard, and ſome others, paſs'd through theſe Bands of Soldiers to the Door of Weſtminſter-Hall. Where alighting from his Coach, there march'd in State, Firſt the City-Marſhalls; then the Aldermen of London in Scarlet; after them the Judges; next Keble and Liſle, the two Keepers of the Great-Seal; then four Serjeants at Arms, each with a Mace, one belonging to the Parliament, another to the City, a third to the Council of State, and a fourth to the Lord-Keeper: After theſe the Lord-Mayor's Sword-Bearer, with the Cap of Maintenance, and Sword depreſs'd; then the Lord-Mayor; and next to Him Cromwell Himſelf in a Black Sute and Cloak lined with Velvet, Boots, and a Gold Hatband; and after Him the principal Officers of the Army, and Council of State, every Perſon bare-headed. In this Proceſſion they aſcended the Chancery Court, where was plac'd a rich Chair of State, with a large Cuſhion, and Carpets on the Floor. Being enter'd the Court, Cromwell ſtanding before the Chair, with the two Keepers and Judges on each Side of him, Lambert, then the ſecond Perſon in the Army, ‘ declaring to him the Diſſolution of the Parliament, and the Exigency of the Times, did, in the Name of the Army, and of the three Nations, earneſtly deſire him to accept of the Protectorſhip of them.’ To which he aſſenting, a large Inſtrument in Parchment was read to him, conſiſting of forty two Articles, and call'd THE INSTRUMENT OF GOVERNMENT. The Subſtance of which was, ‘ That the Protector ſhou'd call a Parliament once in every three Years, which was to conſiſt of about four hundred Men, beſides thoſe out of Scotland and Ireland; the firſt of which was to meet on the third Day of September 1654; and that he ſhould not diſſolve any Parliament once met, till they had ſat five Months; that ſuch Bills as ſhou'd be preſented to him by the Parliament, if they ſhou'd not be confirm'd by him within twenty Days, ſhou'd paſs without him into Laws: That he ſhou'd have a ſelect Council to aſſiſt him, which ſhou'd not exceed twenty one, nor be leſs than thirteen: That immediately after his Death, the Council ſhall chuſe another ‘ Protector, before they roſe: That no Protector after him ‘ ſhou'd be General of the Army: That the Protector ‘ ſhou'd have Power to make Peace and War; and farther, ‘ with the Conſent of his Council, he ſhou'd make Laws ‘ which ſhou'd be binding, during the Intervals of Par‘ liament.’ While this was reading, Cromwell had his Hand upon the Bible, and when read, he took his Oath, ‘ That he wou'd not violate any Thing contain'd in that ‘ Inſtrument of Government; but wou'd obſerve, and cauſe ‘ the ſame to be obſerv'd; and in all Things govern the ‘ Nation according to the Laws, Statutes, and Cuſtoms, ‘ ſeeking Peace, and cauſing Juſtice and Law to be equally ‘ adminiſter'd.

A new Proclamation.

This new-invented Ceremony being over, the Lord-Mayor preſented the Sword to him, and the Keepers the Great-Seal; both which he very reſpectfully deliver'd back. This done, the Soldiers with a Shout cry'd out God bleſs the Lord-Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland and Ireland! and ſo he went back to White-hall, the Lord-Mayor carrying the Sword upright before him, and all were bare-headed beſides Himſelf. Immediately after, a Proclamation was made by a Herald in the Palace-Yard, ‘ That the late Parliament having diſſolv'd ‘ Themſelves, and reſign'd their whole Power and Au‘ thority, the Government of the Common-wealth of ‘ England, Scotland and Ireland, by a Lord-Protector and ‘ ſucceſſive Triennial Parliaments, was now eſtabliſh'd: ‘ And whereas Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General of all ‘ the Forces of the Common-wealth, is declar'd Lord- ‘ Protector of the ſaid Nations, Publication was now made ‘ of the ſame; and all Perſons, from the Higheſt to the ‘ Loweſt, in any of the ſaid three Nations, were ſtrictly ‘ charged and commanded to take Notice thereof, and to ‘ conform and ſubmit themſelves to the Government ſo ‘ eſtabliſh'd; and Sheriffs, Mayors, &c. were requir'd to ‘ publiſh this Proclamation, to the End that none might ‘ have Cauſe to pretend Ignorance therein.’ Which Proclamation was at the ſame Time publiſh'd in Cheapſide by the Lord-Mayor; and, with all poſſible Expedition, by the Sheriffs, and other Officers, throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland. Thus, with ſo much Eaſe, did this extraordinary Man, without any other Reaſon than his own Will, and without the Aſſiſtance, and without the Inclination of the Nobility and Gentry of the Land, mount Himſelf into the Throne of three Kingdoms without the Name of KING; but with greater Power and Authority than had been exercis'd or claim'd by any preceding King; and receiv'd greater Evidence of Reſpect, and Marks of Eſteem, from all the Kings and Princes in Chriſtendom, than had ever been ſhew'd to any Monarch of the ſame Nations: Which was the more remarkable, in that they all abhorr'd his Perſon, when they trembled at his Power, and courted his Amity.

The Death of Doctor Gouge,

Mr. Holyoke,

*M.*Dugard,

Mr. Chilmead,

Dr. Pottinger,

And Sir Hen. Vane Senior.

At this Period we ſhall conclude the Year with the Deaths of four or five conſiderable Perſons, tho' of inferior Degree: As Doctor William Gouge, a Perſon educated in King's-College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, of which he was Fellow, and thence remov'd to the Church of Black-Fryers in London; a learned and pious Preacher, one of the Aſſembly of Divines, accounted the Father of the London Miniſters of theſe Times, and highly eſteem'd by ſeveral Foreign Divines. Next was Mr. Francis Holyoke, in Latin de ſacrâ Quercu, a very ancient Divine and Linguiſt of South-Ham in Warwickſhire; a Perſon chiefly to be remember'd for his elaborate Dictionary, which has been very advantagious to others, who have happily built upon his Foundation. Next, Mr. R. Dugard, Batchelor of Divinity, and Fellow of Sidney-College in Cambridge, an excellent Grecian, and a general Scholar, and the greateſt Tutor of his Time in the Univerſity; happily educating young Gentlemen in a Medium between Superſtition and Faction: He behav'd himſelf ſo wiſely, notwithſtanding his Zeal for the King's Cauſe, that he found Means to be a Benefactor to his College, and a particular Help to diſtreſſed Cavaliers. After him was Mr. Edmund Chilmead, an Oxonian of Chriſt-Church, a choice Mathematician, a noted Critick and Linguiſt, and one of extraordinary Ingenuity and Curioſity; who being ejected by the Viſitors, was forc'd to live upon a Muſick-Meeting in London, where he was ſnatch'd away in the Prime of his Years. Laſtly dy'd Dr. John Pottinger, Fellow of New-College in Oxford, and then the famous Maſter of Wincheſter School, a Perſon juſtly admired for his Diſcipline and Method of Teaching, and his bringing up ſuch Numbers of learned and excellent Men, who were able by their Parts to maſter that Faction that maſter'd Him, and drove him out of his Benefice. After all theſe we may mention the Death of Sir Henry Vane the Elder, whoſe Character is already given; who after he had ſhewn the higheſt Ingratitude to the late King, and done what Miſchief he was able, he was laid aſide, fell into the Hatred and Contempt of thoſe who had made moſt uſe of him, and dy'd in univerſal Reproach, not more deſpis'd by any of his Enemies, than by his own Son, who had been his chief Conductor in all his Ways: But for the better Security of his Eſtate, he entail'd it upon his Grandſon.

Cromwell's new Council

II. I. Cromwell having now, beſides the Power of a Monarch, the Solemnity of an Inauguration, proceeded in the Exerciſe of his Government with all Vigour and Induſtry. He had by his tranſcendent Subtilty cheriſh'd many Sects of deſperate Schiſmaticks in his Army, and elſewhere, by whoſe Help he firſt pull'd down the Preſbyterians, and then deſtroy'd the King; therefore it was not his leaſt Skill now ſo to manage theſe unruly Spirits, that none of them by claſhing might endanger the Publick; nor that any of them, upon Occaſion, ſhou'd be unſerviceable to his Deſigns. To which End, as well to ballance them rightly, as to rule them when he pleas'd, he made Choice of the moſt active and leading Men into his Council, by whoſe Influence he had the guiding of all the reſt of each Faction; which Method he alſo obſerv'd in the Choice of his Head Officers in the Army. His firſt Council, choſen in purſuance of the Inſtrument of Government, were fourteen in Number, Major-General Lambert, Colonel Montague, Lord Liſle, Colonel Deſborough, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, Sir Charles Woolſley, Major-General Skippon, Mr. Strickland, Colonel Sydenham, Colonel Jones, Mr. Rouſe, Mr. Lawrence, and Mr. Major. Being thus ſettled in his new Dominion, he ſet forth an Ordinance, declaring what Offences ſhou'd be adjudg'd Treaſon; and likewiſe another for repealing thoſe Acts and Reſolves of Parliament, which had formerly been made for ſubſcribing to the Engagement. Then well conſidering, that all the former Bloodſhed and Confuſion, as it had been chiefly brought about by the Pulpits, ſo by the like Means his new-eſtabliſh'd Rules might eaſily be ſhaken, he fram'd another Ordinance, whereby certain ſelect Commiſſioners, call'd by the Name of Tryers, were appointed for the Approbation of all publick Preachers, that ſhou'd for the future enter upon any Benefice.

The Manner of the Protector's Entertainment in the City.

And now to make the greater Show, He was invited by the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, to dine at Grocer's-Hall, upon Aſhwedneſday, the 18th of February; and that he might have the more Veneration from the People, it was contriv'd, that he ſhou'd ride through the City in State to that Feaſt, which was accordingly perform'd in this Manner. Firſt the ſeveral Companies of London, in their Liveries, plac'd themſelves, according to their Superiority, in the Streets from the lower End of Cheapſide, to Temple-Bar, within Rails, hung with Blue Cloth, with the City Banner and Streamers, belonging to their reſpectiue Companies, ſet before them. Then the Lord-Mayor Vyner, with all his Regalia, attended by the Aldermen in Scarlet and Gold Chains rode to Temple-Bar. Where meeting the Lord Protector, with his Military Train, he deliver'd up the Sword to him; and then making a ſhort congratulatory Speech to his Highneſs, they thus proceeded towards Grocers-Hall. Firſt the City-Marſhal, with ſome other Officers: Then ſix Trumpets; and after them his Highneſs's Life-Guard: Then eight Trumpets more, follow'd by the City-Streamers red and white: Then the Aldermen, and after them the two Sheriffs: Next his Highneſs's Heralds, with rich Coats, adorn'd with the Arms of the Common-wealth: Then the Mace and Cap of Maintenance carry'd before the Lord-Mayor, carrying the Sword bare-headed, with two Gentlemen-Uſhers: Then his Highneſs the Protector, with twelve Footmen in grey Liveries laced with Silver, and other Ornaments. After him rode Major-General Skippon, with the reſt of the Council, and the great Officers of the Army. At Grocers-Hall the Recorder made a Speech to let his Highneſs underſtand, ‘ How happy that City did account ‘ themſelves under his conſpicuous Government, and like‘ wiſe in the Enjoyment of his Preſence with them that ‘ Day.’ Which done, he knighted the Lord-Mayor; and then dined with as much Splendor and Magnificence as any Monarch of England had done before him. But he met with none of the Applauſes in the Streets that were expected; and in his Return he was ſaluted with a Brick-bat upon his Coach, from the Top of a Houſe in the Strand; and Search was made after the Author of that daring Affront, but to no Effect.

He makes a Peace with the Dutch.

And now the Protector had the Opportunity to conclude a Peace with the Dutch: He began to be weary of the Charge of that War, and knew he had much to do to ſettle the Government at home, and that he might upon Occaſion chuſe more convenient Enemies abroad, who were not able to give him thoſe Obſtructions that the Hollanders could do. Therefore he brought the Dutch to accept of ſuch Conditions as were moſt tending to his own Advantage; among which one was, ‘ That they ſhou'd not ſuffer ‘ any of the King's Party, or any Enemy to the Com‘ mon-wealth of England, to reſide within their Dominions;’ and another, which was contain'd in a ſecret Article, confirm'd by the States Great-Seal, by which they oblig'd Themſelves, ‘ Never to admit the Prince of Orange to be their State-Holder, General, or Admiral; and likewiſe to deliver up the Iſland of Polerone in the Eaſt-Indies, which they had taken from the Engliſh in the Reign of King James, into the Hands of the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company; and to pay a good Sum of Mony (ſome ſay three Hundred Thouſand Pounds) for the old barbarous Uſage at Amboyna;’ for which the two laſt Kings cou'd never obtain any Satisfaction. Thus the whole Peace was concluded with the States-General, in the Beginning of April, with all the Advantages to Himſelf he cou'd deſire, having indeed all the Perſons of Power and Intereſt there faſt bound to him upon their mutual Intereſt.

The French Ambaſſador's Speech to the Protector.

2. The Peace with the Dutch, and the ſlaviſh Condition to which Cromwell had brought the People of theſe Nations, caus'd him not only to be idoliz'd by his Party at home, but to be highly reverenc'd abroad. Moſt of the Princes of Europe made Application to him; among whom the French King was the firſt, whoſe Ambaſſador thus addreſs'd himſelf to him in the Banquetting-Houſe at Whitehall: Your moſt ſerene Highneſs has already receiv'd ſome principal Aſſurances of the King my Maſter, and of his Deſire to eſtabliſh a perfect Correſpondency between his Dominions and England. His Majeſty, this Day, gives to your Highneſs ſome publick Demonſtration of the ſame; and his ſending his Ambaſſador to your Highneſs, does plainly ſhew, ‘ That the Eſteem which his Majeſty makes of your Highneſs, and Intereſt of his People, have more Power in his Councils, than many Conſiderations, that wou'd be of great Concernment to a Prince leſs affected with the one and the other.’ This Proceeding, grounded upon ſuch ſound Principles, and ſo different from what is only guided by Ambition, renders the Amity of the King my Maſter, as conſiderable for its Firmneſs, as its Utility; for which Reaſon it is ſo eminently eſteem'd and courted by all the greateſt Princes and Potentates of the Earth. But his Majeſty communicates none to any with ſo much Joy and Chearfulneſs, as to Thoſe, whoſe virtuous Acts and extraordinary Merits, render them more conſpicuouſly famous, than the Largeneſs of their Dominions. His Majeſty is ſenſible, ‘ That all theſe Advantages do wholly reſide in your Highneſs; and that the Divine Providence, after ſo many Calamities, cou'd not deal more favourably with theſe three Nations, nor cauſe them to forget their paſt Miſeries, with greater Satisfaction, than by ſubmitting them to ſo juſt a Government.’ And ſince it is not ſufficient for the compleating of their Happineſs, to make them enjoy Peace at home, becauſe it depends no leſs in good Correſpondency with Nations abroad; the King my Maſter does not doubt but to find alſo the ſame Diſpoſition in your Highneſs, which his Majeſty here expreſſes in his Letters. After ſo many Diſpoſitions expreſs'd both by his Majeſty and your Highneſs, towards the Accommodation of the two Nations, there is Reaſon to believe, ‘ That their Wiſhes will be ſoon accompliſh'd.’ As for me, I have none greater, than to be able to ſerve the King my Maſter, with the good Pleaſure and Satisfaction of your Highneſs; and that the Happineſs I have to tender to your Highneſs the firſt Aſſurances of his Majeſty's Eſteem, may give me Occaſion by my Services to merit the Honour of your gracious Affection.

Cromwell makes an Union of the three Kingdoms.

The Protector being thus ſtrengthen'd, he forc'd Portugal to ſend an Ambaſſador to beg Peace, and ſubmit to expiate the Offence they had committed in receiving Prince Rupert, by the Payment of a great Sum of Mony; and let Denmark be taken into the Dutch Treaty, upon the good Terms of making the States-General reſponſible for a Hundred and Forty Thouſand Pounds, to repair the Damage done by the Danes to the Engliſh. At the ſame Time, by his Ambaſſador Whitelock, he made a firm Alliance with the Kingdom of Sweden. And the better to confirm himſelf in his new Government, he reſolv'd to unite the three Kingdoms into one Common-wealth, to be the more eaſily manag'd by Him the ſole Head. So, with Conſent of his Council, on April 12, he made an Ordinance, ſetting forth, ‘ How he had took into Conſideration, that the People of Scotland ought to be united with the People of England into one Common-wealth, and under one Government; and had found that in December 1651, the Parliament then ſitting had ſent Commiſſioners into Scotland, to invite the People of that Nation into ſuch an happy Union, who proceeded ſo far therein, that the Shires and Boroughs did accept of the ſaid Union, and aſſent thereunto; for the compleating and perfecting of which Union, he now Ordain'd, That all the People of Scotland, and of all the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging, ſhou'd be incorporated into one Common-wealth with England: And in every Parliament to be held ſucceſſively for the ſame Common-wealth, thirty Perſons ſhou'd be call'd from, and ſerve for Scotland, &c.’ And a like Ordinance was ſoon after made for a like Diſtribution of thirty Members from Ireland, to ſerve in the Parliament at Weſtminſter. So much greater was the Power of an Uſurper, than that of a lawful Prince; and to ſhew he wou'd be no ways inferior, he now remov'd his Lodgings, which before were in the Cock-Pit, into thoſe of the late King, in his Royal Palace at Whitehall.

He finds England unmanageable.

3. Tho' the Protector had now nothing to do but at home, all Nations contending, by their Ambaſſadors, which ſhou'd render themſelves moſt acceptable to him; Scotland lying under a heavy Yoke under the ſtrict Government of Monk, lately ſent to rule that Province, which was ſubjugated to the Engliſh Laws, and their Kirk to the Obedience of the State with Reference to Aſſemblies or Synods; Ireland being confeſſedly ſubdued, and no Oppoſition made to the Protector's Commands, iſſu'd out by his Son Henry Cromwell, whom he ſent thither as his Lieutenant of that Kingdom; yet notwithſtanding all this, England prov'd not ſo towardly and manageable as was expected. Vane, and the moſt conſiderable of the Independent Party, from the Time he had turn'd them out of the Long Parliament, retired quietly into the Country, where they poiſon'd the Affections of their Neighbours towards the preſent Government; yet carry'd themſelves ſo warily, that they took Care not to diſturb the Peace of the Nation, or to give Cromwell any great Advantage againſt them. There was another Party leſs wary, and more deſperate, the Levellers; many of whom had been the moſt active Agitators in the Army, who had carry'd on his Deſigns in incenſing the Army againſt the Parliament, and had been at that time his ſole Confidents, and Bed-Fellows; who, from the Time he aſſum'd the Title of Protector, which to them was as odious as that of King, profeſs'd a mortal Hatred to his Perſon; and he well knew both theſe People had too much Credit in his Army, and with ſome principal Officers of it. Theſe Men he more really dreaded than all the King's Party, of which he had in Truth no great Apprehenſion, tho' he cunningly colour'd many of the Preparations he made againſt the other, as if provided againſt the Dangers threatned from them. Againſt the King's Party he teſtify'd his moſt open Malice and Hatred; and often mortify'd the unruly Spirits of the Preſbyterians at their Expence. He laid new Impoſitions upon them; they were watch'd by his Spies, and upon every light Rumour of a Conſpiracy, as many as he thought fit to ſuſpect, were thrown into Priſon: He enjoin'd others not to ſtir from their own Houſes, and baniſh'd all who had ever been in Arms for the King, from the Cities of London and Weſtminſter; and laid other Penalties upon them, contrary to the Articles granted to them when they gave up their Arms, and to the Indemnity upon making their Compoſitions.

The Tryal of Gerard and Vowell.

Within a Month after the Peace was made with Holland, for the better Eſtabliſhment of Cromwell's Empire, a High Court of Juſtice was erected, according to the Model in the late Common-wealth, for the Tryal of Perſons accuſed of holding Correſpondence with the King, and for High-Treaſon againſt the Life of the Protector. The chief Perſons accus'd of this were, Mr. Gerard, a young Gentleman of a good Family, about twenty two Years of Age, who had been an Enſign in the King's Army; and one Mr. Vowell, who kept a conſiderable School for Lads about Iſlington. Mr. Gerard was charg'd with having been at Paris, and there ſpeaking with the King; which he did not deny, at the ſame time declaring, ‘ That he went to Paris, upon a private Buſineſs of his own, which when he had diſpatch'd, and ready to return to England, he deſir'd the Lord Gerard, his Kinſman, to preſent him to the King, that he might kiſs his Hand; which he did in a large Room, where many were preſent; and that when he ask'd his Majeſty, Whether he wou'd command him any Service into England? His Majeſty bid him to commend him to his Friends there, and to charge them that they ſhou'd be quiet, and not engage themſelves in any Plots, which muſt prove ruinous to them, and cou'd do him no good.’ All which was true; for the King had obſerv'd ſo much of the Temper of the People at his being at Worceſter, and in his after Concealment, the Fears they lay under, and the Difficulties of an Inſurrection, that he endeavour'd nothing more than to divert and remove all Inclinations that Way. However, this High Court of Juſtice receiv'd Proof, ‘ That Mr. Gerard and Mr. Vowell had been preſent with ſome other Gentlemen in a Tavern, where a Diſcourſe had been rais'd, how eaſie it was to kill the Protector, and at the ſame time to ſeize the Tower of London; and that if at the ſame Time the King were proclaim'd, the City of London wou'd preſently declare for his Majeſty, and no Body wou'd oppoſe him.’ Upon this Evidence, dence, theſe two Gentlemen were condemn'd to be hang'd.

1654. Car. 6.

On the tenth of July, about two Months after they had been in Priſon, a Gallows was erected at Charing-Croſs, whither Mr. Vowell was brought; who was a Perſon utterly unknown to the King, or any intruſted by him, but worthy to have his Name and Memory preſerv'd in the Liſt of thoſe who moſt couragiouſly ſacrificed their Lives to the Crown. He ſhew'd himſelf above all the Fears of Death, which, he ſaid, he ſuffer'd without having committed any Fault. He profeſs'd his Duty to the King, and his Reverence for the Church; and earneſtly and pathetically adviſ'd the People to return to their Fidelity to both; which, he told them, they wou'd at laſt be compell'd to do, after all their Sufferings. He addreſs'd himſelf chiefly to the Soldiers, and told them, how unworthily they proſtituted themſelves to ſerve the Ambition of a bloody Tyrant; and conjur'd them, to forſake him, and to ſerve the King; which, he was ſure, they wou'd at laſt do. And ſo having devoutly recommended the King, the Kingdom, and himſelf, to God in very pious Prayers, he ended his Life with as much Chriſtian Reſolution as can be expected from the cleareſt Conſcience. A little more Reſpect was ſhewn to Mr. Gerard, who that Afternoon was brought to a Scaffold on Tower-Hill to be beheaded. But they were ſo little pleas'd with the Behaviour of the Sufferer in the Morning, that they wou'd not permit this to ſpeak to the People, but urg'd him to diſcover all the Secrets of the Plot and Conſpiracy. He told them, That if he had a hundred Lives, he wou'd loſe them all to do the King any Service, and was now willing to die upon that Suſpicion; but that he was very innocent of what was charg'd againſt him; that he had not contriv'd, or conſented to any Plot or Conſpiracy, nor countenanc'd any Diſcourſe to that Purpoſe; and offer'd again to ſpeak to the People, and to magnify the King: Upon which they wou'd not ſuffer him to proceed; and ſo with undaunted Courage he ſubmitted to the Stroke of the Executioner.

They both ſuffer Death.

The ſame Day ended with an Execution ariſing from a Cauſe and a Perſon very different from the other two. The Portugal Ambaſſador had in his ſplendid Retinue a Brother, call'd Don Panteleon Sa, a Knight of Malta, and a Man eminent in many great Actions, who out of Curioſity to ſee England, attended in this Embaſſy. Being of a high and imperious Temper, upon a ſudden Accident and Miſtake, he had a Quarrel in the New-Exchange with the laſt nam'd Mr. Gerard, who had ſhewn ſuch a Neglect or Contempt of the Portugueſe Rodomontades, as had made him look upon it as an Affront. Upon which, to revenge the Quarrel, the Don repair'd thither the next Day, with Servants arm'd with Swords, Piſtols, and other Weapons; where, without meeting with Mr. Gerard, they kill'd another Gentleman, whom they took for him, and wounded ſeveral others, that ſtood in their own Defence. This caus'd a mighty Tumult and Diſturbance; and Don Pantaleon flying to his Brother's Houſe, the People flock'd together from all Parts to apprehend the Murderers; and the Ambaſſador knowing nothing of the Affair, thought himſelf attack'd by the rude Multitude, and ſtood upon his Defence. Cromwell being adviſ'd of what had happen'd, ſent an Officer with Soldiers to demand and ſeize the Perſons ingag'd in the Action; and more particularly demanded of the Ambaſſador the Perſon of his Brother, to be deliver'd to him, without which he wou'd break open the Houſe, and ſeize him. The Ambaſſador inſiſted upon the Privilege due to his Houſe by the Law of Nations, which he wou'd defend againſt all Violence; but finding the Officer reſolute, and himſelf too weak, he deſir'd and obtain'd Time to ſend to the Protector; to whom he complain'd of the Injury done him, and deſir'd an Audience. Cromwell ſent him Word, That a Gentleman had been murther'd, and others hurt, and that Juſtice muſt be ſatisfy'd; and therefore requir'd, That all Perſons concern'd might be deliver'd into the Hands of his Officer; without which, if he ſhou'd withdraw his Soldiers, the People wou'd execute Juſtice, by a Way for which he wou'd not be anſwerable. This being done, He ſhou'd have an Audience, and all the Satisfaction it was in his Power to give. The Ambaſſador deſir'd, That his Brother, and the reſt, might remain in his Houſe, and he wou'd be reſponſible, and produce them at the Time ſhou'd be aſſign'd. But nothing wou'd ſatisfy but the Delivery of the Perſons, and the People encreas'd their Cry That they wou'd pull down the Houſe! Upon which the Ambaſſador, to his great Affliction, was compell'd to deliver up his Brother, and the reſt; who were all ſent Priſoners to Newgate. The Ambaſſador us'd his utmoſt Sollicitations for his Brother, being willing to leave the reſt to the Mercy of the Laws; but cou'd receive no other Anſwer than, That Juſtice muſt be done: And Juſtice was done to the full; for they were all brought to their Tryal, before a Jury of half Engliſh and half Strangers, and as many as were found guilty, condemn'd to Death. All were executed at Tyburn, except Don Pantaleon, who was brought to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill, immediately after the Execution of Mr. Gerard; where he loſt his Head, with as much Dejection of Spirit, as the other had done with Courage and Magnanimity. This laſt Proceeding inhanced the Opinion of the Protector's Juſtice, as well as his Power.

His Execution.

The King's Condition in France.

4. During all theſe Tranſactions at home, the King paſs'd away his Time in a low, and ſtill more declining Condition abroad. He had been in France above two Years after his wonderful Eſcape, where he attended on the grand Solemnity of the Coronation of the French King at Rheims; and us'd all his Endeavours to reconcile the jarring Intereſts of that Court, but at the ſame Time found many Inconveniencies from the Diviſions of that little one of his own. He was often beſet and attack'd as to his Religion, and ſometimes as to his Perſon, in Matches propos'd to him, particularly in one with the Duke of Lorrain's Daughter, with whom he was to receive a very great Fortune, and her Father's Aſſiſtance for his Reſtoration. But as the Engliſh Common-wealth and Cromwell encreaſed in their Power, ſo the French Court grew more and more uneaſie at his Reſidence, and he at his Treatment. Upon which Account, in the laſt Year, his Brother the Duke of York left Paris, and repair'd to the French Army under the Command of the famous Marſhal Turenne; where in a ſhort Time he gain'd the Reputation of a Prince of a very ſignal Courage, and by his affable Behaviour the univerſal Love of the Army. This Year Prince Rupert repair'd to him, having brought into France the poor Remains of his ſhatter'd Fleet; which prov'd of ſome little Advantage to him under his preſſing Neceſſities. He ſent the Lord Wilmot, whom he made Earl of Rocheſter, to the Diet at Ratiſbone, to ſollicite the German Princes for Contributions in this low Condition; and as Mazarine, to humble the Spaniard, began to fall in with Cromwell's Meaſures, he daily found that his Continuance in the French Court wou'd be neither comfortable for his Life, nor ſafe for his Perſon. Holland was bound not to admit him into their Dominions, and by their Example had ſhew'd other Princes, and Potentates, to what Conditions they muſt ſubmit who wou'd be Allys to Cromwell. The King of Spain was at the ſame Time contending with France for that Uſurper's Friendſhip, and judg'd he had ſome Advantage with him by the Reſidence the King had in France; ſo there cou'd be no Thought of his repairing into that King's Dominions in Flanders. The Proteſtants, in moſt Places, who had been miſ-led as to his Father's Cauſe, expreſſed more Inclination to his rebellious Subjects than to him. The Roman Catholicks look'd upon him as one that wou'd be neceſſitated to throw himſelf into their Arms by changing his Religion, without which they generally declar'd, They wou'd never give him the leaſt Aſſiſtance: Yet the Cardinal de Retz generouſly told him, That tho' it became him as a Cardinal to wiſh his Majeſty a Catholick for the ſaving his Soul; yet he muſt declare, That if he did change his Religion, he wou'd never be reſtor'd to his Kingdoms. He had ſome Encouragement to adventure once more into Scotland, by the Encreaſe of his Forces under Glencarne and Middleton, and the common Senſe of Slavery, under which that People now lay; but he had ſo little Love for the Country, and ſo much Experience of the Kirk, that he ſuffer'd the Armies there to complain of his not coming to the Head of them, till they were entirely defeated and ſuppreſs'd by General Monk.

He retires to the Spaw.

In this Diſtreſs, and after repeated Importunities from his Friends in England to remove out of France, in the Beginning of June, he took leave of the French Court, having firſt receiv'd the Arrears of his ſmall Allowance from the Ruling Cardinal, with a Promiſe of the Continuance of it. So, without any form'd Deſign of Reſidence, but rather as a Journey, or a Viſit, he paſs'd through part of the Spaniſh Netherlands, as Cambray, Mons and Namure, without any Marks of Reſpect from the Arch-Duke the Governor, and ſo through Liege to the famous Spaw; whether he met with his beloved Siſter the Princeſs of Orange, who came thither, as well for the Benefit of the Waters, as the Happineſs of his Company; with whom he continu'd two or three Months with ſingular Eaſe and Satisfaction. When the Seaſon was over, he remov'd with his Siſter to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was honourably received by the Magiſtrates of that Free-City, and encourag'd to ſtay there. But not long after, in the middle of September, waiting upon the Princeſs Royal to Cologne, he met with a more than ordinary Invitation to fix his Reſidence there; being receiv'd with all the Reſpect, Pomp, and Magnificence, that cou'd be expected, or the City cou'd perform. So that, after he had attended his Siſter to the Duke of Newburg's Palace at Duſſeldorp, and taken his Leave of her at Santen, with no ſmall Paſſion and Concern, he ſettled Himſelf, with his ſmall Court or Family, in this City, for about two Years and ſix Months. His general Subſiſtence exceeded not above ſix hundred Piſtoles a Month, which was to ſerve for the Occaſions of Him and all his Attendants; yet by the excellent Managemement of Mr. Stephen Fox, a wiſe, modeſt and induſtrious young Gentleman, the Family was ſo well regulated, that the King and the reſt enjoy'd much greater Eaſe and Contentment, than ever they had done in France. I have been aſſur'd by the ſame Perſon, ſince Sir Stephen Fox, who ſhew'd me a particular Paper all under the King's own Hand, that this happy Regulation and Management was wholly owing to the King Himſelf, tho' the Lord Clarendon had too favourably attributed it to him: And he further declar'd theſe Words, That his Majeſty was the beſt Oeconomiſt he ever met with in his whole Life. His Majeſty cou'd not have choſen a more convenient Retreat, or a Place where he wou'd be more civilly treated; who now betook himſelf with great Chearfulneſs to compoſe his Mind to his Fortune; and with ſingular Satisfaction, preſcrib'd ſo many Hours in the Day to his Retirement in his Cloſet, which he employ'd in reading and ſtudying both the French and Italian Authors; and at other Times walk'd much upon the Walls of the Town, and ſometimes rid into the Fields; and, in the whole, he ſpent his Time both to his real Benefit, and his publick Reputation.

His Majeſty had left his youngeſt Brother, the Duke of Gloceſter, at Paris with his Mother, who with great Importunity had gain'd that Point of him, having firſt promis'd 'That ſhe wou'd not permit any Attempt to be made towards the Changing his Religion.' But upon the King's Abſence her Zeal for the Romiſh Faith put her upon uſing all Methods for that End: She put away Mr. Lovel his Tutor, and committed him to the Care of the Abbot Mountague her Almoner; who, together with herſelf and others, us'd all the inſinuating Arguments to induce him to embrace the Roman-Catholick Religion, with all the Promiſes and Threats moſt likely to prevail upon a Perſon of his Age, then but Fourteen. But the dying Commands and Inſtructions of his Father had made ſo ſtrong an Impreſſion upon this excellent young Prince, that he nobly reſiſted all their ſeveral Attacks, which caus'd them at laſt to treat him with unuſual Rigour and Severity. The King, not long after his Settlement in Cologne, receiv'd the Account of this Affair with great Concern and Affliction; and to let the World ſee he wou'd do what he cou'd to prevent this Diſhonour, he ſent over to Paris the brave Marqueſs of Ormond, who, as he was ſure, wou'd ſteadily execute his Command, which was, through all Difficulties, to bring the Duke his Brother along with him. The Marqueſs, with great Labour and Hazard, and with no leſs Courage and Reſolution, got the young Prince out of their Hands, to the infinite Regret of the Queen his Mother; and having brought him to Cologne, his Majeſty was extreamly pleas'd with the Negotiation and Succeſs, and kept his Brother with him till the Time he return'd into England: So careful was the King, AT THAT TIME, of preſerving the Purity and Honour of his Father's Religion.

*Crom*well's Preparations for his

III. I. During theſe Tranſactions abroad, the Protector Cromwell found it his greateſt Care at home to manage the approaching Parliament, which was to be elected according to the late Inſtrument of Government, a greater Number out of the Counties, and a leſſer out of the Boroughs, the whole amounting to about four hundred in England. To this purpoſe he expreſly fixt upon the Set of Members to be ſent out of the conquer'd Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, where the Shew of Election was made to concur with his declared Nomination: And even in England, where Liberty was to be more ſpeciouſly pretended, he had ſuch an Influence upon the People, and ſuch an Awe upon the Sheriffs and Magiſtrates, that very few were return'd diſagreeable to his own Deſires. And then to purge out thoſe Few, he brought the Tryal of Elections into a Committee of his own Council, before the opening of the Parliament. So that by the Time of Sitting, they were, in appearance, all right and true to his Purpoſe, except the Lord Grey of Groby, Mr. John Wildman, Mr. Highland, and one or two other inflexible Republicans, who for that Reaſon were by his own Will and Pleaſure excluded the Houſe.

SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The third of September, tho' it fell upon a Sunday, being reckon'd an auſpicious Day by the Protector, he wou'd have that to be the Opening of the Parliament; and caus'd the Members, after hearing a Sermon at Weſtminſter-Abby, to wait upon him in the Painted-Chamber, where he made a Speech to them of the Cauſe of their Summons, and ſo ſent them to their Houſe to adjourn to the next Day. On which Day he had a ſecond Opening in the moſt Solemn Monarchical Manner: He was drawn from Whitehall in a Coach of State, in which his Son Henry and Lambert ſat with him bare; many Hundreds of Gentlemen and Officers walking uncover'd; and next before the Coach his Pages and Lacqueys in ſplendid Liveries; on each Side of the Coach, Strickland and Howard Captains of his Guards; after the Coach, Claypole Maſter of the Horſe, on Horſeback, leading the Horſe of State, adorn'd with the moſt rich Trappings; then the Commiſſioners of the Great Seal and the Treaſury, and all the principal Men of his Council and Army. He alighted at the Abby-Door, and had the Purſe carry'd before him by Whitelock, and the Sword by Lambert; and was plac'd in a Seat rais'd before the Pulpit, the Members of Parliament being diſpos'd on each Side of him. After a Sermon preach'd by Mr. Thomas Goodwin, his Highneſs went in the ſame Equipage to the Painted-Chamber, where being Seated in a Chair of State, with the Members ſitting round upon Benches all bare, he put off his Hat, and made a long and ſubtle Speech to them, telling them 'Firſt of the Danger of the Levelling Principles, and of the Fifth Monarchy Opinions, and of the Form of Godlineſs, and the two Pretenſions, Liberty of the Subject, and Liberty of Conſcience, brought in to patronize thoſe Evils: Which Abominations had ſwell'd to that Height, that the Axe had been laid to the Root of the Miniſtry as Antichriſtian and Babyloniſh, and Swarms of Jeſuits were continually wafted over hither, to conſume and deſtroy the Welfare of England; which, together with the Foreign Wars, had made the whole Nation a Heap of Confuſion. Then he let them know to whom the Remedy and Deliverance was owing; That the new erected Government was calculated for the People's Intereſt, let malignant Spirits ſay what they wou'd; and that with Humbleneſs towards God, and Modeſty towards them, he wou'd recount ſomewhat in Behalf of it: It had reform'd the Laws, and put good Men into the Seats of Juſtice; had regulated the Chancery, ſettled a Way for Approbation of able Miniſters, and had been inſtrumental in calling a Free Parliament; had made Peace with Sweden and the Danes, with the Dutch, and with Portugal, and was now in a Treaty with France: That theſe Things were but Entrances and Doors of Hope; but now he made no Queſtion to enable them to lay the Top Stone of the Work; recommending to them that Maxim, That Peace, tho' it were made, was not to be truſted farther than it conſiſted with Intereſt: That they wou'd avoid Confuſions, leſt Foreign States ſhou'd take Advantage of them; therefore the great Work now upon the Parliament was, That the Government of England might be ſettled in Terms of Honour. Laſtly, for himſelf, he did not ſpeak like one that wou'd be a Lord over them, but as one that wou'd be a Fellow-Servant with them in this great Affair:' And ſo order'd them to repair to their Houſe, and there make Choice of a Speaker.

1654. Car. 6.

His Speech.

Lenthal the Speaker.

They almoſt unanimouſly made Choice of William Lenthal, the Speaker of the Long Parliament; which Agreement in chuſing him proceeded from very diſagreeing Principles, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves. Cromwell had deſign'd him as auſpicious to his Ends; concluding he wou'd be made a Property in This, as well as he had been in the Long Parliament, where he always comply'd with the moſt prevailing Party. And the other Perſons, whoſe Deſigns were oppoſite to his, were well pleas'd, in hopes that the ſame Man's being in the Chair might facilitate the renewing and reviving of the former Houſe, which they eſteem'd as the true legitimate Parliament, which, tho' Strangled by the Tyranny of Cromwell, had yet Life enough remaining. To which End they immediately fell to making Speeches in Derogation of the Lord-Protector's Authority, earneſtly preſſing, 'That thoſe Members of the good old Parliament, which were then, by God's Providence, ſo met together, ſhou'd forthwith declare for, and re-aſſume their juſt and rightful Power.' Many argued againſt the Authority of their Meeting, and the Current of the Houſe inſiſted upon the firſt clearing that Point, as fundamental in it ſelf: And one Republican Member took the Liberty to ſay, 'That they cou'd not but diſcern the Snares laid to entrap the Privileges of the People; and for his own Part, as God hath made him inſtrumental in cutting down Tyranny in One Perſon, ſo he cou'd not endure to ſee the Nation's Liberties ſhackled by Another; whoſe Right to the Government cou'd be meaſur'd no other ways than by the Length of his Sword, which was only that which embolden'd him to command his Commanders.' This Spirit prevail'd ſo far, that for ſeven or eight Days together, the Protectorians cou'd not divert the Queſtion from being put, 'Whether the Government ſhou'd Diviſions in the Houſe.

'ſhou'd be by a Protector and a Parliament.' In which Debates Bradſhaw, Scot and Haſlerigg, ſignaliz'd their Zeal for a Common-wealth; but the other Party found means to protract Time, and to adjourn the Houſe when the Queſtion was ready to be put.

2. The Protector being inform'd of theſe Tranſactions, reſolv'd once more to try what his Sovereign Preſence wou'd produce towards a better Compoſure: So on the twelfth of September, early in the Morning, he caus'd a Guard to be ſet upon the Door of the Houſe, and ſent to the Lord-Mayor to acquaint him with the Reaſons of what he was going to do, that he might prevent any Diſorders in the City. The Members coming at the uſual Hour were refus'd Entrance, and required to attend his Highneſs in the Painted-Chamber; where he recounted to them ſome of his meritorious Actions, particularly his Diſſolving the Long Parliament; declaring, 'That he had preſſed that Parliament as a Member, a great many Times, to put a Period to Themſelves, and told them, That the Nation loathed their Sitting; and that when they were diſſolv'd there was no viſible repining at it, no not ſo much as the Barking of a Dog.' Then teſtifying his great Concern for the Heats and Diviſions in the Houſe, he plainly told them, 'That he wou'd have them to take Notice of this, That the ſame Government which made Him a PROTECTOR, made them a PARLIAMENT; and there were ſome Things in the Government Fundamental, which cou'd not be alter'd by them: As, 1. The Government in One Perſon and a Parliament. 2. Parliaments not to be perpetual. 3. The Militia to be in the Protector, as well as the Parliament. 4. A Liberty of Conſcience in Matters of Religion.' That therefore they muſt not meddle with any of theſe Fundamental Things: And to prevent the Inconveniencies of ſo doing, he was neceſſitated to appoint them a Teſt or Recognition of the Government, in a Protector and a Common-wealth, which they ſhou'd all ſign before they went any more into the Houſe. The Form of the Recognition was this: I A. B. do hereby promiſe and engage my ſelf, to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland and Ireland; and ſhall not (according to the Tenor of the Indenture whereby I am return'd to ſerve in this preſent Parliament) propoſe, or give any Conſent to alter the Government, as it is ſettled in one ſingle Perſon and a Parliament.

Cromwell reproves the Members.

And appoints them a Teſt.

This being ingroſs'd in Parchment, was laid on a Table for the Members to ſign, before they ſhou'd be qualify'd to ſit: And for thoſe who refus'd, they were not only excluded the Houſe, but ſome of them were taken into Cuſtody; among whom was the Protector's late great Favourite, Major-General Harriſon, now in Cuſtody of a Party of Horſe. This Recognition or Engagement was ſign'd by about a hundred and thirty Members within a Day or two; and ſome Days after many others ſubſcrib'd it, and took their Places in the Houſe; where a Debate ariſing touching the ſaid Recognition, they paſs'd a Declaration, 'That it ſhou'd not be intended to comprehend the whole contain'd in the forty two Articles of The Inſtrument of Government, but only that which required the Government of the Common-wealth to be by a ſingle Perſon, and ſucceſſive Parliaments.' And to this the major Part conſented, hoping that by their Compliance with him, in providing for his Safety, and his Government during Life, he wou'd have been ſatisfy'd with that, and left the People after his Death to an Election of their own. This great Point concerning the Single Perſon being gain'd, they apply'd themſelves to the Conſideration of the remaining Clauſes of the Inſtrument of Government. They declared, 'That Oliver Cromwell ſhou'd be Protector during Life, and limited the Number of Forces to be kept up in the three Kingdoms, to be twenty thouſand Foot, and ten thouſand Horſe, with a Proviſion of ſixty thouſand Pounds a Month. They agreed upon the Number of Ships that they thought neceſſary for the Guard of the Seas; and order'd two hundred thouſand Pounds a Year for the Protector's own Expences, the Salaries of his Council, the Judges, Foreign Intelligence, and the Reception of Ambaſſadors. They alſo voted a Clauſe to be inſerted, to declare the Rights of the People of England, particularly That no Mony ſhou'd be rais'd upon the Nation but by Authority of Parliament.' And whereas by the Inſtrument of Government it was provided, That if the Parliament were not ſitting at the Death of the preſent Protector, the Council of Officers ſhou'd chuſe a Succeſſor; they reſolv'd, 'That nothing ſhou'd be determin'd by the Council after his Death, but the calling of a Parliament, who were then to conſider what they wou'd have done. Thus they employ'd themſelves for ſome Months, beſides taking a tranſient View of the Protector's own Ordinances, which were, 'One for paying the Mony into the Treaſury rais'd for the Propagation of the Goſpel in Wales: Another to make Soldiers free in Corporations; a third to remove all ſcandalous Preachers and Miniſters; and a fourth for the ſurveying of King's and Churches Lands:' All which Ordinances he publiſh'd as ſo many Laws, juſt before the Sitting of the Parliament, to ſhew his own Power, and the Validity of his Inſtrument of Government.

Their Declaration and Ordinances.

1654. Car. 6.

During theſe Tranſactions of the Houſe, the Protector having aſſum'd the whole Power of the Nation to himſelf, and ſent Ambaſſadors and Agents to all Foreign States, was again courted by them, and preſented with the Rarities and Curioſities of ſeveral Countries: Among the reſt the Duke of Holſtein made him a Preſent of a noble Set of grey Frizeland Coach-Horſes; with which, taking the Air in the Park, attended only with his Secretary Thurloe, and his Guard of Janizaries, he thought fit to mount the Box, and take the Place of his Coach-man, as if he believ'd the three Pair of Horſes wou'd prove as tame as the three Nations now ridden by him. And therefore, not contented with their ordinary Pace, he laſh'd and drove them on with his uſual Fury. But they, unacquainted with ſuch a rough Manager, ran away with full Speed, and never ſtopp'd till they had violently thrown him out of the Box, with which Fall his Piſtol fired in his Pocket, tho' without any Hurt to himſelf. This became the Subject of Mirth and Ridicule among ſeveral, and of ſevere Lampoons among others; and occaſion'd ſome boldly to ſay, That this ought to have inſtructed him how dangerous it was to intermeddle with thoſe Things, in which he had no Experience.

A private Accident to Cromwell.

1655. Car. 6.

3. The pretended Parliament, being not fully inclin'd to ſerve Cromwell's Deſigns, he grew impatient till the five Months allow'd for their Sitting ſhou'd be expired; during which Time he was reſtrain'd by his own Inſtrument of Government, from giving them an Interruption. And tho' they differ'd not in any material Point from that Form of Government which he himſelf had erected, unleſs it were in reſerving the Nomination of his Succeſſor to the Parliament; yet the Omiſſion of a Thing ſo near to him, ſo provok'd him, that he reſolv'd upon their Diſſolution. Therefore as ſoon as the five Months of their ſitting, according to the Soldiers Account of twenty eight Days to the Month, was expired, the Members were order'd to attend him on the 22d of January in the Painted-Chamber, where he made them a moſt tedious and intricate Speech, of which it may not be improper to inſert ſome Parcels: It begins thus: Gentlemen, I perceive, you are here as the Houſe of Parliament, by your Speaker, whom I ſee here, and by your Faces, which are, in a great Meaſure, known to me.----As I may not take Notice what you have been doing, ſo I think I have a very great Liberty to tell you, That I do not know what you have been doing: I do not know whether you have been alive or dead, I have not once heard from you all this Time; I have not, and that you all know: If that be a Fault that I have not, ſurely it hath not been mine.----There be ſome Trees that will not grow under the Shadow of other Trees; There be ſome that chuſe (a Man may ſay ſo by way of Alluſion) to thrive under the Shadow of other Trees: I will tell you what hath thriven; I will not ſay what you have cheriſh'd under your Shadow, that were too hard. Inſtead of Peace and Settlement, inſtead of Mercy and Truth being brought together, Righteouſneſs and Peace kiſſing each other, by reconciling the honeſt People of theſe Nations, and ſettling the woful Diſtempers that are among us, Weeds and Nettles, Briars and Thorns, have thriven under your Shadow; Diſſettlement and Diviſion, Diſcontentment and Diſſatisfaction, together with real Dangers to the whole, have been multiply'd within theſe Five Months of your ſitting, more than in ſome Years before. Foundations have been alſo laid for the future renewing the Troubles of theſe Nations, by all the Enemies of it abroad and at home: Let not theſe Words ſeem too ſharp, for they are true, as any Mathematical Demonſtrations are, or can be.----After he had declar'd againſt Hereditary Government as unlawful, he proceeded to vindicate himſelf in raiſing Mony without a Parliamentary Authority, by this Argument: Either it is of God, or of Man; if it be of Man, I wou'd not have touch'd it with a Finger: If I had not had a Hope fix'd in me that this Cauſe, and this Buſineſs is of God, I wou'd many Years ago have run from it. If it be of God, it will bear up; if it be of Man, it will tumble, as every Thing that hath been of Man, ſince the World began, hath done.----After many unintelligible Paſſages, he concludes thus: I have troubled you with a long Speech, and I believe it may not have the ſame Reſentment with all, that it hath with me; I ſhall leave it to God, and conclude with that, that I think my ſelf bound in my Duty to God, and the People of theſe Nations, to their Safety and Good in every Reſpect; I think it my Duty to tell you, That it is not for the Profit Profit of theſe Nations, nor for the Common and Publick Good, for you to continue here any longer, and therefore I declare unto you, THAT I DO DISSOLVE THIS PARLIAMENT.

Wildman's bold Declaration.

This upbraiding and inſulting Way of Diſſolution was ſo very unpopular, that the Protector cou'd never have betray'd himſelf into it, if his Pride and Paſſion had not perverted his Judgment, and Experience of the People of England. It gave Encouragement to the Royaliſts, and Indignation to the Republicans; ſo that both Parties, for King and Common-wealth, were in Rage, and Plots, and Arms againſt him. Particularly Major John Wildman, whom he had expell'd the Houſe at the firſt opening of the Seſſion, as much an Enemy to the King as to the Uſurper, was ſeiz'd with a Paper dictated by him, entitled, The Declaration of the free and well-affected People of England now in Arms againſt the Tyrant Oliver Cromwell Eſquire: 'Being now ſatisfy'd in our Judgment and Conſciences of the preſent Neceſſity to take up Arms for the Defence of our native Rights and Freedoms, which are wholly invaded and ſwallow'd up in the Pride and Ambition of Oliver Cromwell, who calls himſelf Lord Protector of England, and hath render'd all Engliſh Men no better than Vaſſals, &c. This Man had been a cunning Incendiary in the Army, a prime Agitator and Leveller, a great Divider of the Long Parliament and Army, and a ſingular Inſtrument in promoting Cromwell's Deſigns, both before and after the late King's Murder. Therefore theſe Words in his Paper are the more remarkable: 'His pretended Zeal for God and his People, his high Profeſſions of Godlineſs, Simplicity, and Integrity; his hypocritical Prayers, and Days of Faſting to ſeek the Lord; his diſſembled Humility and Meekneſs, and his frequent compaſſionate Tears upon every Occaſion; his Engagements publick, and private; his moſt ſolemn Proteſtations, with Imprecations of Vengeance upon himſelf and Family, if he diſſembled, and his moſt frequent Appeals to God for the Truth of his Profeſſions and Declarations; "That he deſign'd nothing but ſecuring the Liberties of God's People, and Adminiſtration of Impartial Juſtice, and ſought no Power, Honour, Riches, nor Greatneſs to Himſelf, or any particular Party or Intereſt:" We ſay, theſe Things rocked us ſo aſleep with the pleaſant Dreams of LIBERTY and JUSTICE, untill he hath made a Sacrifice of all our Laws, Liberties and Properties unto his own Ambition.---' Yet this Man, when inevitable Death was expected by his Friends and others, after a ſhort Impriſonment, was unaccountably ſet at full Liberty: Which Example, with that other of Lilburn formerly mention'd, will ſhew the Temper of the Nation, how far the Spirits of that Time were from paying a Submiſſion to Cromwell's Power, when no Perſon had the Courage to lift up their Hands againſt him. Yet innumerable Deſigns were form'd againſt his Perſon; ſo that his Mother, who dy'd this Year, was continually affraid of her Son's Life, and when ſhe heard the Noiſe of any Gun, wou'd cry out That her Son was ſhot! and cou'd not be ſatisfy'd without ſeeing him ſafe once or twice a Day: And tho' a thouſand of his Enemies did in Conſcience believe, That killing him wou'd be no Murder, yet he remarkably eſcap'd all Dangers.

To proceed to the Deaths of conſiderable and eminent Perſons this Year, beſides the Protector's Mother, who was bury'd with extraordinary Pomp and Solemnity, there dy'd the Protector's own Uncle and God-Father, Sir Oliver Cromwell Knight, the oldeſt Gentleman in England; who, at his Houſe at Hinchinbrook in Huntingtonſhire, had made the greateſt Entertainment to King James, at his Acceſſion to the Crown, that had ever been offer'd by a private Subject; after which he continu'd ſufficiently remarkable for his old Engliſh Hoſpitality, and, abhorring his Nephew's Practices, for his unſhaken Loyalty to the Crown, and his unblemiſh'd Integrity to his Friends and Neighbours. After him, we are to mention ſeveral others; and firſt two famous Antiquaries, Mr. John Selden, and Mr. Roger Dodſworth: The firſt, who has been more than once mentioned, was a Bencher of the Inner-Temple, who not only ran through the whole Body of the Law, but became a Prodigy in moſt Parts of Learning, eſpecially in thoſe that were uncommon and profound, being a vaſt Philologiſt, Antiquary, Herald, Linguiſt, Stateſman, &c. So that his Fame was wonderfully advanc'd both at Home, and in Foreign Countries, where he was uſually ſtil'd, The Glory, and great Dictator of Learning of the Engliſh Nation; upon the Account of which the great Uſher declar'd, He was not worthy to carry his Books after him. He moſtly join'd with the Long Parliament, and was one of the Lay-Men that compos'd The Aſſembly of Divines, whoſe principal Theologiſts he often puzled and ſilenc'd; and after innumerable Labours, he expired in the 70th Year of his Age, and was bury'd with extraordinary Solemnity in the Temple. The other, Mr. Dodſworth, was a Yorkſhire Gentleman, and tho' inferior in many Reſpects to the former, he was infinitely laborious, and highly ſerviceable to the World in Matters of Antiquity; being a moſt indefatigable Searcher of Records, old Papers and Hiſtories, by whoſe laudable Induſtry, great Numbers were preſerv'd from Ruin and Oblivion: He was much incourag'd by the Lord Fairfax, and other Lovers of Antiquities, and had far the greateſt Hand in thoſe vaſt and elaborate Volumes, publiſh'd by Sir William Dugdale, under the Title of Monaſticon Anglicanum, &c. Beſides theſe, we ought to take Notice of ſome others, as Mr. Abraham Whelock, a Fellow of Clare-Hall, the Publick Library-Keeper, and Arabick Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Cambridge; a Perſon admirable in his Induſtry, and no leſs in his Knowledge of the Oriental Languages, and is particularly to be remember'd and recorded for his laudable Deſign and Work in tranſlating the New-Teſtament into the Perſian Tongue. Next was Mr. Henry Iſaacſon, a Perſon whoſe Skill lay another Way, a Citizen of London; who without any Academical Education, that is known to us, arriv'd to a mighty Perfection in Chronology, as ſufficiently appears from his large, painful and elaborate Work upon that Subject. After him is Mr. Henry Elſinge, a Clerk of the Long-Parliament, till a little before the late King's Tryal, in which Place he manifeſted his rare Accompliſhments and Abilities, particularly in taking and expreſſing the Senſe of the Houſe, ſo that it was believ'd, that not one of the Members ever exceeded him; for which Reaſon more Reverence was paid to his Stool, than to the Speaker's Chair, where by Means of his prudent and temperate Carriage, he was belov'd and eſteem'd by all Parties, eſpecially by Mr. Selden. Quitting his beneficial Employment, he retir'd himſelf, and falling into a deep Melancholy for the Diſtreſſes of his Family, and the Loſs of his Sovereign, he dy'd in the 56th Year of his Age. Laſtly we ſhall mention two Divines, of different Talents and Nations, Mr. Thomas Gataker, and Dr. Alexander Roſs: The former, of an ancient Family in Shropſhire, was educated in St. John's College in Cambridge, and elected Fellow of Sidney College while it was in building, where he became remarkable for his Skill in the Greek and Hebrew Tongues; He was afterwards Rector of Redriſh in Surrey, and the moſt celebrated among the Aſſembly of Divines, being highly eſteemed by Salmaſius and other Foreigners; and it is hard to ſay which is moſt remarkable, his exemplary Piety and Charity, his polite Literature, or his Humility and Modeſty in refuſing Preferments. The other, Dr. Roſs, was a Scotch Divine, and a Chaplain to the late King, a buiſy, various and voluminous Writer, who by his Pen, and other Ways made a conſiderable Noiſe and Figure in theſe Times, and who ſo manag'd his Affairs, that in the midſt of theſe Storms, he dy'd very rich, as appears from the ſeveral Benefactions he made.

The King's Condition at Cologne.

A View of the there Kingdoms.

IV. 1. While Cromwell was proceeding in his various Arts of Government, and exerciſing ſeveral Kinds of Tyranny in all Parts, the King remain'd chiefly at Cologne for above two Years, all the Time bearing the Rigour of Fortune with ſingular Temper and Magnanimity; and if his Nature cou'd have been delighted in beholding the Oppreſſions his rebellious Subjects ſuſtain'd in all the three Nations, he might have receiv'd abundance of that kind of Comfort and Pleaſure from each of them: Firſt, in ſeeing Scotland, a Kingdom that had wantonly deſtroy'd its own Peace and Plenty, and ſpread its Contagion through the other Two, now reduc'd and govern'd by a Rod of Iron; now ſubdu'd by thoſe whom they had taught the Science of Rebellion, and with whom they had joyn'd by innumerable Ways to overthrow their own natural Prince, and that Regal Government which was as ancient as their Nation: In ſeeing the Inſolence of that People, which us'd to practiſe ſuch ill Manners towards their King, contemn'd, and brought to Slavery under the Tyranny of Perſons of inferior Rank; while their adored Idol, Presbytery, which had pull'd off the Crown of their Sovereign, was trampled on, and derided, and their bold Preachers, who had threatned their Princes with Excommunication, ſcoff'd at, and controul'd by Artificers and common Soldiers; and all this mortifying Subjection ſupported at their own Charge. Next, in ſeeing Ireland, that began its Rebellion with the moſt inhuman Maſſacres, and continu'd it under all the Circumſtances of Treachery and Perjury, now groveling at the Feet of its proud Conquerors, reduc'd to the loweſt Condition, and even to the Point of Extirpation; and the Blood that had been ſavagely ſpilt in the Beginning, now plentifully reveng'd in new Streams from one End of the Kingdom to the other; while the firſt Contrivers of the Rebellion, who cou'd never be reach'd by the King, and they who caus'd every Peace to be broken which had been made with his Majeſty, and after they had endeavour'd moſt baſely to reconcile Themſelves to their new Maſters, were every Day taken, and infamouſly put to Death by their Authority; who ſold ſo many Thouſands of them to the Services of Foreign Princes, that there is not an Account in Hiſtory of any Nation, excepting the Jews, that was ever reduc'd to a more compleat Miſery; and all this without any Pity from the reſt of the World, who look'd upon them as deſerving no better Fate. Laſtly, in ſeeing England, which was firſt encourag'd by the Crimes of thoſe two Kingdoms, and afterwards ſeem'd to glory in the Conqueſt of Both, now overwhelm'd, and its Conſtitution inverted; in ſeeing the firſt Authors of the publick Calamities, now ſo much Sharers, that they were no more Maſters of their Eſtates, than they whom they had firſt ſpoiled; that themſelves were brought upon thoſe Scaffolds, which they had caus'd to be erected for others; that little or no Part of the new Government was in the Hands of Thoſe which had pull'd down the Old; that after Monarchy had been made ſo odious to the People, the whole Wealth of the Nation was become at the Diſpoſal of a ſingle Perſon; and thoſe proud Lords, without whoſe unnatural Aſſiſtance the Sceptre cou'd never have been wreſted out of its Place, were now number'd and rank'd with the Dregs of the People: In a Word, Cromwell was jealous of none ſo much as thoſe who had rais'd him, and propos'd nothing more to Himſelf, than to ſuppreſs or drive Them out of the Kingdom, who had been the principal Means to ſuppreſs the Regal Authority, and to drive the Royal Family, and all its Adherents, into Baniſhment.

Such was the Proſpect his Majeſty had of the Three Kingdoms, during his long Reſidence at Cologne; where, in all other Reſpects, he had a hopeful View of enjoying Eaſe and Quiet; having brought his Mind to his Fortune, and his Fortune to afford a tolerable Subſiſtance for Himſelf and a few Friends, that made up his little Court. But his Reſt was too ſoon diſturb'd by the Impatience and Activity of his Friends in England; who notwithſtanding all his Commands not to enter upon any ſudden and raſh Inſurrections, were ſo ſtimulated by the Inſolence of their Enemies, and the Uneaſineſs of their own Condition, that they cou'd not continue quiet. They ſent Expreſſes every Day to Cologne for more Commiſſions and Inſtructions, and made an erroneous Judgment of their own Strength and Power, by concluding that all who hated the preſent Government, wou'd joyn with them to deſtroy it, or at leaſt not to ſupport it. They aſſured his Majeſty, 'That 'they had made ſufficient Proviſion of Arms and Ammu-'nition; that their Numbers were great enough to ſeize 'on many Places; that a conſiderable Part of the Army 'wou'd declare againſt Cromwell, and that if a certain 'Day was appointed, the Inſurrection wou'd be ſo gene-'ral, as cou'd not fail of Succeſs.' Theſe and other plauſible Repreſentations being often made to the King, he was at laſt prevail'd upon to allow of an appointed fix'd Day for the Inſurrection. Wilmot, now Earl of Rocheſter, offer'd his Service to be Head of this grand Deſign; and accordingly he was ſent over to London, with Sir Joſeph Wagſtaff, in order to bring it to Maturity: And the King Himſelf repaired privately in Diſguiſe to Fluſhing in Zeeland, to wait the Iſſue of it, and to be ready, if Occaſion offer'd, to tranſport Himſelf into England.

The King allows of an Inſurrection in England.

But this great Deſign daily ſunk and diminiſh'd in the Proſpect: Yet the Earl of Rocheſter met with conſiderable Hopes from the King's Friends at London, with whom he very freely convers'd. He was fully perſuaded that in the North very much was to be expected, and that there was a Party powerful enough to poſſeſs themſelves of York. In the Weſt likewiſe there appear'd to be a ſtrong Combination, in which many Gentlemen were engag'd, whoſe Agents were then in London, and were very urgent to have a Day aſſign'd, and deſir'd no more, than that Sir Joſeph Wagſtaff might be authoriz'd to be in the Head of them. The Earl of Rocheſter choſe the North for his Part; and ſent Mr. Marmaduke Darcy, a gallant Gentleman, to prepare the Party there, appointed a Day, and Place for the Rendezvous, and promis'd to be there Himſelf; and was contented that Sir Joſeph Wagſtaff ſhou'd go into the Weſt, where he was well known, and by reaſon of his Bravery and great Companionableneſs in his Nature, very well belov'd. The 11th of March was the Day appointed for the Weſt, and the Place of Rendezvous two Miles from Saliſbury; and it was an Argument that they had no ſmall Opinion of their Strength, that they appointed that very Day when the Judges were to keep their Aſſizes in that City, and where the Sheriff and principal Gentlemen of the Country were oblig'd to give their Attendance. Thoſe of Hampſhire were not ſo punctual at their own Rendezvous, as to be preſent at the other near Salisbury at the appointed Hour; however Wagſtaff, and they of Wiltſhire, appeared according to Expectation. Penruddock, a Gentleman of a fair Eſtate, and great Zeal for the Cauſe, Hugh Grove, Jones, and other Perſons of Condition, were there with a Body of two Hundred Horſe well armed, which they believ'd wou'd daily be augmented by the Acceſs of thoſe engag'd in the Weſtern Aſſociation, eſpecially after the Fame of their being up, and their Performance of ſome Action, had been ſpread abroad.

It begins in Wiltſhire.

They judg'd that they were already ſtrong enough to viſit Salisbury in all its preſent Grandeur, knowing that they had many Friends there, and expecting that they ſhou'd there encreaſe their Numbers both in Foot and Horſe, with which the Town then abounded; and accordingly they enter'd the Place about five a Clock in the Morning. They appointed ſeveral of their Party to cauſe all the Stables to be lock'd up, that all the Horſes might be at their Devotion; others to break open the Goals, that all there might attend their Benefactors. They kept a good Body of Horſe upon the Market-Place, to hinder all Oppoſition; and gave Order to apprehend the two Judges, Rolls and Nicolas, and the Sheriff, then in their Beds, and to bring them into the Market-Place with their Commiſſions. All this was done with ſo little Noiſe and Diſorder, as if they in the Town had been unanimous. Thoſe within Doors, except they were commanded to come out, continu'd there, being more deſirous to hear than to ſee what was done; many being highly pleas'd, and not willing that others ſhou'd diſcern it in their Countenances. When the Judges, half dead with Fear, were brought out in their Robes, and produc'd their Commiſſions, together with the Sheriff, Wagſtaff reſolv'd to cauſe them all three to be hang'd, having well conſider'd how he Himſelf ſhou'd be us'd if he were under their Hands. But not having timely diſcovered this to his Friends, by which their Scruples might have been remov'd, many of the Country Gentlemen were ſo ſtartled, that they proteſted againſt the Propoſition; and the unhappy Penruddock was ſo paſſionate to preſerve their Lives, as if Works of this Nature cou'd be done by Halves, that this Commander durſt not perſiſt in it; but was prevail'd with to diſmiſs the Judges, and to oblige them upon another Occaſion to remember to whom they ow'd their Lives; reſolving ſtill to hang the Sheriff, who poſitively, but with many Tears, refus'd to proclaim the King: Which being otherways done, the Gentlemen likewiſe prevail'd with him rather to keep the Sheriff alive, and to carry him with them to redeem an honeſter Man, if Occaſion ſhou'd ſerve.

The Judges and others ſeiz'd at Salisbury.

The Rumour of this Action ſoon reſounded through the Nation; and queſtionleſs it was a bold Enterpriſe, and might have produc'd wonderful Effects, had it been proſecuted with the ſame Reſolution, or the ſame Raſhneſs, it was begun. There were various Opinions concerning the Foundation of it, and Cromwell Himſelf was much allarmed: He well knew the Diſtemper of the Kingdom, and the Diſcontents in his Army; and now when ſaw ſuch a Body gather'd together without any Noiſe, that durſt enter into one of the chief Cities of the Kingdom, take his Judges and Sheriff Priſoners, and proclaim the King in a Time of full Peace and Poſſeſſion, he cou'd not conceive that ſuch an Enterprize cou'd be undertaken without an univerſal Conſpiracy, in which his own Army cou'd not be innocent; and therefore knew not how to truſt them together in any conſiderable Body. But all this Apprehenſion vaniſh'd, when it was known, that within four or five Hours after this Exploit, they left the Town with very ſmall Addition to their Numbers. And indeed they perform'd nothing with Reſolution after the firſt Action; but were in ſuch Diſorder and Diſcontent among themſelves, that without ſtaying for their Friends out of Hampſhire, who were upon the Way with two or three Hundred Horſe, upon Pretence that they were expected in Dorſetſhire, they left the Town about two in the Afternoon; when they were ſo fatigu'd with their Day's Labour, and their Night's Watching, that they grew cold in the Deſign, and differ'd again among themſelves about the Sheriff, whom many deſir'd to be preſently releas'd; and that Party carry'd it, in Hopes of receiving good Offices afterwards from him. They from Hampſhire, and other Places, who were behind them, being diſguſted at their leaving Salisbury, wou'd not follow, but diſpers'd themſelves; and they who were before them, and heard in what Diſorder they left Wiltſhire, did the ſame: So that after they had continu'd their March into Devonſhire, without meeting with any to joyn with them, Horſe and Men were ſo tired for want of Meat and Sleep, that one ſingle Troop of Horſe, under Captain Unton Crook, being by Chance in thoſe Parts, follow'd them at a Diſtance, till they were ſo ſpent, that he rather entreated than compell'd them to deliver themſelves. Wagſtaff, Maſon, and Mompeſſon eſcap'd, and afterwards got beyond the Sea; but Penruddock, Grave, and moſt of the reſt, were taken Priſoners, upon Promiſe given them by the Officer that their Lives ſhou'd be ſaved; which they ſoon found he had no Power or Will to make good.

The Inſurrection ſuppreſs'd.

2. The Protector hearing of this cheap Victory, in a very ſhort Time ſent Judges away with a new Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, and Orders to proceed with the utmoſt Severity againſt the Offenders. But Rolls, the chief Juſtice, who had ſo fortunately eſcap'd at Saliſbury, had not recover'd the Fright, and wou'd not judge thoſe Men from the Bench, who had ſo much oblig'd him in the Streets, but expreſly refus'd to be employ'd in the Service, raiſing ſome Scruples in Point of Law, 'Whether the Men cou'd be legally condemn'd;' upon which Cromwell ſhortly after turn'd him out of his Office, having found others who wou'd execute his Commands. Penruddock and Grove loſt their Heads at Exeter; and others were hang'd in that City, who dy'd with great Courage and Reſolution, profeſſing to the laſt their Duty and Loyalty to their Sovereign: Many were ſent to Saliſbury, and try'd and executed there, in the Place where they had ſo lately triumph'd; and ſome who were condemn'd, where there were Fathers and Sons and Brothers, that the Butchery might ſeem to receive ſome Mitigation, were ſold, and ſent away Slaves to the Weſt-Indies; where they met with ſuch Treatment, that few of them ever return'd into their own Country. Thus this little Fire, which probably might have inflam'd all the Kingdom, was for the preſent extinguiſh'd in the Weſt, and Cromwell ſecured without the Help of his Army. At the ſame Time the Deſign of the North, which was thought to be much better prepared, made leſs Noiſe, and expired more peaceably; and the Earl of Rocheſter return'd from thence to the King in Diſcontent. His Majeſty finding the ill Succeſſes in England, left Zeeland, and return'd with all Speed to Cologne; where his little Court was ſoon gather'd together again, and better diſpos'd to ſit ſtill, and expect the Events of Providence.

Penruddock, Grove, and others ſuffer.

The King was extreamly afflicted with the Loſs of ſo many honeſt Gentlemen in England, who had ſo deſperately engag'd themſelves expreſly againſt his Judgment: And he was the more troubled, becauſe he by ſeveral of his Friends from thence was adviſ'd, 'That all his Counſels were diſcover'd, and that Cromwell had perfect Intelligence of whatſoever his Majeſty reſolv'd to do, and of all he ſaid Himſelf; ſo that it wou'd not be ſafe for any one to correſpond with him, or to be concern'd with his Affairs: That his private Continuance in Zeeland was known to Cromwell, with all the Particulars of his Journey; that many Perſons of Condition were ſeiz'd and impriſon'd for deſigning to poſſeſs themſelves of ſome Places of Strength; which Intelligence cou'd not be given but from Cologne; implying, That the Miſcarriage in the laſt Deſign proceeded wholly from the Treaſon of ſome Perſons near his Majeſty.' Theſe Advertiſements moſt ſenſibly diſturb'd the King; but he was much eas'd when it was ſoon after diſcover'd, that theſe miſtaken Reports aroſe chiefly from the Villainy of one Manning; a Perſon whoſe Father, a Colonel, had loſt his Life, and who had himſelf receiv'd a Wound in the late King's Service. This Man being employ'd as a Spy by Cromwell's Secretary Thurloe, diſſembled his Romiſh Religion, and by his plauſible Stories inſinuated Himſelf into the Converſation of the Earl of Rocheſter; by whoſe Encouragement he ſoon came to be a Perſon of no ſmall Conſideration in the Court at Cologne. Thus he paſs'd for a Man of ſingular Correſpondence with the King's Friends in England; but Sir Edward Hyde firſt ſuſpecting, and afterwards diſcovering the Falſeneſs of ſome of his Narratives, which ſeem'd to flow too much from a fruitful Brain, Means were found to intercept ſeveral Letters from him, and to him, and to ſeize upon all his Papers. By all which it appear'd that he had held a conſtant Correſpondence with Secretary Thurloe, receiv'd conſiderable Sums of Mony from him, and ſent variety of Intelligence to him, 'of what was done, ſaid, projected and debated by the King's Council at Cologne, with what Inſurrections were deſign'd in England, what Towns to be ſeiz'd, who were to be concern'd, and innumerable other Matters;' in all which there was not one Word of Truth, excepting the King's being at Zeeland, but were wholly the Effects of his own Invention: And moreover they found ſeveral Letters prepared, and made up with the Dates proper for many Poſts to come, and Information and Intelligence of the ſame Nature as the former. The King immediately took Care to publiſh the Tranſactions of this Man, by which his Friends diſcern'd with what Shadows they had been affrighted, and his Enemies ſaw what current Ware they had receiv'd for their Mony. This is the ſhort Account of Manning's Plot, which had amus'd ſo many at that Time, and ſeem'd to have been miſtaken by all our Writers, except the Lord Clarendon himſelf. As to this poor Wretch, his chief Excuſe was, That he thought he might get Mony by ſending Lyes to the Rebels, without Prejudice to the King; but notwithſtanding this, he was, at the Inſtance of the Court at Cologne, order'd to be ſhot to Death in one of the Caſtles of the Duke of Newburgh.

3. As the King's Hopes were much diminiſh'd by the late unſeaſonable and unfortunate Attempt, ſo Cromwell advanc'd his own Credit, and was very much enrich'd by it, and more confirm'd with thoſe whoſe Obedience and Submiſſion had been more dubious. He lay before under the Reproach of inventing Plots Himſelf, to make the Common-wealth be thought in Danger, that he might have an Excuſe and a Pretence to continue ſuch numerous Forces in Pay; but now it was more apparent how active and confident the King's Party was, and that they wou'd not have preſum'd to make ſo bold an Attempt, had they not good Aſſurance of being ſupported; and therefore they were to look upon the Fire as only cover'd, not extinguiſh'd. The little Succeſs they met withal, was thought Proof enough that there was not yet ſufficient Force for the Safety of the Kingdom; and therefore that it was neceſſary to make better Proviſion for the Quiet of every County, that it might not be endanger'd by every bold Attempt; and the Charge of this Defence ſhou'd in Juſtice be born by thoſe who were the Occaſion of the Expence. Thereupon He, by the Advice of his Council, made a wicked and unheard-of Order, 'That all thoſe who had born Arms for the King, or had declar'd themſelves to be of the Royal Party, ſhou'd be DECIMATED, that is, Pay a Tenth Part of all that Eſtate which they had left, to ſupport the Charge given to the Common-wealth by the Unquietneſs of their Temper, and the juſt Cauſe of Jealouſy which they Adminiſter'd.' And that the Publick might loſe Nothing of what he had ſo frankly given to it, Commiſſioners were appointed in every County, to value the real Worth of that Tenth Part of every ſuch Eſtate; and that no Man might have too good a Bargain of his own, every One was to pay as much as the Commiſſioners judg'd fit; and till he paid it, beſides the frequent Puniſhment of Impriſonment, his whole Eſtate was Sequeſter'd. And in this ſcandalous Decimation no Conſideration was taken of former Compoſitions, of any Articles of War, or of any Acts of Pardon and Indemnity, which had been granted under the Great-Seal of the Common-wealth.

Cromwell appoints a DECIMATION.

Then to procure Submiſſion to this Order, he publiſh'd a Declaration to make the Juſtice, as well as the Neceſſity of that Proceeding appear; in which he did not only inſert the Grounds of his Proceedings againſt the Royal Party, but the Rules he deſign'd to obſerve againſt any other Party that ſhou'd give him any Diſturbance. The Declaration was worded and digeſted with much greater Aſperity againſt all who had ſerv'd the King, than any before publiſh'd: In it 'they were look'd upon as a common Enemy, and who were not to be proſecuted like other Men, by the ordinary Forms of Juſtice, and to have their Crimes proved by Witneſſes, before they ſhou'd be concluded guilty; but if any Attempts were made againſt the Publick Peace, it ſhou'd be concluded that they all wiſh'd well to it; and that they might juſtly be ſuſpected and proſecuted as privy to them, by their common Diſcourſes, by the Company they uſually kept, and by their very Looks;' with many other Expreſſions, of ſuch an unuſual Nature in the Proceedings of Juſtice and Law, that the King's Party might reaſonably conclude, they had nothing left that they cou'd call their own, but muſt expect a total Extirpation, either by Maſſacre, or Tranſplantation. But the Declaration likewiſe took notice of other Kinds of Enemies of the Levelling and Republican Spirit, and gave clear Information, 'That the Connivance they had formerly receiv'd, and even the Pardons that had been granted for their former Mutinies and Tranſgreſſions, were of no more Validity than thoſe which had been granted to the Royal Party; which were all to be void and null, upon any ſucceeding Delinquency.' So that all Diſcontented People who lik'd not the preſent Government, how Officious ſoever in pulling down the Old, whether Presbyterian, Independent, or Leveller, were left to conſider of the Conſequence of this Declaration; and might naturally conclude that they were in no better Condition of Security for what they enjoy'd, and dearly purchas'd, than thoſe who by their Means were brought to the loweſt Miſery. Tho' indeed, for the preſent, none but the King's Party underwent that horrid Burthen of Decimation; which brought incredible Sums of Mony into Cromwell's Coffers, the greater Part of which was rais'd upon thoſe who never did, or ever wou'd have given the King the leaſt Aſſiſtance, and were only reputed to be of his Party, becauſe they had not aſſiſted the other with a viſible Chearfulneſs, or a conſiderable Proportion; but had propos'd to themſelves to ſit ſtill as Neuters, and not to be at any Charge with reference to either Party.

His Declaration upon it.

1655. Car. 7.

The Protector likewiſe ſent many of thoſe he ſuſpected to Priſon, as the Earl of Oxford, the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Newport, and Compton, Littleton, Peyton, Packington, Aſhburnham, Ruſſel, Legg, Philips, Halſey, and ſeveral others. He was no leſs watchful of the Republicans and Millenarians; and diſcarded Major-General Harriſon, and Colonel Rich, and then ſent them with Colonel Carew and Courtney, Priſoners to remote Caſtles; and General Monk had Orders to ſeize Major-General Overton, and Major Bramſton, Holms, and other Officers, and caſhier them. Overton was ſent up Priſoner to the Tower, and his Regiment given to Colonel Morgan; Colonel Okey's Regiment was given to the Lord Howard; Cornet, now Colonel Joyce, was likewiſe diſmiſs'd, having reproach'd Cromwell to the Face with his great Services. Nothing gave this Tyrant more Trouble than the Diſtemper in the Army, where he knew there were many Troops more at the Diſpoſal of that Party that wou'd deſtroy him, than at his own. It was once his Deſign to have drawn over a Regiment of Swiſs, upon Pretence of ſending them into Ireland, but in reality to keep them as a Guard to his own Perſon; and to that Purpoſe he had ſent a Perſon to treat with Colonel Balthazer, a Man well known in the Proteſtant Cantons: But this came to be diſcover'd, ſo that he had not the Confidence to proceed in it. He reſolv'd therefore upon an extraordinary Expedient, which ſhou'd provide for all Inconveniencies, as well amongſt the People, as in the Army. He made Choice of about a Dozen ſure Friends; for whom he conſtituted a new Office, and call'd them by the Name of MAJOR-GENERALS, they being in the Nature of Prefects, or Governors of Provinces. All England was put under the abſolute Power of theſe Men, none of them having any Power in the Juriſdiction of another, but every Man in thoſe Counties committed to his Charge, had all that Authority which was before divided among Committee-Men, Juſtices of Peace, and ſeveral other Officers. Their Names were, Major Haynes, who was Major-General for Eſſex, Suffolk, and Norfolk; Colonel Kelſey, for Kent and Surrey; Colonel Goffe, for Suſſex, Hampſhire, and Barkſhire; Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, for Oxfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Herefordſhire, and Cambridgeſhire; Major-General Skippon, for the City of London; Commiſſary-General Whaley, for Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, Warwickſhire, and Leiceſterſhire; Major Butler, for Northamptonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Rutland and Huntingtonſhire; Colonel Berry, for Worceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Salop and North-Wales; Colonel Wortley, for Cheſhire, Lancaſhire and Staffordſhire; Major-General Lambert, for Yorkſhire, Durham, Cumberland, Weſtmorland and Northumberland; and Colonel Barkſtead, for the City of Weſtminſter, and the County of Middleſex.

He conſtitutes MAJOR-GENERALS.

Their Power and Employment.

Theſe Major-Generals committed to Priſon what Perſons they thought fit to ſuſpect; took care to levy all Monies which were appointed by the Protector and his Council to be collected for the Publick; ſequeſter'd all who did not pay their Decimation, or ſuch other Payments to which they were made liable; and there was no Appeal from any of their Acts, but to the Protector Himſelf. And that they might not ſeem thus to domineer only for Mony, they were impowered to make Enquiry into many Things; into private Aſſemblies, and ſuch as had bought up Arms; into Vagabonds and idle Perſons, and thoſe who lived at too high a Rate, when it was not known how they were able to afford it; into Frequenters of Gaming-Houſes, Taverns and Publick Places; and into unlearned and ſcandalous Miniſters and School-Maſters: All which the Major-Generals had Power to examine, call before them, and puniſh. To theſe were joyn'd Aſſeſſors in the ſeveral Counties, Towns, and Provinces, for the moſt part choſen out of the Dregs of the People, tho' others of better Note were ſometimes mingled with them; and theſe had Power upon common Fame, proper Knowledge, or private Conjecture, to inform againſt others, make them appear, and accuſe them before the Major-General, with whom they ſat as Aſſociates in giving Judgment. Theſe Governors had likewiſe a Military Power, which was to liſt a Body of Horſe and Foot, who were to have ſuch a conſtant Salary, and not to be call'd upon Service but upon an Emergency, and then to attend ſo many Days at their own Charge; and if they ſtay'd longer, they were to be under the ſame Pay with the Army, but independent upon its Officers, and only to obey their Major-General. A Horſeman had eight Pounds a Year, for which he was to be ready with his Horſe, if call'd upon; if not, he might attend his own Affairs; which little ſort of Informers were call'd Eight-Pound Men. By this Means Cromwell had a ſecond Army in View, powerful enough to controle the Firſt, when there was any juſt Occaſion for Suſpicion. Theſe new Magiſtrates carry'd themſelves like ſo many Turkiſh Baſſas with their Bands of Janizaries, towards the People, and became extremely odious to all Parties, being call'd by the Name of State-Maſtives. They Lorded it over all the Nobility and Gentry of the Nation; and were as imperious towards the high Earl of Northumberland and his Followers, as to any of the Tribe of Cavaliers. Thoſe who had formerly made Way for this exorbitant Power, now felt the full Weight of it; and the haughty Lord Say, finding all his great Projects defeated, withdrew Himſelf to the Iſle of Lundy by Devonſhire, to which there is but one Acceſs, ſo ſteep and narrow, that ten Men may keep out a thouſand; where with a Guard of his own Servants, he kept himſelf as it were a voluntary Priſoner, till the Protector's Death, as I am aſſur'd from a very good Hand.

The Lord Say's Retreat.

4. The Commiſſioners for the great Seal were Sir Thomas Widdrington, Whitelock, Lenthal and Liſle; of which the three former made their Exceptions againſt executing an Ordinance of his Highneſs, and his Council, ‘ For the better regulating and limiting the Juriſdiction of ‘ the High-Court of Chancery.’ Upon which, the Protector, not ſuffering his Authority or his Acts to be diſputed, ſent for them to the Council-Chamber in June, and there commanded them to lay down the Seal and withdraw: the Protector kept it for ſome Days in his own Poſſeſſion, and at length deliver'd it to Major Liſle, one of his old obſequious Commiſſioners, and Colonel Fiennes; and it now ſeem'd moſt proper for Military Men to be Lord-Chancellors, while Law and Equity depended both upon the Length of the Sword. However to oblige the ejected Commiſſioners, the Protector made Widdrington and Whitelock Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, and continu'd Lenthal in his Favour upon the Account of old Services. About the ſame Time State Libels or Reflections on the Tyranny of the Protector, and his Miniſters, were ſo bold and common, that it was now found expedient to reſtain that Liberty of the Preſs, which began to turn upon the greateſt Advocates for it: So an Ordinance was made at Whitehall in October, ‘ That no Perſon preſume ‘ to publiſh in Print any Matter of Publick News or In‘telligence, without Leave and Approbation of the Secre‘tary of State;’ and another Order to enforce the ‘ Re‘ſtraint of printing unlicenc'd and ſcandalous Books ‘ and Pamphlets, and for Regulating of Printing.’ Then to lay a Reſtraint, both upon the Sword and Pen at the ſame Time, ſhortly after, an Order was made, ‘ That no ‘ Cavalier ſhou'd be allow'd to keep any Piece of De‘fenſive Arms.

A Change in the Miniſtry.

At this Time the Protector had Occaſion offer'd him both to exerciſe his Charity, and to diſplay his Power: The Proteſtants in the Valley of Lucern in Piedmont having unwarily riſen in Arms againſt Charles Emanuel Duke of Savoy; the Pope, and the Neighbour Princes of Italy, took Advantage and Occaſion to call for their Extirpation in his Dominions. This the Duke undertook; and having cruelly murder'd and maſſacred many of them, and driven the reſt from their Dwellings into the Mountains, where many of them dy'd with Cold and Hunger, they ſent their Agents to beg Relief of all Proteſtant Princes, who touch'd with the Senſe of their Brethrens Miſeries, were willing to contribute to their Aſſiſtance. Nor wou'd the Protector be backward in ſuch a Work, which might give the World a particular Opinion of his Piety, and Zeal for the Proteſtant Religion; but he proclaim'd a Solemn Faſt, and caus'd large Contributions to be gather'd for them throughout the Kingdom of England and Wales. Nor did he reſt here, but ſent his Agents to the Duke of Savoy, a Prince with whom he had no Correſpondence, or Commerce, and the next Year ſo engag'd the Cardinal of France, and even terrify'd the Pope Himſelf, without ſo much as doing any Favour to the Engliſh Roman Catholicks, that that Duke thought it neceſſary to reſtore all that he had taken from them, and renew'd all thoſe Privileges they had formerly enjoy'd. So great was the Terror of his Name; nothing being more uſual than his Saying, That his Ships in the Mediterranean ſhou'd viſit Civita Vecchia, and the Sound of his Cannon ſhou'd be heard in Rome.

Cromwell aſſiſts the Proteſtants in Savoy.

But tho' he appear'd ſo very zealous for the Proteſtant, yet he was thought not to have ſhewn the like Honour to the Chriſtian Religion: For about this Time the Jews, who cou'd never be permitted to live long in a well-ſettled Monarchy, but always made their Advantage in Common-wealths, finding England now to bear that Denomination, and knowing how beneficial an engroſſed Trade might prove, they ſent over ſome of their Emiſſaries, with Manaſſes Ben Iſrael, a great Rabbi, at the Head of them, and tempted the Protector with two hundred thouſand Pounds for their Re-admiſſion and Eſtabliſhment, provided they might have St Paul's Cathedral for a Synagogue, which they likewiſe promis'd to repair. The Offer of ſo much Mony wrought very ſtrongly with his Highneſs, and made him look upon it as the Cauſe of God, and a Way happily laid open for their promis'd Converſion; and therefore he deſir'd a Conference with ſeveral Miniſters and others about it, to whom he declar'd his Mind with great Fervour, alledging, ‘ That ſince there was a Promiſe that they ſhould be converted, Means ought to be us'd to that Purpoſe; that the moſt probable Way was, the Preaching the Goſpel in Truth and Sincerity, as it was then in England, devoid of all Popiſh Idolatry, which had render'd the Chriſtian Religion odious to them.’ But both the Clergy and the Laity ſo declaim'd againſt them, that this Religious Juggle wou'd not take place: The Merchants foreſaw, that if they ſhou'd obtain their Requeſt, they wou'd ſoon engroſs the Trade of the Nation into their own Hands, to the Empoveriſhing of the Natives; and it was eaſily diſcernible that in theſe Times, when every Man's Fancy was his Religion, it was more probable that ſome of them ſhou'd turn Jews, than that any of the Jews ſhou'd be converted to Chriſtianity. A French Author tell us, that the Fame of Cromwell was become ſo eminent, that tho' the Jews pretended the Buſineſs of Traffick, yet their ſecret Deſign was to diſcover whether he was not the Meſſias they waited for: And going to the Univerſity of Cambridge, under the Pretext of viewing and purchaſing ſome Hebrew Manuſcripts, they repair'd to the County of Huntingdon, where his Parents were born; and there ſtrictly enquiring into his Genealogy, they return'd without any further Overtures made to the Protector.

He ſets out two great Fleets.

5. Such were this Year's Proceedings of Cromwell at home, whoſe aſpiring Mind was not confin'd there, but dilated it ſelf abroad; and being hurry'd on by the Ambition of ſpreading his Name, and the Avarice of gaining great Treaſure, he reſolv'd upon great Exploits in Foreign Parts, without declaring War, or giving the leaſt Intimation of his Deſigns. Long had the World wonder'd for what Enterprize he was preparing thoſe two mighty Fleets which were ſet out in the Beginning of the Year, all the neighbouring Nations being jealous leaſt the Storm ſhou'd fall upon them. None cou'd imagine where it wou'd break forth; only the Spaniards, having moſt Reaſon to be apprehenſive, ſent over the Marqueſs of Lerida, Governor of Dunkirk, into England, to penetrate into the Depth of this grand Deſign: But, conjecturing by the Ambiguity of the Anſwers he receiv'd, and the Reſervedneſs of the Protector, that it might concern his Country-men, he ſoon after return'd to his Government. Nor was it publickly known in England, till a conſiderable Time after the two Fleets were ſet out; the firſt under Admiral Blake, which was ſent into the Mediterranean to ſpread the Terror of his Arms; and the ſecond under Pen and Venables, ſent to the Weſt-Indies, to enrich himſelf, and his Friends. The latter conſiſting of about thirty Men of War, with three or four thouſand Land-Soldiers, to be commanded by Venables, ſet Sail directly for Barbadoes, where the two Commanders had Orders to break open their Commiſſions. Here ſafely arriving, they landed their Men for their better Refreſhment, and us'd all Diligence to make all Things ready for ſome mighty Enterprize. Out of this, as alſo out of the neighbouring Iſles, the Forces they brought out of England were encreas'd to ten thouſand Men; Servants and others being invited to take up Arms, upon the Aſſurance of Liberty, and Hopes of great Plunder. But tho' the Army was numerous, the Proviſions made for it were not proportionable, as tho' they had nothing to do but to appear and conquer.

The one arrives at Hiſpaniola;

With theſe Forces, and with mighty Expectations, they ſail'd directly to the Iſland of Hiſpaniola, and on the 13th of April appear'd before San Domingo, the chief City and Port of that Country, a rich Place, fortify'd and inhabited by the Spaniards. The Inhabitants, ſurpris'd and terrify'd with the Danger, abandon'd their City, and fled into the Woods, leaving all to the Diſcretion of the Aſſailants. But the Engliſh, by the vain Precaution of their Leaders, fearing ſome imaginary Ambuſcades, omitted and loſt this great Opportunity; for inſtead of an immediate Entrance into the Port, Venables with ſeven thouſand Men landed about ten Leagues from the Town. The Soldiers were lively and couragious, promiſing themſelves vaſt Quantities of Gold and Riches. But their Joy and Hopes did not continue long; for it was proclaim'd under Pain of Death, that no Man ſhou'd plunder Gold, Silver, Jewels, or any other rich Moveables, or kill any tame Cattle. The Soldiers, damp'd and diſappointed with this unſeaſonable Order, mov'd very heavily; and marching through thick Woods, ſcorching Sands, exceſſive Heat of the Sun, and its Concomitant, unſufferable Thirſt, they at length came to the aſſign'd Rendezvous. Colonel Buller met them there with three Regiments from the Fleet, where they were ſomewhat refreſh'd by Means of a River of freſh Water, which diſcharged it ſelf into the Sea. The Forces being joined, Venables march'd with his Army towards the City, having ſent Captain Cox, who was alſo their Guide, with five hundred Men before as a Forlorn. And ſo they prov'd; for in the mean Time, the Spaniards taking Courage from their Enemies Delays, and perceiving the Difficulties that attended them, betook themſelves to their Defence; and falling bravely upon them in the Intricacies of their Paſſage with a handful of Men, they kill'd Cox himſelf, and routed his Party, who ruſhing upon the next Regiment put it to Flight. Upon the Advance of the Army, the Spaniards retired into a certain Fort they had in the Wood.

Where it is unſucceſsful

Venables, after this unfortunate Attack, return'd back to the River, with a Reſolution to reaſſume his Deſign; and having mounted two Guns, provided ſcaling Ladders, Mortars, Granadoes and Fire-Balls, he march'd a ſecond Time towards the City. But being miſ-led by the Errors of his Guides, who undertook to lead them a more commodious Way for the avoiding of the Fort, he was brought into the ſame Place where they had already fought ſo unfortunately. The Spaniards, but ſeventy in Number, ſallying ſuddenly out of their Ambuſhes, fell with ſuch Violence and Fury upon the Van-Guard, that the Forlorn being beaten into the next following Battalion, that alſo turn'd upon their own Army, and filling all with Terror, they all ſhamefully fled. The Enemy purſu'd with great Slaughter; nor did they retire, till they were wearied with killing, and carry'd away ſeven Colours in Token of Victory. Colonel Haynes having with great Courage endeavour'd to make Head againſt them, being abandon'd, was ſlain by them, and with him ſix hundred more, beſides many wounded. Theſe ſad Misfortunes were ſucceeded, by the Negligence of the Commanders, with Want of Proviſions; ſo that ſeveral of the Soldiers ſtraying in the Woods in Queſt of Victuals were knockt on the Head by the Negroes and Molattoes. Their Wants daily increaſing, they eat all their Horſes, which they had brought in a fine Troop with them from Barbadoes; and theſe not ſufficing, they at length reſolv'd to leave that Place that had prov'd ſo diſgraceful and fatal to them. So on the third of May they ſail'd with their baffled Army to the Iſland of Jamaica; where the News of their Defeat not being yet arriv'd, they eaſily landed, the Spaniards there Articling for Liberty to depart, to which they readily conſented. But here they met with an Enemy more ſevere than the Spaniards, which was the Plague; which in a little Time reduc'd their Army to fewer than two thouſand Men. Thoſe who ſurviv'd, being recruited with Men and Proviſions from England, the Iſland being alſo clear'd of Spaniards, afterwards became a famous Colony of the Engliſh.

Blake's Acts in the Mediterranean.

But tho' they were ſo unfortunate in this Attempt, yet the brave Exploit of Admiral Blake in the other Fleet that went to the Mediterranean, made ſome Reparation to the Honour of England. His Deſign was honourable, to ſcour thoſe Seas of the Turkiſh Pirates, who had often made Prize of the Engliſh Merchant Ships, and Slaves of their Perſons. Blake not meeting with any of theſe at Sea, bravely reſolv'd to ſeek them out in their Ports, and there either perſuade, or compel them to a Reſtitution, or a Peace. And firſt he appear'd before Algiers, the neareſt Harbour of thoſe Sea-Robbers, and Anchoring within the very Mole, he ſent to the Dye or King, requiring Reſtitution of all Engliſh Ships taken, and Releaſe of all Engliſh Men made Slaves. The Dye knowing his Inability to reſiſt ſo powerful a Fleet, immediately ſent a rich Preſent with ſome Store of freſh Proviſions, acquainting the Engliſh Admiral, ‘ That the Ships and Captives already taken belong'd to private Men, therefore not ſo much in his own Power; but yet they ſhou'd be reſtor'd at a moderate Ranſom; and if the Admiral thought good, they wou'd conclude a Peace, and for the future offer no Acts of Violence to any of the Engliſh Ships and Natives.’ This being concluded according to Blake's Satisfaction, he ſail'd directly for Tunis, another Receptacle for thoſe Pirates, where their Port being better fortify'd, he found more reſolute Anſwers: For having here alſo ſent to demand Reſtitution of the Ships, and Releaſe of the Engliſh Captives, he was abſolutely deny'd, with this bold Anſwer, ‘ That there were their Caſtles of Goletta, and their Ships and Caſtles of Porto Ferino, he might do his worſt, for he ſhou'd not think to fright them with the Sight of his Fleet.’ Fired with this Anſwer, Blake in a Council of War reſolv'd at once to deſtroy their Ships in Porto Ferino; to which Purpoſe they mann'd their Long-Boats with reſolute Sea-Men, and ſent them into the Harbour to fire the Ships, while Blake himſelf with his whole Fleet moſt furiouſly thunder'd with his Cannon upon their Caſtles and Batteries, for the moſt part diſmounting their their Guns, and forcing the Defendants to abandon their Works. In the mean Time the Sea-Men ſo gallantly play'd their Parts, that they ſoon reduc'd all their nine Ships of War to Aſhes, and return'd back with the Loſs of only twenty five Men, and forty eight wounded. The Infidels thus chaſtis'd and aſtoniſh'd, ſubmitted to Articles; and this Action ſpread the Fame and Gallantry of the Engliſh Nation all over thoſe Parts, and was eſteem'd by the People of thoſe Countries, who had never ſeen or heard of Ships fighting with Caſtles, as little leſs than a Miracle.

Cromwell diſſatisfy'd.

The Succeſs of both Fleets came to the Protector's Knowledge about the ſame Time, but did not equally affect him. Tho' he had uſually a great Command over his Paſſions, yet he ſhew'd himſelf highly diſcompos'd, upon the Miſcarriage of Hiſpaniola. And as ſoon as they came on Shore, he ſent both Pen and Venables Priſoners to the Tower, and cou'd never be perſuaded to truſt either of them again; nor cou'd he for a long Time ſpeak temperately of that Affair. However he loſt no Time in cheriſhing his Infant Plantation in Jamaica; which many believ'd to be at too great a Diſtance, and deſired the Men there might be recalled: But he wou'd not hearken to that Advice, but immediately ſent a good Squadron of Ships, and a Recruit of fifteen hundred Men to carry on that Work; and reſolv'd nothing more, than to make a continual War from that Place upon the Spaniard. At the ſame time he reſolv'd upon another Piece of Policy, advantagious to himſelf, but ruinous to his Country, which was to join, ſupport, and raiſe the Power of France as much as he cou'd, or was ſubſervient to his own private Intereſt.

The Death of the Duke of Richmond.

Archbiſhop Uſher,

Dr. Robinſon,

Sir Tobie Mathew,

Sir Theodore Mayerne,

Biſhop Goodman,

And Mr. Marſhal.

And here we ſhall finiſh the old Year with an Account of the Deaths of ſome eminent and noted Men; and firſt with James Duke of Richmond, that great and excellent Man, who had never once deviated from his Honour and Loyalty, and had ſeen all his three Brothers, George, John and Bernard, die in the Royal Cauſe, and whoſe Character we have given in another Place: He dy'd of a Quartan Ague, in the Beginining of the Year, having never had his Health, nor yet his Spirits, ſince the deplorable Murder of his beloved Maſter, for the ſaving of whoſe Life he had the Honour to offer his own. The next to be mention'd is the famous Dr. James Uſher, the venerable Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Lord Primate of Ireland, the Glory of that Nation both for Learning and Piety: He left his Native Country ever ſince the Year 1640, and continuing with a moderate Subſiſtance in England, he diſplay'd his wonderful Abilities in many noble Treatiſes; being invited and courted by Cardinal Richlieu and ſeveral Foreigners to repair into their Countries: And Cromwell, knowing how univerſally he was eſteem'd, ſhew'd ſome particular Marks of Reſpect to him a little before his Death, and after that was at the Charge of a publick Funeral for him. Beſides theſe two great Men, three others are worthy of Remembrance, all of different Characters and Capacities; as firſt Dr. Hugh Robinſon, Maſter of the great School at Wincheſter, Arch-Deacon of Gloceſter, and Canon of Wells; an excellent Linguiſt, and able Divine, and well vers'd in all ancient Hiſtories, as his learned Writings ſufficiently teſtify. Next, Sir Tobie Matthew, Son to the Archbiſhop of York, mention'd in the Year 1628, a learned Romaniſt and Jeſuit, who had made a great Noiſe and Figure in the Nation, by his Ingenuity and unwearied Induſtry, and the Intereſt and Acquaintance he had acquired among the great Courtiers, both in King James's and the laſt Reign. Next, Sir Theodore Mayerne, or Turquettus de Mayerne, Baron of Aubon in France, Phyſician in ordinary both to King James and the late King; a Perſon of eminent Note and Fame in his Profeſſion, of whom ſeveral learned Men of France and Germany have made honourable mention, even ſixty Years before his Death. There are two others which ought not to be forgotten, tho' moſt memorable for their infamous Practices: The Firſt was Dr. Godfrey Goodman, Biſhop of Gloceſter, who with great Scandal declar'd himſelf, in his laſt Will, to die in the Faith and Communion of the Mother Church of Rome; having before given great Grounds of Suſpicion, particularly by refuſing to ſubſcribe the Canons in the Year 1640. It is obſervable that this Man was the only Biſhop who made his Addreſſes to Cromwell, and dedicated a Book to his Excellency with Flattery, and a ſervile Petition for hearing his Cauſe, and for doing Juſtice to him; and it is further remarkable, that as this was the only Apoſtate Engliſh Biſhop ſince the Reformation, ſo he was the only one who left Children to beg their Bread. The laſt was Mr. Stephen Marſhal, Batchellor of Divinity, the celebrated Independent, tho' formerly Presbyterian Preacher, of whom mention has been made before, and one of the Authors of that noted Book call'd Smectymnuus; a famous Incendiary and Aſſiſtant to the Parliamentarians. He was their Trumpet in their Faſts, their Confeſſor in their Sickneſs, their Counſellor in their Aſſemblies, their Chaplain in their Treaties, and their Champion in their Diſputations: This great Shimei, falling into a deſperate Sickneſs, departed the World mad and raving.

Cromwell's Treaty with France.

V. I. The King of Spain being provok'd with the Hardſhip he had ſuſtain'd from Cromwell, and ſenſible of his perfidious Dealings, ſolemnly proclaim'd War againſt England in the Beginning of the new Year. So that the Rupture, which begun on one Side privately, was now carry'd on publickly on Both; and Cromwell, who had the Advantage of being the Aggreſſor, ſent Orders to Admiral Blake, 'That he ſhou'd watch the Return of the Spaniſh 'Plate-Fleet, and make what Deſtruction he cou'd upon the 'Coaſts of Spain;' and gave Directions to his Ship Commanders in the Downs to infeſt thoſe of Flanders, which they had never done before. What had been hitherto privately treated between him and Cardinal Mazarine, was now expos'd more to the Light. He now ſent Lockhart his Ambaſſador into France, who was receiv'd with great Solemnity; being a Man of great Addreſs in Matters of Treaty, and one who had a wonderful Credit and Power with the Cardinal. He there finiſh'd that unhappy Alliance with France. On the Side of England, Cromwell undertook 'To ſend over an Army of ſix Thouſand Foot, to 'be commanded by their own ſuperior Officer, who was 'to receive Orders only from Marſhal Turenne; and when 'the Forts of Dunkirk and Mardyke ſhou'd be taken, they 'were to be put into Cromwell's Hands.' There were other more ſecret Articles, which were not long after diſcover'd and known, and particularly, 'That the King 'Himſelf, with his two Brothers, the Dukes of York and 'Gloceſter, and all his Relations and Adherents, excepting 'the Queen Mother, ſhou'd be excluded out of the French 'Dominions:' Articles that were conceal'd by the French, till the Cardinal found a kind of a Neceſſity to diſcover them to the World.

An Inſtance of his Tyranny.

Strengthen'd with this Alliance abroad, the Protector had greater Encouragement to exerciſe his Tyranny at home; of which there happen'd a particular Inſtance about this Time, which ought not to paſs unremember'd. Having laid ſome Taxes upon the City by his own Authority, one Cony, a great Fanatick and old Aſſiſtant of his, poſitively refus'd to pay his Share, and loudly diſſwaded others from ſubmitting to it, as an Impoſition directly againſt Law, and the Property of the Subject. The Protector ſent for him, and ſooth'd him with the Memory of former Kindneſs and Friendſhip, and told him, That of all Men he did not expect this Oppoſition from him, in a Matter ſo neceſſary for the Good of the Common-wealth. This Man remember'd him, how great an Enemy he had formerly expreſs'd himſelf to ſuch Grievances, and particularly had declar'd, That all who ſubmitted to pay illegal Taxes, were greater Enemies to their Country than the Impoſers; and the Tyranny of Princes could never be grievous, but by the Tameneſs and Stupidity of the People. When Cromwell ſaw he cou'd not convert him, he told him, That He had a Will as ſtubborn as His, and he would try which of them two ſhould be Maſter; and thereupon, with Paſſion and Contempt, committed the Man to Priſon. This did not abate the other's Reſolution; but as ſoon as the Term came, he brought his Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, then call'd the Upper Bench. Maynard, Twyſden and Windham were his Council, who with great Confidence demanded his Liberty, both upon the Illegality of the Commitment, and the Illegality of the Impoſition. The Judges cou'd not maintain or defend either, and ſufficiently intimated what their Sentence wou'd be; and therefore the Protector's Attorney required a further Day, to anſwer what had been urg'd. Before that Day, Maynard and the other two were committed to the Tower, for preſuming to queſtion the preſent Authority; and the Judges were ſent for, and ſeverely reprehended for ſuffering that Liberty; and when they humbly alledg'd Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, he ridicul'd thoſe Laws in Words too coarſe and ſcandalous for a Hiſtory, and ask'd them, Who made them Judges? and whether they had any Authority to ſit there, but what he gave them? and therefore he adviſ'd them to be more tender of that Authority which only cou'd preſerve them; and ſo diſmiſs'd them with a Caution, That they ſhou'd not ſuffer the Lawyers to prate what it wou'd not become Them to hear. Thus he ſubdu'd a Spirit which had been troubleſome to the moſt Sovereign Authority, and made Weſtminſter-Hall as obedient, and ſubſervient to his Commands, as any of the reſt of his Quarters.

2. It now concern'd the Prqtector to ſet all Engines on Work, for the procuring of Mony to carry on the War, which he himſelf had rais'd againſt ſo potent an Enemy as the Spaniard; for being fully convinc'd of the Injury done him

The Succeſs of the Engliſh Fleet againſt the Spaniards.

him at Hiſpaniola and Jamaica, he ſoon made Seizure of all the Engliſh Merchant Ships and Goods in his Ports, before they were ſuſpected by the Owners. To manage this War offenſively, Admiral Blake, and Montague, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, were with a powerful Navy commanded by Cromwell to block up the Spaniſh chief Port of Cadiz, whither the Plate-Fleet us'd Yearly to come and unlade, hoping to intercept them at their Return. Here the two Commanders lay before the Harbour for ſeveral Weeks; but cou'd not provoke the Spaniards to come out and fight, who had then a Squadron of Men of War ſecur'd by the Forts and Caſtles in the Iſland. They were in Hopes to tire out the Engliſh, and that Want of Water and Proviſions wou'd oblige them leave their Coaſts; but they were plentifully ſupply'd with both at Wyers-Bay in Portugal. The Admirals were gone to this Place, when Captain Stayner, who was left with ſeven Ships at the Mouth of the Harbour, eſpy'd the Spaniſh Plate-Fleet making directly for Cadiz. Stayner was ſomewhat to the Leeward, but he bore up in the Head of them with all the Sail he could make; and in a few Hours Time, Himſelf in the Speaker, the Bridgwater and Plymouth Frigates got up with the Spaniards: With theſe Ships, while the reſt were behind, Stayner bravely fought eight Spaniſh Men of War and Galleons within four Leagues of Cadiz. The Admiral, Don Marco del Porto, with ſix hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight, ran his Ship on Shore. The Vice-Admiral, in which were twelve hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight, and another Galleon, were fired, one deſignedly by the Spaniards, and the other by Accident. In the former, the Marqueſs of Bajadox, Vice-Roy of Mexico, with his Wife and eldeſt Daughter, who was to be marry'd to the Duke of Medina Celi, periſh'd in the Flames; but his other Daughter, and his two Sons, and near a Hundred more, were ſav'd by the Engliſh. The Rear-Admiral, with two Millions of Plate on Board, was taken and ſecured, and another Ship richly loaden with Hydes and Cocheneal. A Man of War and an Advice-Boat got into Gibralter, and the other two Ships run aſhore and bulg'd: and ſix of theſe eight were deſtroy'd, or made Prize.

Great Riches brought home.

Admiral Montague, with the young Marqueſs of Bajadox, the Priſoner and the Plate, to the Value of above two Millions, return'd ſafe to England. The Ships arriv'd at Portſmouth; and tho' they might with leſs Charge have continu'd their Voyage by Sea to London, Cromwell judg'd it wou'd occaſion more Noiſe and Wonder, if all the Bullion, which was of ſuch great Value, was landed at Portſmouth; from whence it was brought by Land in many Carts to London, and carry'd through the City to the Tower to be there coin'd, as it was, in as ſhort a Time as cou'd be diſpatch'd; and tho' it was in it ſelf ſo conſiderable, they gave out and reported it to be of greater Value than it was. But the Loſs to the Spaniard was prodigious; tho' moſt of what was in the Admiral was ſav'd, and that only. And they ſaw the Engliſh Fleet ſtill remaining before them, which was not likely to miſs the other Fleet they ſhortly after expected, notwithſtanding all Advertiſements they cou'd be able to ſend to it. And thus the Spaniard, who firſt had by his Ambaſſador Cardinas, and others, too much encourag'd the Rebellion and Power of the Parliament againſt the late King, began in his Turn to receive his Retribution from the Effects of Both.

A general View of Cromwell's Government and Behaviour,

3. And now the Protector Cromwell, tho' many of his Actions were yet unperform'd, ſeem'd to have been in the Height of his Glory; more in Power and Dread, both abroad and at home, than perhaps ever was any Engliſh Monarch before him. And here it will not be improper to take ſome more general View of his Government, his Methods, and Perſonal Behaviour, that we may give a more perfect Idea of the State of the Times and Nation. Notwithſtanding all the tyrannical Proceedings of this Uſurper, he perform'd ſeveral great and laudable, as well as little and uncommon Things: He reſtor'd Juſtice, as well Diſtributive as Commutative, almoſt to its ancient Dignity and Splendor; The Judges diſcharging their Duties without Covetouſneſs, according to Law and Equity; and the Laws, except ſome few that concern'd Himſelf, having full and free Courſe in all Courts, without Impediment or Delay. Mens Manners alſo, at leaſt outwardly, ſeem'd to be really reform'd, either by withdrawing the Fewel of Luxury, or through Fear of the ancient Laws, now reviv'd and put in Execution. His own Court alſo was regulated according to a moſt ſtrict Diſcipline; where Drunkenneſs, Whoredom, and Bribery were either baniſh'd or ſeverely puniſh'd. Trade began again to flouriſh and proſper, and ſeveral of the Arts of Peace to be cultivated throughout the Nation.

In Spiritual Matters,

As he proceeded with great Indignation and Haughtineſs, againſt thoſe who were refractory, and durſt contend with his Greatneſs, ſo towards all who comply'd with his good Pleaſure, and courted his Protection, he manifeſted great Civility, Generoſity and Bounty. He particularly ſtudy'd to gain an Opinion of extraordinary Sanctity among the Preachers; for no Man affected to ſeem more tender of the Clergy than Himſelf, tho' he wou'd not liſt himſelf in any particular Sect. He was indeed more inclin'd to the Independents, as his Affairs required; but he gave it out, 'That it was his only Wiſh and Deſire to ſee the 'Church in Peace, and that all wou'd gather into one 'Sheep-Fold, under one Shepherd, Jeſus Chriſt, and mu'tually love another;' while he privately divided them, and promoted all their Diſſenſions. He projected ſome ſpecious Propoſals of Reconciliation between the Presbyterians and Independents; but when they ſeem'd upon the Point of Agreement, he ſet them again at greater Variance. Under Pretext alſo of moderating and pacifying the Diviſions of the Scotch Remonſtrators, and Aſſembly-Men, he blew up the Coals, and kindled greater Flames amongſt them. By Turns he countenanc'd all Sorts of Fanaticks, that the Enthuſiaſtical People might more obſtinately adhere to their Scruples and Whimſies: If he perceiv'd that the Presbyterians began to raiſe their Creſts, become uneaſy under the Government, or meddle in Civil Affairs, he let looſe againſt them the Anabaptiſts, Quakers, and the reſt of the Fanaticks, who took Pleaſure in diſputing with their Preachers, and interrupting them in their religious Worſhip; and he was by many heard to glory, That he had curb'd that inſolent Sect, that wou'd ſuffer none but it ſelf; ſo that they humbly begg'd his Leave, and thank'd him for permitting them to preach and pray after their Manner, in their own Congregations. Tho' the publick Uſe of the Common-Prayer-Book was deny'd to the Epiſcopal Party, yet he allow'd the Uſe of their Rites in private Houſes; and tho' the State of the Church of England now ſeem'd ſad and deplorable, yet it cannot be deny'd, but that milder Courſes were us'd, than under the rigid Tyranny of others that went before. As to the Papiſts, tho' he appear'd a publick and implacable Enemy to them, yet he was very familiar with, and very obliging towards ſome of them: Nay, he once enter'd upon a Treaty with them concerning a general Toleration of Religion, converting the third Part of their Rents, which had been forfeited by Law, into a certain Sum of Mony. But becauſe they could not agree upon the very Sum, and finding it would be ungrateful to the People, and give Occaſion for Commotions, he thought it more expedient for that Time to deſiſt. But what Succeſs ſoever that Affair had, he privately gave Liberty of Maſs to all; and Romiſh Prieſts and Jeſuits, who by Law were guilty of Death, never had greater Freedom, nor ever more boldly carry'd on their Deſigns, in the Camp, Court, and Pulpit, ſome of them even arriving at Promotion; ſo that among the ill-grounded People, they reap'd no ſmall Harveſt of Proſelytes.

In Civil Matters,

As to Civil Affairs, where the Life of his Juriſdiction was not concern'd, he pretended a great Reverence for the Law, and the Conſtitution; and becauſe his Enemies and Oppoſers were numerous both at home and abroad, he never ſpared in the Caſe of Spies and Intelligence, in which he is believ'd to have been at the Expence of no leſs than Two Hundred Thouſand Pounds a Year. He had given Power to the publick Poſt-Maſters, who were all at his Devotion, to ſtop ſuſpected Perſons, and ſecretly open their Letters; and if they inſinuated any Thing tending to an Inſurrection, or any Thing was ambiguouſly expreſs'd, they were to write it down, till he might have an Opportunity either of ſeizing, or branding the Parties with pregnant Suſpicion. All Carriers and Meſſengers were narrowly obſerv'd, and ſometimes caus'd to be ſtopp'd, and carefully ſearch'd from Head to Foot, and other times terrify'd with Threats and Impriſonments, or ply'd with Wine and Engines of Diſcovery, till the moſt hidden Secrets were detected. His Spies were diſpers'd in all Parts, not only in England, but in Foreign Courts and Countries, and were often intermixt and woven among the Cavaliers themſelves. No Prince ſeem'd to have been Maſter of ſo much, and of ſuch particular Intelligence as Himſelf; concerning which we have ſome uncommon Stories, and one not improper to be here mention'd: A Gentleman, who was a known Friend to the late King, applying Himſelf to the Protector, obtain'd leave from him to Travel, upon a particular Promiſe That he wou'd not ſee Charles Stuart. Being arriv'd near the Court, he ſent a Meſſage to the King, that he might be permitted to wait upon his Majeſty by Night, which was granted; and having fully diſcours'd with him concerning his Affairs, he took leave, and receiv'd a Letter which he ſew'd within the Crown of his Hat. Upon his Return to England, he came with Confidence to Cromwell, and being demanded by him, If he had punctually perform'd his Promiſe? he anſwer'd he had. But, ſaid Cromwell, Who was it that put out the Candles when you ſpoke to Charles Stuart? This unexpected Queſtion ſomewhat ſtartled him; but Cromwell proceeding, asked him, What he ſaid to him? To which the Gentleman anſwer'd, He had ſaid nothing at all to him. Then, reply'd Cromwell, did he not ſend a Letter by you? The Gentleman denying that alſo, Cromwell took his Hat, and having found the Letter, immediately ſent him to the Tower.

And in all.

As to his general Behaviour, he endeavour'd to endear and oblige moſt Perſons by ſpecious Offices, ſuch as were accommodated to the different Humours and Characters of the Men. The few Nobility, with whom he had an Intimacy, he delighted with Raillery and Jeſting, contended with them in mimical Geſtures, and entertain'd them with pleaſant Collations, Muſick, Hunting and Hawking. But the Godly, and thoſe that profeſs'd great Piety, he humour'd with holy Conferences and Prayers, and Expounding of the Scriptures; all which he wou'd perform with numberleſs Sighs and Tears. When he was at Hampton-Court, he us'd ſometimes to give his Neighbours a Buck, to be run down in his Park, to honour them with his Preſence, and then give them Mony for Wine. He often made Feaſts for the inferior Officers, and before they had half dined, he wou'd order the Drums to beat, and call in his Foot Guards, like a Kennel of Hounds, to ſnatch off the Meat from the Table, and ſee them tear it in Pieces; after which he wou'd proceed to a hundred Antick Tricks, as throwing of Cuſhions, and putting burning Coals into their Boots and Pockets. When the Officers had ſufficiently laugh'd and tired themſelves with thoſe Preludes, he wou'd wheadle them to open their Hearts, and by that Means draw from them ſome Secrets of the greateſt Importance; while Himſelf, ſounding the Opinions of others, artfully conceal'd his own; and whatſoever he cou'd thus catch, he reſerv'd for the moſt proper Seaſon. He had a wonderful Knowledge of Men, and had a ſtrange Faculty of examining and winding about the Minds of all, even of his Enemies, which he cou'd beſet with innumerable Snares and Artifices. If he perceiv'd any one of the latter caught, that was not inflexible, his Method was to put them upon odious Employments, as raiſing and collecting Aſſeſſments, informing againſt, and accuſing of others; and ſo render them hateful and unpopular, while they at the ſame Time perform'd his Buſineſs. No Man more cunningly div'd into the Manners of Men, and into the Tempers of thoſe with whom he had Buſineſs, nor ſooner diſcover'd their Talent; and if there were any Man in all England that was ſingular in any Art or Faculty, he cou'd not be conceal'd from him. He had an abſolute Command over all the Paſſions and Affections of his own Mind; and in ſum, cou'd weep without Grief, laugh without Mirth, fawn without Love, and not only deceive others, but almoſt diſſemble Himſelf into a Belief that he was in earneſt.

4. Cromwell being now in the Height of his Power and Authority, and more formidable than any of the Engliſh Monarchs, wanted nothing but the Name of KING; which he was ſenſible he cou'd not obtain without a Parliament. He wanted no Forces to be rais'd, for he had augmented them at his own Pleaſure. Nor did he want Mony to ſupply his great Occaſions; for he had Ways and Means alway in his own Hands. Nor did he love to ſee a Parliament ſitting; for he had parted with two former Aſſemblies in the moſt rough and odious Manner. So that in all Appearance he cou'd have no Inclination, nor Occaſion for a new Seſſion, but only to make a Party for a Crown. To this purpoſe therefore, he us'd all Methods to awe and influence Elections: So beſides his ſtanding Force of Major-Generals in every County, he erected a new Office of Purgation, call'd A Committee for Inſpection of Charters, of which Mr. Gabriel Beck, Solicitor to his Highneſs, was Chair-Man; and their Conſults were all to be reported to the Protector and his Council: By which Means the Boroughs and Corporations were influenc'd or modell'd as his Highneſs and his Court pleas'd. But the Members for the Counties, which were made more numerous by the Inſtrument of Government, were not ſo eaſily elected or manag'd. Therefore, knowing the Inclination of the Country, the Protector us'd his utmoſt Endeavours to diſable and incapacitate ſuch Men from being Choſen, whom he thought moſt likely to obſtruct his Deſigns. In order to this he ſummon'd Preſident Bradſhaw, Sir Henry Vane, Colonel Rich, and Colonel Ludlow, to appear before him in Council. After Conſultation, Rich was ſent Priſoner to Windſor Caſtle; Ludlow was order'd to be taken into Cuſtody; Sir Henry Vane was ſent Priſoner to Cariſbrook Caſtle; and Bradſhaw, tho' ſuffer'd to go his Circuit as Chief-Juſtice of Cheſter, had Letters ſent after him to deter People from giving their Votes for him.

Cromwell's THIRD PARLIAMENT.

All Things thus prepared, on the 17th Day of September this Party of a Parliament met the Lord Protector in the Abbby-Church at Weſtminſter, where they heard a Sermon preach'd by a prime Creature and even Confeſſor of Cromwell, Dr. Owen, Dean of Chriſt-Church and Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, on theſe Words in Iſaiah, What ſhall one then anſwer the Meſſengers of the Nation? That the Lord hath founded Zion, and the Poor of his People ſhall truſt in it: A Sermon exactly calculated for the new projected Monarchy. After this, his Highneſs and the Members repaired to the Painted-Chamber, where he made a dark Speech to them, and ſent them away to their Houſe for Admiſſion, or Excluſion, according to Will of Himſelf and Council, and as they ſhou'd ſubſcribe a Paper of Recognition, That they wou'd act nothing prejudicial to the Government, as it was eſtabliſh'd under a PROTECTOR. For at the Doors of the Houſe they found a Guard, and an Officer ſtanding with a Liſt in his Hand, and demanding the Name of every Perſon: Such as were mark'd for Non-admittance, or refus'd the Recognition, were turned back, and ſuch as were approv'd, took a Ticket to introduce them, in theſe Words: Theſe are to certify, that A. B. is return'd by Indenture one of the Members to ſerve in this preſent Parliament for -------- and is approv'd by his Highneſs's Council. Ludlow ſeems to repreſent this Matter right, when he tells us, That the Court, finding by the Liſts they had receiv'd, that notwithſtanding all their Menaces, Promiſes, and other Artifices, divers Perſons were choſen whom they knew to be no Favourers of the Uſurpation, reſolv'd to clear their Hands at once. And to that End, under the Colour of a Clauſe in the Inſtrument of Government, ‘ That none ſhou'd be admitted to Places ‘ of Power and Truſt, but ſuch as were Men of Sincerity and Integrity,’ they gave an Excluſion to Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, and Mr. Scot, with as many more as they thought fit. By this Means, and the Refuſal of Others to take out their Permiſſions to ſit from Cromwell and his Council, as was required, leſt they ſhou'd ſeem to countenance ſuch a deteſtable Impoſition, and open Breach of Privilege; it came to paſs, that about a Hundred of thoſe who were elected by the Country, were excluded from the Diſcharge of their Truſt; while thoſe from Ireland and Scotland, who were choſen by and for the Sword, were admitted without any Scruple.

A Remonſtrance of the excluded Members.

The Excluded Members, to the Number of Ninety Eight, finding no Redreſs, appeal'd to the People in a ſevere Remonſtrance or Proteſtation, ſetting forth, ‘ That ‘ the Lord Protector had by Force of Arms invaded their ‘ Fundamental Right and Liberty, and violently prevent‘ ed the Meeting of the Peoples choſen Deputies in Par‘ liament; and concluding with an Appeal to God and ‘ all the good People of England for Aſſiſtance and Pro‘ tection in their Service; and pouring out their ſad Com‘ plaints before the Lord againſt our powerful Oppreſſors, ‘ humbly hoping that he will come forth Speedily to redeem ‘ his People out of the Hands of wicked and deceitful Men.’ But all this was to no Effect; eſpecially ſince moſt of the Subſcribers, as Haſlerigg, Scot, Jones, Goodwyn, &c. had been unſufferable Oppoſers of the juſt Prerogatives and Authority of their lawful Soveraign, and were the more fit and worthy to fall a Sacrifice to an Arbitrary Power in a wicked Accomplice, and a late Equal of their own. And it is obſervable how their Complaints were juſtly retorted upon Themſelves, particularly theſe Words in their Remonſtrance; We belive every Man can diſcern, how much it is more miſchievous for a King, OR ANY OTHER, to Command a Hundred, two Hundred, or three Hundred of the Members to depart, and call the reſt a PARLIAMENT. Which was the very ſame Complaint that the late King, and the Majority of the Nation, had for ſeveral Years made againſt the Uſurpations of the Long Parliament, in which they had been principal Actors.

The Proceedings of the Parliament.

The ſitting Members, chuſing Sir Thomas Widdrington for their Speaker, began to act agreeably to his Highneſs's Wiſhes and Deſires: For firſt, to ſecure him from all Attempts that might be made upon his Perſon, they paſſed an Act, ‘ making it High-Treaſon to ‘ attempt, compaſs or imagine the Death of the Pro‘ tector.’ And for the better ſecuring of him in his Government, they paſs'd another, ‘ Renouncing and ‘ Diſannulling the Title of Charles Stuart, unto the Do‘ minions of England, Scotland and Ireland. They likewiſe paſs'd ſeveral Acts for raiſing of Mony, for the more effectual Supply of the Protector's Neceſſities, and carrying on the War againſt Spain; as firſt, ‘ An Act for an Aſſeſſment of Sixty Thouſand Pounds ‘ a Month upon England, to continue three Months; ‘ another on Scotland, for the ſame Time, at five Thou‘ ſand Pounds a Month, and the ſame on Ireland.’

But for a more continu'd Supply for his Highneſs, there was another Act paſs'd, ‘ for thirty thouſand Pounds a Month for England, ſix thouſands Pounds a Month for Scotland, and nine thouſand Pounds a Month for Ireland, to be paid for three whole Years next enſuing.’ Nor were theſe wanting to grant that to the Protector, which the Long Parliament had in a Manner abſolutely deny'd to the late King, namely ‘ The Receipts of Tonnage and Poundage, for his Life.’ Nor was all this ſufficient, but other Projects were carry'd on for raiſing of Monies, as the Revival of that Act ‘ prohibiting the Multiplicity of Buildings in and about the City of London, or within ten Miles of it, and obliging a whole Year's Revenue to be immediately paid for all Houſes, which had been built upon new Foundations ſince the Year 1620.’ By all which, and Exciſes upon many inferior trifling Things, vaſt Sums of Mony were afterwards rais'd. Theſe, with ſome others, as One for the Exportation of ſeveral Commodities, of the Breed, Growth and Manufacture of England; another for the taking away of the Court of Wards and Liveries, &c. were on the 27th of November preſented ſolemnly to his Highneſs, to be confirm'd by his Royal Authority; and he as graciouſly confirm'd them all, and told them, That as it had been the Cuſtom of the chief Governors to acknowledge the Care and Kindneſs of the Commons upon ſuch Occaſions, ſo he did very heartily and thankfully acknowledge their Kindneſs therein. So much was done for his Benefit and Advantage, within a little above the Space of two Months.

The Major-Generals Suppreſs'd.

Within the ſame Compaſs of Time they began to debate concerning the exorbitant Power of the Major-Generals, whoſe Inſults ſo far increas'd, that they intimated, That they needed no Act of Indemnity, ſince their Swords cou'd protect them. But when their Authority came to be ſtrictly debated, Mr. Cleypole, Son-in-Law to the Protector, ſtood up, which was unuſual for him to do, and told the Houſe, ‘ That he cou'd but Start the Game, and leave thoſe who had more Experience to follow the Chace; and therefore cou'd only ſay, That he had formerly thought it neceſſary, in Reſpect to the Condition in which the Nation had been, that the Major-Generals ſhou'd be entruſted with the Authority which they had exercis'd; but in the preſent State of Affairs, he conceiv'd it inconſiſtent with the Laws of England, and the Liberties of the People, to continue their Power any longer.’ This Motion was a clear Direction to the Sycophants of the Court, who being fully perſuaded that Cleypole had deliver'd the Senſe, if not the very Words of Cromwell in this Matter, joyn'd unanimouſly in oppoſing and abrogating the Authority of theſe Major-Generals. Yet Cromwell took Care to continue their Names, that they might be formidable to the Counties, but abridg'd them of all that Power which began to be inconvenient to his own Security.

The Blaſphemy and Puniſhment of James Naylor.

At the ſame Time the Parliament was employ'd and diſturb'd by Matters of another Nature, the frequent Effuſions of Religious Phrenſy: The Quakers grew extravagantly mad, if they may be judg'd by the reſt of the World: One diſturb'd the Preacher in White-Chappel Church with ſuch a ſeditious Impulſe, that a Complaint was made to the Protector, who order'd him to a Juſtice of Peace, and to be proſecuted according to Law. Another pretending to an immediate Meſſage from God, went about the Streets denouncing his Judgments againſt the Protector and his Council. A Third in Colcheſter was ſo infatuated, as to ſtarve Himſelf to Death, upon the Claim of a Commiſſion from the Spirit, That he muſt faſt forty Days. But the moſt impudent of all Mortals was James Naylor, a late Soldier under General Lambert, who blaſphemouſly ſet up to be Jeſus Himſelf in Perſon; and ſo with Garb, Hair, and Looks, reſembling the Pictures of our Bleſſed Saviour, he went about with Diſciples, and Women miniſtring unto him: And ſo enter'd the City of Briſtol, riding upon an Aſs, with Women and a Mob crying Hoſanna! &c. and giving no other Anſwer to any Queſtion but Thou haſt ſaid it. The Magiſtrates of that City ſent him to Weſtminſter, where the Parliament, December the 8th, Reſolv'd, ‘ That James Naylor was guilty of horrid Blaſphemy, and a great Seducer of the People;’ and order'd the Speaker to pronounce this remarkable Sentence againſt him, ‘ To ſtand in the Pillory two Hours at Weſtminſter; to be whip'd by the Hang-Man through the Streets from Weſtminſter to the Old Exchange, and there to ſtand in the Pillory two Hours more; his Tongue bored through with a hot Iron, and his Forehead ſtigmatiz'd with the Letter B; to be afterwards ſent to Briſtol, and convey'd through the City on a Horſe bare back'd, and his Face backward, and his Body whip'd in the Market-Place: Thence to be brought back to London, and committed to Priſon in Bridewell, and there to be reſtrain'd from all Company, and to have no Relief but what he earns from hard Labour; and being debarr'd from the Uſe of Pen, Ink and Paper, ſhall be kept to continual Work, till he ſhall be releas'd by the Parliament.’ It was ſome Reproach to Human Nature, as one juſtly obſerves, that this wretched Fellow, under all his Sufferings, had ſome of his Followers to admire, and adore him, to lick his Wounds, to kiſs his Feet, to lean in his Boſom, and to do all that was prodigiouſly Impious and Silly. When he came firſt to Bridewell, to act on the Impoſture, he faſted Three Days; but the Fleſh overpowering the Spirit, he begg'd for Victuals, and fell to Work. He was for ſome Time diſown'd by the Quakers, but afterwards, upon ſome Acknowledgement, receiv'd again into their Favour.

Synder-comb's Plot and Death.

5. The Acts made for the Security of the Protector's Perſon were now judg'd to be highly ſeaſonable; ſince a new Diſcovery was made of a deſperate Plot againſt his Life: Miles Syndercomb, a Leveller and a ſtout Man, being caſhier'd in Scotland, combin'd with one Cecil and one Troop, of Cromwell's Life-Guard, to kill the Protector by ſome one of ſeveral Ways propos'd; and were always diſappointed by wonderful and unexpected Accidents. Syndercomb being detected and betray'd by one or both the other Conſpirators, reſolutely deny'd the Plot, but was condemn'd upon the Statute of the 25th of Edward the Third; which the Chief-Juſtice Glynne declar'd to be Treaſon in Caſe of a Protector as much as a King, ſince by the Word King any chief Magiſtrate was underſtood. The Priſoner was found dead in the very Morning appointed for his Execution; upon which his Body was dragg'd naked by a Horſe's Tail to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill, and under that bury'd with a Stake driven through it, cover'd with Iron at the Top, to ſtand the more durable Mark of Infamy. Immediately after, February the 20th was appointed for a Day of publick Thankſgiving for this great Mercy and Deliverance; when after a Sermon at St. Margaret's Weſtminſter, the Protector treated the Speaker and the Members in the Banquetting-Houſe at Whitehall, with more than ordinary Endearment. Yet he was very much diſturb'd at this Accident; for inſtead of getting an uſeful Confeſſion out of this bold Man, as he fully expected, he found himſelf under the Reproach of cauſing him to be poyſon'd, as not daring to bring him to publick Juſtice; and tho' he cou'd not make the particular Diſcovery he expected, he found this general one, that he himſelf was more odious to his Army than he believ'd he had been.

The Death of the Earl of Cheſterfield,

Biſhop Hall,

Mr. Hales,

Mr. Wingate.

After this Man's Death we ſhall conclude the Year with ſome others of greater Worth and Conſideration; and firſt of a noble Lord, Philip Stanhope, Earl of Cheſterfield, a Perſon highly remarkable for his inviolable Steadineſs and Loyalty to the late and preſent King; in whoſe Service he expended about fifteen thouſand Pounds, and likewiſe loſt two brave and valiant Sons, Philip as he glorioſly defended Shelford Houſe, and Ferdinando in a ſharp Fight at Bridgeford in Nottinghamſhire. The next was a Lord Spiritual, Dr. Joſeph Hall, Biſhop of Norwich, by Education a Cantabrigian of Emanuel College; who, before he was Biſhop, was for his Worth and Learning ſelected and ſent over by King James to the Synod of Dort: He was a Man of great Parts and Judgment, the Purity and Strength of whoſe Stile caus'd Sir Henry Wotton to call him the Engliſh Seneca; and notwithſtanding he was celebrated for his Piety, Candour and Moderation, he met with as ſevere Meaſures from the prevailing Sectaries as the moſt violent of the Church Party; all which he bore with exemplary Patience, and noble Fortitude, till Death put an End to all his Miſeries. Beſides theſe two, there dy'd Mr. John Hales, Fellow of Eaton College, and Canon of Windſor, of whom mention has been made in the Year 1638; a Man of prodigious Capacity, and ſurpriſing Ingenuity, of a profound Sagacity, and excellent Temper, with an unuſual Modeſty: His Learning was vaſt and unlimited, rais'd out of uncommon Notions, ſtrange Obſervations, and comprehenſive Thoughts within himſelf, which caus'd him at firſt to broach ſome Heterodox Opinions; of which he cured himſelf, tho' the Venom ſtill remains in the World. His Integrity was as ſhining, and his Charity as extenſive as his Knowledge, and his Opinion was deſired by the Learned in all Nations; yet neither his Abilities, nor his innocent Life cou'd protect him from the Iniquity of the Times, being driven from his Preferments, forc'd to ſell his admirable Library, and laſtly to die in a mean and obſcure Condition, to the great Reproach of the Age that cou'd be guilty of ſo much Injuſtice and Ingratitude. There dy'd alſo two other Perſons that deſerve to be mention'd, as Edmund Wingate Eſquire, a Bencher of Gray's-Inn, who in France had the Honour to teach the late King's Queen, and her Ladies, the Engliſh Tongue; and afterwards became noted, not only for his Skill in the Law, but in divers Parts of the Mathematicks, eſpecially Arithmetick, of which he wrote ſeveral uſeful Treatiſes: Joyning with the Times, in all the Alterations, he became well known to the Protector, And Mr. Capel.

and dy'd much in his Favour. The other Perſon was Mr. Richard Capel, a Puritan Divine of great Note; who, when he was a Fellow in Oxford, had educated many eminent Pupils; and was afterwards highly eſteem'd for his excellent Preaching, his exemplary Life and Converſation, and in doing many good Offices for thoſe of his own Function.

Attempts to make Cromwell KING.

VI. 1. The preſent Parliament, as it was call'd, had ſat about ſix Months, before they began to anſwer the main End for which they ſeem'd to have been ſummon'd; which was to confirm Cromwell's Perſonal Authority, and ſecure it to his Poſterity. He himſelf ſeem'd to have deſir'd nothing more, than a Parliamentary Eſtabliſhment in that Power, which he had exercis'd from the Time he was Protector; which was really greater than any Engliſh King had ever enjoy'd. Yet ſtill, to effect that Deſign, and for other Reaſons, it was by many thought beſt 'That he ſhou'd be 'inveſted with the Title, Rights, and Dignity of a KING. This Propoſal was firſt mov'd in the Houſe by Colonel Jephſon, one of the Members that ſerv'd for Ireland; but Matters not being thoroughly concerted it had no other Effect than to ſound the Inclinations of the Aſſembly. Cromwell having Notice of this Motion, as he had of all others, gently reprov'd the Colonel at Table, and wonder'd what he cou'd mean by ſuch a Propoſition. To which the other anſwer'd, That while he was permitted the Honour of ſitting in that Houſe, he muſt deſire the Liberty to diſcharge his Conſcience, tho' his Opinion ſhou'd happen to diſpleaſe. Upon which the Protector, giving him a familiar Clap on the Shoulder cry'd, Get thee gone for a mad Fellow as thou art! and ſoon after gave Preferment both to him and his Son. Shortly after, the Propoſal, being prepar'd by his Creatures, was brought into the Houſe by Mr. Pack, a very rich Alderman of London, where it was without much Difficulty read; having then a Blank left for the Title of the ſingle Perſon, who, together with two Houſes, was to have the ſupreme Legiſlative Power. This was warmly oppos'd by the Major-Generals, and Soldiers Party, who finding that Cromwell was abandoning them to eſpouſe another Intereſt, ſtruck in with the Republicans, and fell ſo furiouſly upon Pack for his great Preſumption, and Unparliamentary Proceeding, that they bore him down from the Speaker's Chair to the Bar of the Houſe. But this Heat being ſoon over, the Lord Broghil, Judge Glynne, and others who were privy to the grand Deſign, endeavour'd to perſuade the Houſe to debate the new Form, alledging, 'That being Maſters of their own Reſolutions, they might 'retain as much of it as was good, and reject what was 'otherwiſe.

It is debated in Parliament.

Upon the Debates of the Propoſition, which laſted two Days with great Vehemence, it found a very remarkable Concurrence; and many who us'd not to agree to any thing elſe, ſeem'd unanimous in this, and were ready to vote the Protector King. And it was obſerv'd that none were forwarder in that Acclamation, than ſome who were known to be faithful to the King, and to wiſh his Reſtoration: And indeed many of the King's Party were ſo deceiv'd in their Judgments, as really to believe, that the preſent making of Cromwell King, was the beſt Expedient for the Reſtoration of his Majeſty; and that both the Army and the Nation wou'd rather have join'd to reſtore the true, than admit of a falſe Soveraign, whoſe Hypocriſy, as well as Tyranny, became more and more conſpicuous to the Nation. But the wiſer and more judicious Perſons of the ſame Party, who made leſs Noiſe, trembled at this Overture; and believ'd that that was the only way to deſtroy the King, and utterly to eradicate all future Hopes of the Royal Family; eſpecially ſince by this the Nobility were likely to be reſtored to their loſt Privileges, and that all, or moſt Things, wou'd run in the old Channel. And indeed when the News of this came to the King abroad, he was very much ſtartled at it, as well as thoſe about him: Inſomuch that ſeveral Perſons were ſent over into England with Orders to uſe all poſſible Endeavours to prevent this Deſign: Being agreed 'That, in ſuch a Caſe, the Laws 'wou'd have been on Cromwell's Side, as King in Poſſeſſion; 'tho' the Right had ſtill remain'd in King Charles as the 'Legal Succeſſor to his Father.' This being particularly told to the King, he was greatly ſurpris'd and concern'd at it; and occaſion'd him to ſend over ſo many to oppoſe it; among whom the Perſon who gave this Narrative was one.

But notwithſtanding the Succeſs the Propoſition met with in the Houſe, Cromwell found himſelf under great Difficulties; ſo that tho' he paſſionately deſir'd the Thing, yet he artfully declin'd it. For Lambert, who was the ſecond Man of Power in the Army, and many other Officers of Account and Intereſt, beſides the Country Members, oppos'd this Overture with great Bitterneſs and Indignation, and no leſs Boldneſs of Expreſſion. And what was more ſurpriſing, ſome of his own Family, who had thriven under him, and had their whole Dependance upon him, as Fleetwood, Desborough, Whaley, and others, no leſs paſſionately contradicted the Motion, and confidently undertook to know, 'That himſelf wou'd never conſent to it; and 'inveigh'd againſt it as a monſtrous Thing; and that which 'wou'd infallibly ruin him.

They offer him the Title.

However the Majority of the Members were in a little Time drawn into the Deſign; and on the fourth of April, preſented him a Writing, which they ſtiled, The humble Petition and Advice of the Parliament of England, Scotland and Ireland to his Highneſs; with a Speech from Sir Thomas Widdrington their Speaker, recommending the Title and Office of a King as ſettled here with Chriſtianity it ſelf, approv'd and retain'd by our Anceſtors, and every Way fitted to the Laws and Temper of the People of England. Had Cromwell immediately comply'd with their Zeal, and his own real Inclination, he might have ſeiz'd the Crown and the Scepter without any other Oppoſition. But whether it was to diſſemble greater Modeſty, and be at laſt made a King by the very Importunity of others; or whether it was to obviate all Dangers by a farther Deliberation on the Matter, inſtead of a ready Aſſent, he devoutly demurr'd, and told them, 'That it was a weighty Matter, 'and therefore deſir'd Space to ſeek God; for the Charge 'laid upon him was too great to bear without the Divine 'Aſſiſtance: That the Engliſh were the beſt People in the 'World, and therefore required all Tenderneſs, and Conſideration of their Liberties; he muſt therefore deſire that 'a Committee might be appointed to confer with him, and 'to offer him better Knowledge and Satisfaction in this great 'Cauſe.

He demurrs.

The Committee's Arguments for it.

2. A particular Committee was appointed, which on the 11th of April met his Highneſs in the Painted-Chamber, where Whitelock the Chair-Man, and all the chief Members, were to argue for Monarchy in Cromwell, and he who really reach'd at it, was to be the only Man that ſhou'd ſpeak againſt it. The chief Speakers, beſides the Chair-Man, were the Lord Broghill, Chief-Juſtice Glynne, the Lord-Commiſſioners Fiennes and Liſle, Lenthall Maſter of the Rolls, Sir Charles Wolſley, Sir Richard Onſlow, and Colonel Jones. Theſe, for two diſtinct Days, ſucceſſively entertain'd the Protector with long Harangues. They let him know, 'That the Name of a Protector, as 'he held it, was unknown to the Engliſh Conſtitution, but 'the Title of King had the only Foundation in the ancient 'and known Laws of the Nation.' They alſo alledg'd, 'That it was not Circumſtantial, but Eſſential; that it 'was the Head from whence all the Nerves and Sinews 'of the Government proceeded; and if a new Head was 'put on, it was a Queſtion whether thoſe Nerves and Sinews wou'd grow and receive Nouriſhment: Then for 'Him to take up the Office of King, without the Title, 'was to take it up with all the Objections of Scandal.' They likewiſe proceeded to ſhew the Advantages of Monarchy, 'and that the King, the Laws of the Nation, the 'Liberties of the People, and alſo Parliaments themſelves, 'had but one Foundation; and that the End of the late 'War was not to deſtroy Kingſhip, as appear'd by ſix or 'ſeven of the Parliament Declarations, one of which was 'order'd to be read in all Churches.' Then they inſiſted upon the Safety and Security of Him and Themſelves, 'That this had been the great Encouragement of thoſe Attempts againſt his Perſon, that the Law did not take Notice of him as chief Magiſtrate, and that Juries were generally backward in finding any guilty of Treaſon upon 'that Account: But by the Laws in Edward the Fourth, 'and Henry the Seventh, whatever was done by a King 'in Poſſeſſion was good and valid, and all that ſerv'd under 'Him were ſafe, and exempt from Puniſhment: By thoſe 'Laws his Enemies had hitherto pleaded Indemnity; but 'by his aſſuming what was deſired, thoſe Laws they pretended for their Diſobedience, wou'd tye them, even by 'their own Principles, to Obedience.' In the laſt Place they alledg'd, 'That tho' Part of the Long Parliament had 'taken away Kingſhip, yet now it was ſet up again by a 'fuller Repreſentative of three Nations; and ſince the Parliament of England, Scotland and Ireland, had adviſ'd and 'deſir'd him to take upon him the Title of King, he ought 'not in Reaſon and Equity to refuſe it.

Whitelock's Speech for it.

To theſe, and other Arguments, Cromwell gave dark and ſubtle Anſwers, to which he alſo receiv'd particular Replies; and at length Whitelock the Chair-Man ſumm'd up all their Arguments in a remarkable Speech, in which are theſe Words: Never any Perſons met their Supream Magiſtrate with more Love, Duty, and Honour, than the Parliament have met your Highneſs with, in their preſent Addreſſes; which Argument of Love deſerves the Eſteem and Force, which I doubt not but your Highneſs will put upon it. ------ I think it requires a very great Regard from us, and I doubt not but theſe good People will be fully ſatisfy'd, if they conſider the Covenants, Promiſes, and Precepts, which in the Scriptures are annex'd to the Name of King: And altho' ſome have alledg'd, that they belong to any Chief Magiſtrate, as well as to King; yet no Man did ever read the Original Word tranſlated otherwiſe than King.---- If any Inconvenience ſhou'd enſue upon your Acceptance of this Title, which the Parliament adviſeth, your Highneſs's Satisfaction will be, That they did adviſe it: On the contrary, if Inconvenience ſhou'd ariſe upon your Highneſs's Refuſal of this Title, which the Parliament hath adviſed, your Burthen will be the greater: And therefore whatſoever may fall out, will be better anſwer'd by your Highneſs's complying with your Parliament, than by any other Way. It has been obſerv'd, That, it gave ſome Reputation to the Form of Engliſh Monarchy, to ſee that thoſe very Men, who had perſecuted and murder'd one King, baniſh'd and renounc'd another, aboliſh'd all Kingly Government, and ſworn themſelves into a Common-wealth, ſhou'd at laſt turn back to the ancient Conſtitution, and find no Reſt or Peace, but under a new Monarch. If they acted thus from their Opinion of the Excellence and Neceſſity of a Sovereign Power in one ſingle Perſon; it was a ſingular Teſtimony for that Government they had impiouſly deſtroy'd, and wou'd now induſtriouſly reſtore: But if all this were againſt their own Conſcience, and they were terrify'd into the Deſire of a King, when they ſtill hated the very Name and Office, it was ſuch a Token of an abject Spirit, as cou'd have nothing leſs than the Divine Vengeance in it; that they who rebell'd for Liberty under a lawful and merciful Prince, ſhou'd now be ſo ſtupid as to proſtitute their Judgement, and deliver their Necks to a Yoke far heavier than what they had before ſhaken off, only on a Pretence they were not able to bear it. And if this were the Caſe of giving themſelves up to Captivity, in Oppoſition to their own Conſcience, it was the finer Myſtery, That thoſe who abhorr'd a Monarchy were compell'd to plead and Petition for it, while he, who ambitiouſly ſought for it, was likewiſe forc'd to decline and deny it. This laſt was the Caſe of Cromwell, who gratefully acknowledg'd the Kindneſs and Civility of the Offer, but wou'd not take upon him to give a preſent Anſwer, acquainting the Members, 'That 'he wou'd conſider of all they had ſaid to him, and ſeek 'to God for Counſel; and then he wou'd ſend for them, 'and declare his Reſolution.' And thus, having firſt complain'd of the Shortneſs of his preſent Revenues, they parted; all Men ſtanding in Amaze, and in terrible Suſpence, according to their ſeveral Hopes and Fears, till they knew what he wou'd determine.

Cromwell under great Difficulties.

3. It was many Days before Cromwell cou'd come to a Determination in this grand Affair; for he was under great Difficulties and Diſtraction of Mind. He was not frighted with the Oppoſition given him by Lambert; whom, for his Security, he reſolv'd to deſtroy; nor with thoſe Officers who concurr'd with him, whom he had many Ways to reduce: But he trembled at the inflexible Reſolution of thoſe, who he knew lov'd him; his Son-in-Law Fleetwood, and his Brother Desborough, and the reſt, who wholly depended upon Him and his Greatneſs, and who did not wiſh any Diminution of his Power and Authority: That theſe Men ſhou'd withſtand his Promotion with that Obſtinacy, moſt ſenſibly affected him. All his Conſultations were now in private, and we are ſomewhat in the Dark as to this nice Affair. Ludlow, who then well knew the Intrigues of the Court and Camp, ſeems to have given the moſt perfect Account of it. He tells us, That Cromwell endeavour'd by all poſſible Means to prevail with the Officers of the Army to approve his Deſign; and knowing that Fleetwood and Desborough were particularly averſe to it, he invited himſelf to dine perſonally with the latter, and carry'd the former with him; where he began to droll with them about Monarchy, and ſpeaking ſlightingly of it, ſaid, It was but a Feather in a Man's Cap, and therefore wonder'd, That Men wou'd not pleaſe their Children, and permit them to enjoy their Rattle. But he receiv'd an Anſwer contrary to his Expectations and Deſires; when they aſſur'd him, That thoſe who put him upon it, were no Enemies to Charles Stuart; and that if he accepted of it, he wou'd infallibly draw Ruin on Himſelf and Friends. Having thus ſounded their Inclinations, that he might conclude the Matter he had begun, he told them, they were a Couple of ſcrupulous Fellows, and ſo departed. The next Day he ſent a Meſſage to the Houſe, to require their Attendance the Morning after in the Painted-Chamber, deſigning, as all Men believ'd, there to declare his Acceptation of the Crown. But in the mean Time, meeting with Colonel Desborough in the Park, and acquainting him with his Reſolution, the Colonel made Anſwer, That he then gave the Cauſe, and his Family alſo, for loſt; adding, That tho' he was reſolv'd never to act againſt him, yet he would not act for him after that Time. After ſome other Diſcourſe upon the ſame Subject, Desborough went home, and there found Colonel Pride, a former Friend, and knighted by Cromwell; and having imparted to him the Protector's Deſign of accepting the Crown, Pride anſwer'd, He ſhall not: Why, ſaid the Colonel, how wilt thou hinder it? The other reply'd, Get me a Petition drawn, and I will prevent it; and ſo they both went to Dr. Owen, and having acquainted him with what had happen'd, they perſuaded him to draw up a Petition according to their Deſires. In the mean Time, Cromwell having reflected upon his Diſcourſe with Desborough, and being inform'd that many Officers were diſſatisfy'd with his Deſign, ſent a Meſſage to put off the Meeting in the Painted-Chamber, and to deſire that the Houſe would ſend a Committee to confer with him about the great Buſineſs then depending; intending by that Means to gain Time to prepare the Officers for his Deſign: But the Houſe being riſen before his Meſſage arriv'd, it came to no Effect.

The Army's Petition againſt the Deſign.

The next Morning, the Houſe being in great Expectation of a Meſſage to appoint the Time and Place for the Acceptance of what they had prepared, ſome Officers of the Army coming to the Parliament Doors, ſent in a Meſſage to Colonel Desborough, to acquaint him, 'That they 'had a Petition which they deſir'd him to preſent to the 'Houſe.' But he knowing the Contents of it, and conceiving it improper for him to take Notice of it before it was preſented, inform'd the Houſe, 'That certain Officers 'of the Army had a Petition to preſent to them.' Which done, and every one ſuppoſing the Deſires of the Officers were conformable to their own, it was generally agreed that they ſhou'd be call'd in, and have leave to preſent it with their own Hands. Lieutenant-Colonel Maſon was choſen by the reſt of the Officers to deliver the Petition, which when he had done, and the Officers withdrawn, it was read, and found to this Effect: 'That the Petitioners 'had hazarded their Lives againſt Monarchy, and were ſtill 'ready ſo to do, in Defence of the Liberties of the Nation: That having obſerv'd in ſome Men great Endeavours to bring the Nation again under their old Servitude, 'by preſſing their General to take upon him the Title and Government of a King, in order to deſtroy Him, and weaken the Hands of thoſe who were faithful to the Publick; 'they therefore humbly deſired that they would diſcountenance all ſuch Perſons and Endeavours, and continue ſtedfaſt to the Good Old Cauſe; for the Preſervation of which 'they for their Parts were moſt ready to lay down their 'Lives.' This Petition was ſubſcrib'd by two Colonels, ſeven Lieutenant-Colonels, eight Majors, and ſixteen Captains; who, with ſuch Officers in the Houſe as were of the ſame Opinion, made up the Majority of thoſe of that Part of the Army which was then quarter'd about the Town.

It is difficult to determine whether the Houſe or Cromwell was moſt ſurpris'd at this unexpected Addreſs; but certainly both were infinitely diſturb'd and confounded at it. Cromwell had a little before been poſitively aſſured, That there were a Number of Men, who had bound themſelves by Oath to kill him, within ſo many Hours after he ſhou'd accept the Title of King, which gave him great Uneaſineſs. They who were very near him ſaid, 'That in 'this Perplexity he revolv'd his former Dream, or Apparition, that had firſt promis'd him the high Fortune to which 'he was arriv'd, and which was generally ſpoken of from 'the Beginning of the Wars, when he had the leaſt Proſpect of ſuch Exaltation; and that he then obſerv'd, it had 'only declar'd, That he ſhou'd be the greateſt Man in England, and ſhou'd be near to be King; which ſeem'd to 'imply that he ſhou'd be only near, and never actually attain the Crown.' In the midſt of theſe Fears and Uncertainties, this laſt Petition ſeem'd to have brought all to a Criſis; and as ſoon as he had Notice of it, he immediately ſent for his Son-in-Law, Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, and told him, That he wonder'd he wou'd ſuffer ſuch a Petition to proceed ſo far, ſince he knew it was his Reſolution not to accept of the Crown, without the Conſent of the Army; and therefore deſir'd him to haſten to the Houſe, and put them off from doing any Thing further in that Matter. The Lieutenant-General went in all Haſte, and told them, 'That the Petition ought not to be debated, 'much leſs to be anſwer'd at this Time, the Contents of it being to deſire them not to preſs the Protector to be King; whereas the preſent Buſineſs was to 'receive his Anſwer to what had been formerly offer'd to 'him; and therefore deſir'd, That the Debate of it might 'be put off till they had receiv'd his Anſwer.' To this the Houſe having conſented, they receiv'd a Meſſage from the Protector, that inſtead of meeting him in the Painted-Chamber, where he uſually paſs'd their Bills, they wou'd meet him in the Banqueting-Houſe. Here on the 8th Day of May, with great Diſturbance of Mind, which was viſible in his Countenance notwithſtanding his Art of Diſſimulation, he found his Courage to ſink; and as his Looks were extremely diſcompos'd, and diſcover'd an irreſolute Mind, ſo his Words were broken and disjoynted, without Method, and full of Pauſes; and with frequent Mention of God and his gracious Diſpenſation, he concluded with letting them know, That he cou'd not, with a good Conſcience, accept the Government under the Title of a King. Many were then of Opinion, that his Genius at that Time forſook him, and yielded to the Spirit of the King, and that his Reign was near its Expiration: Others were as confident, that he did very wiſely to decline the Offer, and that if he had accepted it, he cou'd not have liv'd many Days after: But others, of no leſs Sagacity, cou'd but look upon that Refuſal of his as an immediate Act of Heaven towards the King's Reſtoration; and therefore were infinitely reviv'd at this unexpected Infatuation.

But reaſſumes that of PROTECTOR

By a new Inſtrument.

4. Cromwell having ſlipp'd over this great Point, ſoon made it appear, that he wou'd renounce nothing but the Name and Stile of King; and likewiſe ſhew'd that his Modeſty, or his Wiſdom, or his Fear in the refuſing that Supream Title, were not attended with any open Diſadvantage to Himſelf, or his Sovereign Power. They who had moſt warmly oppos'd it, were ſo ſatisfy'd with this late Eſcape, that they did not care to obſtruct any other Thing that was propos'd towards his Greatneſs. And accordingly they voted, 'That he ſhou'd enjoy the Title 'and Authority he had already;' which they in many Particulars enlarg'd, beyond what it was by the Inſtrument of Government; and this was by a new Inſtrument, which they call'd The humble Petition and Advice; in which they granted him not only that Authority for his Life, but Power by his laſt Will and Teſtament, and in the Preſence of ſuch a Number of Witneſſes, to chuſe and declare his own Succeſſor; which Power ſhou'd never be granted to any other Protector than Himſelf. And when they had digeſted and agreed upon this Inſtrument, at the paſſing of which Lambert choſe rather to be abſent than to oppoſe it, the Parliament ſent to him for an Audience, which he aſſign'd them on the 25th Day of May, in the Banqueting-Houſe; where their Speaker Widdrington preſented and read the Petition and Advice of his Parliament, and deſir'd his Aſſent to it. It was a long Inſtrument conſiſting of eighteen Articles, the Subſtance of which was, 'That his Highneſs Oliver Cromwell ſhou'd, under the 'Title of Protector, be pleas'd to execute the Office of 'chief Magiſtrate over England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c. 'and to govern according to all Things in that humble 'Petition and Advice; and alſo, That he wou'd in his 'Life Time appoint the Perſon that ſhou'd ſucceed him 'in the Government: That he wou'd call a Parliament, 'conſiſting of Two Houſes, at leaſt once a Year: That 'thoſe Perſons who are legally choſen by the People to 'ſerve in Paliament, may not be excluded from doing their 'Duties, but by Conſent of that Houſe whereof they are 'Members: That none but thoſe under the Qualifications 'therein mention'd, ſhou'd be capable to ſerve as Members in Parliament: That the Power of the Other Houſe 'be limited as herein preſcrib'd: That the Laws and Statutes of the Land be obſerv'd and kept, no Laws alter'd, 'ſuſpended, abrogated or repeal'd, but by new Laws made 'by Act of Parliament: That the Yearly Sum of a Million of Pounds Sterling be for the Maintenance of the 'Navy and Army, and three Hundred Thouſand Pounds 'for the Support of the Government, beſides other Temporary Supplies, as the Commons in Parliament ſhou'd 'ſee neceſſary: That the Number of the Protector's 'Council ſhall not exceed twenty one, whereof ſeven 'ſhall be a Quorum: The chief Officers of State, as Chancellors, Keepers of the great Seal, &c. to be approv'd 'by Parliament: That his Highneſs wou'd encourage a 'Godly Miniſtry in theſe Nations; and that ſuch as revile 'and diſturb them in the Worſhip of God, may be puniſh'd according to the Law; and where Laws are defective, new ones to be made: That the Proteſtant Chriſtian Religion, as it is contain'd in the Old and New 'Teſtament, be aſſerted and held forth for the Publick 'Profeſſion of theſe Nations, and no other, and that a 'Confeſſion of Faith be agreed upon, and recommended 'to the People of theſe Nations; and none be permitted 'by Words or Writings, to revile, or reproach the ſaid 'Confeſſion of Faith.

His Speech upon receiving it.

This Inſtrument being diſtinctly read to his Highneſs, after a long Pauſe, with Eyes lift up, and other Geſtures of Concern and Perplexity, he ſign'd it; and then told them, 'That he came not thither that Day as to a Day of 'Triumph, but with the moſt ſerious Thoughts that ever 'he had in all his Life, being to undertake one of the greateſt Burthens that ever was laid upon the Back of any 'Human Creature; ſo that, without the Support of the 'Almighty, he muſt neceſſarily ſink under the Weight of 'it, to the Damage and Prejudice of the Nation committed to his Charge: Therefore he deſired the Help of 'the Parliament, and the Help of all thoſe who feared 'God, that by their Help he might receive Help and Aſſiſtance from the Hand of God, ſince nothing but his 'Preſence cou'd enable him to diſcharge ſo great a Truſt.' He told them, 'That this was but an Introduction to the 'carrying on of the Government of the three Nations; 'therefore he recommended the Supply of the reſt that was 'yet wanting, to the Wiſdom of the Parliament;' and ſaid, 'he cou'd not doubt but the ſame Spirit that had 'led the Parliament to this, wou'd eaſily ſuggeſt the reſt 'to them; and that nothing cou'd have induced him to 'have undertaken this intolerable Burthen to Fleſh and 'Blood, but that he ſaw, it was the Parliament's Care to 'anſwer thoſe Ends, for which they were engag'd;' calling God to witneſs, 'That he cou'd not have undergone 'it, but that the Parliament had determin'd that it made 'clearly for the Liberty and Intereſt of the Nation, and 'Preſervation of ſuch as fear God; and if the Nation 'were not thankful to them for their Care, it wou'd fall 'as a Sin upon their Heads.' He concluded with recommending ſome Things to them, 'which he ſaid wou'd 'tend to Reformation, by diſcountenancing Vice, and encouraging Virtue; and wiſhing the Lord to proſper their 'Endeavours, he diſmiſs'd them to return to their Houſe.

The Solemnity of his INAUGURATION.

Since they had perform'd all he cou'd expect from them, he reſolv'd to do ſomewhat for himſelf; and that all the Diſcourſes made of Kingſhip, ſhou'd not paſs away in the Silence of this Addreſs, and that this Exaltation ſhou'd be grac'd with ſuch a Pomp and Solemnity, as ſhou'd make it little inferior to the other. Therefore, within a few Days after, he ſent an unexpected Meſſage to the Parliament, 'That they wou'd adjourn until ſuch a Time as 'the Solemnity of his INAUGURATION ſhou'd 'be perform'd;' for which he appointed the 26th Day of June; and in the mean Time he aſſign'd the Care of it to ſeveral Perſons, that all Things ſhou'd be in Readineſs for the Magnificence of ſuch a Work. Weſtminſter-Hall was prepared, and adorn'd and beautify'd as ſumptuouſly as it cou'd be for a CORONATION; and Seats were built up for the Members of Parliament, the Judges and Officers, and for the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London. A Throne was erected with a noble Pavilion, and a Chair of State under it; to which Cromwell was conducted in an Entry and Attendance of his Officers, Military and Civil, and the Sword carry'd before him, all with as much State and Grandeur as cou'd be imagin'd. Being ſeated in his Chair of State, that this Promotion might not ſeem to be without the Nobility's having a Share in it, the Speaker, with the Earl of Warwick and Whitelock, veſted him with a glorious purple Velvet Robe lin'd with Ermines; the Speaker telling him, It was an Emblem of Magiſtracy, and imported Righteouſneſs and Juſtice. Then delivering him a Bible richly gilt and boſs'd with Gold, he told him, It was a Book that contain'd the Holy Scriptures, in which he had the Happineſs to be well vers'd. Next he put in his Hand a Scepter of maſſy Gold, ſaying, Here is a Scepter not unlike a Staff; for you are to be a Staff to the Poor. Laſtly he girt him with a very rich Sword, with this Comment, This is not a Military, but a Civil Sword; it is a Sword rather of Defence than Offence, not only to defend your ſelf, but alſo your People. Upon the Cloſe of which, there being little wanting to a perfect Coronation but a Crown and an Archbiſhop, he took an Oath, to govern the People of theſe three Nations according to Law, &c. and after all the Ceremonies and Enſigns of Honour, Mr. Manton pray'd, the People ſhouted, and the Trumpets ſounded, and the Protector return'd to White-Hall, accompany'd not only by the foremention'd Attendance, but alſo by ſeveral Foreign Ambaſſadors. And now that he might entirely enjoy the Soveraignty they had conferr'd upon him, without any Obſtruction, that he might have Leiſure to diſpatch his Domeſtick Affairs, which he had modell'd, and might have Time to conſider how to fill his Other Houſe with proper Members; after paſſing ſome Acts, he adjourn'd his Parliament to the 20th Day of January, after it had ſat ſomewhat above nine Months.

His Care of his Family.

Thus had Cromwell now perfected a chief Part of his Deſign, of having his Power confirm'd by Parliament; and in this Vacancy, his Power ſeem'd ſo well eſtabliſh'd both at home and abroad, as if it cou'd never be ſhaken. He had before ſtrengthen'd himſelf by Leagues with Foreign Princes, his next Care was the advancing of his Children: He ſent for his eldeſt Son Richard, who till then had liv'd privately in Hampſhire upon his Wife's Fortune, and brought him to the Court, and made him a Privy-Counſellor; and ſoon after caus'd the Univerſity of Oxford to elect him their Chancellor, with which Honour he was very ſolemnly inſtalled at White-Hall. His ſecond Son Henry was inveſted with the Power of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in the Room of his Son-in-law Fleetwood, whom he had ſent for to Court, out of a Pretence of the Want of his Preſence and Counſel. Nor was he leſs careful of his Daughters, of which two were yet unmarry'd: The eldeſt of thoſe, named Frances, he gave to Mr. Robert Rich, the Grandſon and Heir of the Earl of Warwick, a Man of great Eſtate, and throughly engag'd in the Cauſe from the beginning. His youngeſt Daughter Mary was marry'd to the young Lord Falconbridge, the Owner likewiſe of a very fair Eſtate in Yorkſhire, and deſcended of a Family entirely loyal. Theſe Marriages were ſolemniz'd at White-Hall with the utmoſt Pomp and Splendor; and it was obſerv'd, that tho' they were perform'd in publick according to the Rites and Ceremonies then in Uſe, they were ſoon after in private marry'd by Epiſcopal Miniſters, and according to the Common-Prayer; and all this with the Privity of Cromwell, who pretended to yield to it in Compliance with the Importunity and Infirmity of his Daughters.

The Succeſs of his Forces by Land,

5. Theſe Domeſtick Triumphs were confirm'd and improv'd by the Succeſs of the Protector's Arms abroad, both by Sea and Land. In the Netherlands, the French at firſt had no Deſire to apply thoſe Forces upon Dunkirk; which they were oblig'd, when taken, to put into the Hands of Cromwell; therefore they march'd to other Places, which they were to conquer to their own Uſe; in which the ſix thouſand Engliſh under the Command of Sir John Reynolds, and Major-General Morgan, attended them, and behav'd themſelves eminently well; and particularly in Artois at the Siege of St. Venant, which they carry'd with a Suddenneſs and Bravery beyond Expectation. But Cromwell's Ambaſſador Lockhart made ſuch lively Inſtances with the Cardinal, with Complaints of their Breach of Faith, and ſome Menaces, That his Maſter knew where to find a more punctual Friend, that as ſoon as they had taken Montmedy and St. Venant, the Army march'd into Flanders; and tho' the Seaſon of the Year was too far ſpent to engage in a Siege before Dunkirk, they inveſted Mardike, accounted the moſt difficult Part of the Work; which being reduc'd wou'd much facilitate the Deſign upon the other. This Fort was ply'd with that Vigour, that it was ſurrender'd in about four Days, and, according to Articles, deliver'd into the Hands of the Engliſh; who, under the Government of Morgan, ſo well fortify'd it, that it was render'd almoſt impregnable. But before that, the Spaniards, knowing of how much Importance this Place was to the keeping of Dunkirk, ſent a Body of Horſe and Foot to regain it, among which were two thouſand Engliſh Reformadoes under the brave Duke of York, who made two very deſperate Storms upon it, the laſt continuing ſix Hours, but were both Times repuls'd, and forc'd to retire with Loſs; ſo that in England there ſeem'd no Doubt of the taking of Dunkirk in another Campaign.

And by Sea.

But the Protector's Succeſs at Sea was far more remarkable, and reſounded through all Parts of Europe; ſo that the Name of Blake cannot be forgotten, eſpecially in Spain and the Canaries. That Admiral with his Fleet had rode out all the Winter Storms before Cadiz, and the Coaſt of Portugal; when he receiv'd certain Information that another Spaniſh Plate-Fleet, much richer than the laſt he had taken and deſtroy'd, was coming home; but, by reaſon of the Engliſh Fleet, wou'd moſt probably ſtop at the Canaries, where the Ships might lye in Safety. Upon which Intelligence, he weigh'd Anchor with twenty five Men of War, and on the 20th of April ſtood with his Fleet off the Offing at the Bay of Sancta Cruz, in the Iſland of Tenariffe; where he found the Galeons already arriv'd, to the Number of ſixteen Men of War; protected, beſides their own Strength, by all the Methods of Art: For the Bay was ſecured by a ſtrong Caſtle well fortify'd with Cannon, beſides ſeven Forts more in ſeveral Parts of it, mounted with each four, five and ſix good Pieces of Ordnance; all united by a Line of Communication from Fort to Fort, mann'd with Muſqueteers. Don Diego Diagues, the Spaniſh Admiral, order'd all his ſmaller Ships to moar cloſe to the Shoar, cover'd by the Caſtles and Forts, and poſted the ſix large Galeons farther off at Anchor, with their formidable Broad-ſides to the Sea; and ſent Word by a Dutch Merchant there, Let Blake come if he dares.

Blake's Succeſs at Sancta Cruz.

All this cou'd not daunt the Courage of the Engliſh Admiral, who having call'd a Council of War, and finding it impracticable to carry off the Galeons, he reſolutely determin'd to burn them in the midſt of all theſe Dangers. And firſt he commanded the valiant Captain Stayner, in the Speaker Frigate, with a Squadron to ſtand into the very Bay; who by eight the next Morning fell couragiouſly on the Spaniards, and fought them near an Hour. The Admiral, to ſhare the Toil and Danger, as well as the Glory of the Action, ſeconded Stayner, and poſted ſome of the greater Ships to Cannonade the Forts and Caſtles, that inceſſantly play'd upon them with their great and ſmall Shot; and theſe beat the Spaniards from their Forts and their Lines. Blake fought four Hours with the Galeons, which made a brave Reſiſtance; but nothing cou'd withſtand the intrepid Courage of this Commander, who ſo thunder'd with his Broad-ſides upon the Enemy, that at laſt they abandon'd thoſe great Ships, of which the leaſt was larger than the biggeſt of Blake's, and ran aſhore. The Sea-Men left the ſmaller Veſſels which lay under the Forts, and Stayner burnt every one of them; while Blake did the ſame with the large Galeons; ſo that never was ſeen a greater Scene of Combuſtion, Confuſion and Deſolation. Thus was the whole Plate-Fleet, of ineſtimable value, deſtroy'd; and no ſooner was the Action over, but the Wind, which before blew ſtrong into the Bay, ſuddenly veer'd about, and brought the Engliſh Fleet out to Sea, without the Loſs of one Ship, and with no more than forty eight Men kill'd, and a hundred and twenty wounded. The whole Action was unparallel'd and ſtupendous, ſo that all Men who knew the Place, admir'd that any ſober Men, how couragious ſoever, wou'd have undertaken it; and they cou'd hardly perſwade themſelves of the Reality of the Enterprize; while the melancholy Spaniards cou'd only comfort themſelves with the Belief, that they were Devils and not Men that had made this amazing Ravage and Deſtruction.

His Death and Character.

The News of this arriving in England before the Parliament broke up, they order'd a Day of Thankſgiving, and a Diamond Ring to be given to Blake of five hundred Pounds Value; and the Protector Knighted Captain Richard Stayner, at his Return to England, for this and other Services. The Admiral himſelf, having been on board three Years, in his Return home to his Native Country, dy'd on the 17th of Auguſt, as he enter'd into Plymouth Sound, he being then in the ſixty-ſeventh Year of his Age. His Body was carry'd by Sea to Greenwich Houſe, where for ſome Time it lay in State; from whence it was convey'd by Water in a Barge of State, cover'd with Velvet, adorn'd with Eſcutcheons and Pendants, accompany'd by Cromwell's Privy-Council, the Commiſſioners of the Admiralty and Navy, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, the Field-Officers of the Army, and many other Perſons of Honour and Quality, in a great Number of Mourning Barges, marſhall'd and order'd by the Heralds, who directed and attended the Solemnity. Thus they landed at Weſtminſter, and made a Proceſſion through a Guard of ſeveral Regiments of Foot to the Abby, where the Body was interr'd in Henry the Seventh's Chappel. He was a Man of a private Extraction in Somerſetſhire; firſt educated, and then doubly graduated in the Univerſity of Oxford. He was of a melancholick and ſullen Nature, and ſpent his Time moſt with good Fellows, who lik'd his Moroſeneſs, and a Freedom he us'd in inveighing againſt the Licenſe of the Time, and the Power of the Court. He always ſhew'd a Republican Spirit; and yet he did not ſeem ſo much to eſpouſe the Intereſt of the Long Parliament, or the new Service of Cromwell, as he did the Honour of his Country, and the Engliſh Dominion of the Seas. It was his Argument for Unity among his Sea-Men, That they ſhou'd not liſten to any News from Land, nor mind the Changes in the Government; but remember that the Fleet was Engliſh, and that their Enemies were Foreigners: And the better to maintain this Principle, with him Valour ſeldom miſs'd its Reward, nor Cowardize its Puniſhment; ſo that his Death was univerſally lamented among the Sea-Men. He was the firſt Man that declin'd the old Track, and brought his Ships to contemn Caſtles on Shoar, and taught his Men to fight in Fire, as well as upon Water. And after all his mighty Actions, to ſhew that he was animated by that brave publick Spirit, which has been ſince thought rather Romantick than Heroick, he was ſo diſintereſted, that tho' no Man had more Opportunity to enrich himſelf than he who had taken ſo many Millions abroad, yet he threw it all into the Publick Treaſury, and did not die five hundred Pounds richer than his Father left him; which the Author of his Life avers from his own Perſonal Knowledge of the Family and their Circumſtances; who farther adds, That dying a Batchelor, his younger Brother, being a Diſſenter, ſuffer'd ſo many Hardſhips in the latter End of the Reign of King Charles the Second, that he was forc'd to ſell the little Eſtate left him by the Admiral, ſcarce two hundred Pounds a Year, and tranſport himſelf and his Children to Carolina.

The King's Condition abroad.

VII. 1. As Cromwell's Settlement began to be more fix'd, and his Power ſeem'd to encreaſe, the King's Condition appear'd more hopeleſs, and in a manner deſperate. He ſeem'd to enjoy all the Eaſe and Satisfaction of a private Life at Cologne; where he ſpent his Time, ſo much like an Heir of a Crown, and with ſo much Honour and Reputation, as if he had ſought more to deſerve, than to regain his Kingdoms. Greatneſs of Mind, Knowledge of Men, Vigilance and Temperance, were conſpicuous in him in thoſe Parts, and the Luxury and Voluptuouſneſs of Men of Power were in a manner Strangers to him at that Time; with ſome Exceptions in one Caſe, which the World is too apt to think not very criminal in a young, and unmarry'd Prince. He was obligingly and honourably entertain'd by the Elector of Mentz, and other Perſons of the higheſt Quality in the neighbouring Provinces; and he had a particular Enterview with the famous Chriſtiana, Queen of Sweden, who had lately reſign'd her Crown, and was paſſing through Frankfort into Italy. Before he left Cologne, Dr. Bates tells, that the Biſhop of Avignon ſent him out of France a Scheme calculated by a famous Mathematician, wherein he predicted, That in the Year one Thouſand Six Hundred and Sixty, his Majeſty ſhou'd certainly enter England in a Triumphant Manner: But whether this was by the Principles of his Art, or a fortuitous Hit, he wou'd not determine. However, it came to be believ'd by many, both abroad, and in England, 'That that was to be the Year of his Reſtoration.' What Credit the King gave to ſuch Kind of Predictions, we know not; only that he induſtriouſly us'd all preſent Methods, and watch'd all Opportunities for the Advancement of his Affairs in England.

He privately makes Offers to Cromwell.

Among the various Methods he us'd, beſides ſecret Correſpondence with ſome who ſeem'd Friends to the preſent Government, one was a private Application to Cromwell Himſelf; which was undertaken and carry'd on by a Lady of very conſiderable Spirit and Policy, who afterwards became Dutcheſs of Lauderdale. This Lady, who was a particular Friend and Acquaintance of the Protector's, was employ'd to make a private Offer and Propoſal to his Highneſs; which in Subſtance was, 'That if he wou'd reſtore, or permit the King to return to his Throne, he wou'd ſend him a Blank Paper, in which he might write his own Terms and Limitations, and ſettle what Power and Riches he pleas'd upon Himſelf, Family, and Friends.' This Propoſal was firſt made to the Protector's Lady, who was well pleas'd with it, and ſeem'd to be ſenſible, that, beſides other Advantages, it wou'd bring abſolute Indemnity and Security to her Husband, and the whole Family. Accordingly ſhe took an Opportunity, when ſhe was in Bed with him, not only to mention the Propoſal, but to urge it as a Matter of the higheſt Moment to the Happineſs of Himſelf and Relations. Without harkening to her Arguments and Perſwaſions, he preſently told her She was a Fool; and added this ſhrewd Sentence, If Charles Stuart can forgive Me all that I have done againſt Him, and his Family, he does not deſerve to wear the Crown of England. This came from the Mouth of the Dutcheſs of Lauderdale, who told the ſame to a Perſon, of whoſe Credit and Reputation I can make no Queſtion.

Cromwell's Anſwer.

The King correſponds with the Spaniards.

2. As ſoon as the King had heard of the open Rupture between the King of Spain, and the Protector of England, he concluded that the Spaniard wou'd not be unwilling to enter into ſome Correſpondence with him. He therefore ſent privately to the Arch-Duke, the Governor at Bruſſels, and his Aſſiſtant Fuenſaldagna, to offer them his Conjunction. De Cardinas, who had many Years been Amballador in England, was likewiſe there; who, whether out of Conſciouſneſs of his former Behaviour againſt the Royal Family, or out of a Belief that the King cou'd bring little Advantage to them, had no Inclination to make a Conjunction with him, yet they all ſaw one Benefit they might receive, if his Majeſty wou'd draw off the Iriſh Soldiers from the Service of France; which they believ'd wou'd be in his Power, becauſe, when he was in France, he had drawn off ſome Regiments from Spain. This made them willing to confer with the King; which they did with the utmoſt Caution and Privacy in a little vile Dorp about a League from Bruſſels; where De Cardinas pretended to more than ordinary Merit with the King, and that he had held a hopeful Correſpondence with the Levellers in the Engliſh Army, who hated the Government of Cromwell. The King preſs'd them, 'That he might remove his Family to Bruſſels, or to ſome Place in Flanders, that it might be apparent that he was in Alliance with his Catholick Majeſty; and then they wou'd ſoon ſee he had another Kind of Intereſt in England, than what thoſe Men pretended to, and that he had a full Influence upon the Iriſh who were in France.' They wou'd by no Means conſent that He ſhou'd remain in Bruſſels, or Antwerp, or in any Place as acknowledg'd by the State; alledgin 'That the King of Spain's Honour wou'd not permit ſuch a Reſidence, without ſhewing thoſe Reſpects to him that were due to a great King, the Charge of which was greater than they cou'd defray at this troubleſome Time.' But they intimated, 'That if his Majeſty wou'd remove his Family to Bruges, and there remain ſo far Incognito, as not to expect any publick expenſive Reception, they were ſure he wou'd find all Reſpect from the Inhabitants of that City.

A Treaty with him.

The King was ſenſible that they were not able to do very much for him; however he was deſirous to have the Reputation of a Treaty between Him and the King of Spain; under which he might draw his Family from Cologne, and remain in Flanders, which was at a proper Diſtance from England, to wait for new Alterations. He therefore propos'd that ſome Treaty might be Sign'd between them; which was committed to the Management of De Cardinas, who prepar'd it in as ſlight a Manner as was poſſible: By this the King was permitted to reſide in Bruges, and nothing on the King of Spain's Part undertaken but 'That whenſoever the King cou'd cauſe a good Port Town in England to declare for him, his Catholick Majeſty wou'd aſſiſt him with a Body of Six Thouſand Foot, with ſuch a Proportion of Ammunition, and ſo many Ships to tranſport that Body thither;' which was the Number that the Levellers had propos'd to the Correſpondent of De Cardinas; who by making it the Contract with the King, thought thus to beget an Intelligence between them and the Royal Party, of whoſe Power he had no Eſteem. The King readily accepted the Treaty as De Cardinas had prepared it, and declared he wou'd reſide at Bruges in the Manner they propos'd; and thereupon the Treaty was engroſs'd and ſign'd by the King, the Arch-Duke, and De Cardinas, in the Beginning of the April of this Year, and after that ſent by an Expreſs to Madrid for the Confirmation of the King of Spain. Soon after, the King, after he had continu'd two Years and about ſix Months at Cologne, repair'd to the City of Bruges, where he found a handſome Accommodation for Himſelf and his ſmall Court. About the ſame Time, the Arch-Duke deſiring his Diſmiſſion from his Government, retired into Germany, and Fuenſaldagna was remov'd to Milain; being ſucceeded by Don Juan of Auſtria, the natural Son of the King of Spain, and the Marqueſs of Carracena.

He removes from Cologne to Bruges:

About two Months after the King's Settlement at Bruges, the little Treaty was ſent ratify'd from Madrid by the King of Spain, with many great Compliments; which his Britannick Majeſty was willing ſhou'd be believ'd of extraordinary Importance. After numerous Excuſes for the Lowneſs of their Affairs in all Places, which diſabled them from performing the Services due from, and to a great King, they gave him to underſtand, 'That the Catholick King had aſſign'd ſix Thouſand Guilders, amounting to about five Hundred Pounds Sterling, to be paid every Month towards a Royal Aid; and Half as much more, for the Support of the Duke of Glouceſter: And tho' the Sum was ſmall, it was as much as their Neceſſities cou'd bear, which Smallneſs ſhou'd be recompenc'd by the Punctuality of the Payment.' Upon this, and the Confirmation of the Treaty, his Majeſty freely gave Notice to the King of France, that he wou'd no longer receive that Penſion, which had been reaſonably well paid him, during the Time he remain'd in Cologne, but never ſince he came into Flanders. The Spaniards were deſirous that the King ſhou'd raiſe four Regiments of Foot; but no Allowance was made for thoſe Levies, nor any Encouragement given, more than little Quarters to bring their Men to, and after that the common Allowance of Bread. However the King was pleas'd with the Opportunity to employ and diſpoſe of many Officers and Soldiers, who daily flock'd to him in this Country. The firſt Regiment was given to the Lord Wentworth, who were call'd by the Name of Guards; the Second, to the Marqueſs of Ormond, who was to bring over the Iriſh; the Third, to the Earl of Rocheſter, who pretended to great Intereſt with the Soldiery; and the Laſt, upon the Account of the Scots, to the Lord Newburgh. Theſe Regiments were rais'd with more Expedition than cou'd be expected upon ſo little Encouragement: They were to ſerve a double Deſign, to aſſiſt the King of Spain againſt his Enemies the French, who were ſupported by Cromwell, and to be in Readineſs to tranſport themſelves into England, if any favourable Juncture ſhou'd invite them over.

Where he raiſes ſome Regiments.

3. After ſo long and ſo dark a Retirement in Cologne, the King's very coming into Flanders, and to a Place ſo near the Sea, rais'd the Spirits of his Friends in England, and encreas'd the Jealouſy of the Uſurper. His Friends, upon hearing of the Treaty with Spain, made no doubt of an Army ſufficient to begin the great Work, which wou'd be finiſh'd by the general Affections of the Kingdom; and He, who had hitherto reſtrain'd them from expoſing themſelves to unneceſſary Dangers, now thought fit to encourage them to put themſelves into ſuch a Poſture, as to be ready to joyn with Him when he appear'd; which he hop'd the Spaniard wou'd enable him to do in the Depth of Winter. The Royaliſts had form'd themſelves into certain Bodies and Aſſociations, in the Nature of Committees, diſpers'd in ſeveral Parts of the Nation; but were chiefly under the Guidance and Direction of a ſelect Number at London, whoſe Head and principal Manager was Sir Richard Willis,

Willis, who had all the outward Appearance of Zeal for his Majeſty's Service. Theſe Commiſſioners, by Meſſengers in all Parts, gave to each other, and to the King, Intelligence of the Beginnings and Progreſs of Affairs, and of the ſeveral Opportunities of Acting; and they were empower'd to draw in as many others as they cou'd into the ſame Aſſociation; in which they uſually proceeded in this Manner: Every one, according as they cou'd, acquainted their faithful Companions with their Purpoſe of Riſing, with the Time and Place; but very privately, and only to One at a Time, leſt if the Matter ſhou'd afterwards be detected, there might be no more than one Witneſs againſt the Party accuſed. So the Affair was ſpread amongſt a vaſt Number of Men, and ſo much the more to be fear'd, as it was communicated to ſo many. Moſt of the Nobility and Gentry were acquainted with the Deſign; and tho' ſeveral declin'd the Danger, yet they were ſtill ſilent and faithful. Several Governors of Towns alſo gave hopes of joyning in the Confederacy; and not a few Presbyterians and Republicans ſeem'd to have the ſame Inclination. However it was, the Uſurper's Enemies were in Appearance more numerous than the King's Friends.

An Account of Sir Richard Willis,

Sir Richard Willis being, or ſeeming to be, at the Head of theſe great Deſigns, ſomething ought to be ſaid of him, more than what was formerly; which the Author has receiv'd from very good Hands. This Gentleman was a younger Brother of a good Family of Fen-Ditton in Cambridgeſhire, and educated in Chriſt-College in the Univerſity of Cambridge. After ſome Continuance there, in the Year 1630, he went over into Holland, and there became an Enſign in the ſame Company of Foot, of which Monk was then Lieutenant, and under Goring, who was then Colonel of the Regiment in the Service of the States-General. Upon the Scotch Troubles, he was call'd over to ſerve the late King againſt that Nation; and was after that one of his Guard at White-Hall againſt the Inſurrections of the City Mob, and one that help'd to conduct him to Hampton-Court, as he fled thither from London. When the War commenc'd, he was made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Horſe under the Lord Grandiſon, and afterwards Governor of Newark, and then one of the King's Commiſſioners for the Rendering of Oxford; in all which War, excepting a ſeditious Attempt at Newark formerly mention'd, he gave ſuch Teſtimonies of his Duty and Bravery, that he was univerſally thought ſuperior to all Temptations of Infidelity. Upon the Concluſion of the firſt War, he went beyond the Seas, and there continu'd ſix Years, for the moſt Part in Italy; and in the Year 1652, he came over into England with a Commiſſion from the Venetians, to raiſe a Regiment for their Service in the War of Candia. But ſoon after his Arrival he was ſeiz'd by Cromwell's Order as a dangerous Malignant, and committed to cloſe Priſon in Wisbich Caſtle. He was a well-bred Gentleman, of excellent Parts, and of eminent Courage, but of a moſt reſtleſs Ambition; which latter Quality ſeems to have been ſo well diſcover'd by Cromwell, that he found Means by Mony and Promiſes, not only to gain him from his former Cauſe, but to make him ſubſervient to his darkeſt Deſigns. This was manag'd with the utmoſt Caution and Circumſpection, ſo that he was ſcarce ever ſeen in Cromwell's Preſence: And tho' he continually inform'd his new Maſter of the ſecret Conſultations and Proceedings of the Royal Committees, ſuch as ſhou'd prevent any Danger againſt the preſent Government; yet he never was oblig'd to appear as an Evidence againſt any Perſon whatſoever. By means of this Secret Intelligence, Cromwell had continual Opportunities of defeating the Deſigns of the King's Friends, by ſecuring their Perſons, or their Arms, and by divers other Methods; which he effected in ſuch a Way, and under ſuch Pretences, that this Gentleman remain'd unſuſpected both to Them, and to the King, in whoſe Cauſe he was not only thought to be faithful, but very zealous.

And of Sir Robert Walſh,

Soon after the King was ſettled at Bruges; which being, but a very few Miles from the Sea, Cromwell and his Agents form'd a deep Deſign againſt his Perſon; which occaſionally ſeem'd to have given the firſt Light into the Perfidiouſneſs of Sir Richard Willis. The chief Inſtrument to effect this Project was Sir Robert Walſh, an Iriſh Gentleman of a diſadvantagious Character, who for rudely Striking the Lord Colepeper, had been baniſh'd the King's Court at the Hague, a little before his Father's Murther. Retiring into France, he was for ſome Miſdemeanors or Suſpicion made two or three Years Priſoner in the Baſtille; from whence being ſet at Liberty he came over into England to try his Fortunes in the preſent Government. Here he met with new Impriſonments, both in the Tower and the Fleet, the former for Policy, and the latter for Debt; but entering into dark Debates with Secretary Thurloe, one Mr. Brohill, and others, he was employ'd and entruſted with this villainous Deſign. It was ſecretly contriv'd by theſe Agents, with the Privity of Cromwell, that Sir Robert ſhou'd make his Eſcape from the Fleet, where he was Priſoner at large; ſhould ſeize upon a Ship that lay ready for that Purpoſe, and being at Sea, plunder ſome Engliſh Veſſels, on Pretence that they belong'd to Rebels: And when he was become ſo obnoxious to the Government at home, that it might juſtly be thought he never durſt appear in England again, he was to betake himſelf to ſome Port on the Coaſt of Flanders, and there renew his Acquaintance with the King's Followers, inviting them upon Occaſions to be merry with them on Board his Ship; till at laſt he ſhould prevail upon the King Himſelf to make one of the Company, his Majeſty being well known not to be over ſhy in accepting all civil Invitations. At length when he had gain'd this Point, and got him into his Ship, he was to carry him off into England, to be at Cromwell's Diſpoſal.

The Latter's Deſign upon the King.

Prevented by Sir Jeremy Witchcot,

This dark Contrivance was not ſo ſecretly manag'd, but by ſome Accident it came to the Ears and Knowledge of Sir Jeremy Witchcot, Brother to the Governor of Windſor-Caſtle, formerly mention'd, but oppoſite to him both in Intereſt and Practice. This worthy Gentleman had been brought up to the Law, and deſign'd to have made his Fortunes that Way; but not long before, he had receiv'd ſeveral Letters from Sir Edward Hyde, perſuading him to buy the Place of Warden of the Fleet, as a particular Means to ſerve the King; which he was to effect by ſheltering ſuch of the Cavaliers as ſhou'd enter themſelves Priſoners for Debt in the Fleet; as ſeveral of thoſe that were employ'd in the King's Buſineſs did, as Mr. Mordaunt, Sir Robert Peyton, and others. Hearing by ſome Accident of this new Deſign, in order to prevent it, Sir Jeremy prevail'd with Walſh's Creditors ſo to proceed againſt him as He, as Warden, might be oblig'd to put him under cloſe Confinement. But before this cou'd be compleated, Walſh made his Eſcape, and was got as far as Canterbury, when the Warden, by ſending out his Officers, retook him, and brought him Priſoner to the Fleet. Sir Jeremy, not ſatisfy'd with this, about the ſame Time writ a Letter to Sir Richard Willis, ſubſcrib'd with his own Name, informing him of the whole Deſign, and adviſing him, as having ſo near a Correſpondence with the King, to precaution his Majeſty againſt the Danger of it. He had no imaginable Suſpicion of this Gentleman's Fidelity; but upon a Reconſideration, and a Fear that his Letter might fall into other Hands, he writ the whole Account in a feign'd Hand, without putting any Name to it; and to prevent Suſpicion, went up into Holbourn, and from thence ſent it by a Porter to Sir Richard's Lodgings. Soon after he receiv'd an Order from the Protector to appear before him in Council, together with his Priſoner Sir Robert Walſh. Accordingly he appear'd, but without his Priſoner; with the Confidence of one that cou'd be betray'd by none but Himſelf, and reſolv'd to be upon his Guard. Cromwell demanded of him, What he had to do to ſeize upon a Perſon employ'd by them? He anſwer'd, He did not know that they had employ'd Sir Robert Walſh; but knew very well that he was his Priſoner. Then he was ask'd, Why he had not brought him thither according to Order? His Reply was, That he underſtood there were certain Perſons ready in the Streets to make a Reſcue.-------That if his Conduct diſpleas'd, he was willing to ſurrender his Keys; and ſeem'd ready to deliver them up. While he was under this Examination, to his great Surpriſe, he ſaw the very Letter he had ſent to Sir Richard Willis lying on the Board, before his Face. This Piece of Service was after the Reſtoration gratefully remember'd by the King, and the Chancellor, when Sir Jeremy had a private Occaſion to apply himſelf to the Court, as I have been aſſured by his Son Sir Paul Witchcot.

Who likewiſe diſcovers Willis's Treachery.

The Deſign being diſcover'd, tho' by a Way unknown to the Protector and his Agents, Walſh found Means to get over into Flanders, where he apply'd himſelf to the Marqueſs of Ormond, and entertain'd him with many ſpecious Stories of what nice Diſcoveries he had made in England, and what great Services he had done, and could ſtill do for the King; and made ſome Offers of diſcovering Traytors about his Majeſty's Perſon, by Ways and Means very ſtrange and uncommon: ‘ Particularly he offer'd to ‘ forge a Letter from Cardinal Mazarine to the King, “ which ſhou'd contain all imaginable Kindneſſes, toge-“ gether with Aſſurance to his Majeſty, That all the Tranſ-“ actions he had hitherto made with Cromwell, were for “ no other End than his Ruin; and likewiſe a further Aſ-“ ſurance of his good Intentions for his Majeſty's In-“ tereſt and Service: And that if the King pleas'd to im-‘ part this Letter to a particular Perſon in his Coun-‘ cil, and leave it an Hour or two in his Hands, he ‘ wou'd not fail to copy it Himſelf, and ſend it to ‘ Secretary Thurloe by the next Poſt; and that he ‘ wou'd undertake to intercept the Letter, at a certain Place he well knew. The Conſequences of which, he ſaid, wou'd be of vaſt Importance: Firſt the Traytor wou'd be diſcover'd, and convicted by his own Hand; and as ſoon as Cromwell ſhou'd ſee it, he wou'd certainly believe the Contents to be true, which wou'd cauſe a Rupture between Him and France, to the extraordinary Advantages of the King's Affairs.' But his fine Stories and Pretenſions had ſo little Effect, and his Perſon and Character was ſo well known, that inſtead of meeting with Encouragement, he was firſt commanded to depart the Country, and after that committed to cloſe Impriſonment at Bruſſels; where in a Manifeſto he makes a long Narrative and Apology for his Proceedings, omits many Particulars, and directly accuſes the Earl of Briſtol and Sir Edward Hyde, as Traytors to the King, and ſecret Correſpondents with Cromwell; all which, he ſays, he laid before his Majeſty, but with no other Effect, than bringing worſe Uſage, and more Enemies upon Himſelf. This I have more largely in his Manuſcript Manifeſto, found in the Study of Sir Joſeph Williamſon, afterwards Secretary to this King.

Walſh is impriſon'd by the King.

4. The King being well fix'd with his little Court at Bruges, by means of his Treaty with Spain, and his four Regiments of Soldiers, began to make a more notable Figure than formerly, and his Intereſt to occaſion ſome Conſideration. The Spaniards ſoon found real Advantage from the Preſence of his Majeſty, and his Attendants; and particularly from the Marqueſs of Ormond, who, ſoon after the taking of Conde from the French, by his Management brought over his Nephew Muskery, with a famous Regiment of Iriſh, intirely to their Service. Not long after, the Earl of Briſtol, who came this Year from France, prov'd very inſtrumental in bringing over more of the Iriſh, and reducing the Town and Garriſon of St. Ghiſlan to the Power of Spain; by which and other Means of Inſinuation, he overcame Prejudices that were thought inſuperable, and got into the good Graces of Don Juan, and the Court of Bruſſels. This Earl had been compell'd to leave the Kingdom of France, by Vertue of Cromwell's Treaty with the Cardinal, the ſecret Part of which was now diſcover'd; and the Cardinal bewail'd the preſent Condition of France, ‘ which oblig'd them to receive Commands from Cromwell, which were very uneaſy to them;' and let him know, ‘ That neither He, nor the Duke of York Himſelf, cou'd be permitted to ſtay any longer in that Kingdom.' Accordingly, ſome Time after the Departure of the Earl, the Duke of York took his Leave of his Mother and the Cardinal, who parted with much ſeeming Regret, and on the latter End of the Year repair'd to the King at Bruges. So at this City there were then all the viſible Hopes of the Crown of England together, and all the Royal Iſſue of the late King, except the Princeſs Henrietta; for beſides the King, and the Dukes of York and Gloceſter, the Princeſs Royal of Orange made that her Way from Paris to Holland, and ſtay'd there ſome Days with her three Brothers, making up a glorious and happy Part of the Illuſtrious Company.

Almoſt all the Royal Family at Bruges.

About the ſame Time the King made the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Hyde, Lord Chancellor of England, in the Room of Sir Edward Herbert, lately deceas'd at Paris. The King had long kept the Seal in his own Hands; and Hyde was very unwilling to take it, till he was induc'd by the Perſwaſions of the King, and ſeveral others about him. And his Majeſty having thus fix'd his Court, all Things this Winter ſeem'd to have a better Aſpect, and his Cauſe appear'd more hopeful than it had for ſome Years paſt. There were great Expectations in England of the King's Landing, with a conſiderable Aſſiſtance from the Spaniard; and many were of Opinion, that he was ready with ſuch an Army as would be alone able to effect his Purpoſe. Great Preparations were made for Inſurrections in ſeveral Parts of England; and ſeveral Meſſengers were ſent from thence to aſſure his Majeſty, ‘ That there was ſuch an univerſal Readineſs there, that they cou'd hardly be perſwaded to ſtay for the King's Arrival, but they wou'd begin the Work themſelves:' Yet they complain'd much of ſome who were moſt truſted by the King; and they again as much inveigh'd againſt the precipitated Management of the other, who were like to ruin Themſelves and their Friends. For the compoſing of theſe Diſtempers, and the managing and conducting of this great Work, the brave Marqueſs of Ormond offer'd to the King, ‘ to go privately into England, and confer with thoſe who were moſt forward; if he found their Counſels were diſcreetly laid, he wou'd encourage them, and unite all the reſt to them; and if Matters were not ripe, he wou'd diſpoſe them to be quiet;' and there was not a true Friend to the King in England, who wou'd not be readily adviſ'd by this great Man. Accordingly he ventur'd over into England, in Diſguiſe, and at London privately diſcours'd with many of the Royal Party, and more particularly with Sir Richard Willis Himſelf. After many various Opinions and Propoſals, and after he had ſtaid about three Weeks, he thought it neceſſary to retire; having found that Cromwell really knew of his being at London, and had made many Searches for him; but cou'd not at that Time imagine which Way, or by whom it was diſcover'd.

Sir Edward Hyde made Lord Chancellor.

The Marqueſs of Ormond ſent over into England.

5. In the mean Time Cromwell was not unacquainted with the Deſigns and Motions of the King and his Friends, and found Means to counterplot them in all their Projects; and from the Time that the three Royal Brothers had ſettled themſelves at Bruges, he enter'd upon darker Deſigns than ever. Particularly, with the joint Conſpiracy of his old Friend Secretary Thurloe, and his new one Sir Richard Willis, was form'd an execrable Contrivance, that at one Blow ſhou'd ruin, and in a Manner extirpate the Royal Family. This was, to ſend over proper Meſſengers to Flanders, with plauſible Letters, ‘ To invite his Majeſty to come over in a ſingle Ship, with only the two Dukes of York and Gloceſter, his Brothers, and a very few more, to a certain Port in Suſſex, upon an appointed fix'd Day; where they were promis'd to be receiv'd and ſupported by five Hundred Foot at their firſt Landing, and two Thouſand Horſe within one Day after.' It was likewiſe determin'd by this Cabinet-Council, that Sir Richard Himſelf ſhou'd contrive and manage theſe Letters of Invitation, in which the Matter was to be urg'd to his Majeſty as the moſt hopeful, if not certain Project for his Reſtoration; tho' at the ſame Time the real Deſign and Reſolution was, to ſhoot all the three Brothers dead at their firſt Landing.

A deep Deſign formed by Cromwell, Thurloe, and Willis.

The whole Matter, being thus form'd by this Triumvirate in Thurloe's own Office, was unexpectedly overheard by Mr. Samuel Morland, the preſent Under-Secretary to Thurloe, who all the while counterfeited himſelf to be faſt aſleep upon a Desk, not far off, in that Office. This ingenious Gentleman, who for his Parts had been choſen into this Service, had formerly marry'd a French Woman; who having been her ſelf induced by the particular Intereſt and Acquaintance of the Earl of Arundel, by Degrees had inclin'd her Husband to come ſecretly in with the King's Party. And now being fully confirm'd and riveted by the Horrour of this Contrivance, he reſolv'd at any Hazard to defeat it. In order to which, he immediately repair'd to the Tower to one Major Henſhaw, a loyal Perſon who had been impriſon'd there by Cromwell, more for his being a known Friend to the King, than for any particular Practices againſt the preſent Government. Mr. Morland being in a publick Station, and altogether unſuſpected to the Keepers of the Tower, and likewiſe pretending to perform ſome ſecret Service for his Maſter Cromwell, found an eaſy Opportunity to procure Mr. Henſhaw, in Company with the Warder himſelf, to go over and give the King ſuch an Account of the Matter, as might ſecure him from future Danger: And to defray their Expences, he gave to each of them a Hundred broad Pieces of Gold. All this was manag'd with the utmoſt Privacy by Henſhaw, without the leaſt Suſpicion of the Warder; and at ſuch a nice Juncture of Time, that the King and his Brothers had a very narrow Eſcape. The King being ſufficiently inform'd and caution'd, order'd a particular Anſwer to be ſent to the Letters of Invitation, intimating, ‘ That he cou'd not be ready ſo ſoon as the appointed Day;' which gave the three Projectors ſome Apprehenſion and Suſpicion of the Diſcovery. But not being ſatisfy'd with this Anſwer, Willis was appointed to contrive other Letters to the King, urging his Majeſty to uſe Expedition, ‘ and not to loſe ſo fair an Opportunity for his happy Reſtoration:' But now the King's Anſwer was, ‘ That he was not very well,' or ſomething that appear'd ſo frivolous, that they all juſtly concluded all their Project was diſcover'd and loſt.

Diſcover'd by Mr. Morland.

The King inform'd of it.

This unexpected Defeat gave them infinite Uneaſineſs; not only for the Greatneſs of the preſent Diſappointment, but for the Infidelity of ſome one of their Cabinet-Council, which, they had all reaſon to believe, conſiſted but of three Perſons. Willis having been formerly ſo eminent a Cavalier, was moſt ſtrongly ſuſpected by the other two, which made it the more difficult for him to clear Himſelf. And being now very reſtleſs, and juſtly conſidering and believing that Mr. Morland might, or rather muſt be the Diſcoverer, he preſently took private Lodgings, and ſent a ſecret Meſſage to Mr. Morland to come and meet him concerning a Matter of great Importance. Mr. Morland thought it by no Means proper, or perhaps ſafe, to decline the Meeting; but imagining ſomething extraordinary in the Affair, he carefully took Pocket-Piſtols along with him, and went to the appointed Place. There he was met by another Perſon inſtead of Sir Richard, who privately carry'd him to another Houſe; from whence he was conducted by a ſecond unknown Meſſenger, with the like Privacy, to a third Houſe. Here, with the utmoſt Caution, he was carry'd up three or four Pair of Stairs, and then down as many into another Houſe, and at laſt into a dark deep Cellar; where by the Light of a Candle he ſaw Sir Richard by Himſelf, with a Bible upon a Table by him. Sir Richard told him plainly, 'That he had ſent 'for him upon the Account of the Diſcovery of a Secret 'of the higheſt Importance, which cou'd not poſſibly be 'known to more than three Perſons beſides himſelf.' Then naming the Particulars, he laid his Hand upon the Bible, and with a formal Oath and Execration purg'd himſelf from being the Diſcoverer of that Secret; and told him, 'That he expected that he ſhould make the ſame 'ſolemn Purgation.' Mr. Morland, laying his Hands upon one of his Piſtols, with a ſingular Preſence of Mind, and an Air of Innocence, told him, 'He was ready to do 'the ſame, upon this one ſingle Condition, That he wou'd 'give him the leaſt Inſtance, or ſhew of Reaſon, Why he 'cou'd ſuſpect him guilty of ſo vile a Treachery.' All this he did with ſuch an unaffected and undaunted Courage, as really damp'd and defeated the deep Management and Subtlety of the other: and ſo eſcap'd an imminent Danger. Mr. Morland afterwards declar'd, 'That if Matters had 'then come to Extremity, he wou'd certainly have ſhot Sir 'Richard dead upon the Spot, rather than have hazarded 'the probable Conſequences of that Meeting.' For this, and other Services, this Gentleman was afterwards rewarded with Knighthood, a Penſion, &c. and complimented with farther Promiſes from the King and Court. This Account, which never yet appear'd in Print, came from his own Mouth, and from Sir John Talbot, confirm'd by a third Perſon of undoubted Worth and Honour.

This remarkable Story, which was told me with great Formality and Exactneſs, by Sir John Talbot and others, is wholly inconſiſtent with a Letter I think myſelf oblig'd to ſubjoin, unleſs we can ſuppoſe that the Name Morland or Willis ſignify'd ſome other Perſon. The Letter is from Mr. Morland to Sir Richard, and in theſe Words; 'Sir, 'Whereas I have heard how much you have ſuffer'd by 'a Libel bearing date the 3d of June, 1659, charging you 'with a private Correſpondence with Mr. Secretary Thurloe and his Creatures; and that I particularly was ſince in 'Flanders, in Perſon, to inform the King of the Particulars by ſhewing him Letters of yours, and Receipts for 'Money; I think myſelf oblig'd (tho' a Stranger to you) 'to be ſo far aſſiſting to your Vindication, as to declare 'and profeſs, That I was never in any Part of Flanders in 'all my Life, nor with the King beyond Sea upon that, 'or any other Account; nor did ever ſhew him (as is 'aforeſaid) any ſuch Letters or Bills of Receipt, for any 'Monies whatſoever. And ſo far was I from being in any 'Capacity of Informing againſt you as aforeſaid, that I do 'profeſs, I knew not ſo much as your Name; neither 'was I ever preſent at any private Conference between 'you and Mr. Secretary Thurloe; which upon all Occaſions ſhall be conſtantly teſtify'd by, Sir,

Thurſday the 1*ſt of* March, 16$\frac{59}{60}$. Your moſt humble Servant,

S. Morland.

If this Letter acquits Sir Richard in this Caſe, it will not clear him from what is ſaid in P. 727, of this Hiſtory. How far it conſiſts with what the Lord Clarendon ſays in his laſt Folio Volume, P. 522, 523, 524, and 525, I leave to the judicious and impartial Reader.

And here, for the Concluſion of the old Year, we ſhall take Notice of the Deaths of ſeveral Perſons worthy of Remembrance for their different Excellencies and Qualifications; as firſt Dr. Thomas Laurence, Maſter of Baliol College, and Margaret-Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Oxford; a Perſon once highly celebrated for his Scholaſtical Divinity, and his extraordinary Proficiency in the Greek and Latin Tongues; who upon the fatal Turn of the Times, loſing all, he became melancholy and careleſs, and unaccountably degenerate in his Life and Converſation, till at length he dy'd in great Obſcurity. The next was Mr. John Langley, the noted Maſter of St. Paul's School, where he was the happy Educator of many, who were afterwards ſerviceable both in Church and State; an excellent Theologiſt of the Puritan Stamp, a great Linguiſt and Hiſtorian, and a nice and exact Antiquary; for which he was particularly eſteem'd by the famous Selden, and other learned Men in thoſe Times. Mr. William Burton was another eminent Antiquary, and an excellent Critick and Philologiſt, belov'd and admir'd by many Perſons of Curioſity, eſpecially the great Archbiſhop of Armagh: He was, by Profeſſion, Maſter of the Free-School at Kingſton upon Thames, and left a conſiderable Name behind him for his Commentary on Antoninus his Itinerary, and other uſeful and beneficial Pieces. Dr. Gerard Langbain, Provoſt of Queen's Colledge, and Keeper of the Archives of the Univerſity of Oxford, was another great Antiquary, and no leſs conſiderable for Languages, Philoſophy, and Divinity; whoſe indefatigable Labours, and immenſe Undertakings, caus'd him likewiſe to be particularly eſteem'd by Selden, Uſher, and the other great Diſcoverers of the Age. Beſides theſe we are to mention two eminent Phyſicians, Dr. William Harvey, and Sir Matthew Liſter: The former was educated in that noted College for Phyſicians, Caius in Cambridge, and then in Padua in Italy, and afterwards became Phyſician to the late King, and Warden of the other Phyſick College, Merton in Oxford: He was the Glory of the Engliſh Nation, for his admirable Skill in his Profeſſion, and has immortaliz'd his Name by his Noble Diſcovery of the Circulation of the Blood; and having form'd a Practice of Phyſick conformable to this Theſis, he was plunder'd of his Papers to the extraordinary Loſs of the World; tho' he ſtill left ſome excellent Pieces behind him. The other, Sir Matthew Liſter, a Doctor of Phyſick in the Univerſity of Baſil in Switzerland, was likewiſe one of the prime Phyſicians of the Nation, and a Gentleman of a Yorkſhire Family celebrated for that Profeſſion: He was ſucceſſively Phyſician to King James's Queen Anne, and to the late King; and having liv'd to the 92d Year of his Age, he dy'd at his Houſe at Burnell in Lincolnſhire, the Eſtate he had purchas'd from the famous Sir Thomas Glemham. Beſides all theſe, we are to mention two other Perſons ſufficiently remarkable, Obadiah Sedgewick, and John Lilburn, both notorious Incendiaries: The former was a Puritan Divine, and a mighty Fomenter of the Flames and Troubles of the Nation; who, after he had been ſeveral Years a voluble Preacher, and a violent Promoter of the Old Clauſe, retir'd from the City of London, and dy'd very wealthy at his native Town of Marlborough. The latter, John Lilburn, or Free-born John, the furious Oppoſer of all Governments, was one whoſe Character we have formerly given; who after he had concern'd and ingag'd himſelf with all Parties, both in Oppoſition and Conjunction, and undergone the moſt ſtrange Varieties of Fortune, at laſt dy'd a Quaker.

The Parliament encreas'd by Cromwell's Lords.

VIII. 1. After a ſeven Months Prorogation and Receſs, Cromwell's Parliament met a ſecond Time on the 20th Day of January; and, according to the laſt Inſtrument ſtill'd The humble Petition and Advice, was increas'd and improv'd by the Addition of that call'd The Other Houſe. Cromwell had formerly declar'd That it wou'd never be well, and we ſhou'd never ſee good Days, while there was one Lord left in England, and till the Earl of Mancheſter was call'd Mr. Mountague; yet now he thought fit to give that Title to a Sett of Men, to make up his Other Houſe of Parliament. Theſe conſiſted of ſixty Perſons, of whom ſeven or eight were real Lords, as the Earls of Warwick, Mulgrave and Mancheſter, the Lords Say, and Wharton, &c. and about twenty were of the Gentry, as Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Fiennes, Lord Liſle, Sir William Strickland, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Sir John Hobart, Sir Richard Onſlow, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir Thomas Honywood, Mr. Saint-John, Mr. Popham, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Mr. Howard, &c. beſides the two Sons of the Protector, and ſome Relations. The reſt were Officers of the Army, and very inferior Perſons, as Pride the Drayman, Hewſon the Shoe-Maker, Barkſtead the Silver-Smith, Whaley a broken Clothier, Goff the Salter, Berry the Wood-Monger, Pack the Woollen-Draper, Cooper the Haberdaſher of Small Wares, &c. Theſe were ſummon'd in the Form of the ancient Writ directed by the Kings of England to ſuch as they call'd to the Houſe of Lords.' Moſt of the Lords diſdain'd to appear upon this Occaſion, and ſome few of the Commons declin'd the Honour, and choſe rather to ſit in the lower Houſe, as Sir Arthur Haſlerigg in particular. Lenthall, the old Speaker of the Long Parliament, according to Ludlow, was much diſturb'd that a Writ had not been ſent to him, and complain'd, That he who had been for ſome Years the firſt Man of the Nation, was now deny'd to be a Member of either Houſe of Parliament. Whereupon Cromwell in Pity ſent him a Writ, which ſo elevated the poor Man, that meeting with Mr. Osbaldſton, the former School-Maſter of Weſtminſter, whom he knew to be a great Lover of Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, he ask'd him what Sir Arthur deſign'd to do in Anſwer to this Writ? The other replying that he knew not Sir Arthur's Intentions in that Matter; he return'd, I pray write to him, and deſire him by no Means to omit taking his Place; and aſſure him from me, That all that do ſo, ſhall themſelves and their Heirs be for ever Peers of England. Such was the Temper and Humour of that Man, who had done ſuch infinite Miſchief to the Nation.

Crom-well's Speech to them.

Both Houſes being met upon the appointed Day, the Protector, without coming to the Painted-Chamber, as uſually he did, went as Soveraign to the Houſe of Lords, where he ſent for the Speaker and the Houſe of Commons by the Uſher of the Black-Rod, to come to the Bar of the Houſe. Being plac'd in his Chair under a Cloth of State, he began his Speech in the old Royal Stile, 'My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons! and then diſcours'd ſome Particulars which he recommended to them; thank'd them for their fair Correſpondence laſt Seſſion, and aſſur'd them, If they wou'd continue to proſecute his Deſigns, they ſhou'd be call'd the Bleſſed of the Lord, and Generations to come ſhou'd bleſs them.' He left his Lord-Keeper Fiennes to make a long Speech to them, with all the Formality of the ancient Monarchs of England: In which he largely vindicated the preſent Conſtitution, and the new Houſe of Lords; and among other things told them, 'the late Wars and Confuſions had ſo trampled down the Quick Wood, whereby the Hedge was made to fence in our Laws and Liberties, that there was a Neceſſity of ſetting it over again: Some were for having the very ſame Old Plants ſet in the very ſelf-ſame Old Bank: Others ran into the contrary Extream, and wou'd have none of the Old Sets, nor none of the Old Bank, but wou'd have their Fence ſet upon a Level: A third Sort liked a middle Way, as on the one Side not to meddle with the Old dry and dead Bank, ſo on the other Side not to place their Sets upon the Plain Ground, leſt the Beaſts ſhou'd tread them down, according as their Food and Fancy leads them; but to place the Sets in two Tables upon a Bank rais'd up as before, but of a freſh and live Mould, and to make uſe of all Plants, both Old and New, that will take to the freſh Ground, and thrive in it.' Afterwards, ſpeaking of the King and his Friends, he demanded of them, 'If the Intereſt of that Party ſhou'd be again enthroned amongſt them, and brought in upon the Wings of that double-headed black Eagle, or rather Vulture, What wou'd become of the poor Lambs of Chriſt?' Therefore by way of Concluſion he let them underſtand, 'That they all knew, and the three Nations knew, and all the Nations round about them knew, That the Quiet, Peace and Welfare of theſe Nations, did at preſent, under God, depend upon Highneſs's Life.

And Fiennes.

As ſoon as the Commons came to their Houſe, unfortunately for the Protector, they caus'd the third Article of the Humble Petition and Advice to be read; by which it was provided, 'That no Members legally choſen ſhou'd be excluded from the Performance of their Duty, but by Conſent of that Houſe of which they were Members.' Upon which they proceeded to the Calling over their Houſe, and preſently re-admitted all thoſe who had been excluded for refuſing to ſign that Recognition of the Protector; and by this Means about a hundred of the moſt inveterate Enemies to Cromwell came and ſat in the Houſe; among whom were Haſlerigg, Scot, Goodwin, and many other Subſcribers of the former Proteſtation, who now had the more Credit and Intereſt in the Houſe, for having been excluded for their Fidelity to the Common-Wealth; many of thoſe who had ſubſcrib'd it, valuing themſelves for having thereby become Inſtruments to introduce them again, who cou'd not otherwiſe have gain'd a Re-admiſſion. When theſe Men came into the Houſe, they ſoon began to queſtion the Authority and Juriſdiction of the Other Houſe: They acknowledg'd, 'That the Petition and Advice had allow'd that there ſhou'd be ſuch a Houſe; but that it ſhou'd be a Houſe of Peers, and that they ſhou'd be call'd My Lords, there was no Proviſion; nor did it appear what Juriſdiction they ſhou'd have: That it wou'd be a very ridiculous Thing, if they ſhou'd ſuffer thoſe who were created by themſeves, and ſat only by their Vote, to be better Men than they, and to have a Negative Voice to control their Maſters:' When they had ſufficiently vilify'd their Character, they queſtion'd the Protector's Authority to ſend Writs to call them thither; and ask'd 'Who gave him that Authority to make Peers? That it had been the proper Buſineſs of that Houſe to have provided for all this; which probably they wou'd have effected at this Meeting, if he had not preſumptuouſly taken that Soveraign Power upon him.' At the ſame Time the Other Houſe well knew it was their Commiſſion to be a Houſe of Peers in every thing but Name; and therefore ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon all the ancient Rights and Privileges, belonging to the Place where they ſat.

A great Diviſion between the two Houſes.

This new Spirit exceedingly ſurpris'd and perplex'd the Protector, who found he had been ſhort-ſighted in not providing for the filling his Houſe of Commons, when he erected his other of Peers: For he had remov'd the boldeſt Speakers, and beſt able to oppoſe this Torrent, out of the Lower Houſe, to inſtitute his Other Houſe, without Supplying their Places by others ſo well able to undergo the Work. He was not a little apprehenſive alſo, that Part of the Army, eſpecially thoſe quarter'd about St. James's, were engag'd in theſe Diſtempers; therefore to prevent the worſt, he took the Inſpection of the Watch at White-Hall for ſeveral Nights ſucceſſively in his own Perſon. And the Allarm from abroad increaſing daily and hourly, he reſolv'd to put an End to all by a Diſſolution. While he was conſidering about the beſt Means of effecting his Deſigns, on the fourth of February freſh Informations were brought him concerning the Diligence of his Oppoſers and Enemies; which ſo rous'd and quicken'd him, that he wou'd not ſtay for one of his own Coaches; but taking the firſt that was ready, with ſuch Guards as he cou'd immediately get together, he hurry'd to the Other Houſe. Here he firſt imparted his Reſolution to Lieutenant-General Fleetwood; who earneſtly endeavouring to diſſwade him from an Act ſo unpopular, he clapp'd his Hand upon his Breaſt, and Swore by the Living God he wou'd do it! Then he ſent for the Judges, and the Members of the Lower Houſe, and treated them with great Indignation 'for obſtructing that Work, which he ſaid was ſo well begun, in Order to the Settlement of the Nation.' On the other Hand he aſſur'd thoſe whom he had called to his Other Houſe, That notwithſtanding all the Practices againſt them, they were Lords, and ſhou'd continue to be Lords; and ſo proceeded to a Diſſolution, concluding, as ſome ſay, with theſe Words, By the Living God I do and muſt Diſſolve you. Thus ended Cromwell's Third and laſt Parliament; which, after the new Improvement of the Other Houſe, laſted but fifteen Days. Of his three Parliaments there went this vulgar Saying, That the Firſt was called, but not choſen; the Second did juſt Nothing, and the Third did nothing Juſt.

Cromwell diſſolves them.

2. The reſt of the Life and Reign of Cromwell, which conſiſted of the Space of ſeven Months, became daily more uneaſy and unhappy to that aſpiring Man; who ſeem'd now to be purſued and environ'd by all the direful Attendants of an Uſurper and Tyrant. For tho' all Things ſeem'd to ſucceed both at home and abroad, and his Power and Greatneſs to be better eſtabliſh'd than ever, yet it is obſerv'd, that after he had refus'd the Crown, he never had his former and uſual Serenity of Mind; and whether he was laſh'd by the Furies of a guilty Conſcience, or terrify'd with unexpected or increaſing Dangers, he never was at reſt; ſo that he was much leſs the Happy Man, than the World took him to be. He grew more apprehenſive of the Danger of his Perſon than formerly; ſo that he was harder of Acceſs, and more rarely ſeen abroad; and his Eyes were intent upon the Carriage, Manners and Looks of all Strangers that came in his Preſence. He wore Armour underneath his Cloaths, beſides Offenſive Weapons, as a Sword, Faulchion, and ſeveral Piſtols; and he never went abroad but with ſtrong Guards, and with his Coach full throng'd with well-armed Servants. When he deſign'd to go to Hampton-Court, which was his principal Delight and Diverſion, it was never known which Way he wou'd go, till he was in the Coach; and he ſeldom return'd the ſame Way he went, and always in great Speed and Expedition. He kept ſeveral Keys for the Doors of his Chambers, and rarely ſlept above two Nights together in the ſame Room; nor in any, that had not two or three Back-doors, well guarded by his Servants. All which made his Fears more publick and obſerv'd, becauſe he never had been accuſtom'd to theſe Precautions. He was likewiſe awaken'd by the Diſperſing of a very ſmart and ſurpriſing Paper entitled Killing no Murder; wherein it was prov'd to be not only lawful, but honourable, to kill the Tyrant as a common Enemy of his Country. This made him more than ordinary vigilant to apprehend the Author, who was then happily conceal'd, not only in his Perſon, but in the very ſuſpicion of his Name; tho' ſince commonly taken to be Colonel Titus, a Perſon of great Figure in many of the Parliaments after the King's Reſtoration.

Crom-well's Fears and Jealouſies.

It is certain, he knew of many Combinations either to aſſaſſinate, or to ruin him, by thoſe, who, he believ'd, were no Friends to the King: For beſides the Deſign of Syndercombe formerly mention'd, ſome Fifth-Monarchy-Men, to the Number of about Three Hundred, expecting extraordinary Aſſiſtance from Heaven, had form'd a Deſign to dethrone the Protector, and to ſet up King Jeſus. Their chief Cabal was held in a Houſe in Shore-Ditch, where Secretary Thurloe, who never wanted Intelligence, had a Spy amongſt them, who diſcover'd their Intrigues time enough to prevent the Execution of them: He ſeiz'd their Arms and Ammunition, with their Standard containing a Lion Couchant, as of the Tribe of Judah, with this Motto, WHO WILL ROUSE HIM UP? and ſeveral Copies of a printed Declaration, with this Title, The Principle of the Remnant, &c. The Conſpirators taken were Venner, Gray, Gowler, Hopkins, Aſhton, and others, who were made Priſoners in the Gate-Houſe, where they lay long in a miſerable Condition; being, as it were, reſerv'd for a more ſignal Puniſhment after the Reſtoration. after, ſome Perſons that us'd to meet in Coleman-ſtreet, to deplore the Apoſtacy of the Times, and particularly that of White-Hall, purſuant to the Protector's Orders, were ſeiz'd by the Lord-Mayor's Officers, as they were coming out from their Place of Meeting. Among theſe was one Cornet Day, who being charg'd with Saying That the Protector was a Rogue and a Traytor, confeſs'd the Words; and to juſtify Himſelf declar'd, That Cromwell had affirm'd in the Preſence of Himſelf, and divers other Officers, That if he did oppreſs the Conſcientious, betray the Liberties of People, or not take away Tithes by a certain Time, now paſt, they ſhou'd then have Liberty to ſay he was a ROGUE and a TRAYTOR. He boldly moved therefore that he might be permitted to produce his Witneſſes, who were then preſent, to prove the fore-mention'd Particulars. But the Matter was ſo order'd, that He and ſome others were, without allowing ſuch Vindications, fined and impriſon'd for their Miſdemeanors.

His old Friends are againſt him.

Several Others, who had been formerly great Friends to Cromwell, as Major-General Harriſon, Vice-Admiral Lawſon, Colonel Rich, and Colonel Danvers, were now ſecur'd as publick Malecontents. And the chief Man of the Army, Lambert, was ſent for by the Protector, who after ſevere Expoſtulations with him for his Non-Compliance, he call'd for his Commiſſion; which He ſuddenly gave up, when there was a general Imagination that he wou'd have refus'd the Delivery of it. So at once his Pay as Colonel of a Regiment of Horſe, as Colonel of a Regiment of Foot, and as Major-General of the Army, was ſtruck off, together with ten Pounds a Day, which was the General's own Pay, and which Cromwell allow'd him, to keep him firm to his Intereſt. Thus Lambert retir'd to his Privacy unviſited, and unregarded, as if he had never been in Authority; but Ludlow tells us that Cromwell thought it expedient to allow him a Penſion of two thouſand Pounds a Year, to keep him from any deſperate Undertaking. Sir Henry Vane, his former grand Brother in deep Contrivances, being lately remov'd from Cariſbrook Caſtle, now underwent another Sort of Perſecution: for Cromwell finding his former Method unſucceſsful, privately encourag'd ſome of the Army to ſeize upon certain Foreſt Walks belonging to him near the Caſtle of Raby; and likewiſe gave Order to the Attorney General, on Pretence of a Flaw in his Title to a great Part of his Eſtate, to prefer a Bill againſt him in the Exchequer. This was to oblige him to expoſe his Title, which if they cou'd effect, it was not doubted but, by the Cunning of the Lawyers, to find ſome Defect in it, and ſo force him to a Submiſſion: Yet at the ſame Time, he was privately inform'd, 'That he ſhou'd be freed from this, or any other Impoſition, and that he ſhou'd have what he cou'd deſire, in Caſe he wou'd comply with the preſent Authority.

The Cavaliers Plot.

3. But that which made moſt Noiſe with the Protector and the Nation was a new and formidable Plot of the Cavaliers, which was pretended to be of the moſt dangerous Conſequence. Cromwell well knew how to turn ſuch Diſcoveries into Acts of Popularity and Gain: And therefore, being without a Parliament, he ſent for the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Common-Council of the City of London, and in a very aggravating Speech inform'd them 'of the imminent Danger of the Common-Wealth from the Enemies to his Government both at home and abroad; That there was a Deſign to ſeize upon the Tower; That the Marqueſs of Ormond had lain privately three Weeks in London, to promote the King's Affairs: That the King lay ready with an Army of eight thouſand Men, with twenty two Ships to tranſport them upon the Coaſt of Flanders; and that there were ſeveral ill-affected Perſons about the City, who endeavour'd to put themſelves in Arms, and embroil the Nation in a War, &c. And then profeſſing a greater Paſſion for their Safety, than for his own, he deſir'd their Care to put the City into a Poſture of Defence.' And then to make his Fears ſeem the greater, he plac'd double Guards in the Tower; and caus'd many ſuſpected Perſons to be ſeiz'd in their very Beds, and to be ſent to ſeveral Priſons. The Lord-Mayor and his Brethren took the Bait, and went home with great Indignation againſt the Royaliſts, for attempting to plunder their Houſes, and cut their Throats, as they believ'd; and took extraordinary Care of the Gates and Guards; and withal drew up an humble Repreſentation and Addreſs to his Highneſs, 'promiſing the Faith of the City, and the Purſe of it, in firmly adhering to him againſt all his Enemies.' A like Hint was alſo given to the Army, and Addreſſes of the ſame Strain were ſent up from ſeveral Regiments, and likewiſe brought over from the Engliſh Forces in Flanders; the Protector begging the Compliment, by imparting to them, 'That the Deſigns and Preparations of the Enemy were very formidable, and many Commiſſioners ſent over by the King of Scots, and therefore it behoved all honeſt Men to provide for a Defence, and joyn heartily together.

Cromwell's Proceedings againſt them.

When he had thus doubly fortify'd his Intereſt, he reſolv'd to proceed againſt the Conſpirators, whom he had ſafely lodg'd in Priſon; but in what Method to proceed, he cou'd not ſo eaſily determine. His Council adviſ'd him to the ancient Way of Indicting them in the Upper Bench for High-Treaſon, and ſo to proceed in the ordinary Courſe of Tryals at Common-Law; but he had no Inclination to truſt to the ordinary Practice of Judges and Juries, tho' they might have been all his own Creatures. His Head and Heart lay rather for a High Court of Juſtice: He had found uſeful Experience of it, as the ſhorteſt Way with Offenders; and therefore he had ſuch a new Court erected, and under the higheſt Authority nominated the Commiſſioners of the Great Seal and of the Treaſury, the Judges, and ſome other Confidents, to be in this Commiſſion; tho' ſome of them wou'd gladly have waſh'd their Hands of ſuch Sanguinary Proceedings: And Whitelock in particular confeſſes, 'That tho' he was one of them, yet he never ſate with them, it being againſt his Judgment.' This High Court of Juſtice was founded on a Law made by the late Parliament, For the Security of his Highneſs's Perſon; and had Power to try all ſuch, and ſuch only, as ſhou'd be nam'd to the Commiſſioners by Him, or his Council.

The Tryal of Mr. Mordaunt.

Before this High Court, of which John Liſle was Preſident, there was firſt brought to be try'd Mr. John Mordaunt, the younger Son and Brother of the Earls of Peterborough; Sir Henry Slingsby, a Gentleman of an ancient Family, and ample Fortune in Yorkſhire; and Dr. John Hewet, an eminent and orthodox Preacher in London, to whoſe Church of St. Gregory's thoſe of the King's Party moſt frequently reſorted. Theſe Three were totally unacquainted with each other; and yet the Firſt and the Laſt had found Means to correſpond ſo much together, as to reſolve that neither of them wou'd plead to the Impeachment, but demur to the Juriſdiction of the Court, and deſire to have Council to argue againſt it in Point of Law. Mr. Mordaunt was firſt arraign'd, and charg'd with receiving Commiſſions from the King for raiſing of a Regiment, one of which he had deliver'd to one Mr. Stapeley, who being over-aw'd by Cromwell had confeſs'd 'That he had receiv'd this Commiſſion from Mr. Mordaunt's own Hand.' This Gentleman refus'd to plead, and according to the former Reſolution, deſir'd Council to argue againſt the Juriſdiction of the Court. But being ſent back with a poſitive Threat of being condemn'd as a Mute, by the Advice and Management of his Lady and others, he the next Day pleaded Not Guilty. After a long Hearing, and by the happy Contrivance of removing one Mallory a Witneſs againſt him, beſides an Accident of one of the Judges withdrawing upon a Fit of the Stone, the Court was equally divided for and againſt him; ſo that the Determination depended upon the ſingle Vote of the Preſident; who after ſome Excuſes, and Acknowledgement of many Obligations to the Mother of the Priſoner, pronounc'd him Innocent for ought appear'd to the Court. There was not the like Inſtance in all theſe Times; and ſcarce any other Man ever eſcap'd, that was try'd before any High Court of Juſtice. And Cromwell was ſo offended at it, that contrary to his own Forms, he kept him a long Time Priſoner; and, upon the unexpected Return of Mallory, wou'd have had him try'd a ſecond Time, but was diſſuaded from venturing the Reproach and Scandal of it.

He eſcapes.

Sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewet condemn'd.

But poor Slingsby and Hewet met with harder Fortune; and their Blood was the more thirſted after for the other's Impunity; and the Court was too ſeverely reprehended to commit the ſame Error again. The former had lain two Years in Priſon in Hull, and was now brought up to the Tower, leſt they might not diſcover enough of any new Plot, to make ſo many formidable Examples, as the preſent Conjuncture required. Beſides his odious Fidelity to the Crown from the firſt attacking it, they had ſufficient Evidence againſt him, 'That he had contriv'd and contracted with ſome Officers of Hull, about the Time the Earl of Rocheſter had been in Yorkſhire two Years before, for the Delivery of one of the Block-Houſes to him for the King's Service.' Nor did he regard much to defend Himſelf againſt the Accuſation; but rather acknowledg'd and juſtify'd his Affection, and own'd his Loyalty to the King, with very little Compliment or Ceremony to the preſent Powers. The next was Dr. Hewet, whoſe greateſt Crime was collecting and ſending Money to the King, beſides having given Mony to ſome Officers; tho' he was charg'd with many other Particulars, which he altogether deny'd upon the Scaffold. Having no Opportunity of receiving Information of Mr. Mordaunt's declining the Way formerly reſolv'd upon, and being brought to the Bar as ſoon as the other was remov'd from it, he perſiſted in the ſame Reſolution, and ſpoke bravely and learnedly, tho' not politickly, againſt the Juriſdiction of the Court. But upon better Information, and before the Judgment was pronounc'd againſt him, he deſir'd to be admitted to plead, and to put himſelf upon his Tryal. But they then utterly refus'd him; and ſo Sentence of Death, as is uſual in High-Treaſon, was pronounc'd againſt them both: only they met with the Favour of being beheaded, which was executed on Tower-Hill on the 8th Day of June.

Their Characters.

To give ſome ſhort Account of theſe two loyal Sufferers; Sir Henry Slingsby was in the Year 1640 return'd a Member of the Long Parliament for Knaſeborough in the County of York, where he ſate till the Troubles begun; and without any Obligation to the Court, was guided by his own Conſcience to deteſt the violent Proceedings of that Parliament. He was a Gentleman of a good Underſtanding, but of a melancholy Diſpoſition, and reſerv'd in his Speech; who being weary of the Proceedings at Weſtminſter, he left the Place, and joyn'd with the firſt who took up Arms for the King. Thus he continu'd with inviolable Steadineſs; and having a good Fortune and a general Reputation, he had a greater Influence upon the People, than they who talk'd more and louder. He was known to be irreconcileable to the new Government; therefore he muſt be deſtroy'd, as well as Dr. Hewet; who was born a Gentleman, educated a Scholar in Cambridge, and finiſh'd a Divine before the Beginning of the Troubles. He liv'd at Oxford and in the Army, till the End of the War, and continu'd afterwards to preach with great Applauſe in his Church at London; where he was admitted purely by the Affection of the Pariſh, ſince he was ſufficiently known to lye under the Brand of Malignity. It is believ'd, that if he had pleaded, he might have been quitted, ſince few of the Things charg'd upon him cou'd have been prov'd; but being once condemn'd, no Interceſſions cou'd prevail to ſave Him or Sir Henry Slingsby, tho' the latter was Uncle to the Lord Falconbridge, who had marry'd Cromwell's Daughter, and the former had the Favour of privately marrying that Couple according to the Rules of the Church of England. But their united Intereſt and Prayers cou'd make no Impreſſion upon the Heart of a jealous Tyrant; and tho' his beloved Daughter, the Lady Cleypole, earneſtly begg'd for the Life of Dr. Hewet, he remain'd inexorable; which is believ'd to have been the principal Cauſe of her laſt Sickneſs and Death, which happen'd not long after.

Others ſuffer.

Beſides theſe two, who ſuffer'd with a moſt Chriſtian Courage, there were three others, Colonel Aſhton, Mr. Stacy, and Mr. Beſtely, condemn'd by the ſame Court, and treated with more Severity: For they were all order'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, in ſeveral great Streets in the City; Aſhton at Mark-Lane End, Stacy in Cornhill, and Beſtely in Cheapſide; all which was perform'd with the utmoſt Rigour, to make the deeper Impreſſion upon the Inhabitants, the two laſt being Citizens. But now all Men appear'd ſo nauſeated with Blood, and ſo tired with theſe abominable Spectacles, that Cromwell thought it convenient to pardon the reſt who were condemn'd, or rather to reprieve and reſerve them for a more proper Seaſon. Such were Cromwell's Proceedings, and thus did he exerciſe his Tyranny in the latter Part of his Reign and Government.

The King removes to Bruſſels.

IX. I. In the mean Time the King, after he had continu'd nine or ten Months at Bruges, by the Allowance of Don Juan the Governour of the Country, removed and ſettled at Bruſſels; where he met with better Accommodation and Satisfaction, and found Himſelf farther diſtant from the deep and dangerous Deſigns of Cromwell. Tho' theſe bloody Proceedings were extremely afflicting to his Majeſty, and all his Friends, yet the Uſurper did not ſeem to be more ſecured in his Tyranny. The King's Party were indeed more diſpirited; but Cromwell found another kind of Enemy ſtill more dangerous than they, and that knew better how to deal with him in his own Way. They who were rais'd by him, and had likewiſe rais'd him, even almoſt the whole Body of Sectaries, Independents, Anabaptiſts, Quakers, &c. declar'd an implacable Hatred againſt him; and while they endeavour'd to raiſe a Power to contend with him, they likewiſe enter'd into ſeveral Conſpiracies to aſſaſſinate him; which he very much apprehended. They ſent over a remarkable Addreſs to the King, which is no where to be found but in the Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory; which ſhewing the Spirit and Humour, both of the Men and the Times, we ſhall inſert ſome Part of it.

A remarkable Addreſs to him.

After they had given a deplorable Account of the Shipwreck'd Common-Wealth of England, 'which like a poor Weather-beaten Pinnace, had for a long Time been toſs'd upon the Billows of Faction, ſplit upon the Rocks of Violence, and now almoſt devour'd in the Quick-Sands of Ambition;' they freely diſplay'd Theirs and the Nation's Crimes in theſe memorable Words: 'What have we done, nay, what have we not done, which either Helliſh Policy was able to contrive, or Brutiſh Power to execute? We have trampled under Foot all Authorities; we have laid violent Hands upon our own Sovereign; we have raviſh'd our Parliaments; we have deflour'd the Virgin Liberty of our Nation; we have put a Yoke, an heavy Yoke of Iron, upon the Necks of our Countrymen; we have thrown down the Walls and Bulwarks of the People's Safety; we have broken often repeated Oaths, Vows, Engagements, Covenants, Proteſtations; we have betray'd our Truſts; we have violated our Faiths; we have lifted up our Hands to Heaven deceitfully; and that theſe our Sins might want no Aggravation to make them exceeding ſinful, we have added Hypocriſy to them all; and have not only, like the audacious Strumpet, wiped our Mouths, and boaſted That we have done no Evil; but in the midſt of all our Abominations, (ſuch as are too bad to be nam'd among the worſt of Heathens) we have not wanted Impudence enough to ſay, Let the Lord be glorify'd! Let Jeſus Chriſt be exalted! Let his Kingdom be advanc'd! Let the Goſpel be propagated! Let the Saints be dignify'd! Let Righteouſneſs be eſtabliſh'd! Pudet hæc Opprobria, &c.' Then after a free Declaration of their great Dexterity in Deſtroying, and their great Infirmity in Reſtoring of a Government, they thus proceed: 'Whither ſhall we go for Help? or to whom ſhall we addreſs our ſelves for Relief? If we ſay, We will have recourſe to Parliaments, and they ſhall ſave us; behold, they are broken Reeds, Reeds ſhaken with the Wind, They cannot ſave Themſelves. If we turn to the Army, and ſay, They are Bone of our Bone, and Fleſh of our Fleſh, it may be they will at laſt have pity upon us, and deliver us; behold they are become as a Rod of Iron to bruiſe us, rather than a Staff of Strength to ſupport us. If we go to Him who had treacherouſly uſurped, and does tyrannically exerciſe an unjuſt Power over us, and ſay to him, Free us from this Yoke, for it oppreſſeth us, and from theſe Burthens, for they are heavier than we, or our Fathers, were ever able to bear; behold, in the Pride and Haughtineſs of his Spirit, he anſwers us, You are Factious, you are Factious; if your Burthens are heavy, I will make them yet heavier, &c.' At laſt they apply themſelves to his Majeſty, and make the higheſt Promiſes to reſtore him to the Throne of his Father, if he wou'd condeſcend to ſome extraordinary Propoſitions, that may be ſeen in the noble Hiſtorian. The King gave ſuch an Anſwer to this Addreſs, as might diſpoſe theſe People to hope for his Favour, if he receiv'd Service from them; and ſo the Matter reſted at preſent.

He offers to go into the Field.

The King daily found that the Spaniards were leſs and leſs able to give him that Aſſiſtance towards his Reſtoration, that they deſign'd, and he expected; therefore in a Country, now ſo great a Scene of War, he reſolv'd not to live altogether unactive; and accordingly ſent to Don Juan, 'That he wou'd accompany him in the Field the next Campaign, without occaſioning him any Trouble or Ceremony whatſoever.' But the Spaniards ſent him a formal Meſſage to excuſe themſelves from conſenting to this Propoſition, declaring, 'That they cou'd not anſwer it to the King their Maſter, if they ſhou'd permit his Majeſty to hazard his Royal Perſon, at a Time when his two Brothers, who were known to affect ſo much Danger, were already in the Army.' And finding that they cou'd not reſtrain him from ſuch Adventures, while he remain'd at Bruges, and hearing that he had privately ventur'd Himſelf in the former Action at Mardyke, they readily conſented to his forementioned Removal to Bruſſels, the Place at which he firſt of all deſir'd to reſide.

A Deſign of Mazarine and Cromwell upon Oſtend.

Nothing was more apparent to the Eyes of diſcerning Men, than that the French wou'd begin the Campaign with the Siege of Dunkirk; but in order to this, and to obtain more ſignal Advantages, Cardinal Mazarine and Cromwell had form'd a ſecret and politick Deſign of ſurprizing and ſeizing of Oſtend upon a certain fix'd Day; in which they thought they had ſufficient Encouragement. For in the Beginning of the Year, a Party of that Garriſon, with the Privity of the Governour, held Intelligence with the Cardinal, and then with Cromwell, to betray the Town to the French, wherein Cromwell was to have his Share. The Cardinal was to ſend a Land Army, commanded by Marſhal D'Aumont, and Cromwell was to provide a Fleet to tranſport the Men; and particular Articles were agreed on between the ſuppos'd Conſpirators and the Cardinal, in the Month of April: But here Cromwell was at a greater Charge for his Fleet, than the Cardinal for his Army; and the former had privately outbid the latter for the Bargain, but little Mony was to be paid before the Town was ſurrender'd. The Agreement thus made, upon the fix'd appointed Day, the 14th of May, the Engliſh Fleet appear'd before Oſtend, and the Garriſon in the Fort permitted the French to paſs and land, who thought of nothing leſs than taking immediate Poſſeſſion of the Place. But the Governour, after he had ſuffer'd the Fleet to come to a proper Diſtance, immediately pull'd down the White Flag, that had invited them in, and ſet up a Bloody Flag; and before the Ships cou'd tack about, or get out of his Reach, he ſeverely gall'd them with the Artillery from the Forts; and the French that landed were every Man kill'd or taken Priſoners, to the Number of fifteen hundred; the Marſhal Himſelf being one who was taken. This Stratagem was nicely manag'd by the Spaniards, and the whole Action ſeem'd a Mixture of Tragedy, Comedy and Farce; as will more largely appear by the Spaniſh Account given by one of the principal Actors.

Dunkirk inveſted by the French and Engliſh.

2. The Expectation of being Maſters of Oſtend loſt the French ſeveral Advantages in the Beginning of the Year, for which no Reaſon did then appear; but this being over, in the ſame Month they inveſted Dunkirk, aſſiſted by ſix thouſand brave Engliſhmen, under the Inſpection of Cromwell's Ambaſſador Lockhart, but more immediately under the Command of Major-General Morgan, who ſeems to have left us the beſt and fulleſt Account of this Siege, &c. It ſeems that Don Juan was ſo far deluded with falſe Intelligence that the French deſign'd to inveſt Cambray, that Dunkirk was very ill provided either of Men, Ammunition, or of Victuals; of which the Marqueſs de Leda, the brave Governor, was ſo ſenſible, that he intimated, That he had nothing to do but to loſe his Life honourably. The French, under Marſhal Turenne, carry'd on the Approaches on the Side of Newport, and Major-General Morgan, with his Engliſh and a Brigade of French Horſe, on that next Mardyke; and theſe latter had two Miles to march every Day upon relieving their Approaches. In this manner they proceeded for the Space of twelve Nights, when they receiv'd Intelligence that Don Juan with the Prince of Conde, the Prince de Ligny, and the Dukes of York and Gloceſter, were at the Head of thirty thouſand effective Men to relieve the Place.

Several Conſultations.

Upon this Intelligence, Marſhal Turenne, with ſeveral Perſons of Quality, repair'd to the French King and Cardinal, then at Mardyke, and deſir'd his Majeſty and his Eminence to withdraw their Perſons, and leave their Orders. The King anſwer'd, That he knew no better Place of Safety than at the Head of his Army; but at laſt was perſuaded to retire to Calais with the Cardinal, leaving all Proceedings to be determin'd by a Council of War. The firſt Council was held without either Ambaſſador Lockhart, or Major-General Morgan; and the Senſe of it was, ‘ That it was great Danger to the Crown of France, to hazard a Battel in that ſtreight Country, full of Canals and Ditches of Water, and that they ought to raiſe the Siege, if the Enemy came on.’ In the next Council, when the two Engliſh Commanders were call'd, Morgan vehemently oppos'd the former Reſolution, and anſwer'd their ſeveral Reaſons for it; and particularly alledg'd, ‘ What a Diſhonour it wou'd be to the Crown of France, to have ſummon'd a Place, and broke Ground before it, and then raiſe the Siege and run away; deſiring the Council of War to conſider, That if they rais'd the Siege, the Alliance with England wou'd be broken the ſame Hour.’ After a little further Diſcourſe, and ſome Inclinations ſhewn in the Marſhal Himſelf, Morgan aroſe from the Board, and moſt earneſtly begg'd a Battel, declaring, That he wou'd venture the ſix thouſand Engliſh, every Soul. Upon which he was deſir'd to retire for a ſhort Space, and being again call'd in, the Marſhal declar'd, ‘ That He and the Council of War had reſolv'd to give Battel to the Enemy if they came on; and to maintain the Siege on Newport Side, and that Major-General Morgan was to joyn with the French Army.’ Whereupon the Major-General with Satisfaction ſaid, That with God's Aſſiſtance, we ſhou'd be able to deal with them.

The Spaniards endeavour to relieve Dunkirk.

The next Day in the Afternoon the Spaniards, by a Bridge of Boats, croſs'd their Army to the Sands of Dunkirk, and drew up in Battalia, within two Miles of the French Lines, before they knew any Thing of them. Upon which Marſhal Turenne ſent immediate Orders to Major-General Morgan to march into his Camp, with the ſix thouſand Engliſh, and the French Brigade of Horſe; which was done accordingly. The next Morning, having clear'd the Avenues, both the French and Engliſh Army march'd out of the Lines towards the Enemy. Morgan ſeeing the Enemy plain in Battalia, ſaid at the Head of his Forces, See yonder are the Gentlemen you have to trade withal! at which Word the whole Body of the Engliſh gave a triumphant Shout, that made a reſounding Echo between the Sea and the grand Canal. Upon which Turenne came up with above a hundred of the Nobility, to know the Meaning and Reaſon of a Thing ſo uncommon. Morgan told him, 'Twas an uſual Cuſtom of the Red-Coats, when they ſaw the Enemy, to Rejoice; upon which Turrenne anſwer'd, They were Men of brave Reſolution and Courage. At the ſecond Halt, the whole Engliſh Brigade gave another Shout, and throwing their Caps into the Air, cry'd, They wou'd have better Hats before Night! Being got very near the Enemy, Morgan, who march'd a little before them in the Front, told them They were to face an Enemy who had violated, and endeavour'd to take away their Reputation, and that they had no other Way, but to fight it out to the laſt Man, or be kill'd, taken Priſoners, or drown'd; and the Honour of England depended upon their Gallantry and Reſolution that Day. Upon this they fell on with great Fury upon the Enemies Right-Wing, and ſoon came to that they call'd Club-Law, knocking them down with the But-Ends of their Muſquets, which they perform'd with that Succeſs, that the Six thouſand Engliſh carry'd ten or twelve thouſand Horſe and Foot before them. The reſt of the Spaniſh Army, ſeeing the Right Wing carry'd away, and the Engliſh Colours flying over their Heads, wheel'd about in ſuch a Manner, that the Engliſh had the whole Spaniſh Army before them. Then advancing to the Right, and falling on, the Engliſh carry'd all the Spaniſh Army, as far as from Weſtminſter-Abby to Paul's Church-yard, to uſe Morgan's own Words, before ever the French came in; and then they had no other Employment than to carry Priſoners back to the Camp. At the End of the Purſuit and Victory, Turenne Himſelf, with above a hundred Officers, came up to the Engliſh, quitted their Horſes, and embracing the Officers ſaid, They never ſaw a more glorious Action in their Lives, and that they were ſo tranſported with the Sight of it, that they had not Power to move, or do any Thing.

They are routed by the Engliſh.

The Dukes of York and Gloceſter, in the Spaniſh Army, charg'd ſeveral Times on Horſe-back, and with great Difficulty, and ſome Blows of Muſquets, got ſafe off; not without ſome Satisfaction to ſee the Bravery of their own Country-Men. The Day being loſt with a greater Rout and Confuſion than Loſs of Men, Don Juan retired with the beſt Part of his Army to Ipres and Furnes, and the Duke of York to Newport, that he might defend the reſt when Dunkirk ſhou'd be taken. This laſt was the preſent Buſineſs of Marſhal Turenne, who found de Leda the brave Governour reſolv'd to defend it, notwithſtanding the defeat of the Army; and therefore he betook himſelf again to that Work, as ſoon as the Spaniſh Army was retired. The Governour, when he ſaw there was no Relief to be had from Don Juan, now reſolv'd to try what he cou'd do for Himſelf; and ſo with as ſtrong a Party as he cou'd make, he made a deſperate Sally upon the Beſiegers; who, tho' he diſorder'd them, were ſo well ſeconded, that they drove him back into the Town with great Loſs, after Himſelf had receiv'd a Wound, of which he dy'd within three Days. And then the Officers ſent to treat with the French, to which he wou'd never conſent while he liv'd; and ſo that important Place was ſurrender'd upon good Articles, on the 25th Day of June.

Dunkirk ſurrender'd to the Engliſh.

And here we muſt not forget a Relation made by an Ingenious modern Writer, which ſhews both the Perfidiouſneſs of the French Court, and the Policy and Power of Cromwell. When the French and Engliſh Army were ſat down before Dunkirk, Cromwell ſent one Morning for the French Ambaſſador to White-Hall, and publickly upbraided him ‘ for his Maſter's deſign'd Breach of Promiſe, in giving Secret Orders to the French General to keep Poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, in Caſe it was taken, contrary to the expreſs Treaty between them.’ The Ambaſſador very truly proteſted he knew nothing of the Matter, and begg'd leave to aſſure him, That there was no ſuch Thing thought of. Upon which Cromwell, pulling a Paper out of his Pocket, ſaid, Here is a Copy of the Cardinal's Order: And I deſire you immediately to diſpatch an Expreſs, to let him know, That I am not to be impos'd upon; and that if he deliver not up the Keys of the Town of Dunkirk to Lockart within an Hour after it is taken, I'll come in Perſon and demand them at the Gates of Paris. There were but four Perſons ſaid to be privy to this Order, the Queen Mother, the Cardinal, Marſhal Turenne, and the Secretary. The Cardinal for a long Time blam'd the Queen, as if ſhe had indiſcreetly diſcover'd it to ſome of her Women; whereas it was found after the Secretary's Death, That he had for ſeveral Years kept a ſecret Correſpondence with Cromwell; and therefore it was not to be doubted but he had ſent him the foremention'd Copy. The Meſſage had its Effect; and Dunkirk was accordingly put into the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Forces. And to palliate the Matter, the Duke of Crequy was diſpatch'd from Calais into England Ambaſſador Extraordinary, to compliment the Protector, attended with a ſplendid Train of Perſons of Quality; among whom was a Prince of the Blood, and Mancini, Nephew to the Cardinal, who brought a Letter from his Uncle, full of the higheſt Expreſſions of Reſpect; and aſſuring his Highneſs, That being in the View of the Engliſh Shore, nothing but the King's Illneſs in the Small-Pox cou'd have hinder'd him to come over to England, that he might enjoy the Honour of waiting upon one of the Greateſt Men that ever was; and whom, next to his Maſter, his greateſt Ambition was to ſerve. But being depriv'd of ſo great a Happineſs, he had ſent the Perſon who was neareſt to him in Blood, to aſſure him of the profound Veneration he had for his Perſon, and how much he was re- ſolv'd, to the utmoſt of his Power, to cultivate a perpetual Amity and Friendſhip between his Maſter and Him. Soon after the taking of Dunkirk, the French, by the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, took Winoxberg, and ſoon after Furnes, next Menin, after that Oudenard, and then Ipres, and in ſhort eight ſtrong Towns beſides Dunkirk; which much contributed to the Glory of the Engliſh Soldiery, and the Grandeur of Cromwell.

He declines in Body and Mind.

3. But Cromwell's Greatneſs now drew near to a Period, and his Happineſs and Pleaſure daily and ſenſibly declin'd; and his Body began to be ſeiz'd with Infirmities, and his Mind much more with melancholy Apprehenſions. Beſides the general Fears and Anxieties that uſually perplex the Thoughts of Tyrants, he was particularly afflicted with the Death of his old Friend and Ally the Earl of Warwick, with whom he had held a ſure Amity; tho' there was little Reſemblance either in their Humours or Natures. And the Heir of that Houſe, who had marry'd his youngeſt Daughter, dy'd about the ſame Time; ſo that all his Relation, or Confidence he had in that Family was now at an End, ſince the other Branches of it abhorr'd his Alliance. His Domeſtick Comforts and Delights were leſſen'd every Day; and he plainly diſcover'd that his Son Faulconbridge's Heart was ſet upon an Intereſt deſtructive to his, and began to hate him perfectly. But what chiefly broke the Peace of his Mind, was the Death of his Daughter Cleypole, who had always been his greateſt Joy and Delight, and who in her Sickneſs, which was an inward tormenting Impoſthume in her Loins, had ſeveral Diſcourſes with him, which exceedingly perplex'd him. Tho' none was near enough to hear the Particulars, yet by her frequent mentioning, in her Agonies, the Blood her Father had ſpilt, particularly that of Dr. Hewet, People concluded, that ſhe had preſented his worſt Actions to his Conſideration: And tho' he never ſhew'd the leaſt Remorſe for any of thoſe Actions, it is certain, that either her Diſcourſes, or her Death, did wonderfully affect him both in Body and Mind.

He falls ſick at Hampton-Court.

Whatever it was, about the Middle of Auguſt, he was taken with a ſlow Fever, which at length degenerated into a kind of a Tertian Ague; and for about a Week the Diſeaſe continu'd under ſeveral Appearances, with Symptoms ſo favourable, that every alternate Day he walk'd abroad in the Gardens at Hampton-Court. But one Day after Dinner, his five Phyſicians coming to wait upon him, one of them feeling his Pulſe, ſaid That it intermitted; at which being ſuddenly ſtartled, he look'd pale and fell into a cold Sweat, and being ready to faint order'd Himſelf to be carry'd to Bed; where being refreſh'd with Cordials, he made his Will, relating only to his private and Domeſtick Affairs. The next Morning, when one of his Phyſicians came to viſit him, he ask'd the Phyſician, Why he look'd ſo ſad? and when he anſwer'd, That it became any One, who had the weighty Care of his Life and Health upon Him; Ye Phyſicians, ſaid he, think I ſhall die; but I tell you I ſhall not die this Bout; I am ſure on't! And obſerving him to look more attentively upon him at theſe Words, he added, Don't think I am mad; I ſpeak the Words of Truth, upon ſurer Grounds than your Galen and Hippocrates: God Almighty Himſelf hath given that Anſwer, not only to my Prayers, but alſo to the Prayers of thoſe who hold a ſtricter Commerce, and greater Intimacy with Him. But being order'd to take his Reſt, becauſe he had not ſlept the greateſt Part of the Night, as the Phyſician was going out of the Chamber, he accidentally met with another of his particular Acquaintance, to whom he ſaid, I am afraid our Patient will be light-headed. The Other reply'd, You are certainly a Stranger in this Houſe: Don't you know what was done laſt Night? The Chaplains and all who are Dear to God, diſpers'd in ſeveral Parts of the Palace, have pray'd to God for his Health, and all have brought this Anſwer, HE SHALL RECOVER. Nay, to that Degree of Enthuſiaſm they arriv'd, that a publick Faſt being for his Sake kept at Hampton-Court, they did not ſo much pray to God for his Health, as they thank'd Him for the undoubted Pledges of his Recovery. But ſtill he kept up his Spirits, ſometimes with Broths and Jellies, and other Times with large Draughts of Wine; and he ſeldom awak'd in the Night, but with one or other of theſe he muſt be repleniſh'd; which ſeem'd more comfortable to him than the Reflecting upon all his Succeſſes.

He removes to White-Hall.

His Death.

His Fits growing ſtronger, and his Spirits weaker, he remov'd from Hampton-Court to White-Hall; where appearing to be delirious, the Phyſicians began to think him in real Danger. Yet ſtill his flattering Chaplains and Friends gave themſelves and Him Aſſurance of his Recovery; and ſo far that Dr. Thomas Goodwin, in his ſawcy Expoſtulations with God in Prayer, ſaid, That they ask'd not for his Life; for they were aſſured, He had too great Things for this Man to do, to remove him yet; but they pray'd for his Speedy Recovery, becauſe his Life and Preſence were ſo neceſſary to divers Things then of great Moment to be diſpatcht. All the Time he manifeſted ſo little Remorſe of Conſcience for all his Actions, that ſome of his laſt Words were rather becoming a Mediator, than a Sinner; recommending to God the Condition of the Nation he had ſo infamouſly deluded, and expreſſing a great Care of the People he had ſo manifeſtly contemn'd. But ſtill he was not altogether without Reflection, and ſeem'd above all concern'd for the Reproaches, he ſaid, Men wou'd caſt upon his Name, in trampling on his Aſhes when Dead. Nor did he ſeem to be totally without Religious Apprehenſions, and one great Enquiry he had to make was, as we are told from Dr. Goodwin, Whether a Man cou'd fall from Grace? a Queſtion very common in thoſe Times. And when the Doctor anſwer'd in the Negative, according to the prevailing Notion, he reply'd, Then I am ſafe; for I am ſure I was ONCE in a State of Grace. He grew more and more drowſy and diſturb'd in his Head, and ſeem'd to have been often thinking of the Independent Miniſters, that were aſſembled at the Savoy to ſet forth their Articles of Faith; for he ſometimes cry'd out, They muſt be ſatisfy'd, they muſt be ſatisfy'd, or elſe we ſhall all run into Blood again! Sir Philip Warwick was aſſur'd by one of his Phyſicians, that during this Sickneſs, he was never Maſter of ſo much Reaſon, as to determine any Thing of his Succeſſor, or Matters of State; and tho' it was pretended by Thurloe the Secretary, and Goodwin the Miniſter, that he gave particular Directions to them, that his Son Richard ſhou'd be his Succeſſor, and they brought in others afterward to teſtify the ſame; yet this Phyſician declar'd, He never was in ſuch a Condition, as diſtinctly to know what he did; nor cou'd they, with all their Care, find the Will that he had made. In this Condition he expired at Three in the Afternoon, on Friday the third Day of September, according to the Prediction of Colonel Lindſey; a Day he thought always very propitious to him, and on which he had twice triumph'd for two of his greateſt Victories, at Dunbar and Worceſter. The News of his Death being brought to thoſe who were met together to pray for him, Mr. Peter Sterry ſtood up and deſired them not to be troubled: For, ſaid he, this is good News; becauſe if he was of great Uſe to the People of God when he was among us, now he will be much more ſo, being aſcended to Heaven at the Right-Hand of Jeſus Chriſt, there to intercede for us, and to be mindful of us on all Occaſions.

His Body.

Thus dy'd the mighty Oliver Cromwell, aged fifty nine Years, and a little above four Months; a Perſon, who, after he had run through ſo many Difficulties and Dangers, eſcap'd ſo many Plots and Conſpiracies, and committed ſo many infernal and flagrant Crimes, yielded up his laſt Breath in his Bed. But as if all the Elements, as well as Mankind, had waited for this important Day, it was uſher'd in with the moſt prodigious Storm of Wind that ever had been known, which overthrew great Numbers of Trees and Houſes, made dreadful Wrecks at Sea; and the Tempeſt was ſo Univerſal, that the Effects of it were very terrible in France, the Netherlands, and Foreign Countries, where all People trembled at it; for beſides the the Wrecks all along the Sea Coſts, many Boats were caſt away in the very Rivers. Beſides, there ſeem'd ſomething preternatural as to the very Body of this brave wicked Man; for notwithſtanding it was artificially Embowell'd and Embalm'd with Aromatick Odours, wrapt alſo in a Six-Fold Cerecloath, and put in a Sheet of Lead, with a ſtrong Wooden Coffin over it; yet in a ſhort Time it fermented after ſuch an unheard-of Manner, that it burſt all in Pieces, and became ſo inſufferably noyſom, that they were immediately neceſſitated to commit it to the Earth, and afterwards to celebrate his famous Funeral with an empty Coffin. His Government, from the Diſſolution of the Long Parliament, continu'd five Years, four Months, and fourteen Days; but the Time he enjoy'd the particular Title of Protector was no more than four Years, eight Months, and eighteen Days.

As to his perſonal Character and Behaviour, and the Variety of his good and bad Deeds, we have already taken notice of them in ſeveral Places of this Hiſtory; yet ſomething more general may be added by Way of Recapitulation and Concluſion. His publick Character is all over wonderful and amazing; where ſome Things were ſo ſhining and glaring, and others ſo black and diſmal, that ſo vaſt a Mixture can hardly be found in any one Perſon in the World. To reduce Three Kingdoms to an abſolute Obedience, which perfectly hated him; to awe and govern thoſe Nations by an Army that was indevoted to him, and wiſh'd his Ruin, was an Inſtance of a mighty Genius, and a prodigious Addreſs; and had his Life been ſully'd only by thoſe Crimes which are uſual, and almoſt neceſſary in Uſurpers, it cou'd not but have dazled thoſe, who are not ſo nice in trying Matters by the Weights of the Sanctuary. He attempted thoſe Things on which none but the wickedeſt Men wou'd have ventur'd, and atchiev'd

Thoſe

His Memory.

Thoſe in which none but the greateſt Men cou'd have ſucceeded. To take Notice then of his Memory, both in the bright and dark Side of it, according to the Method of one who has made an excellent Diſcourſe concerning his Government; Nothing can be more wonderful, than that a Perſon of mean Birth, no Fortune, nor no Qualities then conſpicuouſly eminent, ſhou'd have the Courage to attempt, and the Fortune to ſucceed in a Deſign ſo improbable, as the Deſtruction of one of the moſt ancient and beſt founded Monarchies upon Earth: That he ſhou'd have the Power or Courage, to cut off the King his Maſter, againſt the Senſe of three Kingdoms; and to baniſh that numerous and cloſe ally'd Family: To do all this under the Name and Ways of a Parliament; to trample upon Them too as he pleas'd, and to ſend them ſhamefully home when he grew weary of them: To raiſe up a New and unheard-of Fantom out of their Aſhes; to ſtifle that in the very Infancy, and ſet up Himſelf above all Things that ever were call'd Sovereign in England: To ſubdue all his Enemies by Arms, and then all his Friends by Artifice; and to ſerve all Parties patiently for a while, and to command them victoriouſly at laſt: To over-run each Corner of the three Nations, and with equal Facility overcome both the Riches of the South, and the Poverty of the North: To be fear'd and courted by all Foreign Princes, and adopted a Brother to the Gods of the Earth: To call Parliaments together with a Word of his Pen, and diſperſe them again with the Breath of his Mouth: To be humbly petition'd that he would be pleas'd to be hired at the Rate of two Millions a Year, to be Maſter of thoſe who before had hired him to be their Servant: To have the Eſtates and Lives of three Kingdoms as much at his Diſpoſal, as was the little Inheritance of his Father, and to be as noble and liberal in the ſpending of them; and laſtly to bequeath all this with one Word to his Poſterity: To die with Peace at home, and Triumph abroad; to be buried among Kings with more than Regal Solemnity; and to leave a Name behind him, not to be extinguiſh'd but with the whole World, which was thought too little for his Praiſes, as well as his Conqueſts, if the ſhort Line of his Life cou'd have been ſtretch'd to the Extent of his Immortal Deſigns.

On the other Side, Nothing can be more villainous and ſhocking, than for a Perſon, thus qualify'd, to reſolve not only to exalt himſelf above, but to trample upon all his Equals and Betters: That he ſhou'd have the Aſſurance to pretend Liberty for all Men, and by the Help of that Pretence to make all Men his Slaves: To take up Arms againſt Taxes of two Hundred Thouſand Pounds a Year, and to raiſe them Himſelf to above Two Millions: To quarrel for the Loſs of three or four Ears, and ſtrike off three or four Hundred Heads: To fight againſt an imaginary Suſpicion of two Thouſand Guards, to be rais'd for the King, and to keep up no leſs than forty Thouſand for Himſelf: To undertake the Reformation of Religion, to rob it to the very Skin, and then expoſe it naked to the Rage of all Sects and Hereſies: To fight againſt the King under a Commiſſion for him; to take him forcibly out of the Hands of thoſe for whom he had conquer'd him; to draw him into his Net with Proteſtations and Vows of Fidelity, and then to butcher him, with as little Shame, as Conſcience or Humanity, in the open Face of the World: To pretend the Defence of Parliaments, and violently to diſſolve all, even thoſe of his own calling, and almoſt chuſing: To fight againſt Monarchy, when he declar'd for it; and to declare againſt it, when he contriv'd for it in his own Perſon: Perfidiouſly to debaſe, and ingratefully to ſupplant his own General firſt, and afterwards moſt of thoſe Officers, who with the Loſs of their Honour, and Hazard of their Souls, had mounted him to the Top of his unreaſonable Ambitions: Equally to break his Faith with all Enemies, and all Friends; and to weep, cant and diſſemble, and no more regard the moſt ſolemn Perjuries, than the looſer Sort did cuſtomary Oaths: To uſurp three Kingdoms without any Shadow of the leaſt Pretenſions, and to govern them by Councils of Rapine, Courts of Murder, &c. To ſeek to entail this Uſurpation on his Poſterity, and with it an endleſs War upon the Nation: And laſtly, by the ſevereſt Vengeance of Heaven, to die impenitent, hardned, and raving mad, with the Curſes of the preſent, and the Deteſtation of future Ages. To all which may be added, that he broke the Ballance of Europe by aſſiſting the French, and weakning the Spaniard; and whereas he found the Common-Wealth, as it was then call'd, in a ready Stock of eight Hundred Thouſand Pounds, he left the Common-Wealth, as he ſtill was pleas'd to call it, about two Millions and a Half in Debt, and the Navy of England in a ſinking deplorable Condition.

We ſhall conclude this Period with the Deaths of ſeveral Perſons who, by ſome Means or other, render'd themſelves conſiderable in the World; and ſhall begin with a particular Friend to Cromwell, Mr. Francis Rouſe, a reverend old Gentleman of ſome Parts, but of no great Underſtanding, of whom Mention has been made, as Speaker of the Little Parliament: He was Provoſt of Eaton, and one of Cromwell's Lords; and having been a thorough-pac'd Puritan, a profeſs'd Enemy to the Church of England, a Member in all Parliaments, and one of the Aſſembly of Divines, he had a deep Hand in all the Turns, and all the Calamities of the Nation. Next we ſhall mention Dr. John Harris, the Greek Profeſſor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and afterwards Warden of Wincheſter-College; one who had been ſo admirable a Grecian, and ſo celebrated a Preacher, when in the Univerſity, that the famous Sir Henry Savile us'd frequently to ſay, That he was Second to St. Chryſoſtome: He was one of the Aſſembly of Divines; and by complying with the Times, he held his Wardenſhip to his dying Day. Mr. Robert Waring, of Chriſt Church in Oxford, for a while Hiſtory-Profeſſor in that Univerſity, was a great Wit, an excellent Latin and Greek Poet, and ſtill more celebrated for his Oratory; who being driven from his Places, by the Iniquity of the Times, was forc'd to bury his excellent Parts in the Solitudes of a Country Life. Next we muſt take Notice of that great Wit and Poet, Mr. John Cleaveland, a Perſon educated in Chriſt-College, and then of St. John's-College in Cambridge, where he was nine Years the Delight and Ornament of that Houſe, being highly admired for his exquiſite Oratory, and facetious Poetry. He was much reſpected by the late King, for whom he was the firſt Poetick Champion, whoſe Turning Wit and Satyrick Verſes preſs'd ſo hard upon the Presbyterian Party, that he became a great Sufferer for his Loyalty; yet he gain'd ſo far upon Cromwell, that he met with both Liberty and Encouragement, and dy'd in Peace in Gray's-Inn. Laſtly we ſhall mention Colonel Richard Lovelace, a noted Soldier and Scholar, a Poet and Muſician, whoſe Perſon was charmingly beautiful, his Speech incomparably graceful, and his Dreſs and Carriage genteel to a Miracle, ſo that he attracted the Love and Admiration of the greateſt Perſons of both Sexes: Joining with the late King, he met with innumerable Misfortunes, beſides the Loſs of a fine Eſtate, and being reduc'd to Poverty, ragged Cloaths, and wretched Lodgings, he dy'd in a melancholy Condition, in the 40th Year of his Age.

CHAP. III.

The VARIOUS GOVERNMENT of England:

From the Death, and Concluſion of the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, to the Happy Reſtoration of King Charles the Second.

Containing the Space of one Year, and almoſt nine Months.

I. 1. BY the Extinction of the laſt glaring Meteor, and the Events that ſo ſoon ſucceeded it, we may learn that the Felicity, which is not grounded upon Reaſon and Virtue, is moſt commonly of ſhort Duration; and ſoon after its Diſappearance, as if Heaven had poured out Shame upon the Engliſh Nation, there aroſe ſuch a Spirit of Giddineſs and Irreſolution, with ſuch various Models of Government, as can hardly be parallell'd, in ſo ſhort a Time, by any other Country in the World. Tho' the Tyrant's Memory was dear to ſeveral particular Perſons, and exercis'd the Wits of ſome of the moſt ingenious Men in the Nation; yet his Death was generally acceptable both at Home and Abroad, being every where fear'd and hated. The Royal Party had moſt Reaſon to be forward in their Joys; for amidſt the diſtracted Intereſts ariſing from the Succeſs of the great Rebellion, nothing cou'd have more hinder'd the Return of a lawful Prince, than ſuch a ſingle Uſurper ſetting up himſelf, and re-eſtabliſhing Monarcy without the King: And they had Reaſon to hope, that this great Obſtructor being now remov'd, he cou'd not leave a Succeſſor of equal Genius with Himſelf, but the Feuds and Diviſions muſt only be compos'd by the Reſtoration of the Legal Government. The real Republicans were, if poſſible, ſtill more joyful; for they look'd upon him as a Traytor to the People of England; and if their Power had ſerv'd, wou'd have brought him to the ſame Puniſhment to which he had ſo villainouſly brought his Maſter: Even Desborough his Brother-in-Law, and Fleetwood his Son-in-Law were in Confederacy with Pickering and Sydenham, and others of his Privy-Council, to bring back a beloved Common-Wealth.

Oliver's Death generally acceptable.

And

And even all the Parties in Religion thought his Death wou'd bring Advantage to their ſeveral Cauſes; ſince he properly eſpous'd none, and kept all under Subjection. The Foreign States and Kingdoms all likewiſe rejoyc'd as in a common Deliverance. The Dutch had loſt much Glory to him at Sea, and had found him more imperious in his Terms and Treaties than any Engliſh Monarch. The Portugueſe had been fill'd with Indignation againſt him, for having ſolemnly caus'd their Ambaſſador's Brother to be executed at London, notwithſtanding his Plea of being a Publick Miniſter. The Spaniards above all Nations were diſpos'd to curſe his Memory, becauſe of their hard and dreadful Suffering by his Arms at Sea and Land: And even the French Court, who by his Aſſiſtance laid the Foundation of their ſucceeding Greatneſs, envy'd him as a Friend, and ſuſpected he wou'd prove their Enemy: And it was ſaid that Mazarine wou'd change Countenance whenever he heard him nam'd; ſo that it paſs'd into a Proverb in France, That the Cardinal was not ſo much affraid of the Devil, as he was of Oliver Cromwell: And upon the News of his Death, he congratulated the Queen-Mother, telling her Majeſty, That the grand Enemy of Her, and her Family, was happily remov'd, and that the Reſtoration of the King her Son was now at hand.

The Army Officers repair to Richard.

Various were the Expectations of the World concerning his Succeſſor, and his eldeſt Son Richard durſt not be proclaim'd Protector, till his Uncle Desborough and his Brother Fleetwood were conſulted, to know whether they wou'd acquieſce; becauſe a former Paper under the late Protector's Hand was known to have been ſign'd, which appointed Fleetwood to ſucceed him. Several Perſons declaring that he had actually nominated his Son, and theſe two joyning in the Matter, the Council and Officers of the Army immediately repaired to Richard, to a Chamber, where he attended their coming; to whom Preſident Laurence made a Speech, acquainting him, ‘How deeply the Council was affected with Grief for the Death of his Father; and that they cou'd not but very much condole with him for ſo great a Loſs; but withal they came to acquaint him, That his late Highneſs having in his Life Time, according to the firſt Article of The humble Petition and Advice, declared and appointed him to ſucceed in the Government of theſe Nations: The Council had thereupon taken the Matter into Conſideration, and caus'd an Inſtrument to be drawn up, whereby he was to be proclaim'd Protector of the three Nations of England, Scotland and Ireland, and that the ſaid Proclamation was to be made publick the next Morning at nine of the Clock, &c.’ To this Richard, the intended Monarch, return'd Anſwer, ‘That he had a very deep Senſe, as well of his own Sorrow for the Loſs of his Father, as of the Faithfulneſs of the Council, and of the City of London and Officers of the Army, towards his deceaſed Father and Himſelf, upon the preſent Occaſion: That he was likewiſe ſenſible of the Weight of the Government, now by God's Providence thruſt upon his Shoulders; which he cou'd by no better Means hope to ſuſtain, than by Theirs and the good People of the Nation's Prayers, whoſe Peace and Proſperity he wou'd endeavour to maintain to the utmoſt of his Power.

They proclaim him Protector, &c.

The Council being thus diſmiſs'd, according to the Reſolutions with which they had acquainted him, they caus'd him the next Morning to be proclaim'd Protector, in theſe notable Words: ‘Whereas it hath pleaſed the moſt wiſe God, in his Providence, to take out of this World the moſt Serene and Renowned Oliver, late Lord Protector of this Common-Wealth: And his Highneſs having in his Life Time, according to the Humble Petition and Advice, declar'd and appointed the moſt Noble and Illuſtrious the Lord Richard, eldeſt Son of his ſaid late Highneſs, to ſucceed him in the Government of theſe Nations; We therefore of the Privy-Council, together with the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, the Officers of the Army, and Numbers of other principal Gentlemen, do now hereby with one full Voice and Conſent of Tongue and Heart, publiſh and declare the ſaid Noble and Illuſtrious Lord Richard to be rightful Protector of the Common-Wealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging: To whom we do acknowledge all Fidelity, and conſtant Obedience, according to Law, and the ſaid Humble Petition and Advice, with all hearty and humble Affections, beſeeching the Lord, by whom Princes rule, to bleſs him with long Life, and theſe Nations with Peace and Happineſs under his Government.’ This Proclamation was ſign'd by the Lord-Mayor of London, the Preſident of the Council, Fiennes, Liſle, Fleetwood, Desborough, Montague, Pickering, Wolſeley, Skippon, Sydenham, Jones, Fauconbridge, Whaley, Goff, Pride, Thurloe, and ſeveral others; which being publiſh'd in ſeveral Parts of the City, in the Afternoon the Lord-Mayor preſented the new Protector with the Sword, which he preſently return'd; and after ſome further Ceremonies, Fiennes, one of the Commiſſioners of the Great-Seal, adminiſter'd an Oath to him in theſe Words: I do, in the Preſence, and by the Name of God Almighty, promiſe and ſwear, That to the utmoſt of my Power, I will uphold and maintain the Reformed Proteſtant Chriſtian Religion in the Purity thereof, as it is contain'd in the Holy Scripture of the Old and New Teſtament, and encourage the Profeſſion and Profeſſors of the ſame. And that I will endeavour, as chief Magiſtrate of theſe Nations, the Maintenance and Preſervation of the Peace and Safety of the juſt Rights and Privileges of the People thereof. And that in all Things I will govern the People of theſe Nations according to Law. So that Richard ſtepp'd into his Father's Seat without the leaſt Noiſe or Confuſion; and the Storm that was ſo much expected, was ſuddenly huſh'd into a general Calm.

His Oath.

In order to this Settlement, the Maſter of the Ceremonies acquainted all Foreign Miniſters with the Death of the late Protector, and the Succeſſion of his Son Richard; which ſoon brought over many new Ambaſſadors and Envoys from the Neighbouring Princes and States, all admitted with full Ceremony to a ſolemn Audience given by his Protectorial Highneſs, to condole the Death of his Father, and to congratulate his Succeſſion to the Government. At the ſame Time infinite Addreſſes came up from all Parts; Firſt from the Soldiery in England, Scotland and Ireland; next from all the Independent Congregational Aſſemblies; Thirdly, from the moſt eminent of the London Miniſters, as alſo from the French, Dutch and Italian Churches; and Laſtly from moſt of the Counties, Cities and Corporations in England; ‘Teſtifying their Joy and Satisfaction, with ſolemn Promiſes and Reſolutions of adhering to his Highneſs, with their Lives and Fortunes, againſt all his Enemies and Oppoſers. In theſe he was celebrated for the Excellence of his Wiſdom, the Nobleneſs of his Mind, and in ſome for the Lovely Compoſition of his Body: His Wife, Father-in-Law, and Relations did not want their Compliments; and the more to oblige Him, his Father Oliver was ſtil'd and compared to Moſes, Zerubbabel, Joſhua, Gideon, Elijah; to the Chariots and Horſemen of Iſrael; to David, Solomon, and Hezekiah, and to Conſtantine the Great; and to whomſoever elſe that either the Sacred Scripture, or any other Hiſtory, had celebrated for their Piety and Goodneſs. He was lamented as the Father of his Country, the Reſtorer of pleaſant Paths to dwell in, of whom we were not worthy,’ and what not? Every one ſtriving to exceed each other in this extravagant Vanity; in which the Independent Churches were thought moſt guilty, and particularly their Metropolitans, or chief Miniſters, Goodwin and Nye.

Addreſſes made to him.

His Character.

That this general Exultation of the People and Armies was ſo great upon this new Succeſſion, muſt be imputed more to the common Senſe of Deliverance from one Tyrant, than to their Hopes or Expectations from this other Protector, who was rais'd to this Government without any Reſpect or good Opinion in the Minds of the People, or the Soldiers. For he had been neither a Military Man, nor a States-Man; rather a plain Country Gentleman, bred to Privacy and Rural Sports, and willing to ſerve his Neighbours, and even the Cavaliers, by that little Intereſt he had in his Father's Court; and being a ſort of a boon Companion, he is ſaid to have often drunk the King's Health, under the Name of his Father's Landlord. His own Father ſeem'd to have leaſt Affection, and the loweſt Opinion of this Son, among all his other Children: He never truſted him in any Command, nor employ'd him in any true or conſiderable Buſineſs: He made him indeed Chancellor of Oxford, and put him at the Top of the Other Houſe in Parliament; but this was rather thought for the Honour of his Family, than for the Love of his Son. He never let him into Secrets of Policy, nor Arts of War; and therefore it ſeems plain, he never deſign'd him for his Succeſſor, becauſe he ſcarce made any Step towards training him up to it. As to Religion, he was no great Bigot nor Hypocrite, and is thought to have had very little Concern about it, eſpecially if we may believe Ludlow; who gives us an Account of a certain inferior Officer, who having publickly murmur'd at the Advancement of ſome, who had been Cavaliers, to Commands in the Army, was for that carry'd to White-Hall to anſwer for Himſelf. Here Richard, beſides other reproachful Language, ask'd him in a deriding Manner, Whether he wou'd have him prefer none but thoſe that were Godly? Then, turning to an Officer, ſaid, Here is Dick Ingoldsby, who can neither Pray nor Preach, and yet I will truſt him before ye all. Thoſe imprudent, as well as irreligious Words, ſays the Author, ſo clearly diſcovering the Frame and Temper of his Mind, were ſoon publiſh'd in the Army, and City of London, to his great Prejudice, and ſhortned the Time of his Government.

The manner of Oliver's lying in State.

2. One of the greateſt Acts of the new Government, was to order the Funeral of the late Protector; and the Council having reſolv'd that it ſhou'd be very magnificent, the Care of it was referred to a particular Committee, who ſending for Mr. Kinnerſly, Maſter of the Wardrobe, deſir'd him to find out ſome Precedent by which they might govern themſelves in this important Affair. After Examination of his Books and Papers, Mr. Kinnerſly, who was ſuſpected to be inclin'd to Popery, recommended to them the Solemnities us'd upon the like Occaſion for Philip the Second King of Spain, who for about two Months had been repreſented to be in Purgatory. The vaſt Expence and Pomp of it, with the Concourſe of People that it occaſion'd, made the moſt conſpicuous Part of this ſhort liv'd Government; and being ſo diſtinguiſhable, ought to be a little particulariz'd. The Corps being ſuddenly bury'd by reaſon of the uncommon Stench, on the 26th of September a Coffin was in the Night carry'd in a Mourning Herſe from Whitehall to Somerſet-Houſe; where in a ſhort Time his Effigies was with mighty State and Magnificence expos'd to the View of infinite Multitudes that daily thronged to that Place. Four large Apartments were hung with Black, illuminated with Wax Tapers, and adorn'd with rich Scutcheons, &c. of which the fourth was compleatly cover'd with Velvet, where the lively Effigies lay under a noble Canopy upon a Bed of State, apparell'd in the moſt magnificent Robes, lac'd with Gold, and furr'd with Ermins, with a Sceptre in one Hand, and a Globe in the other, and a rich Cap on the Head ſuitable to the Robes: Behind was plac'd a Chair and Cuſhion of Tiſſu'd Gold, in which lay an imperial Crown, beſet with Diamonds and other precious Stones: The Bed of State was inclos'd with Rails and Ballaſters, and, beſides ſolemn Mourners, ſurrounded with Banners, Banrols, and all kinds of Trophies of Military Honours. The Effigies having for ſome Weeks been ſeen in this Poſture, on the firſt of November was remov'd into the great Hall, where with new Ornaments and Ceremony it was plac'd, ſtanding with the Imperal Crown upon the Head. Here four or five Hundred Luminaries were ſo plac'd upon ſhining Candleſticks round near the Roof of the Hall, that the Light they gave ſeem'd like the Rays of the Sun; by all which the Protector was repreſented to be now in a State of Glory.

The Solemnity of his Funeral.

Having continu'd thus to the 23d of November, the Waxen Effigies, with the Crown on his Head, Globe and Sceptre in his Hands, was plac'd in a ſtately open Chariot, cover'd with black Velvet, and drawn with ſix Horſes cover'd in the like manner, and adorn'd with Plumes and other Ornaments. The Streets from Somerſet-Houſe to Weſtminſter-Abby were guarded by Soldiers in new Mourning Habits, with their Enſigns wrapt in Cypreſs; through which the Chariot was attended by all the Servants and Officers of the Houſhold, the chief Officers both of the Army and the Navy, the Maſters of Chancery, the Counſellors and Judges at Law, the Commiſſioners of the Great-Seal, the Members of the Privy-Council, the Members of the late Upper-Houſe, and the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, beſides ſeveral Foreign Miniſters and Ambaſſadors, as thoſe of France, Portugal and Holland, all in deep Mourning. Theſe all mov'd in a ſolemn and pompous Proceſſion, each Diviſion or Company being diſtinguiſh'd by Drums, Trumpets, Banners and led Horſes; particularly the Horſe of State, cover'd with black Velvet, and laſtly the Horſe of Honour trapp'd with Embroidery upon Crimſon Velvet, adorn'd with white, red and yellow Plumes, and led by the Maſter of the Horſe; with other Ceremonies us'd at the Obſequies of the greateſt Perſons of the World. At the Weſt End of the Abby Church, the Effigies being taken out of the Chariot, was carry'd through the Church under a Canopy of State up to the Eaſt End, where it was plac'd in a ſumptuous Catapalco or Mauſoleum fram'd for that Purpoſe, with Pilaſters and other Ornaments of Architecture, carv'd, painted and gilt, to remain for a certain Time exhibited to publick View. The whole Funeral amounted to a vaſt Expence, ſome ſay to Thirty, and others to Sixty Thouſand Pounds, which Mony was never half paid; and the Spectators were innumerable, who came from the fartheſt Parts of Scotland, Cornwall and Wales, to behold this wonderful Piece of Pageantry, which was obſerv'd to repreſent the Life of Him for whom it was made, namely, much Noiſe, much Tumult, much Expence, much Magnificence, and much Vain-Glory. The Remainders of all which vaniſh'd and diſappear'd within leſs than two Years, when the Monumental Pile was broken down, and the Body carry'd to a Place more proper for its Interrment.

Conteſts between the Swede and Dane.

England joins with the former.

3. The Funeral Rites thus ſolemniz'd, the Preparations for which had much retarded both Domeſtick and Foreign Proceedings, immediately other Matters of publick Concernment began to be taken into Conſideration by the new Protector and his Council. The firſt Thing was the ſending a Naval Supply to the King of Sweden, between whom and the old Protector had been contracted a firm and inviolable Amity; and Forces had been ſent out of England to that King's Aſſiſtance, both for Land and Sea-Service; for the latter of which he had now more than ordinary Occaſion: For after he had by his great Succeſs againſt the King of Denmark forc'd him to yield a conſiderable Part of his Territories, and at length withdraw his Army; the King of Denmark judging the Conditions too hard on his Side, and alledging an imperfect Obſervation of them by the Swede, began preſently to fly to Arms; being particularly incourag'd by Promiſes from the Hollanders, and ſome of the German Princes. This being known to the King of Sweden, he immediately drew together his Forces, and by a ſtrange and adventurous March with his whole Army over that Part of the Baltick Sea, call'd the Sound, laid Siege to Copenhagen it ſelf, before the King of Denmark had any certain Advice of his Motion; yet the City was ſo well fortify'd and provided, that it was able to endure a long Siege. And now the Sovereignty of the Baltick being thus diſputed between theſe two Kings, the Dutch thought it no ſmall Advantage to them, that the Sound ſhou'd continue in the Power of the Dane their conſtant Ally; and therefore made all poſſible Haſte to ſet out a Fleet for the Relief and Supply of Copenhagen. On the other Side, the Engliſh, or the Government then ruling in England, thought it of no leſs Importance to help the Swede, tho' it were againſt the Dane and the Dutch; and therefore Sir George Aiſcough was firſt ſent with a Squadron of Men of War; but by reaſon of the Coldneſs of the Seaſon, both his Ships were endamaged by the Ice, and many of his Men dy'd through the Extremity of the Weather, ſo that he was forc'd to return without Action. But in the Spring a more powerful Fleet was mann'd out under Admiral Montague; but they continu'd in thoſe Parts without much Performance, till ſuch Time as the Power that ſent them out was diſſolv'd; the Swede, in the mean Time, being with great Loſs compell'd to raiſe the Siege and depart home.

A Synod of Independents.

But to return to England, and conclude the old Year; there had been a Convention or Synod of the Independent Miniſters reſolv'd upon, and call'd by the late Protector in his Life-Time, to make out a Declaration and Confeſſion of their Faith, and to make a Kind of a Canon or Syſtem of their Tenets and Doctrine; he of all Religions outwardly moſt favouring Theirs. This Aſſembly were ſitting and debating at the Savoy at the Time of Oliver's Death, and gave him ſome Diſtraction to hear of their Diſputes and Quarrels; but Richard alone had the Honour to have his Reign ſignaliz'd with a Diſcovery of what Independency was, and its real Conſiſtency, which the World never heard of fully before this Time. For in the latter End of this Year they publiſh'd A Declaration of the Faith and Order owned and practiſed in the CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES in England, agreed upon and conſented unto by their Elders and Meſſengers in their Meeting at the Savoy, &c. But it was now too late to paſs their Scheme into a National Religion: For the new Protector, not being Heir to his Father's Politicks nor Conſcience, was more inclinable to the Presbyterians, by whom he began to be ſervilely courted, and particularly by the eminent Mr. Baxter.

The Republicans plot againſt Richard.

4. In the mean Time the Republicans began to plot and undermine, and by Degrees to attempt the Ruin of the preſent Protector: And in order to it they repair'd to Fleetwood's Houſe, upon Pretext of Duty, and of joining together in Prayers after their accuſtom'd Manner; where at firſt they glanc'd at Things at a Diſtance, and undertook to reconcile Lambert, and other diſbanded Officers, to Desborough, and thoſe that ſtill were in Office in the Army. Next they diſcours'd of the Charge of Protector, 'as if by Right it belong'd to Fleetwood, and by Oliver's 'laſt Will, while he was Compos Mentis, deſign'd for him; 'but that Richard was in a ſurreptitious Manner, and by 'the Craft of ſome of the Council, ſubſtituted, when his 'Father had loſt his Senſes; that it concern'd them to be 'govern'd by a pious and expert Leader, ſuch as had been 'try'd in many Difficulties.' So the Fire-brand of Contention being once thrown in amongſt them, they us'd all Methods to blow it up, and by the Help of freſh Fewel to throw it into a Flame. The Relations being by this Means put at Variance, and mutually incens'd againſt each other, the private Soldiers were wrought upon to join with them; and that they might not loſe their Labour for their Sakes, they deſir'd that the Soldiers might have their full Pay, which in latter Times had been ſomewhat abridg'd. The next Thing debated was the Government of the Army: Oliver having ruled by an Arbitrary Power, turn'd out Officers and Soldiers at his Pleaſure, and put others in their Places; ' no Man ought now to take ſo much upon Himſelf, nor enjoy ſo unlimited a Prerogative.' Therefore the Soldiers form'd a Petition, wherein they deſired, ' That for the future no Soldier ſhou'd be turn'd out of his Place without a Council of War, nor that any Action be brought againſt a Soldier but according to Martial Law; that no Soldier be brought to Tryal for Murder, Theft, Sacrilege or Robbery, but in a Court-Martial, and that the Soldiers have the Power of chuſing their own General.' Theſe Things were argu'd verbally before the Protector, and afterwards appear'd in publick Writings and Declarations.

Preparations for a* PARLIAMENT.

When Richard perceiv'd that the Council of State and Government were toſs'd with theſe Storms, he thought it ſafeſt to betake himſelf to a Parliament, and try what Aids he cou'd find in theſe Difficulties. In order to this Meeting theſe three Queſtions were debated. ' Firſt, Whether the Elections ſhou'd be made by the Counties, Cities and chief Towns, according to the Diſtribution agreed on by the Long Parliament, and practis'd by the late Protector: Or Whether they ſhou'd be made by the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, according to the ancient Law of the Land? It was determin'd for the latter Way; which broke the Meaſures of the Court, and ſet the People upon Hopes of a Free Parliament, and gave many of the Common-wealth's Men an Opportunity to be elected in private Boroughs, who durſt not yet appear in open Counties and Cities. ' Secondly, how the Other Houſe ſhou'd be Summon'd, Whether by a new General Form, or by particular Writs or Summons, as anciently us'd to the Peers?' It was carried for the Latter, under the ſame Pretence of bringing all Things back to the ancient Courſe of Law. But this alſo was a Diſadvantage to the new Government; for upon the Meeting of the Houſes, they cou'd not agree upon the Forms of Meeting, and the Commons wou'd not treat with thoſe new Nobles, without ſaving the Rights of ancient Peerage. ' The Third Queſtion was concerning the Thirty Members to ſerve for Scotland, and the Thirty for Ireland, Whether, or how they ſhou'd be choſen? There having been as yet no Diſtribution of Powers to elect, as it was order'd there ſhou'd be in the Humble Petition and Advice.' It was at laſt concluded, That Members ſhou'd be choſen for Scotland and Ireland, as had been practis'd in the Time of the late Protector, with this Proviſo, ' That they ſhou'd not be admitted to ſit, till the Conſent of thoſe Choſen for England was firſt obtain'd.' And this laid a new Foundation for a fierce Contention in the Houſe about admitting or rejecting the Scotch and Iriſh Members. So that notwithſtanding the Care of the Government to chuſe proper Members, the Way of projecting and modelling this Parliament made the Conſtitution of it to be Strife and Diviſion.

Richard's Speech to the Houſes.

On the 27th Day of January, Richard met his Parliament with the ſame State that the Kings of England and his Father had done before Him. The Commons being ſent for by the Uſher of the Black-Rod to attend him in the Other Houſe, the new Protector made a formal Speech to the whole Aſſembly; in the former Part of which ' he repreſented the Happineſs of his Father's Government, and how he had left theſe Nations in great Honour abroad, and in full Peace at Home, all England, Scotland and Ireland dwelling ſafely, every Man under his Vine, and under his Fig-Tree, from Dan unto Beerſheba. After which he let them know, that he believ'd a Parliament was never ſummon'd upon ſo important Occaſion as this; and ſo recommended to them the Care of the Fleets and Armies, the Proſecution of the War with Spain, and the Aſſiſtance of the King of Sweden, the Reformation of Manners, the Proteſtant Religion, &c.' This Speech was ſeconded by the Lord-Commiſſioner Fiennes, who began with this Expreſſion, moſt ſervilely apply'd, ' What can a Man ſay after the King? and after having enumerated the deceaſed Protector's great Endeavours for the Peace and Good of the Nation, and his Highneſs's happy following of his Steps, he recommended to them more effectually the Wars abroad, and the Probabilities of Domeſtick Diſturbances, deſiring their Proviſion to maintain the one, and Care to prevent the other.' Mr. Challoner Chute was choſen Speaker of the Commons, who was ſo much indiſpos'd with the Heats and Tumults of the Houſe, that in a little Time Sir Lillibone Long was choſen to ſupply his Place, in which he ſoon after dy'd, and Mr. Bamfield was appointed Speaker pro tempore; when Mr. Chute dy'd, and Bamfield was voted to keep his Poſſeſſion: A fatal Parliament, that kill'd two Speakers before it diſpatch'd any Buſineſs.

A particular Oath was required of any ſitting Member, ' not to act or contrive any Thing againſt the Lord Protector;' but ſome of the old Republicans, as Ludlow in particular, found Intereſt enough to ſit and vote without it. The only two Parties were, thoſe for the preſent Government, or a Protector, and thoſe for the Common-wealth; for all that were ſuſpected to be Royaliſts, on which Side ſoever they voted, were expell'd the Houſe by the Complaint and Clamours of the contrary Side.

Diviſions among the Commons.

As ſoon as they enter'd upon Buſineſs, the Republican Spirit began to appear and operate, tho' with more Warineſs than formerly. They firſt fell upon calling to an Account thoſe who had been entruſted with the Cuſtoms, Exciſe, Taxes, and other Revenues, and to conſider of the preſent State of the Revenue, and ſome Way to pay the Arrears of the Army and Navy. But when they were call'd upon to ſettle the principal Matter, the Act of Recognition, to confirm Richard, and his Authority in the State, they reſolv'd firſt to debate ſome previous Queſtions ' concerning their own Authority, and how far the Government was already ſetled, and what Part of it was fit to be aſſign'd to the Other Houſe; which they wou'd by no means allow to be Part of the Government already Eſtabliſh'd, which they had promis'd not to alter.' Upon this Argument they exercis'd themſelves with great Freedom, as well upon the Creator of thoſe Peers, and the Power of the late Protector, as upon his Creatures the Peers; of whoſe Dignity they were no Ways tender, but treated them according to their former real, not preſent appearing Quality. They particularly inſiſted, ' how grievous it had been to the Kingdom, that the Biſhops had ſate in the Houſe of Peers, becauſe they were look'd upon as ſo many Votes for the King; which was a Reaſon much ſtronger againſt theſe Perſons, who were all the Work of the Protector's own Hand, and conſequently cou'd not but be entirely devoted to his Intereſt. Therefore they cou'd not, without the Guilt of Perjury, ever conſent that the Other Houſe ſhou'd have any Part in the Government, ſince they had all taken the Engagement, that there ſhou'd be no more any Houſe of Peers, and ſince the Office of Protector had been, and might ſtill continue without it.' When the Republicans found they cou'd not carry the Point, they propos'd ſome nice Mediums; but they were told, That a Feather might hinder the Motion of a Clock, as well as a Piece of Iron, and ſo it was Voted by the Court Party, ' That they wou'd meet and confer with the Other Houſe, as Part of the Parliament; and likewiſe ſuch other Perſons, as had a Right to come to that Houſe, if they had been faithful to the Parliament, ſhould not be reſtrained.

As to the Act of Recognition, when that was under Debate, Sir Henry Vane and his Common-wealth Party oppos'd the Thing, or Manner of it with great Vehemence, urging, ' That the Protector's Right ought to be more directly founded on the Conſent of the People; and therefore the Word Recognizing ought at leaſt to be alter'd into that of Agnizing, to make his Authority ſtand upon the true Foundation.' And yet the Protector's Party did at laſt carry their Queſtion; but by ſo ſmall a Majority, that the other Party ſoon grew upon them, till the Officers and Army form'd themſelves into a Third Party, and ſwallow'd up both the other. They likewiſe carry'd it, ' That the Members choſen for Scotland and Ireland ſhou'd be continu'd to ſit amongſt them,' who were ſo many Aſſertors of the Protector's Intereſt. Yet in Favour of the Common-wealths-Men ſome Conceſſions were made, as the releaſing of Major-General Overton out of Priſon in the Iſle of Jerſey: Nor were they wanting in ſome Favours to the Royal Party; for the Duke of Buckingham, who had long been impriſon'd in Windſor Caſtle, was, by the Interceſſion and Security given by his Father-in-law the Lord Fairfax, ſet at Liberty. And Major-General Brown, who had been diſabled by the Long Parliament in 1649, from bearing Offices in the City, or ſitting in the Houſe, was by them reſtored to the Privileges and Advantages of both.

Diſcoveries about the Revenues.

As to the Publick Accounts, the Committee of Inſpection of the Martial and Civil Liſts reported ' the yearly Incomes of the three Nations for that Purpoſe, to be a little above eighteen hundred and ſixty eight thouſand Pounds; and the Iſſues to be no leſs than two Millions and two hundred thouſand Pounds. By which they ſaw, that above three hundred and thirty two thouſand Pounds incurr'd yearly upon them, by the ill Management of a vaſt Revenue, which was treble to what any King of England had ever then enjoy'd;' and farther diſcover'd, ' That to maintain the Conqueſt of Scotland, they were at the yearly Charge of above a hundred and ſixty three thouſand Pounds more than the Revenue of that Kingdom did then yield to the Publick.' Many other Particulars were under their Conſideration, which came to no Effect; but in general they did ſome Good, and very little Hurt to the Nation; and they are particularly obſerv'd, not to have given any Offices or Gratuities to themſelves out of the Publick Treaſure, nor to have granted any Mony from the People. But at the ſame Time they were miſerably divided in the Houſe between the preſent Governing Party, and the old Common-wealth's Men.

Diviſions in the Army.

5. Theſe Diviſions were not confin'd within the Walls of the Houſe, but broke out in the Army it ſelf; the Officers in all Places diſcovering their Jealouſies of each other. They were divided into three Parties, and neither of them much ſuperior to the other in Number. One Party was known to be really affected to a Common-wealth, and conſiſted chiefly of theſe following Officers, Colonel Aſhfield, Colonel Lilburn, Colonel Ludlow, Colonel Fitz, Lieutenant-Colonel Maſon, Lieutenant-Colonel Moſs, Lieutenant-Colonel Farly, Major Creed, with divers Captains and other inferior Officers. A ſecond Party was known by the Title of the Wallingford-Houſe, or Army-Party, who had advanc'd Richard Cromwell in Expectation of governing all as they pleas'd, and now kept their ſeparate Meetings at Wallingford Houſe, the Dwelling of Fleetwood: Of theſe were Lieutenant-General Fleetwood himſelf, Colonel Desborough, Colonel Sydenham, Colonel Clerk, Colonel Kelſey, Colonel Berry, Major Haines, Treaſurer Blackwell, and ſome others. The third Party was that of the preſent Protector, who having caſt off thoſe who had taken the Pains to advance him, join'd himſelf to others that were more ſuitable to his Occaſions and Inclinations; ſuch were Colonel Ingoldsby, Colonel Gough, Colonel Whalley, Colonel Howard, Colonel Goodrick, Lieutenant-Colonel Keins, with many others, and more particularly thoſe that were Officers in the Scots and Iriſh Forces. But his Cabinet-Council, according to Ludlow, was the Lord Broghil, Colonel Philip Jones, and Dr. Wilkins, who had marry'd his Aunt, and was this Year made Maſter of Trinity College in the Univerſity of Cambridge.

The Wallingford-Houſe Party being very induſtrious, and having drawn over ſeveral of the Republican Commoners, Vane, Ludlow, Haſlerigg and others; they at firſt kept fair with the Protector, and upon the Tumults in the two Houſes, they ſeduc'd him into an Opinion of the Neceſſity of calling a General Council of Officers, in order to preſent ſomething to the Parliament for the Regulation and Maintenance of the Army. He not ſuſpecting a Deſign that was plauſibly colour'd over, conſented to the Propoſition; and having iſſu'd out an Order for that Purpoſe, this Military General-Council met, and quickly aſſum'd ſo much Power to themſelves, that on the ſixth Day of April they preſented a Remonſtrance or Repreſentation to the Protector; in which they complain'd, ‘ That the ‘ Army by Reaſon of their great Arrears was reduc'd to ‘ very great Streights: That they who had born the brunt ‘ of the War were now undervalu'd, derided, and like to ‘ be laid aſide: That the Good Old Cauſe was ill ſpoken ‘ of, and traduc'd by Malignants and diſaffected Perſons; ‘ who daily grew more inſolent, and their Numbers en‘creas'd by the Reſort out of Flanders, and other Places: ‘ That Liſts of the Names of the late King's Judges were ‘ lately printed in Red Letters, and ſcatter'd about, as if ‘ they were mark'd out for Deſtruction: That Suits were ‘ commenc'd at Common-Law againſt honeſt Men, for ‘ what they had tranſacted in the War as Soldiers: That ‘ thoſe famous Acts perform'd by the Long Parliament, ‘ and by the late Protector, were cenſur'd, and vilify'd.’ By all which they ſaid, ‘ It was manifeſt, that the Good Old ‘ Cauſe was declin'd, which they were reſolv'd to aſſert; ‘ and therefore beſought his Highneſs to repreſent thoſe ‘ their Complaints to the Parliament, and to require pro‘per and ſpeedy Remedies.’ Lambert, tho' now no Member of the Army, was deeply concern'd in this Repreſentation; which was no ſooner known, than Titchburn and Ireton, two Aldermen of London, and principal Commanders of that Militia, drew up likewiſe a Remonſtrance, and ſent it to the General-Council of Officers; in which they declar'd, ‘their Reſolutions with the Army to ‘ adhere to the Good Old Cauſe, and that they were reſolv'd ‘ to accompany them in whatſoever they ſhou'd do for the ‘ Nation's Good.

Their Remonſtrance,

And that of the City.

The Parliament oppoſe both.

The Parliament had before this ſome Suſpicion of the private Cabals of the Army; but upon theſe Repreſentations, both Richard and they were much allarm'd; and the better to ſuppreſs theſe formidable Deſigns, they voted, ‘ That there ſhou'd be no Meeting, or General Council of ‘ Officers, without the Protector's Conſent, and by his ‘ Order: And that no Perſon ſhou'd have any Command ‘ by Sea or Land in any of the three Nations, who ſhou'd ‘ refuſe to ſubſcribe that he wou'd not diſturb the Free ‘ Meetings of Parliament, or of any Members of either ‘ Houſe of Parliament, or ſhou'd obſtruct their Freedom ‘ in Debates and Counſels.’ Theſe Votes were ſent to the Protector, and by him immediately ſent to Wallingford-Houſe, where the Council of Officers then ſate. Then to ſweeten the Common Soldiers, leſt they ſhou'd join with their Officers in turning them out of Doors, as they had formerly done, they added a promiſory Vote, ‘ That they ‘ wou'd preſently take into Conſideration, how to ſatisfy ‘ the Arrears of the Army with preſent Pay; and likewiſe ‘ to prepare an Act of Indemnity for them.

1659. Car. 11.

The Officers were now ſenſible that they were gone much too far, if they went no farther; and therefore they no ſooner receiv'd theſe Votes, but they ſent Fleetwood and Desborough to the Protector, to adviſe him forthwith to diſſolve the Parliament. Upon the Account of their great Obligations to his Father, and their near Alliance to himſelf, he had as much Reaſon to rely upon the Affection of theſe two, as any Men in the Nation. Fleetwood inſiſted upon Conſcience, alledging, That if the Parliament were not immediately diſſolv'd, the Nation wou'd certainly be involv'd in Blood. Desborough, a Perſon of a rough and rude Temper, treated him only with threatning Arguments, and told him, It was impoſſible for him to keep both the Parliament, and the Army, his Friends; wiſhing him to chuſe which he wou'd prefer: If he diſſolv'd the Parliament out of Hand, he had the Army at his Devotion; if he refus'd that, he believ'd the Army wou'd quickly pull him out of Whitehall. The poor Man had not Spirit enough to diſcern what was beſt for him; and yet he was not without Friends to adviſe him, if he had been capable of receiving Advice. Beſides many Members of Parliament, of Courage and Intereſt, had aſſur'd him, That the Parliament wou'd continue firm to him, and deſtroy the Ringleaders of this ſeditious Crew, if he wou'd adhere to them; but if he diſſolv'd it, he wou'd be left without a Friend, and be contemn'd by thoſe who had prevail'd with him to do it; ſome Officers of the Army likewiſe, of no ſmall Courage and Power, perſuaded him to reject the Deſire of thoſe who call'd themſelves The General Council of the Army, and to puniſh their Preſumption. Ingoldsby, Whalley, Gough and Howard, offer'd to ſtand by him; and the latter urg'd him to exert himſelf by ſome vigorous Action, like thoſe which ſupported his Father's Authority to the laſt. You are Cromwell's Son, ſaid he, ſhew your ſelf worthy of that Name: This Buſineſs requires a bold Stroke, ſupported by a good Head; do not ſuffer your ſelf to be daunted, and my Head ſhall anſwer for the Conſequence. Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough and Vane, are the Contrivers of this; I will rid you of them, do but ſtand by me, and ſecond my Zeal with your Name. Richard anſwer'd with Coolneſs and Conſternation, That he did not love Blood.

Richard under great Diffiulties.

Thus fluctuating for a Time, and vainly expecting the Aſſiſtance of the City, he at length comply'd with Desborough and his Companions to ſign a Commiſſion, which they had got prepar'd, to Fiennes the Keeper of the Great-Seal, to diſſolve the Parliament the next Morning. The Commons having Notice of this, ſhut the Door of their Houſe againſt the Uſher of the Black Rod, who was ſent twice by Fiennes to command them up; and ſome were ſo couragious, particularly Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, as to move, ‘ That the Houſe ſhou'd declare it High-Treaſon for any ‘ Perſon whatſoever, to put Force upon any Members of ‘ the Houſe; and that all Votes, Acts, and Reſolutions, ‘ paſs'd by any Members of Parliament, when the reſt were ‘ detain'd from, or taken out of the Houſe by Force, ‘ ſhou'd be null and void.’ And finding Themſelves ſo unanimous in their Reſolves, they adjourn'd Themſelves for three Days, till the twenty fifth of April, imagining that they ſhou'd by that Time convert the Protector from deſtroying Himſelf. But the poor Creature found Himſelf under innumerable Difficulties, and terrify'd on every Side, with the Dangers that attended his Perſon. It was particularly repreſented to him, ‘ That he had ſtill a ſafe Re‘fuge under the Mercy of the King, if he wou'd endeavour ‘ to expiate his Father's Crimes; that it was the Part of a ‘ King to keep his Word; that the Lord Petcombe, the ‘ Daniſh Reſident, had promis'd to ſend over to the Sound, ‘ that a Meſſenger might be more ſecurely ſent to Admiral ‘ Montague to acquaint him with theſe Affairs; and that ‘ he wou'd likewiſe give Security on the King's Part for ‘ Performance of Articles: That this was very practica‘ble, ſince the Fleet was yet free from Contagion, and ‘ the Admiral ready to ſerve the King: That beſides Portſ‘mouth and other ſtrong Places, moſt Part of the People ‘ would be ready to joyn in the Confederacy; and laſtly ‘ all Ireland was yet ſubject to his Government.’ Being ſolicited by theſe and the like Arguments, he was toſs'd between Hope and Fear, having miſs'd or abus'd the Occaſion of effecting his Buſineſs, ſometimes preferring the Advice of ſome, and then again of others, and ſometimes ready to fly for Safety; till at length being advis'd, That it was ſafer to enjoy certain Privileges, than dangerouſly to make Tryal of new Experiments, he ſubmitted to ſecond his former Action by a Proclamation, declaring, ‘ The Par‘liament to be diſſolv'd.

He is perſuaded to diſſolve the Parliament.

1659. Car. II.

Which puts an End to his Government.

From this Moment no Body reſorted to Richard, nor was the Name of the Protector afterwards heard of but in Deriſion; the Council of Officers appointing Guards to attend at Weſtminſter, which kept out thoſe Members, who according to their Adjournment wou'd have enter'd the Houſe upon the appointed Day. Thus, after a Reign of ſeven Months, and about twenty Days, the Son by his extream Weakneſs ſuffer'd himſelf to be ſtripp'd in a Moment of all the Power and Greatneſs, which the Father had acquir'd in ſo many Years, with the moſt villainous Courage, and perfidious Bravery; and this without a ſingle Blow given, or a drop of Blood ſpilt. And it was more viſibly the Hand of Heaven, ſince this mighty Fall was effected chiefly by thoſe very Perſons, and Relations, that Oliver had advanc'd to the higheſt Places of Truſt, and by whom he had rais'd Himſelf to that high Pitch of Grandeur. Here, by the Submiſſion of Richard, and Henry ſoon after, ended the Majeſty and Glory of the Cromwell Family, which had made its own, and all neighbouring Nations, to tremble.

A particular Story of him.

And here by way of Concluſion, it may not be improper to relate a pleaſant Story out of the Lord Clarendon, concerning this miſerable Richard, that happen'd afterwards. Shortly after the King's happy Reſtoration, this deſpiſed Man found it neceſſary to tranſport Himſelf into France, more for Fear of his Debts than of the King, who thought it unneceſſary to enqnire after a Perſon ſo long forgotten. After he had remain'd ſome Years in Paris unobſerv'd, and indeed unknown, living in Obſcurity and Diſguiſe, without owning his Name, and with but one Servant to attend him, upon the firſt Rumour of a War like to break out between England and France, he thought it proper to quit that Kingdom, and to remove to ſome Place of Neutrality, and particularly Geneva. Making his Way thither by Bourdeaux, and through the Province of Languedoc, he paſs'd through Pezenas, a Town belonging to the Prince of Conti, then Governor of Languedoc, who reſided there in a fair Palace of his own. Here making ſome Stay, he accidentally met with an old Acquaintance of his Father's, and his Party; and both were ſufficiently pleas'd thus to find themſelves together. His Friend told him, That all Strangers who came to that Town, us'd to wait upon the Prince of Conti, the Governor of the Province; who expected it, and always treated Strangers, and particularly the Engliſh, with great Civility: That he need not be known, but that He Himſelf wou'd go to the Prince and inform Him, That another Engliſh Gentleman was paſſing through that Town towards Italy, who wou'd be glad to have the Honour to kiſs his Hands. The Prince receiv'd him with great Civility, according to his natural Cuſtom; and, after a few Words, began to diſcourſe of the Affairs of England, and ask'd many Queſtions concerning the King, and whether all Men were quiet, and obediently ſubmitted to him; which the other anſwer'd briefly, and according to the Truth. Well, ſaid the Prince, that OLIVER, tho' he was a Traytor and a Villain, was a brave Man, had great Parts, great Courage, and was worthy to Command; but that RICHARD, that Coxcomb and Poltron, was ſurely the baſeſt Fellow alive: What is become of that Fool? How was it poſſible he cou'd be ſuch a Sot? He anſwer'd, That he was betray'd by thoſe he moſt truſted, and who had been moſt oblig'd by his Father; ſo being weary of his Viſit, ſoon took his Leave, and the next Morning left the Town, for fear the Prince might know that he was the very Fool and Coxcomb he had ſo freely mention'd. And within two Days the Prince came to know who it was that he had treated ſo juſtly, and whom before, by his Behaviour, he had ſuſpected not well affected to the King's Reſtoration.

An Inter-Regnum of twelve Days.

II. 1. Upon the Diſſolution of the late Parliament, and conſequently Richard's Government, there was a kind of an Inter-Regnum, or Anarchy, for about twelve Days. It was thought a wonderful Tranſition in Government, that in a Moment a Monarchy ſhou'd be chang'd into Nothing, and all Men were now amaz'd, and ſtood gazing and expecting ſtrange Things to happen upon ſo great and ſudden an Alteration. The moſt viſible Power lay in thoſe that had deſtroy'd the laſt, the Council of Officers at Wallingford-Houſe, whoſe Numbers daily encreas'd from Whitehall; yet it was generally concluded, that they cou'd not wholly keep the Power in their own Hands, but muſt neceſſarily ſet up ſome Face of a Civil Government. They began firſt with modelling their own Family, which they did by caſhiering of Whalley, Gough, and Ingoldsby, with ſome others of the Protectorian Faction; and likewiſe by taking in Lambert, Haſlerigg, Okey, and ſome few others who had been laid aſide by Oliver. Then conſidering with themſelves that tho' they muſt chiefly govern by a Military Power, yet the Name and Shadow of a Parliament would moſt effectually captivate the People; foraſmuch therefore as the Members of that Parliament, then ſo excluded, cou'd not properly be readmitted, but with great Hazard to the Soldiers Intereſt, they procur'd private Conferences with ſome Members of the Old Long Parliament, formerly turn'd out by Oliver in 1653, as Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Colonel Ludlow, Major Saloway, &c. To theſe they made ſome Propoſals, and particularly, 'That the Government of the Nation might be by a Repreſentative of the People, and by a Select Senate; beſides Acts of Indemnity, with Proviſion made for Richard Cromwell, and the like.

After ſome Conſultations, they agreed to reſtore the Long Parliament; and accordingly many of them, both Members and Officers, repair'd to the Houſe of William Lenthall, the old Speaker of that Parliament. Upon acquainting him with their Deſign, the poor Man, fearing to loſe his late acquired Peerage, made many Excuſes, alledging his Age and Infirmities, and his Spiritual Concerns; but more eſpecially he choaked them with a Point of Law, namely, That notwithſtanding the Act of Continuance, the Death of the late King had legally put an End to the Parliament. When they found they cou'd not prevail with him at this Time, the Council of Officers, on the 6th of May, iſſu'd out a Declaration in theſe Words:

A Declaration of the Council of Officers.

'The Publick Concernment of this Common-wealth, being, through a Viciſſitude of Dangers, Deliverances, and Back-ſlidings of many, brought into that State and Poſture, whereon they now ſtand; and our ſelves alſo contributing thereto, by wandring divers Ways from Righteous and Equal Paths. And altho' there have been many Eſſays to obviate the Dangers, and to ſettle theſe Nations in Peace and Proſperity, yet all have prov'd ineffectual; the only wiſe God in the Courſe of his Providence diſappointing all Endeavours therein. And alſo, obſerving to our great Grief, that the Good Spirit, which formerly appear'd amongſt Us, in the carrying on of this Great Work, did daily decline, ſo as the GOOD OLD CAUSE it ſelf became a Reproach; we have been led to look back, and examine the Cauſe of the Lord's withdrawing his Wonted Preſence from Us, and where we turn'd out of the Way, that through Mercy we might return, and give Him the Glory. And, amongſt other Things calling to Mind, That the Long Parliament, conſiſting of the Members who continu'd their ſitting until the 20th of April 1653, were eminent Aſſerters of the CAUSE, and had a Special Preſence of God with them, and were ſignally bleſſed in that Work, we judge it our Duty to invite the aforeſaid Members to return to the Exerciſe and Diſcharge of their Truſt, as before the ſaid 20th of April 1653. And therefore we do hereby moſt earneſtly deſire the Parliament, conſiſting of thoſe Members, who continued to ſit from the Year 1648, until the 20th of April 1653, to return to the Exerciſe and Diſcharge of their Truſt: And we ſhall be ready in our Places, to yield them, as becomes us, our utmoſt Aſſurance to ſit in Safety, for the improving preſent Opportunities, for ſettling and ſecuring the Peace and Freedom of this Common-wealth; praying for the Preſence and Bleſſing of God upon their Endeavours.' This Declaration was ſign'd by General Fleetwood, and by the Council of Officers of the Army.

The LONG PARLIAMENT reſtor'd.

Lenthall finding that the Members, that cou'd be got together, wou'd meet as a Houſe without him, thought fit to repair to them in the Painted-Chamber, where they were aſſembled the next Day, being Saturday the 7th of May. Here finding that of their deſign'd Number of forty two, they wanted a Couple, they ſent to the Jayls for a preſent Supply; where finding the Lord Munſon and Harry Martin, who lay there upon Executions for Debt; and taking Liſle and Whitelock from the Chancery Bench, they advanced into the Houſe with their Speaker and Mace, and with the State and Formality of the PARLIAMENT OF ENGLAND. The Names of theſe Members were Lenthall, Munſon, Martin, Whitelock, Liſle, Fleetwood, Ingoldsby, Chaloner, Atkins, Pennington, Scot, Holland, Vane, Prideaux, Harrington, Ludlow, Oldſworth, Haſlerigg, Jones, Purefoy, White, Nevil, Say, Blagrave, Bennet, Brewſter, Wilde, Goodwin, Lechmore, Skynner, Downs, Saloway, Dove, Corbet, Walton, Millington, Gold, Sydenham, Bingham, Ayre and Smith. Theſe made up that Aſſembly or Juncto, which now more eſpecially obtain'd the Name of the RUMP, or RUMP-PARLIAMENT, with all but Themſelves, and their Friends, which at preſent were not very numerous.

The ſecluded Members ſtrive to enter, but in vain.

When the Members, who had been formerly ſecluded in the Year 1648 heard of this Aſſembly, a ſuperior Number of them met at Weſtminſter-Hall, and conſtituted Mr. Anneſly, Sir George Booth, Mr. Prynne, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Montague, Sir John Evelin, Mr. Evelin, Mr. Knightly, Mr. Gewin, Mr. John Herbert, Mr. Peck, Mr. Hungerford, Mr. Harley and Mr. Clive, fourteen in all, as a Committee, to go up and try whether they cou'd find Admittance to their Places; but coming up, they found ſuch a Reſtraint upon them, that they cou'd ſcarce get into the Lobby; where being arriv'd, they were entirely ſtopp'd by Lieutenant-Colonel Allen, tho' they vehemently diſputed their Right of ſitting in the Houſe, as well as the others. But notwithſtanding this preſent Repulſe, on Monday the 9th of May, Mr. Anneſly, Mr. Hungerford, and Mr. Prynne, underſtanding that the Houſe was then unguarded, came to Weſtminſter, and without Oppoſition enter'd the Houſe; till afterwards Mr. Anneſly and Mr. Hungerford went out to acquaint the other ſecluded Members of their Admittance, who attended their Succeſs in the Hall; when endeavouring with others to enter again, they were forcibly kept back. But the warm Mr. Prynne, who continu'd in the Houſe, began boldly to diſpute the Right of the Privileges of ſitting there, as well as the others; which ſo much diſpleas'd the Aſſembly, that not being able to confute his Reaſons, they were compell'd to adjourn till ſuch Time as they cou'd keep him out by Force, when yet he reſolutely attempted to enter, but in vain. And the Parliament, for ſo we muſt call it, for fear of being put again to anſwer the Juſtneſs of their ſitting by Law or Reaſon, voted, ' That all Perſons heretofore Members of ' that Parliament, which had not ſate in the Houſe ſince ' the Year 1648, nor had ſubſcrib'd to the Engagement, in ' the Roll of that Houſe, ſhou'd not ſit there, till farther ' Order from the Parliament.' Thus after ſix Years Obſcurity, that Cabal only was ſuffer'd to enter, which had firſt form'd, and afterwards foſter'd the Common-wealth for above four Years; ſo that the Return of the Government into theſe Mens Hands, ſeem'd to be the moſt diſmal Change that cou'd happen to the King and his Friends.

The Parliament's Declaration.

2. The firſt Thing this Remnant Parliament did, after their Eſtabliſhment, was the paſſing a ſhort Declaration, which was order'd to be publiſh'd in Print; in the Cloſe of which they declare, ' That they are reſolv'd, through the gracious Aſſiſtance of Almighty God, to apply themſelves ' to the faithful Diſcharge of the Truſt repoſed in them; ' and to endeavour the Settlement of the Common-wealth ' upon ſuch a Foundation as may aſſert, eſtabliſh, and ſecure the Properties and Liberties of the People in Reference unto all, both as Men and Chriſtians; and that ' without a ſingle Perſon, Kingſhip, or Houſe of Peers: ' And they will vigorouſly endeavour the carrying on of ' the REFORMATION ſo much deſired, and ſo often declared for; to the End that there may be a Godly ' and Faithful Magiſtracy and Miniſtry upheld and maintain'd in the Nations, to the Glory and Praiſe of the ' Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and to the reviving and making glad ' the Hearts of the Upright in the Land.' To this they ſoon after added a general Vote, which declared, ' That ' all ſuch as were to be employ'd in any Place of Truſt or ' Power in the Common-wealth, ſhou'd be able for the ' Diſcharge of ſuch Truſt; and that they ſhou'd be Perſons ' Fearing God, and who had given Teſtimony to all the ' People of God, of their Faithfulneſs to that Commonwealth, according to the late Declaration.' They likewiſe order'd, ' That all Writs and Proceedings at Law ' ſhou'd run as they did under the Common-wealth, in the ' Name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England.' And leſt the Judges, who were Members of the Houſe, might by their Influence in that Place prevent the intended Reformation of the Law, it was reſolv'd, ' That no Member of ' Parliament ſhou'd be a Judge in any Court.

The Petition of the Army to the Parliament.

But in all their Proceedings, theſe Gentlemen ſeem'd not to have well known, either formerly, or at preſent, that they ow'd their very Being to a Standing Army, which, after all their refined Projects, they knew not how to diſband, or command. And they had not ſate a Week before they were preſented with a particular Paper call'd The Humble Petition and Addreſs of the Officers of the Army, to the Parliament of the Common-wealth of England; in which they deſire, or rather preſcribe, ' 1. The Government of a Free-State or Common-wealth, without ' a Single Perſon, Kingſhip, or Houſe of Peers. 2. A ' juſt and due Regulation of Law, and Courts of Juſtice ' and Equity. 3. An Act of Oblivion for all that had ' been acted ſince the 19th of April 1653. 4. A Confirmation of all Laws and Ordinances made ſince the ' foreſaid 19th of April. 5. A Diſcharge of all Publick ' Debts contracted ſince the foreſaid Time. 6. A Liberty ' of Conſcience, but not extending to Popery or Prelacy. ' 7. A godly, painful and Goſpel-Preaching Miniſtry to ' be countenanc'd and maintain'd. 8. The Univerſities ' to be reform'd. 9. All Perſons adhering to the late King, ' or to Charles Stuart his Son, to be remov'd from all ' Places of Truſt. 10. That thoſe intruſted be eminent ' for Godlineſs, &c. 11. To prevent the long ſitting of ' Parliaments, and to provide for a due Succeſſion of ' them. 12. To own and acknowledge the Lord Charles ' Fleetwood to be General of the Land-Forces of this ' Common-wealth. 13. That the Government of the ' Nation may be in a Repreſentative of the People, and ' in a Select Senate Co-ordinate in Power. 14. That ' the executive Power be in a Council of State: And laſtly, to diſcharge all Debts contracted by his late Highneſs, or his Father, ſince the 15th of December 1653. ' To ſettle ten thouſand Pounds per Annum upon Richard Cromwell and his Heirs, and ten thouſand Pounds ' more upon him during Life, and eight thouſand Pounds ' a Year upon his Mother during her Life.

1659 Car. 11.

The Submiſſion of Richard and Henry Cromwell.

This Inſtrument was deliver'd to the Houſe by Lambert himſelf, at the Head of ſeveral Officers, with a particular Speech; for which the Houſe by their Speaker, obſequiouſly and doubly gave them very hearty Thanks; and upon the firſt Debate of the Articles, they ſeem'd to diſagree in none, but in that relating to Richard and his Family; having, as it is believ'd, ſecret Inſtructions from the Army to put ſome Slight and Indignity upon that Cypher of Government. And therefore they appointed a Committee to receive his Submiſſion to their Authority, and to take a State of his Debts, before they wou'd do the leaſt thing for his Advantage. He ſhew'd himſelf full of Compliance and Acquieſcence, and gave in his Submiſſion in Form, with a Schedule of his Debts annex'd, amounting to near thirty thouſand Pounds. What was contracted for his Father's Funeral, in Deſpite to his Memory, they abſolutely rejected, and alſo declin'd the Settlement of any Revenue upon him or his Mother; only they gave him a ſmall Sum to diſcharge part of his private Debts, and required him, and all his Dependents, to remove from Whitehall in ſix Days time. The next Thing they did, was to call home Henry Cromwell from his Government in Ireland, where his Deportment had render'd him very popular, and where he had an Army under good Diſcipline: But finding the Tide to turn ſtrongly, he wou'd not offer to oppoſe it; but with the ſame Meekneſs of Spirit, as his Brother, tamely laid down his Charge. So much did theſe Muſhroom-Princes, in their Ambitions, differ from their Father; and now that Bonefire of Straw, or ſudden Blaze of Oliver's Family was extinguiſh'd, and buried in its own Aſhes: Which if he cou'd have foreſeen, certainly he wou'd not for their Sakes have waded through ſuch Seas of Blood; nor cou'd he have thought Providence ſo much his Friend, as he entitled himſelf to, during the whole Courſe of his Actions.

The Council of State.

3. In the mean time this Parliament took into Conſideration what Powers and Inſtructions were requiſite for their Council of State, and voted their Number to conſiſt of thirty one, whereof twenty one to be of the Parliament, and ten to be of ſuch Perſons as were not Members of the Houſe. Thoſe of the Houſe were Haſlerigg, Vane, Ludlow, Jones, Sydenham, Scot, Saloway, Fleetwood, Harrington, Walton, Nevil, Chaloner, Downs, Whitelock, Morley, Sidney, Thompſon, Dixwell, Reynolds, Saint-John, and Wallop. The other ten were Preſident Bradſhaw, the Lord Fairfax, Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, Sir Horatio Townſend, Sir Robert Honywood, Sir Archibald Johnſton, Mr. Berners, with the three Officers, Lambert, Desborough and Berry. Next they made Preſident Bradſhaw, Serjeant Tyrell, and Serjeant Fountain, Commiſſioners of the Great Seal, which was the ſame that had been us'd by them in 1653. Being thus ſettled, they were ſoon ſtrengthened by the Submiſſion of General Monk in Scotland, who congratulated them in a Letter, but ſtill continu'd in his great Authority and Command. The Navy alſo fairly correſponded with them; nor were there Addreſſes wanting from ſeveral Counties in England, expreſſing their joyful Senſe of the Parliament's Return to the Exerciſe of their Authority. And notwithſtanding the preſent Infancy and Uncertainty of their Power, they were firſt courted by the Holland Ambaſſador, and after that by an extraordinary Ambaſſador from the King of Sweden; upon Audience given to whom, three Perſons were appointed to go as Plenipotentiaries to Copenhagen, to treat of ſuch a Reconciliation between Denmark and Sweden, as might beſt ſtand with the Intereſt of England.

All Perſons ſubmit to the Parliament.

But notwithſtanding this appearing Calm, they were continually under Apprehenſions from the Army, which by their late Addreſs, and other Ways, had given ſufficient Intimations of their Intereſt and Power. Their Deſign was really plauſible, but never long practicable, which was to bring the Military Power under Subjection to the Civil; that is to bring their Makers and Supporters, to be their Subjects and Servants. However the better to unite their Friends in the Army to them, they paſs'd an Act of Indemnity ' to pardon all their former Tranſgreſſions, ' which had been the Cauſe of the Parliament's former ' Diſſolution, and, as they ſaid, of all the Miſchief which ' had follow'd'. This was not thought full enough by ſome of the Officers of the Army, and Lambert particularly complain'd that it left them ſtill at Mercy; and being by Haſlerigg anſwer'd, That they were only at the Mercy of the Parliament, who were their good Friends, he briskly reply'd, I know not why they ſhou'd not be at our Mercy, as well as we at theirs; which ſufficiently allarm'd ſome of their Leaders. Therefore that they might be ſure to be liable to no more Affronts, they reſolv'd no more to make a General, which might again introduce a ſingle Perſon; the Thought of which they heartily abhorr'd: And to make that impoſſible, as they believ'd, they appointed their Speaker 'to execute the Office of General and Admiral, in ſuch 'a Manner as they ſhou'd direct; and that all Commiſ'ſions ſhou'd be granted by him, and ſeal'd with their own 'Great Seal.' And accordingly all the ſeveral Officers both of the Army and the Navy, with ſome Difficulty, deliver'd up their Commiſſions, and took out new ones from the Hands of the chief Commander Lenthall, in the Form that was preſcrib'd. So that now they ſaw not how their Empire cou'd be well ſhaken for the future. And they did one popular Thing, which was moſt likely to preſerve it for a Time, which was a Vote, 'That this 'preſent Parliament ſhou'd not continue longer than the '7th of May, in 1660;' but whether they ever deſign'd to obſerve and make it good, it does not appear.

They new-model the Army.

Their Proceedings againſt the King's Party.

Being now well aſſured of their Authority, they proceeded to order, 'That all ſuch Houſes and Lands of 'the late King, the Queen, the Prince, with the Biſhops, 'Deans and Chapters, that were then unſold, ſhou'd be 'forthwith expos'd to Sale; among which Somerſet-Houſe, without the Chapel, was actually ſold for ten thouſand Pounds. They alſo order'd, 'That ſuch Perſons on 'whom any Title of Honour had been conferr'd by the 'late King, ſhou'd pay thoſe Forfeitures for the ſame, as 'had been by their Acts and Ordinances in that Caſe pro'vided, and ſhou'd bring in the Patents.' They began now to remember how they had been us'd after they had been depos'd, the Reproaches and Contempt they underwent from all Sorts of People; but eſpecially the Scoffs and Deriſion they ſuffer'd from the King's Party, when they ſaw them reduc'd to the ſame Level in Power with themſelves. And tho' the Abuſes from others vex'd and provok'd them as much, yet they were willing to ſuſpend their Revenge againſt them, that they might the more freely exerciſe their Tyranny over the poor broken Cavaliers. Accordingly they made a preſent Order to baniſh all who had ever ſhewn any Affection to the King, or his Father, twenty Miles from London; and reviv'd all thoſe Orders they had formerly made, and which Cromwell had aboliſh'd or forborn to execute; by which many Perſons were committed to Priſon for Offences they thought had been quite forgotten. Theſe ſevere Proceedings were the Foundation of their Overthrow afterwards; and the Conſequence of them awakned thoſe of another Party, to Apprehenſions of what they might be made liable to. The Soldiers were very merry at old Lenthall their new General, and thought it neceſſary he ſhou'd march with them upon the next Enterprize; and the Officers thought they had deſerv'd more than a bare Act of Indemnity, for reſtoring ſuch People to ſuch a Sovereignty. In a Word, as theſe Rulers remember'd how they had been us'd, ſo all other People remember'd how they had us'd them; they cou'd not bring themſelves to ſhew Reverence to thoſe, whom they had derided and contemn'd for above ſix Years together.

Various Projects about Government.

4. Thus theſe Men reign'd with all outward Appearance of Succeſs for near three Months; yet the Inſtability of their Sovereignty daily appear'd in the various Opinions and Diviſions concerning a Form of Government to be ſettled in the Nation. The great Officers of the Army, as was formerly hinted, were for a ſelect Standing Senate to be join'd to the Repreſentative of the People; and this was thought to have been the Project of Sir Henry Vane. Others labour'd to have the Supream Authority to conſiſt of an Aſſembly choſen by the People, and a Council of State choſen by that Aſſembly to be veſted with the Executive Power, and accountable to that which ſhou'd next ſucceed, at which Time the Power of the ſaid Council ſhou'd determine. Some were deſirous to have a Repreſentative of the People conſtantly ſitting, but chang'd by a perpetual Rotation. Others propos'd that there might be join'd to the Popular Aſſembly, a ſelect Number of Men in the Nature of the Lacedemonian Ephori, who ſhou'd have a Negative in Things, in which the Eſſentials of the Government ſhou'd be concern'd, as the Excluſion of a ſingle Perſon, Liberty of Conſcience, Alteration of the Conſtitution, and other Things of the laſt Importance. Some were of Opinion, that it wou'd moſt conduce to the Publick Happineſs, to have two Councils choſen by the People, the One to conſiſt of about three hundred, and to have the Power only of debating and propoſing Laws; the Other to be in Number about a thouſand, and to have the Power finally to reſolve and determine; every Year a third

Part of each Council to go out, and others to be choſen in their Places. In Order to bring about Something, ſome Members of the Council of State propos'd at the Board, 'That the Parliament ſhou'd be mov'd to appoint twenty 'of their own Number, and ten of the Principal Officers 'of the Army, to conſider of a Form of Government to 'be reported to the Parliament; and if they ſhou'd ap'prove it, that then the whole Army ſhou'd be drawn out, 'and declare their Conſent to it.' Which Propoſition, tho' it ſeem'd then to find a general Approbation, did, with all other fine Schemes and Projects, prove abortive.

A general Inſurrection deſigned.

For a new Spirit began to appear in the Nation againſt the preſent Parliament, rais'd not only by the Royaliſts, but by other Male-Contents among the Presbyterians, the Secluded Members of this Parliament, and the diſcarded Protectorians; all joyning, tho' not with equal Intentions or Inclinations, towards the King's Re-eſtabliſhment; to which they were the more encourag'd by the common Diſcourſe of the Soldiers, who declar'd, That if there were any Commotion in the Kingdom, they wou'd go no farther to ſuppreſs it, than Lenthall ſhou'd lead them. It ſoon appeared, that there were very few Counties in England, where there was not a form'd Undertaking by the moſt powerful Men there, to poſſeſs themſelves of ſome conſiderable Place; and all with the King's Privity and Commiſſion: So that this may be ſaid to be the true Dawning of the Reſtoration; which, tho' brought about after a more wonderful and different Manner, may be fairly traced from this Period of Time. The Surpriſal and Poſſeſſing of Lynn, a Town of great Importance in Norfolk, was undertaken by the Lord Willoughby of Parham, with the promiſing Intereſt and Aſſiſtance of Sir Horatio Townſend. The former had been too ſubſervient to the Parliament, and in great Credit with the Presbyterians, and ſo leſs liable to Suſpicion; the latter, a Perſon of worthy Principles and a noble Fortune, had been under Age long after the End of the War, and ſo liable to no Reproach or Jealouſy. The Surpriſal of Gloceſter was undertaken by the famous Governor of it in the late War, Major-General Maſſey; which wou'd have a particular Influence upon Briſtol and Worceſter. The Lord Newport, Littleton, and other Gentlemen of Shropſhire, were ready at the ſame Time to ſecure Shrewsbury; and for the perfecting that Communication, Sir George Booth, lately refus'd Entrance into the Parliament Houſe, one of the beſt Fortunes and Intereſt in Cheſhire, and of abſolute Power with the Presbyterians, promis'd to poſſeſs himſelf of the City and Caſtles of Cheſter. And Sir Thomas Middleton, who had likewiſe ſerv'd the Parliament, and was one of the greateſt Fortune and Intereſt in North-Wales, was ready to joyn with Sir George Booth; and both of them entirely to unite with the King's Party in theſe Counties. In the Weſt, Arundel, Pollard, Trelawny, Greenvil, and the reſt of the King's Friends in Cornwall and Devonſhire, hop'd to poſſeſs Plymouth, but were ſure of Exeter. There were alſo other Undertakings in the North, by Perſons ready to venture the greateſt Hazards; ſo that the Deſign againſt the preſent Government was almoſt Univerſal.

Maſſey's Eſcape.

But all theſe Deſigns were ſeverally defeated by the Activity of thoſe at Weſtminſter on one Side, and ſome notable Acidents on the other; and many Perſons of Honour and Quality were committed to ſeveral Priſons, throughout the Kingdom, before the appointed Day, which was the Firſt of Auguſt. The Day it ſelf was attended with extraordinary unuſual Weather at that Seaſon of the Year: For the Night before there had been exceſſive Rain, which continued all the next Day with ſuch a terrible cold high Wind, that the Winter had ſeldom felt ſo great a Storm: So that the ſeveral diſtant Perſons, who were drawing to their appointed Rendezvous, were much confounded and diſcourag'd, and met with many croſs Accidents: Some miſtook the Place, and went to ſome other Poſt; and others went where they ſhou'd be, but ſoon grew weary of expecting thoſe who ſhou'd have met them there. About the Beginning of the Night, when Maſſey was going for Gloceſter, a Troop of the Army beſet the Houſe where he was, and took him Priſoner; and putting him before one of the Troopers well guarded, they haſtned with him to a Place where he might be ſecure. But that tempeſtuous Night prov'd ſo fortunate to him, that when in the darkeſt Part of it the Troop march'd down a very ſteep Hill with Woods on both Sides, either by his Activity, or the Connivance of the Soldier who ſat behind him, he found Means, that in the ſteepeſt of the Deſcent, they both fell from the Horſe; and ſo diſintangling himſelf by his Strength and Agility, he got into the Woods, and made his Eſcape; which was the Fourth he had made during theſe Troubles. However his Deſign, as many others were, was broken before it cou'd come to any Maturity. And particularly the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir Horatio Townſhend, and moſt of their Friends, were apprehended before the Day, and made Priſoners upon a general Suſpicion of ſome extraordinary Deſigns.

and

Of all the Enterprizes for ſeizing upon ſtrong Places, only one ſucceeded; which was that undertaken by Sir George Booth; who being a Perſon of the beſt Quality and Fortune of thoſe in that County, who had never been of the King's Party, came into Cheſter, with ſome ſelect Perſons the Night before: So that tho' the Tempeſtuouſneſs of the Night and the next Morning had the ſame Effect, as in other Places, to break or diſorder the Rendezvous appointed within four or five Miles of that City, yet Sir George being Himſelf there with a good Troop of Horſe he brought with him, and finding others, tho' leſs numerous than he expected, he retir'd with thoſe he had into Cheſter, where his Party was ſtrong enough: And Sir Thomas Middleton, having kept his Rendezvous, repaired to him, and brought ſufficient Strength with him to keep thoſe Parts at their Devotion, and ſuppreſs all preſent Oppoſers. This done, they immediately publiſh'd a Declaration againſt thoſe who call'd Themſelves The Parliament, and uſurp'd the Government by the Power of the Army, without any direct Owning of the King's Intereſt.

Their Declaration.

They profeſs'd, 'That ſince God had ſuffer'd the Spirit of 'Diviſion to continue in this Nation, which was left 'without any ſettled Foundation of Religion, Liberty and 'Property, the Legiſlative Power uſurp'd at Pleaſure, the 'Army rais'd for its Defence miſ-led by their ſuperior 'Officers, and no Face of Government remaining, that 'was lawfully conſtituted; Therefore, they being ſenſible 'of their Duty, and utter Ruin, if theſe Diſtractions 'ſhou'd continue, had taken Arms in Vindication of the 'Freedom of Parliaments, of the known Laws, Liberty 'and Property, and of the good People of this Nation 'groaning under inſupportable Taxes: That they cannot 'deſpair of the Bleſſing of God, nor of the chearful Concurrence of all good People, and of the undeceiv'd 'Part of the Army; whoſe Arrears and future Advancement they wou'd procure, ſuffering no Impoſition or 'Force on any Man's Conſcience.' But tho' they mention'd nothing of the King in expreſs Terms, they gave all Countenance and Reception, and all imaginable Aſſurance to the Royal Party; who had Directions from his Majeſty to concur, and unite Themſelves to them. Whatever the Diſappointments were in other Places, the Fame of this Inſurrection rais'd the Spirits of all Men: They who were at Liberty renew'd their former Deſigns; and they who wanted Places of Refuge, prepar'd Themſelves to march to Cheſter, if Sir George Booth did not draw nearer with his Army; which he deſign'd to have done, had the ſeveral Appointments been obſerv'd. But when he heard of a general Failing, and of the great Numbers impriſon'd, upon whoſe Aſſiſtance he moſt depended, he was in great Apprehenſion that he had begun the Work too ſoon; and tho' his own Numbers daily encreas'd, he thought it beſt to keep to his preſent Poſt, till he knew what was like to be tranſacted in other Places.

The Parliament alarm'd.

5. The Rulers at Weſtminſter were exceedingly alarm'd, eſpecially ſince the Fire was kindled in a Place they leaſt ſuſpected, which they knew wou'd ſpread far, if not quickly extinguiſh'd. They found they had now too ſoon Occaſion for their Army, in which they had not full Confidence; and tho' Lambert was believ'd the moſt proper Perſon for this Province, yet there were many Officers they had rather truſt than He. While that Matter was under their Conſideration, ſome Perſons of the King's Party addreſs'd themſelves to the Wife of that Commander, endeavouring to induce her to perſuade her Husband to be the Inſtrument of the King's Return, with large Offers of whatſoever Terms he wou'd demand. She acquainted her Husband with their Propoſitions; but he having reſolv'd to play another Part, diſcover'd the whole Project to Sir Henry Vane; who having communicated it to Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, and knowing there had been ſome late Difference between Lambert and Him, he perſuaded them to renew their former Friendſhip, with Promiſes on each Side, to unite their Endeavours in the Service of the Parliament. By this Means principally it was, that Lambert was ſoon after appointed Commander in Chief againſt Sir George Booth, and the Gentlemen in Cheſhire; in which Affair he ſhew'd himſelf ſo Zealous, that he declar'd He wou'd not leave a Cavalier to piſs againſt the Wall, or Words to that Purpoſe.

They ſend Lambert againſt Booth.

They had formerly ſent for two Regiments out of Ireland, which they knew were devoted to the Republican Intereſt, being commanded by Zankey and Axtell; and thoſe they appointed Lambert to join with. Having got three Regiments of Horſe, one of Dragoons, and three of Foot, Lambert advanc'd without Delay; for he deſir'd to take nothing with him that might retard his March, which he reſolv'd ſhou'd be very ſwift, to prevent the Encreaſe of the Enemies Numbers.

1659. Car. II.

In the mean Time Sir George Booth, beſides Cheſter, all but the Caſtle, had ſecured Warrington and Mancheſter; and his Field-Army conſiſted of more than three thouſand Horſe and Foot, the Cavalry moſt Gentlemen and well provided, but the Infantry raw and unſkilful Peſons, newly come from the Plough, or other ordinary Labours. But, according to the natural Eagerneſs of the Nation for Battel, inſtead of retiring into Cheſter, where they might have made ſufficient Defence againſt Lambert, they march'd to meet him, and drew up in a Meadow near Nortwich Bridge, on which Sir George had plac'd a Guard to maintain it. When the two Armies were drawn up, with only a River to part them, Sir George ſent a Trumpet to Lambert, 'to acquaint him with the Reaſonableneſs and 'Juſtice of his Cauſe, and to deſire for the avoiding of 'Blood-ſhed, that ſome Perſons might be appointed in order to a Treaty.' To which Lambert return'd Anſwer, 'That the readieſt Way to avoid Blood-ſhed was, for them 'to lay down their Arms, and ſurrender Cheſter, and other Strengths; which if they refuſ'd to do, he was ſent 'to reduce them to their due Obedience, which by the 'Help of God he did not doubt to effect.' According to this Reſolution, the next Morning he commanded a ſtrong Party of Foot to attack thoſe who kept the Bridge, which they did with great Courage: Nor was it for ſome Time leſs valiantly defended; but at length Lambert's Soldiers beating the other from the Bridge, made Way for his whole Army to paſs over and charge Booth's Infantry, who were immediately forc'd to retreat, but with little Execution, by reaſon of the Incloſures, which gave them Liberty to make good their Retreat from one Hedge to another.

Lambert gains the Day.

The Horſe likewiſe being charg'd by Lambert's Troops, at firſt made a gallant Reſiſtance, but being over-power'd were forc'd to truſt to their Fleetneſs; yet many of them, purſu'd by the Victors, were taken in their Way to Warrington, Mancheſter and Cheſter, the expected Places of Security. Thus the grand Body being diſpers'd, Cheſter and the other Places were ſoon ſurrender'd, and Sir Thomas Middleton's noble Caſtle in North Wales demoliſh'd.

Booth taken.

Sir George Booth Himſelf eſcap'd out of the Field; but making his Flight towards London, in order to tranſport himſelf, he was taken in Woman's Apparel at Newport-Pagnel, and ſent Priſoner to the Tower.

Reflections upon the Defeat.

Various Reflections were made upon the ill Conduct and Succeſs of this generous Undertaking: Particularly 'That the concern'd Parties had omitted many Opportunities of ruining their Enemies: That Colonel Zanchy, 'landing in Angleſey from Ireland, might have been met 'and engag'd with all Probability of Succeſs, before he 'could have join'd with Lambert, they being lodg'd between Him and Them; that Colonel Lilburn, who 'was raiſing Men in Yorkſhire, might eaſily have been 'broken by any ſmall Force from Lancaſhire, and hinder'd 'in his Levies; that many other little Parties, which in 'ſmall Numbers came from ſeveral Counties, might have 'been met and diſpers'd, before they united; and that one 'Blow given to any one of them, wou'd have added ſo 'much to their Reputation, as might have brought effectual Acceſſions to their Party.' But whatever were the Failings, this Defeat ſeem'd fatal to the Royaliſts, and many Others, and at once to have deſtroy'd all their Hopes. Yet this ſeeming Ruin of their Cauſe prov'd a mighty Step towards the Reſtoration of it, after a more unexpected and Bloodleſs Manner: So widely different are the wiſeſt Projects of Men, and the ordinary Productions of Providence.

Severities againſt the Vanquiſh'd.

The Victors in the mean Time proceeded like abſolute Conquerors, and fill'd all the Priſons in England; while the Parliament conſulted what Perſons they wou'd execute, and how they ſhould confiſcate the reſt; by which Means they doubted not but to deſtroy all Seeds of future Inſurrections in Favour of the King, many of the Nobility being at preſent in Cuſtody: And they reſolv'd, if other Evidence was wanting, Suſpicion ſhou'd be a ſufficient Cauſe to continue them Priſoners. They thought of tranſporting of many Loyal Families into the Barbadoes and Jamaica; and tho' many others were concern'd, they laid the late Inſurrection wholly to the Charge of the Royal Party. Their Miniſters and Preachers were taught to cry out in the Pulpits after this Manner, at the firſt Appearance of Danger: 'The Lord ſtir up the Hearts of his People, 'and fill them with Unanimity and Courage at this Evil 'Time, againſt the Common Enemy Charles Stuart, and 'that deſperate Crew of ravenous and unreaſonable Men; 'who, ſhou'd they get in, to ſatisfy the Rabble of his 'Followers wou'd enſlave You, and with your Goods 'maintain Foreigners, and the Pomp and Pride of a luxurious Court, and an abſolute Tyranny.' And after the Defeat of Sir George Booth, a good Number of theſe Clergy came perſonally out of Leiceſterſhire, and preſented to the Parliament a Paper intitled, The humble Repreſentation of of divers well-affected Miniſters of the Goſpel, &c. In which after many other Things, they declar'd, 'That their Souls had not enter'd into the Secret of the late Inſurrectors; but that they profeſs'd an utter Deteſtation thereof; and that, the Lord helping them, they wou'd not ceaſe crying mightily to him, that he wou'd ſtill pour out upon the Parliament a Spirit of Wiſdom, and of the Fear of the Lord, to carry them on in their Work, againſt all Diſcouragements and Oppoſitions whatſoever.' Being brought into the Houſe, and one of them in a Speech to the Speaker declaring, 'That being all Miniſters of the Goſpel, and faithful Servants to the Parliament, ſome of them had march'd along with their Forces to ſuppreſs the late Rebellion,' they were graciouſly diſmiſs'd with the particular Thanks of the Houſe. This Repreſentation was ſubſcribed by thirty eight Miniſters of the County of Leiceſter, of which twenty four loſt their Benefices in the Year 1662.

An Oath of Abjuration.

Being well ſecured in their Places, the Members appointed a Committee to prepare Something in Order to the Settling of a Government: for the better Support of which they eſtabliſh'd the laying a Tax of one hundred Thouſand Pounds a Month, beſides Exciſe and Cuſtoms, and the ſequeſter'd Eſtates of new Delinquents; which laſt wou'd have amounted to immenſe Sums of Mony. But for a full and final Blow and Security, they appointed a formal Oath for Abjuring the King's Title, in theſe particular Words: 'I. A. B. do hereby declare, that I renounce the pretended Title of CHARLES STUART, and the whole Line of the late King JAMES; and of every other Perſon, as a ſingle Perſon, pretending to the Government of theſe Nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereto belonging. And that I will, by the Grace and Aſſiſtance of Almighty God, be true, faithful and conſtant to the COMMON-WEALTH, againſt any King, ſingle Perſon, and Houſe of Peers, and every of Them: And hereunto I ſubſcribe my Name.' This Oath, tho' taken by many, was avoided by Mr. Lenthall the Speaker, who abſented Himſelf from the Houſe about Ten Days, under the Pretence of the Gout; having been diſcourag'd by the Warnings of the noted Propheteſs, or Fortune-teller of this Time, Mrs. Katharine Johnſon; who, as Dr. Price tells us, aſſur'd him, That he ſhou'd certainly be forgiven for whatever elſe he had done againſt the King.

Lambert's Ambitious Deſigns.

6. The Parliament had been Victors but for a ſhort Time, before they were perplex'd by the ambitious Motions of their chief Commander Lambert. For his late Service they had ſent him a Thouſand Pounds to buy him a Jewel; which he more advantageouſly employ'd by beſtowing it among the Officers, who might well deſerve it of him. This particular Bounty was ſoon known to the firſt Donors; who as ſoon concluded, that he deſign'd to make a Party in the Army, that ſhou'd more depend upon his than their Commands. And this reminded them of his former Behaviour; and how that by his Advice they had firſt been diſſolv'd, and that he had help'd Cromwell to the Protectorſhip, upon a Promiſe of being made his Succeſſor; and that he had deſerted him only becauſe he was diſappointed of that Expectation. They therefore courteouſly invited him to London; but reſolv'd to ſecure him from doing further Harm, as ſoon as he ſhou'd come to the Town. Lambert inſtead of haſtning to his Maſters, found ſeveral Delays in his March, under Pretence of ſeiſing upon the Perſons of Delinquents. He was well inform'd of their Inclinations towards him, and that they intended to make a Peace with all Foreigners, and then to leſſen their Army, and model it to their own Devotion. He foreſaw his own Fate in this Model, and that his good Services wou'd be forgotten, while the contrary wou'd be remember'd; therefore he contriv'd a formal Petition to be drawn up, which at Derby was ſign'd by the inferior Officers of his Army; being intitled, The humble Petition and Propoſals of the Army, under the Command of the Lord Lambert, in the late Northern Expedition. It was directed To the Supream Authority of theſe Nations, the Parliament of the Common-wealth of England; in which they made a large Recapitulation of 'the many Services they had done, which they thought were forgotten; and that now lately they had preſerv'd them from an Enemy, which, if permitted to encreaſe, wou'd ſhortly have over-run the Kingdom, and engag'd the Nation in a new bloody War; to which too many Men were ſtill inclin'd: Therefore they deſired, that they might be govern'd, as all other Armies us'd to be, by a General, who might be amongſt them, and other Officers ſubordinate to him; and particularly that they wou'd commit the Army to Fleetwood as General, and appoint Lambert to be Major-General.' Fleetwood was a weak Man, but very popular with all the Praying Part of the Army, and one whom the Parliament wou'd have truſted, if they had not reſolv'd to have no General; and Lambert well knew he cou'd govern him, as Cromwell had done Fairfax, and then in the ſame Manner, lay him aſide.

The Petition of the Army.

The Parliament's Vote upon it.

This Paper was ſent up to London to Colonel Aſhfield, Colonel Cobbet, and Lieutenant-Colonel Duckenfield, to be by them preſented to Fleetwood, and by him to the Parliament. In order to this, Fleetwood firſt communicated it to Sir Henry Vane and Sir Arthur Haſlerigg; and Vane ſeem'd to approve of it, but Haſlerigg immediately acquainted the Members 'of a dangerous Deſign in the Army againſt them, and that that Paper tended to the Subverſion of their Power.' Whereupon they immediately ſent to Fleetwood for the Paper, who return'd Anſwer, That he had only a Copy, the Original being in Cobbet's Hands: Nor cou'd Cobbet, who was ſent for, be found at that Time; but the Houſe, to foreſtal and exclude any Addreſs in that Kind, immediately voted, 'That to have any more General Officers in the Army, than were already ſettled by Parliament, was Needleſs, Chargeable, and Dangerous to the Common-wealth.' This threw the whole Army into that Diſtemper that Lambert deſired; and here began the firſt Strugglings between the Military and pretended Civil Power, which afterwards ſo happily ſhatter'd both in Pieces. But the Army Officers, having not fully ripen'd their main Deſign, thought fit to diſſemble a while, and ſo repreſented to the Parliament, 'That they wou'd adhere to their Authority, in Oppoſition to the common Enemy; and that they wou'd not fail to ſtand by Them, in the Settlement of the Common-wealth, againſt all Diſturbances whatſoever.' Which fair Expreſſions did lull them into ſuch a ſeeming Security, while the City feaſted both Them and the Officers at a Thankſgiving Dinner, that being void of Fear, they fell again upon ſequeſtering ſuch new Delinquents as had appear'd in Sir George Booth's Riſing; and neglected no Means for the gaining the Wealth of the Nation into their own Hands.

But the Deſign of the Army being ſhortly after ripen'd, the Officers, who for a while had plauſibly cover'd their Intentions, began again to appear in their proper Colours; and in a Repreſentation to the Houſe deſired, 'That whatſoever Perſons ſhou'd for the future groundleſsly inform the Parliament againſt them, creating Jealouſies, and caſting ſcandalous Imputations upon them, may be brought to Examination, Juſtice, and condign Puniſhment.' The Members gravely let them know, 'That it was the Duty of Petitioners to ſubmit their Deſires to the Parliament, and acquieſce in the Judgment thereof:' But finding little Hopes of compounding this Diſpute amicably, and that one Side muſt be cruſh'd; firſt, that they might the more inſenſibly diminiſh their Power, they paſs'd an Act, 'That all Orders, Ordinances, Acts made by any ſingle Perſon, &c. or by any Aſſembly or Conventions, pretending to have the Authority of Parliament, from and after the 19th Day of April 1653, and before the 7th of May 1659, and which had not been, or ſhou'd not be, allow'd and confirm'd by this preſent PARLIAMENT; ſhou'd be deemed and taken to be of no Force and Effect, from and after the ſaid 7th Day of May.' Next, to take away all Hope of Subſiſtance from them, if they ſhou'd fail in their Duty, they enacted, 'That no Perſon ſhou'd after the 11th of October 1659, Aſſeſs, Levy, Collect, or Receive any Cuſtom, Import, Exciſe, Tax, &c. whatſoever, upon the People of this Common-wealth, without their Conſent in Parliament: And that every Perſon offending contrary to that Act, ſhou'd ſuffer the Forfeitures and Puniſhment of High-Treaſon.' Having thus cut off the Maintenance of the Army, they ventur'd to take away the Commiſſions of Nine of the Leading Officers, namely, Lambert Himſelf, Deſborough, Berry, Kelſey, Aſhfield, Cobbet, Creed, Parker and Barrow, and conferr'd their Regiments and Commands upon other Perſons, in whom they cou'd confide. Then they order'd, 'That the Army ſhou'd be govern'd by ſeven Commiſſioners, viz. Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, Lieutenant-General Ludlow, General Monk, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Colonel Walton, Colonel Morley, and Colonel Overton, or any three or more of them;' who were to give Notice to Lambert and the reſt, that they were each of them diſcharg'd of their reſpective Military Employments.

They turn out Lambert and other Officers.

This, tho' manag'd with the utmoſt Caution, brought all to a Criſis; and the unſkilful Part of it was much charged upon the ſour and moroſe Temper of Haſlerigg, who, together with Vane, govern'd this little Part of a Parliament. The Army was too far ingag'd to retire; and judg'd themſelves to be the true Supporters of the others ſeeming Authority. The Nine caſhier'd Officers were reſolv'd not to part with their Commands, nor would the Soldiers ſubmit to their new Officers; and both having given out, That they found it neceſſary to diſſolve the Parliament, for the Good of the Nation, they agreed to meet at Weſtminſter the next Morning, being the 13th of October, to determine Theirs or their Oppoſers Fate. All which being known to the Parliament, they ſent their Orders to thoſe Regiments they rely'd on, to be at the ſame Time at Weſtminſter to defend them from Force; and likewiſe ſent into the City to draw down their Militia. Moſs's and Morley's Regiment, with about four Troops of Horſe belonging to Okey, obey'd their Commands, and appear'd in Arms in the Palace-yard; but Lambert, having gather'd together the reſt of the Army, ſtopp'd up all Paſſages, ſo that no more Relief cou'd come to them, which they expected from the City. Both Parties coming near each other, all Men were in a terrible Expectation of the Event; but they rather choſe to make uſe of Words than Blows. Lambert advancing near the Party commanded by Colonel Moſs, demanded of them If they wou'd ſuffer Nine of their old Officers, who had ſo often ſpent their Blood for them, and with them, to be diſgrac'd and ruin'd with their Families? This ſort of Oratory ſoon began to prevail; and when the Speaker with his Life Guard was coming by Whitehall, Lambert rode up to the Coach, and told Him, There was nothing to be done at Weſtminſter, and adviſ'd him to return back again to his Houſe. The Speaker told the Soldiers, He was their General, and expected their Obedience, and ſo preſs'd forwards with his Guard: Upon which Lambert rode to the Captain Himſelf, and pull'd him off his Horſe, and ordered Major Creed, who had formerly commanded that Troop, to mount into the Saddle. Which being done, he bid Creed conduct Mr. Lenthall to his Houſe, which was preſently done with the Obedience of all the Troop. Immediately after Lambert ſent to thoſe Parliamentarians in the Palace-Yard, to retire to their Quarters: At whoſe Refuſal he only ſmil'd, and bid them ſtay there; which they did till towards the Evening: But then finding themſelves laugh'd at, as having no Parliament to guard, they were content to repair to their Quarters. But their Officers were caſhier'd, and ſuch ſent to command as Lambert thought fit, who found all Submiſſion and Obedience from the Soldiers, tho' no Man yet knew who had Power to command them. Thus a ſecond Time was turn'd out that Part of the Long Parliament, which had been now more generally and juſtly than formerly call'd the RUMP; after a new Reign of only five Months, and ſix Days.

An Inter-Regnum of thirteen Days.

III. 1. Upon the Excluſion of that call'd the Parliament, which was the Overthrow of the viſible Government, there was again a kind of an Inter-Regnum, or Anarchy, for about thirteen Days; when all Mens Minds were fill'd with Amazement, and eager Expectation of what wou'd ſucceed. In the Army, that had effected this great Change, there was not any Officer who by his Commiſſion was above the Degree of a Colonel, nor had any of them Power to command more than his own Regiment. Wherefore, to avoid Confuſion, the Officers immediately met together, and declar'd, 'That the Army finding it ſelf 'without a General, or other General Officers, had Them'ſelves made Choice of Fleetwood to be their General, of 'Lambert to be their Major-General, and of Desborough 'to be Commiſſary-General of the Horſe; and that they 'bound themſelves to obey Them in their ſeveral Capaci'ties, and to adhere to, and defend Them.' Upon the publiſhing this Declaration, they aſſum'd their ſeveral Stations and Provinces: The whole Army took Commiſſions from their new General, and were as much united, as if they were under Oliver Cromwell; and look'd upon it as a ſignal Deliverance, that they ſhou'd be no longer ſubject to the Parliament, which they heartily deteſted.

But theſe new Governors were not at Eaſe; and they well knew upon what ſlippery Ground they ſtood: The Parliament had ſtopp'd all the Channels of the Publick Revenue, and put an End to all the Payments of Cuſtom and Exciſe; and to revive theſe Impoſitions, by which the Army might receive their Subſiſtance, required more a Civil than a Military Authority. The Diviſions in Parliament, and particularly between Vane and Haſlerigg, had made the laſt Outrage leſs reproachful and more popular. Vane, who was much the wiſeſt Man, found he cou'd never make that Aſſembly ſettle ſuch a Government as he deſired, either in Church or State; and Haſlerigg, who was of a moroſe Nature, and of a weak Underſtanding, only concurr'd with him in thoſe fierce Counſels, which might more irrecoverably diſinherit the King, and eradicate his Party: In all other Particulars, whether Temporal or Eccleſiaſtical, they were not only of different Judgments, but of great Animoſity againſt each other. The Latter's Credit in the Houſe was, at this Time, ſuperior to the Other's; which made Vane leſs concern'd at the Violence that was us'd, and to appear willing enough to confer and joyn with thoſe who wou'd find any other Hinge upon which the Government might move: So he ſoon enter'd into Converſation with thoſe of the Army, who were moſt like to have Authority. A Model of ſuch a Government as might produce the full Submiſſion of the People, wou'd require very much Agitation, and very long Time, which the preſent Conjuncture wou'd not permit; nor was there ſufficient Unanimity to give ſuch Authority to their Counſels. In this they agreed, as an Expedient towards more ripe Reſolutions, to form out a kind of ſpurious Oligarchy, conſiſting of a ſelect Number of Men, who under the Denomination of a A COMMITTEE OF SAFETY, ſhou'd aſſume the preſent entire Government of the Nation: The Number amounted to Twenty Three; which, tho' fill'd up with Men of almoſt all Parties, except Royaliſts, yet was ſo craftily compos'd, that the Ballance was ſufficiently ſecured to thoſe of the Army Faction. The Names of them were General Fleetwood, Major-General Lambert, Commiſſary-General Desborough, Lieutenant-General Ludlow, Commiſſioner Whitelock, Serjeant Steel, Sir Henry Vane, Colonel Sydenham, Major Saloway, Mr. Strickland, Colonel Berry, Mr. Laurence, Sir James Harrington, Sir Archibald Johnſton, Lord-Mayor Ireton, Alderman Tichburne, Colonel Hewſon, Colonel Clarke, Colonel Bennet, Colonel Lilburn, Mr. Holland, Mr. Brandreth, and Mr. Thompſon.

The Army erect A COMMITTEE OF SAFETY.

Thus having choſen each other, they gave themſelves Authority 'to call Delinquents to an Account, to ſuppreſs 'all Inſurrections, to treat with Foreign States and Prin'ces, to raiſe the Militia in the ſeveral Counties, to diſ'poſe of all Places of Truſt, to do any Thing elſe which 'ſhou'd be judg'd for the Peace and Safety of the King'dom; and likewiſe to conſider and determine what Form 'of Government was fit to be erected, to which the Nati'on was to ſubmit.' They believ'd that the People would be perſuaded, with the Aſſiſtance of the Army, to pay a temporary Obedience to this ſtrange and new invented Government, in hope of another Settlement ſpeedily to enſue. To make Way for which Obedience, theſe extraordinary Governors publiſh'd a Declaration to acquaint the World, 'That it was upon their Hearts to ſettle a due Liberty up'on the Free-born People of theſe Nations, to make a 'thorough Reformation of the Law, and to eſtabliſh a 'Painful, Godly, Faithful, Goſpel-Preaching Miniſtry, 'and to provide them a Maintenance leſs troubleſome to 'them, and leſs vexatious to the People, than that of 'Tythes; and to prepare ſuch a Form of Government, as 'ſhou'd beſt ſuit with a Free State and Common-wealth, 'without a Single Perſon, Kingſhip, or Houſe of Lords. 'They doubted not, but ſuch as ſaw the many Temptati'ons beſetting them on every Side, and the great Difficul'ties they labour'd under, and knew not what farther 'Streights a Day might bring forth, wou'd ſay on their 'Behalfs, Who is ſufficient for theſe Things? And out of 'former Experiences being taught, that the Lord who is a 'preſent Help in Time of Trouble, will cry aloud for them 'before the Throne of Grace, that the Lord Himſelf may 'appear, and carry on his own Work in their Hands: And 'if it ſhall pleaſe Him, by his Spirit, to ſtir up thoſe that 'fear his Name, to be inſtant in their Behalf, they ſhall not 'fear what Evil Man can do unto them.

Their Declaration.

The great Imperfections of the preſent Eſtabliſhment, and the daily Expectations of a better, began more and more to exerciſe the Wits and Inventions of the chief Government-Makers and Menders about the Town. Great Variety of Schemes were fram'd and vented, which, after a ſhort Appearance, expir'd; and ſometimes they were for a Senate, and other times for Conſervators of Liberty. But that which ſeem'd to take moſt at this Time was the Oceana of Mr. Harrington, which by ſome was extoll'd, as if it were the Pattern in the Mount. That Gentleman, with Mr. Henry Nevill, and ſome other Perſons of ingenious and mercurial Heads, had form'd a Society to invent and ſettle a Common-wealth in the greateſt Perfection, in which they had many fine and curious Diſcourſes about Government; ſo that the Arguments in the Parliament-Houſe were thought flat and inſipid in compariſon of theirs. The Ballotting-box from Venice was introduc'd amongſt them, and the Project call'd The Rota was moſt of all approv'd on and recommended among the Parliament Men. The Model of it was, 'That the third Part of the Senate or Houſe 'ſhou'd Rote out by Ballot every Year, ſo that every ninth 'Year the ſaid Senate wou'd be wholly alter'd: No Magi'ſtrate was to continue above three Years, and all to be 'choſen by Ballot;' than which Choice nothing ſeem'd more fair and impartial, tho' at the ſame time it was much oppos'd by many of the Parliament Members, who found it too much againſt their preſent Power to afford it an Admittance. This and many other Projects were examined and debated by the refined Politicians of the Time, who were never able to reduce any thing to Practice; and they ſeem'd to have thought of every thing but the right, the Reſtoration of the Royal Family, which Heaven had reſerv'd as the peculiar Work of its own Hands; of which ſome Dawnings began now to appear.

New Schemes of Government.

General Monk declares for the Parliament.

2. The new Governors at Wallingford-Houſe, under the Name of A Committee of Safety, had but imperfectly fix'd themſelves in their Seats, when they receiv'd a providential Check and Rebuke from General Monk in Scotland, in Letters to Fleetwood and Lambert, which came to their Hands on the 29th of October: In which he upbraided them 'with the Violation of their Faith to the 'Parliament, from whom they had all their Power and 'Authority; and declar'd his Reſolution to reſtore the 'Parliament to a Freedom of Sitting and Acting, againſt 'all Oppoſition.' And this naturally brings us to a particular Account of the Progreſs and Character of this great Man, who was ſo ſignally inſtrumental in the ſucceeding Reſtoration. The World is divided in their Opinion concerning the Counſels and Steps of this famous Reſtorer of the Engliſh Monarchy; and it is hard to know preciſely how and when he was brought over to the King's Intereſt. Some will have it, that he never thought of reſtoring the King, till he deſpair'd of being made Protector; and others with as much Reaſon affirm that his loyal Reſolutions were of a much longer Date: But ſtill there are a ſort of Men in the World, who, when there are two equal Reaſons to judge well or ill of a Perſon, never heſitate, but immediately conclude the latter. But after all, we have the greateſt Reaſons to believe, that his Intentions to ſettle the general Quiet of the Land were very early, and that he all along fram'd his Deſigns ſuitable to the Opportunities that were given him. But to proceed to a more particular Account of him.

An Account of his Family and Actions.

George Monk was ſecond Son to Sir Thomas Monk of Potheridge in the County of Devon, and of a Family very loyally affected, and anciently deſcended: For his Anceſtors were deriv'd from Arthur Plantagenet, natural Son to King Edward the Fourth, who marry'd the Heireſs of John Viſcount Liſle. Being a younger Brother, and of a natural and intrepid Courage, he made the Sword his Profeſſion, as ſoon as he was ever able to weild it. At Seventeen he was in the Expedition againſt Cadiz, and ſoon after in the Deſcent on the Iſle of Rhee, being an Enſign under the brave Sir John Burroughs. England being at Peace, he enter'd upon that Stage where ſome of all Europe then acted, between the Spaniard and the Dutch; and gain'd the Reputation of an excellent Foot Officer in the Lord Vere's Regiment in Holland, at the Time when he aſſign'd it to the Command of Colonel Goring. Returning home, he ſerv'd in both the Expeditions againſt the Scots, after that againſt the Iriſh, and then againſt the Engliſh Parliamentarians, by whom he was taken, and kept Priſoner for three Years. Being ſet at Liberty, he fell in with the Friendſhip and Intereſt of Cromwell, and was very inſtrumental in the reducing both of Ireland and Scotland. After which he highly ſignaliz'd his Courage in three bloody Sea-Fights againſt the Dutch, as is formerly remember'd; and ſo return'd to his old main Poſt in Scotland, which Country he had ſufficiently humbled, and reduc'd to a Degree of Subjection before unknown to that People. Here he continu'd unmoleſted, and in full Command under the Protector Oliver; tho' he was generally look'd upon as a Man more inclined to the King, than any other in great Authority. And Cromwell, in a Letter to him written with his own Hand, not long before his Death, us'd this drolling Expreſſion; 'Tis ſaid there is a cunning Fellow in Scotland call'd George Monk, who lies in wait to ſerve Charles Stuart; pray uſe your Diligence to take him, and ſend him up to me. After his Death he own'd his Son Richard's Authority, and likewiſe comply'd with the Government of the Remainder of the Long Parliament; yet ſtill liv'd and acted more like a Governor himſelf, and after a more independent Manner than he did formerly. His Rule and Authority was carry'd on with ſuch a quiet and ſteddy Hand, that he met with more Submiſſion and Affection from the Scots, than cou'd be expected by one who was little leſs than a Conqueror. He us'd to expreſs a great Concern for the Unhappineſs of the late King, and wou'd ſay, That he had Armies of brave Men, but they were too great to be commanded; and fewer Men, under better Diſcipline, wou'd have done his Buſineſs: But, he ſaid, he cou'd never forget or forgive his not fighting the Scots when they firſt invaded England in 1638; and he imputed all the ſucceeding Bloodſhed to the fooliſh ſparing of it then; and that the Scots deſervedly ſuffer'd what they did.

His Character.

But to come nearer to the Character of this Commander. He was a Man of a reſerved Nature, of deep Thoughts, and of few Words; and what he wanted in fine Elocution, he had in ſound Judgment; and he had a natural Secrecy in him, prevalent upon all his Qualifications of a Soldier, which made him ſo fit an Inſtrument in the Hand of Divine Providence to bring about the great Work of the Reſtoration. He was now a little above fifty Years of Age; having the Happineſs of a ſtrong Body, a Mind not eaſily diſorder'd, an invincible Courage, and a ſedate and uniform Contempt of Death. To reſerve him for this laſt Work, Heaven had given him a thouſand great and eminent Deliverances; there was ſcarce any Man living, who had been more often, or more dangerouſly ingaged, yet he never met in all his Life with any conſiderable Hurt or Wound, as he has often ſaid to a reverend Prelate. Tho' he had no Fumes of Fanaticiſm or Superſtition to turn his Head, yet he ſeem'd to hearken to, and receive Incouragement from the Predictions of Dr. Laybourn, Mrs. Johnſon, and others; but more particularly the Earl of Nitzdale, who in the Month of October came to him, and told him expreſly, That the King wou'd be reſtored, and that within ſome few Months; that he ſhou'd be a principal Inſtrument towards the effecting of it; and that not ſo much as the Blood of a cut Finger ſhou'd be ſpilt in the Action. Whatever were his firſt Intentions, it was the King's greateſt Happineſs, that he never own'd his Purpoſe to ſerve him, 'till it fell to be in his Power; and if he had declar'd ſooner, he muſt have been deſtroy'd himſelf; the whole Machine being ſo much above the Strength of any Mortal. Therefore, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, it is Glory enough to his Memory, that he was God's Inſtrument in bringing thoſe mighty things to paſs, which no Man living of himſelf had either Wiſdom enough to foreſee, or Underſtanding to contrive, or Courage to attempt and execute.

Application made to him by his Brother.

The firſt Application made to him by the King's Party, was not long after the End of the Reign of Richard Cromwell. He had a younger Brother, Mr. Nicholas Monk, a reverend Divine of continual Loyalty, who was Miniſter of the rich Parſonage of Kelkhampton in Cornwall, which had been given him by his Kinſman, that brave Gentleman, Sir John Greenvile, Son to the no leſs famous Sir Bevil Greenvile, who loſt his Life in the Battel of Lanſdown. Sir John and Sir Hugh Pollard, who had both particular Friendſhip for the General, thought fit to adviſe with this Brother, 'That now the Power of Cromwell's 'Family was at an End, and that ſome great Revolution 'might follow, by which the King's Intereſt wou'd be a'gain diſputed; Whether he did not believe, That the Ge'neral might be wrought upon, in a fit Conjuncture, to 'ſerve the King, in which they thought he wou'd be ſure 'to meet with an univerſal Concurrence from the whole 'Scottiſh Nation.' The loyal Clergyman thought the Overture ſo reaſonable, tho' attended with the greateſt Difficulties, that he offer'd himſelf to make a Journey to his Brother in Scotland, under Pretence of bringing back a Daughter of his from thence in order to a good Marriage. Greenvile and Pollard inform'd the King of this Deſign, having good Hopes of Succeſs, and deſir'd his Majeſty's Approbation and Inſtructions. The King readily embrac'd it, and ſent ſuch Directions as he thought moſt proper for ſuch a Negotiation. Whereupon Mr. Monk firſt repaired to London to conſult with Dr. Thomas Clarges a Phyſician, whoſe Siſter was own'd by the General as his Wife, tho' her Husband was then alive, but unknown to the World. Here he took his Inſtructions from the Doctor, how to manage his Negotiation with the greateſt Secrecy and Caution, and to communicate his Deſigns to none except to Dr. Thomas Barrow, Phyſician, and Mr. John Price, Chaplain to the General himſelf. Being arriv'd at Dalkeith, the Reſidence of the General, by the Aſſiſtance of theſe two, he made a due Advantage of the Report of Sir George Booth's Riſing; and by Degrees brought his Brother to a Reſolution of marching into England, in purſuance of that Gentleman's Declaration for a free Parliament. But when all things were juſt ready, he receiv'd Intelligence of Sir George's Defeat from his Agent Dr. Clarges; at which he was ſo much affected and concern'd, that he ſent a Letter to Lenthall the Speaker, to be communicated to the Parliament, deſiring to be diſmiſs'd from his Command, pretending 'he was infirm in Health, and had long 'continu'd in that remote Country; but now, ſince all 'Inſurrections were appeas'd that threatned Diſturbance 'to the Peace of the Nation, he hop'd he might be per'mitted to return into his own Country, and to end his 'Days in Quiet.' This Letter, whether a Reality or an Artifice, is ſaid to have been deliver'd by Clarges to the Speaker, under an Obligation to ſuppreſs the reading of it for ten Days; before which time expired, the Parliament was turn'd out of Doors, and their Power at an End.

His Preparations againſt the Committee of Safety.

This Excluſion gave him a fair Occaſion to exert himſelf, and to declare himſelf openly; but ſtill moſt agreeable to the preſent Juncture of Affairs: For he plauſibly ſtood up 'for the Privileges of Parliaments, and for that 'regular and neceſſary way of bringing the Military Power 'in Subjection to the Civil Authority.' Accordingly he wrote the forementioned Letter to Fleetwood and Lambert; and ſo proceeded to take the beſt Care of all his Forces in that Kingdom, and with all Diligence to get Poſſeſſion of Berwick, which he immediately effected. And now he diſplay'd both his Activity and Judgment; he gradually drew together the diſtant Parts of his Army, and with the utmoſt Vigour proceeded to a thorough Reformation of his Troops, from whence he diſmiſs'd all Fanatick Officers, and ſuch who wou'd not be ſatisfy'd with his Engagement againſt the Army in England: Some he impriſon'd, and others he ſent into England, under the Penalty of Death, if they were ever after found in Scotland; in all which Proceeding he met with innumerable Difficulties, occaſion'd by the Oppoſition of ſome, and the Deſertion of others. But having gain'd the greateſt Points, he drew out his Forces at Edinburgh, and gave them an Account 'of his Reſolutions to adhere to the Civil 'Power, and making the Military ſubordinate to it; and 'that he wou'd oppoſe the Engliſh Army in their mad 'Counſels and their Fanatick Courſes;' all which was entertain'd with great Joy by the Soldiers, who ſaid They wou'd live and dye with him! and with no leſs Satisfaction by the Scotch Nation, who were in Hopes that this might be a Means to break their Yoke, and leave them at Liberty. At the ſame Time the General writ to all Parts to gain Followers, to London, to Ireland, and the Fleet; and did every thing proper for ſo great an Enterprize. Thus as the firſt Storms againſt England aroſe from Scotland, ſo the firſt Sunſhine began to appear in that Country.

Their Proviſions againſt him.

3. Theſe firſt Steps in Scotland caus'd a general Conſternation among thoſe Governors who call'd themſelves The Committee of Safety, and gave ſome Hopes of Reſtoration to the Remainders of the Long Parliament. However the former at preſent thought themſelves much ſuperior in Power; and therefore reſolv'd to ſend Lambert, their chief Hero, with almoſt all their Forces into the North to fight General Monk, or at leaſt to ſtop his March if he ſhou'd attempt to enter into England. But while Preparations were making, more cunning and gentle Methods were thought on: Colonel Cobbet was firſt ſent to induce the General to a Compliance, or rather with a Deſign to corrupt his Officers, and more than that, to ſeize his Perſon, and to ſend him to London by a Ship then lying in Leith Road: But this, or Part of it, being diſcover'd by the Vigilance of Monk, Cobbet was ſeiz'd himſelf, and ſent Priſoner to Edinburgh Caſtle. Next they ſent two ſuch Perſons to the General as they thought might be grateful to him, who were Dr. Clarges and Colonel Talbot; and after them Commiſſary-General Whaley and Colonel Gough, together with Mr. Caryll and Mr. Barker, two independent Preachers, who all perſuaded him to an Accommodation. They were received with all imaginable Civility and Courteſy from the General, who made great Profeſſions, 'That 'he deſired nothing more, than to unite himſelf and his 'Army with that of England, provided there might be a 'lawful Power, to which they might all be ſubject: But 'that the Force that had been us'd upon the Parliament, 'was an Action of ſuch a Nature, that was deſtructive to 'all Government, and that it wou'd be abſolutely neceſ'ſary to reſtore that to its Freedom, Rights, and Privi'leges; which being done, he wou'd uſe all the Intereſt 'he had to procure an Act of Pardon and Oblivion for 'all that had been done amiſs; all which wou'd unite 'both Parliament and Army for the Publick Safety, which 'was apparently threatned and ſhaken by this Diſunion.' After which, to ſhew how much he deſired Peace and Union, he declar'd that he wou'd appoint three Officers of his Army, Colonel Wilks, Lieutenant-Colonel Cloberry, and Major Knight, to go to London, and treat with the Committee of Safety, of all Particulars neceſſary to that Purpoſe. All this he did to gain as much Time as he could, to prepare himſelf againſt a Power, which was manifeſtly ſuperior to his own.

They ſend Lambert againſt him.

When the Perſons ſent from London gave an Account of their Reception, and of the great Profeſſions made by the General, together with his Reſolutions to ſend Commiſſioners to treat upon the Accommodation, the Committee of Safety ſeem'd very well pleas'd, and concluded, That the Fame of their Army's March had frighted him to this Compliance. But at the ſame Time that they willingly embrac'd the Overture of a Treaty, they appointed Lambert to haſten his March, and to make no Stay, till he ſhou'd come to Newcaſtle. All which he obſerv'd with Punctuality and Expedition, and arriv'd at the Place in November, when General Monk had very near got Poſſeſſion of it. Here his Army ſoon encreas'd to twelve thouſand, of which ſeven thouſand were of the chiefeſt Cavalry of the Army; and had he made no Stay there, but with his Horſe only advanc'd directly into Scotland, he cou'd then have met with little or no Reſiſtance. But his Counſels were not equal to his Ambition; and he thought it moſt proper to wait the Iſſue of the Treaty then ſet on Foot. In the mean Time Captain Deane, Treaſurer of the Army, and Major-General Morgan were ſent to work upon General Monk; The former chiefly apply'd himſelf to his Soldiers, and told them That his Lord Lambert was coming upon them, and all Monk's Army wou'd not be a Breakfaſt to him: To which he met with an unpleaſing Anſwer; That Lambert had a very good Stomach, this cold Weather, if he cou'd eat Pikes, and ſwallow Bullets. But Morgan prov'd a contrary Perſon, and, as Clarges did, generouſly join'd with the Sentiments of the General, as believing him to be a true Lover of his Country. The General much wanted him; and ſoon employ'd him in the moſt difficult Service that yet remain'd unattempted, the Reforming of the Horſe, which were then very weak, and much out of Order, and wanted the Influence and Direction of ſo brave a Commander.

Here we may juſtly obſerve the Hand of Heaven, how it ſuperſedes the wiſeſt Actions of Men; particularly in that Ordinance againſt levying of Mony, made by the Parliament, who dreaded the Return of the King, which now prov'd a great Step towards the Reſtoration. It was indeed made only to deſtroy the Subſiſtence of the Army; and Lambert daily felt the Effects of it in the Murmurings and Diviſions among his Forces; who having but little Mony, had no Means left of raiſing more, but by their Swords. This was a ſingular Advantage to General Monk, who was fully inform'd by Dr. Clarges of the Inſtability and Poverty of the Army in England. He was ſenſible that to gain Time was his beſt Expedient; therefore he gave private Inſtructions to the Deputies he ſent to London, to protract the Treaty, and to ſtart ſuch Difficulties as might prevent coming to a Concluſion. Then to avoid the Difficulties reigning in his Enemies Army, he call'd together a general Aſſembly, ſomewhat reſembling a Convention of the States of Scotland; which he had ſubdu'd to all imaginable Tameneſs, tho' he had exercis'd no other Power than was abſolutely neceſſary to reduce that People to a full Submiſſion to his Government. In all his other Carriage towards them, but what was in order to that End, he ſhew'd himſelf very friendly and ſociable; and as he was fear'd by the Nobility, and hated by the Clergy, ſo he was not unbelov'd by the Common People, who receiv'd more Juſtice and leſs Oppreſſion from him, than they uſually did from their own Lords. Upon the Meeting of the Convention, he let them know, 'That he had 'receiv'd a Call from Heaven and Earth, to march with 'his Army into England, for the better Settlement of the 'Government there; and tho' he did not intend to be long 'abſent, yet he foreſaw that there might be ſome Diſturbance of the Peace which they enjoy'd; and therefore 'he expected and deſired, That in any ſuch Occaſion they 'wou'd be ready to join with the Forces he left behind, 'in their own Defence.' In the ſecond Place, which was the main Thing he wanted of them, he very earneſtly preſs'd them, 'That they wou'd pay in a preſent Sum of 'Mony out of the Arrears of their Taxes, for the ſupply'ing the Neceſſities of the Army; without which it cou'd 'not well march into England.' From the Time he had ſettled his Government there, he had ſhew'd more Familiarity and Kindneſs to ſuch Perſons as were moſt noted for their Affection to the King, as finding them more ſteady and punctual than the reſt: And when theſe Men reſorted to him upon this Convention, tho' they cou'd draw nothing from him of Promiſe, or Intimation to any ſuch Purpoſe, yet he was well content that they ſhou'd believe that he carry'd with him good Inclinations to the King. By which Imagination of theirs, he receiv'd great Advantage; for they paid him the Arrears of a Twelve-Month's Tax over the Kingdom; which anſwer'd his Expectation, and enabled him to proceed in his Expedition.

Monk convenes the States of Scotland.

They comply with him.

4. Being thus ſupported, the General began his March towards Berwick on the 18th of November: He advanc'd with ſo much Satisfaction, that it appear'd in his Looks and his Actions, not queſtioning, during the Time of an endleſs Treaty, but that having to deal with a haſty conceited brave Man, inſpired with the Deſigns of a mighty Ambition, he might have Time to gain that by the Sword, which was not to be expected from a Treaty. He was marching full of ſuch Hopes, when being come to Haddington, on the Road from Edinburgh to Berwick, he was ſurpris'd with the bad News of an Accommodation concluded between his Deputies and the Committee of Safety. The Articles were, '1. That the pretended Title of Charles 'Stuart, or any other claiming from that Family, ſhou'd 'be utterly renounced. 2. That the Government of theſe 'Nations ſhou'd be by a Free-State, or Common-wealth, 'and not by a ſingle Perſon, King, or Houſe of Lords. '3. That a Godly and Learned Miniſtry ſhou'd be main'tain'd and encourag'd. 4. That the Univerſities ſhou'd 'be reformed, ſo that they might become Nurſeries of

A Treaty between him and the Committee of Safety.

'Piety and Learning. 5. That all Perſons on either Side ſhou'd be indemnify'd for what is paſt, touching the late Difference, and all Unkindneſs betwixt them bury'd in perpetual Oblivion. 6. That the Officers who were made Priſoners in Scotland ſhou'd be forthwith ſet at Liberty. 7. That the Armies ſhou'd be preſently diſpoſed of into Quarters; as alſo a Committee of Nineteen conſtituted, whereof nine to make a Quorum, which ſhou'd conſider of Qualifications for ſucceeding Parliaments.' Theſe Articles, when read by the Army, appear'd ſo liable to Exceptions, and ſo fitly contriv'd to give the Engliſh Officers an Opportunity of continuing their Tyranny, and oppreſſing Monk's Forces, that they unanimouſly cry'd out, Their Deputies had been frighted or cheated; and that they ought to march on, without any Regard to a Treaty, which had been extorted by Force on one Side, and Fear on the other.

The General, tho' otherwiſe very uneaſie, was pleas'd to obſerve the good Effect that vile Treaty had on his Forces, and conceiv'd great Hopes of the Succeſs of his Deſigns. However he ſuppreſs'd his inward Satisfaction, that his outward Confuſion might ſtill heighten the Indignation of his Officers; and ſo affecting a diſmal Silence, he return'd to Edinburgh, as if he had deſign'd to ſubmit to the Treaty. This Artifice, if ſuch, was altogether ſucceſsful: He was belov'd; and that Melancholy which was believ'd to have ſeiz'd him, very much troubled his Friends, as well as the Reſolution they thought he had taken to admit of the Treaty; ſo that they all urg'd him to except againſt it, to require it ſhou'd be explain'd, and at the ſame Time to march forwards. He heard them without diſcloſing his own Mind, till coming to Edinburgh, and walking in a Room amidſt his Officers, whom he permitted to talk, without anſwering but with thoughtful Looks; one of his Friends, coming in haſtily and abruptly, he ſaid, Well, what ſay you to this Treaty? Truly, Sir, the other reply'd, I have not ſeen it; but I have heard ſo much of it, that I am come to make a Requeſt to you. The General ſeem'd amaz'd, and ask'd him What that cou'd be: He told him a Paſs to go aboard a Veſſel, that was ready to ſail into Holland. The General ſtill more concern'd, urg'd, What, will you leave me in this Condition? For that very Reaſon I wou'd leave you, ſaid the Officer; for after ſuch a Treaty concluded, I cannot ſee how you can eſcape Ruin: For my own Part, I will not reſign my ſelf in cold Blood to the Mercy of my Enemies. Looking upon this as a favourable Opportunity to diſcloſe himſelf without too much Hazard, the General anſwer'd in a louder Voice than before, Will you lay the Blame upon me? I muſt tell you, That if the Army will ſtand by me, I will ſtand by them. Theſe Words wrought ſuch an Effect upon the Company, that every Man cry'd, He wou'd live and die by the General! and they ſhew'd all the moſt joyful Signs of their Obedience and Reſolution to ſhare in their Leader's Fortune. Then calling a Council of War, it was reſolv'd, 'That the Treaty ſhou'd not be abſolutely rejected, that the Enemy might not ſay, they were againſt Peace; but that the Ratification ſhou'd be deferr'd, under Colour of requiring ſome Articles to be explain'd, which ſeem'd ambiguous:' And the better to carry on this Pretence, Colonel Wilks was impriſon'd, for having exceeded his Commiſſion, and made ſome unreaſonable Conceſſions. Nevertheleſs it was agreed, 'That the Army ſhou'd continue their March into England, and advance towards London, unleſs Lambert oblig'd them to fight; which, with very little Management, wou'd give an Opportunity to protract the Explications, the Preliminaries and Conteſts in the Treaty; and they wou'd take Care not to expoſe the Managers, as they had done the firſt Time, to treat in ſuch Places where their Adverſaries were Maſters.

He excepts againſt the Treaty.

The General was the more willing to follow this Advice, becauſe he had Intelligence out of all Parts, by Letters he receiv'd from Ireland, from London, from the Fleet, and from ſome Perſons of Quality in Yorkſhire, who all appear'd ready to eſpouſe his Cauſe; that his Party every where encreas'd, and that of Lambert and the Army in England was look'd upon as Tyrannical, and, unleſs vigorouſly oppos'd, deſigning to ſet up Cromwell's Uſurpation again, and to reſtore the Protectorſhip. Therefore he firſt writ to the Committee of Safety, and particularly to Fleetwood, to acquaint them, 'he had receiv'd the Treaty, and deſired nothing but a good and well-grounded Peace; but that in the ſaid Treaty, there were ſome Articles which cou'd not eſtabliſh ſuch a Peace, unleſs they were better explain'd: That he demanded that Explanation, in the Name of all his Army, and to that Purpoſe they ſhou'd appoint a Place, where they might debate the Matter with Freedom; That in the mean while, to prevent loſs of Time, he wou'd advance forward with his Army, that he might be near enough to ſupport the Laws, and the publick Peace and Liberty.' With theſe Letters to the Committee of Safety, the General ſent others to the Lord-Mayor and Common-Council of Loudon, to acquaint them, 'That as ſoon as he receiv'd the News of the Violence offer'd by the Army to the Parliament, he had writ to them to inform them of the Reſolutions he had thereupon taken for delivering of England from the Yoak of Tyranny: That his Letter had been intercepted, but this wou'd make amends, by letting them know he continu'd firm to that uſeful Deſign, and that he was reſolv'd to draw near to them, that he might put it in Execution: That he deſir'd their Aſſiſtance, and pray'd them to haſten the Succours he promis'd himſelf from their Zeal, and to aſſure themſelves of his for the Preſervation of their Quiet, Liberty and Religion.' Theſe Letters were ſeconded by Declarations, and ſeveral other Papers, artfully drawn up to inform and perſuade the Publick 'of the General's Sincerity he expreſs'd for the ſupporting of the Freedom of the Parliament and Common-wealth, and the Liberties of England, againſt the Tyranny of the Army, and a Military Power.' At the ſame time he march'd forward, and having taken a Review of his Army at Haddington, and viſited Dunbar, and other Places of Moment on that Coaſt, he advanc'd to Berwick, and thence to a Place not far off call'd Coldſtream, ſituated on the Scotch Side of the River Tweed. In this poor Place, but advantagious Poſt, he kept his Head Quarters for above a Month, waiting on the Motions of his formidable Rival Lambert, who then lay with a much ſuperior Force at Newcaſtle.

He removes to Coldſtream.

5. While Affairs continu'd in this State in the Camps at a Diſtance, the City of London grew more and more divided and diſtracted by the various Factions then reigning in the Place. On one Side the Republican Sectarians, who were projecting unknown Schemes, ſtood up for the Remainder of the Long Parliamant; on the other, the Solders in the City were for Fleetwood, and the Committee of Safety: But the Chief of the Citizens, being ſenſible of the horrid Oppreſſions from both, began freely to vent their Complaints, and to look out for more proper Remedies. They complain'd, 'That the Rump-Parliament, made up of the moſt profligate Perſons, was in vain turn'd out, if the Government muſt remain in the Hands of the Committee of Safety, a new Name for old Villains; and the three Cromwells had fallen in vain, if Fleetwood and Lambert muſt be rais'd to Supreme Authority: That the Common-wealth was almoſt ruin'd, whilſt ſacrilegious Robbers contended about Government; That England was never in ſo great Diſtreſs, nor reduc'd to ſuch Extremity; and that having ſuffer'd the greateſt Evils, nothing worſe cou'd befal them.' The Apprentices, whoſe tumultuary Aſſemblies, and confus'd Petitions, had been inſtrumental to the firſt Diſturbances, near twenty Years before, began now to recollect their Spirits; and being abetted by ſome conſiderable Perſons, they flock'd together in great Multitudes with their bold Petitions for a New and Free Parliament. This gave ſuch Offence to the Committee of Safety, that they iſſu'd out a Proclamation againſt them, calling them dangerous Papers, and prohibiting their Subſcriptions; and not content with this, they ſent ſome Forces into the City under Colonel Hewſon, a bold Fellow, who had been an ill Shoemaker, and afterwards Clerk to a Brewer of Small Beer. This Man being ſcorn'd and affronted, killed ſome of the Apprentices in the Streets; which more inflam'd the City againſt the Army, which, they ſaid, was only kept on foot to murther the Citizens.

Complaints and Diſturbances in London.

But that which toucht the Army more nearly in Point of Danger, was the Revolt of Portſmouth, of which Haſlerigg, Walton and Morley, with the Conſent of Whetham the Governor, had taken Poſſeſſion: Which News coming to the Committee of Safety, on the fifth of December, they ſpeedily ſent both Horſe and Foot to reduce the Place. Major Cadwell was firſt ſent, but before he got half Way, above half his Soldiers deſerted him, and joyn'd with the Garriſon; and Major Bremen, who was ſent after him, likewiſe went in to their Aſſiſtance; ſo that they were now ready to march whither their Commanders wou'd conduct them. This, with the Humour of the City, and the Diſcovery of a Cavalier Deſign of ſeizing the Tower, brought Fleetwood and his Committee to a more ſubmiſſive Temper: And finding that nothing wou'd ſaſatisfy the People but Something that had the Name of a Parliament, they came to a ſort of Agreement, and declared, 'That a Parliament ſhou'd be call'd, and appointed to ſit before February next enſuing: Which Parliament ſhou'd be according to ſuch Qualifications as are, or ſhou'd be agreed upon, and may beſt ſecure the juſt Rights, Liberties and Privileges, both Civil and Religious, of the People of this Common-wealth.' At the ſame Time they took Care that no Alteration ſhou'd be made in theſe ſeven Fundamentals, as they were called, '1. That there ſhou'd be no Kingſhip in theſe Nations. '2. No

Portſmouth declares for the Parliament:

'2. No Single Perſon ſhou'd be Chief Magiſtrate. 3. That 'an Army be continu'd, maintain'd, and conducted, to 'ſecure the Peace of the Nation, according to the Con'ſent of ſuch Conſervators as ſhou'd be appointed. 4. That 'no Impoſition be upon the Conſciences of ſuch as feared 'God. 5. That there be no Houſe of Peers. 6. That 'the Legiſlative and Executive Power be diſtinct, and in 'ſeveral Hands. 7. That the Aſſemblies of Parliament 'be elected by the People of the Common-wealth duly Qua'lify'd.' But the City was ſenſible that the Parliament, which they pretended to call, wou'd prove ſuch another Mock-Parliament, compos'd of Sectaries and other intereſted Perſons, as Oliver had formerly call'd; and therefore, notwithſtanding the Writs were fram'd to that Purpoſe, the Diſcontents ſtill continu'd.

And alſo the Fleet.

But before any thing cou'd be brought to Maturiy, the Spirit of the Committee of Safety was broken by the Revolt of their Favourite Vice-Admiral Lawſon, a Man at that Time appearing as much Republican, as much an Independent, and as much an Enemy to the Presbyterians and the Covenant, as Sir Henry Vane Himſelf, whoſe Creature he was; and one to whom they had given that Command in the Fleet, that they might be ſure to keep the Seamen at their Devotion. This Man came ſuddenly into the River Thames, with his whole Squadron, and declared for the Parliament; which ſo ſurpris'd them that they cou'd not believe it; but ſent Sir Henry Vane and two others of great Intimacy with Lawſon, to confer with him; who at their Arrival found Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, and two others, Members of the Parliament, who had ſo fully prepoſſeſs'd Him, that he was deaf to all their Perſuaſions, and told them, That he wou'd ſubmit to no Authority but that of the Parliament. This was immediately ſucceeded by the March of Haſlerigg and Morley from Portſmouth towards London; the News of which rais'd new Thoughts in thoſe Soldiers who had been left by Lambert, to execute ſuch Orders as they ſhou'd receive from the Committee of Safety. The Officers of theſe Regiments had been caſhier'd by the preſent Powers, for adhering to the Parliament; and their Commands having been given to other Men, who had been diſcountenanc'd by the Parliament, the Regiments for a Time were as much confirm'd in the Intereſt of the Army, as cou'd be deſired. But theſe caſhier'd Officers upon theſe Changes in the City and the Navy, and the News of the Advance of Haſlerigg and Morley, reſolv'd to confer with their old Soldiers, and try whether they had as much Credit with them as their new Officers. They ſoon found ſo much Encouragement, that at a fix'd Time they put themſelves into the Heads of their Regiments, and march'd with them into the Field; whence, after a ſhort Conſultation, and Renewal of Vows never more to deſert the Parliament, they all march'd into Chancery-Lane to the Houſe of the Speaker, where they profeſs'd their Reſolution to live and dye with the Parliament, and never more ſwerve from their Fidelity to it. At the ſame Time Desborough's Regiment, which was ſent by Lambert to curb the froward Spirit of the City, having march'd as far as St. Albans, and heard what was done by their Fellows at Weſtminſter, with whom they were to joyn, reſolv'd not to be laſt in their Submiſſions; but declar'd that they were likewiſe for the Parliament, and gave the Speaker Notice of their Obedience.

The Committee of Safety ſubmit to the Parliament.

In all theſe ſtrange Changes in the Soldiers, General Fleetwood remain'd ſtill in Conſultations with the Committee of Safety; and when Intelligence was brought of any Murmur among the Soldiers, which might produce ſome Revolt, and he was deſired to go amongſt them to confirm them, he wou'd fall upon his Knees to his Prayers, and cou'd hardly be prevail'd on to go to them. When he was among them, and in the Middle of any Diſcourſe, he wou'd invite them all to Prayers, and put himſelf upon his Knees before them: And when ſome of his Friends urg'd him to appear more in his Charge, or elſe they muſt all be deſtroy'd, they cou'd get no other Anſwer from him, than, That God had ſpit in his Face, and wou'd not hear him. In ſhort, he was ignorant of his own Strength, and was neither conſtant to Himſelf, nor bravely perfidious; So that Men ceas'd to Wonder why Lambert had made him General, and been content with the ſecond Command for Himſelf. Upon the new Declaration of the Soldiers, Lenthall the Speaker recover'd his Spirit, and went into the City, conferr'd with the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen, and declared to them, That the Parliament wou'd meet within a very few Days. Then he went to the Tower, and by his own Authority remov'd the Lieutenant who had been confirm'd there by the Committee of Safety, and put Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, and other Members of the Parliament into the Government and Command of that Place. And thus ended that unheard-of Government call'd the Committee of Safety, after a ſhort Reign of two Months; and this happen'd in the latter End of December.

What chiefly forwarded this Diſſolution is by Mr. Locke attributed to the Management and Dexterity of Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, who immediately procur'd from the Rump-Parliament a Commiſſion to Himſelf, and two or three more of the moſt weighty and popular Members of the Houſe, to have the Power of General of all the Forces in England, which they were to execute joyntly. This was no ſooner done, but he got them together, where he had provided abundance of Clerks, who were inſtantly order'd to tranſcribe a great many Copies of the Form of a Letter, wherein they recited, 'That it had pleas'd God to reſtore 'the Parliament to the Exerciſe of their Power, and that 'the Parliament had given to them a Commiſſion to com'mand the Army; they therefore commanded them (viz. the Officer to whom the Letter was directed) 'immediately with his Troop, Company or Regiment, 'as it happen'd, to march to.-----' Theſe Letters were directed To the chief Officers of any Part of the Army who had their Quarters together in any Part of England. They were likewiſe diſpatch'd away by particular Meſſengers that very Night; and coming to the ſeveral Officers ſo peremptorily to march immediately, they had not time to aſſemble and debate among themſelves what to do: And having no other Intelligence but 'That the Parliament 'was reſtored, and that London and Portſmouth, and o'ther Parts of England had declared for them;' the Officers durſt not diſobey, but all of them march'd, according to their ſeveral Orders, ſome one Way, and ſome another. So that this Army, which was the great Strength of the Gentlemen of Wallingford Houſe, were by this Means quite diſpers'd, and render'd perfectly uſeleſs to the Committee of Safety, who were hereby totally reduc'd under the Power of the Parliament as ſo many diſarm'd Men to be diſpos'd of as they thought fit. A remarkable Stratagem, and anſwerable to Sir Anthony's penetrating Head.

The Proceedings of the King Abroad.

VI. I. Before we conclude the Hiſtory of this Year's Tranſactions at home, it will be very proper to take ſome Notice of the Proceedings and Motions of the exil'd King abroad. His Majeſty had generally led a quiet and eaſy Life at Bruſſels in all the former Part of the Year, but fluctuating between Hope and Fear, till the Month of May gave him mortifying News of the Reſtoration of the Long Parliament, which had caus'd ſo much Miſchief at home, and ſo much Terror abroad. But in a little Time he receiv'd new Hopes from the Diviſions in England, and the intended Inſurrections in many Parts of the Nation; in all which he was particularly encourag'd by the brave Mr Mordaunt, who, tho' he had his Head ſo lately upon the Block, was more active than any Man, and for which his Majeſty about this Time honour'd him with a Barony. He attended the King in Diſguiſe, receiv'd Inſtructions from him concerning the ſeveral Inſurrections deſign'd, and had particular Cautions given him of the vile Treachery of Sir Richard Willis, of which the King before this Time had receiv'd private and full Satisfaction from Mr. Morland. To favour theſe Riſings, and to make the beſt uſe of them, the King with the Marqueſs of Ormond and the Earl of Briſtol, and two or three Attendants, went with all poſſible Secrecy to Calais; and the Duke of York, with a few others, to Bologn, where he remain'd with equal Privacy, and exact Correſpondence. At Calais the King was revived with the Fame of Sir George Booth's being poſſeſs'd of Cheſter, and of the Conjunction between Him and Middleton, and with the Expectation of a greater Appearance in other Parts. Whereupon he reſolv'd to go Himſelf to ſome other Part of France, from whence he might ſecurely tranſport Himſelf into thoſe Parts of England, where his Friends were in Arms, and ſo went to St. Maloes, and the Coaſt of Bretaigne: while the Duke of York had receiv'd ſecret Promiſes of Aſſiſtance from his brave old Friend Marſhal Turenne. But in a little Time the King receiv'd the fatal News of the Defeat of Sir George Booth, and the total Suppreſſion of all Kind of Oppoſition to the Power of the Parliament; which now ſeem'd to be rivetted in its full Poſſeſſion of the three Kingdoms.

He removes to the Coaſts of France.

Struck with this unhappy Relation, the King and his Brother ſeem'd to have nothing to do, but to haſten out of France; where it was thought they cou'd not remain long in Safety. The Duke of York return'd ſpeedily to Bruſſels; but the King, leſs dejected than might have been expected from the Lowneſs of his Condition, reſum'd a Reſolution he had formerly taken, to make a Journey in Perſon to the Borders of Spain, where the two chief Miniſters of France and Spain, Cardinal Mazarine, and Don Lewis de Haro, had met in great Pomp and Splendor, in order to the Finiſhing an unreaſonable and bloody War, which had laſted between the two Crowns for near Thirty Years, to the Scandal and Reproach of all Chriſtendom. Fontarabia, a Place in the Spaniſh Dominions, on the Borders of France, was agreed upon for their Interview; a little River near that Place, parting both the Kingdoms, and a little Building erected over it, brought the two Favourites to meet, without either of their going out of his Maſter's Dominions. The Cardinal had no leſs than twenty Archbiſhops and Biſhops in his Train, beſides a glorious Equipage; as well knowing how ſuch Appearances wou'd affect the Sanctimonious Spaniard, and help to perſuade him, That his Intentions were pious and upright. This was that famous Treaty which obtain'd the Name of The PYRENEAN, and which concluded with the Marriage of the French King with the Infanta of Spain. The Fame of this Treaty gave ſome Hopes to the King of England; for both Crowns had made the War between them the only Pretence why they did not give him that Aſſiſtance he might reaſonably expect; and both had promis'd, that when that War ſhou'd be at an end, they wou'd ſhow the World, that they took the King's Caſe to be their own: So that his Majeſty might juſtly promiſe Himſelf ſome Advantage and Benefit from this Peace; eſpecially after he had receiv'd Encouragement from his Agent Sir Henry Bennet at Fontarabia, who let him know from Don Lewis, ‘ That if his Majeſty wou'd come incognito thither, after the great Difficulties of the Treaty were over, he wou'd do all he cou'd to induce the Cardinal to concur in what might be moſt for his Convenience.’

Cardinal Mazarine againſt it.

In order to this Journey, the King had privately ſent to the Cardinal to deſire a Paſſport; which his Eminence refus'd to grant, but with ſome ſlight Promiſes of his Care and Aſſiſtance in due Time: And at the ſame time he receiv'd Lockhart, who was Ambaſſador from the Engliſh Parliament, with all the open Marks of Eſteem and Reſpect, and with all Aſſurances, ‘ That he wou'd never make a Peace without the Conſent and Incluſion of England.’ However the King reſolv'd to take a Journey through France, and appear with all Privacy at the Treaty, which now drew near to an End: And accordingly, being accompany'd with the Marqueſs of Ormond, the Earl of Briſtol, Daniel O Neale, and two or three other Servants, he wheel'd about by Lyons and Languedoc, entertaining Himſelf with the Varieties of the Country, till by a miſtaken Report of the Treaty being ended, he was carried as far as Saragoſa in Spain, where he ſtaid for further Intelligence. What Opinion the Cardinal had of this Journey and Deſign, will beſt appear from his own Letters, which have been ſince publiſh'd to the World. In one of which to Monſieur Le Tellier then Secretary of State, he has theſe Words: ‘ Don Lewis told me of a Letter he had from the King of England, dated from Saragoſa, deſiring to viſit and entertain him upon the Subject of his Affairs. That he had return'd Anſwer, That his Majeſty ſhou'd be receiv'd with due Honour; and accordingly he will be to Morrow at Fontarabia, and lodg'd even in Don Lewis's Houſe, where all Things are prepared for him. I told Don Lewis in Raillery, That ſince the Duke of Lorrain was alſo come, together with an Ambaſſador from Portugal, and Agents from Mentz, Cologne, Newburg, and from the Prince of Conde, there need be no doubt but the Comedy drew juſt to an End, ſince all the Actors thus appear'd on the Stage; but he need not be jealous that I ſhou'd debauch any of his Gueſts from him.-----As to the King of England, he has been ill advis'd to take a Journey to no Purpoſe; for Don Lewis and I know, as well as Himſelf, that he is diſpoſſeſs'd of his Right, and of all he can urge to move our Maſters to reſtore him, not only in reſpect of the wicked Murder of his Father, but of the Danger of a growing Republick, which in Time might make Work for the whole Neighbourhood: But ſtill he ought to reflect, that neither We nor Spain are to hazard our own Affairs for His. This King had made it 120 Leagues more than he needed to reach this Place: He went by Tholouſe and the Valley d'Aran to Saragoſa, ſuſpecting that I ſhou'd have ſtopp'd him, becauſe he had been deny'd a Paſſport to come into France. But cou'd he think we were ignorant of his going into Normandy, or any Step he made in his Progreſs through France, or even of his Intentions to do it? But it is the Fate of this Prince, he neither knows how to chuſe for Himſelf, nor has any one near him that is able to adviſe better.’ The whole Current of the Cardinal's Letters and Reports to the French Court, is to paint out Don Lewis alſo ‘ for a heavy, ſlow, irreſolute Man, ill inform'd in his own Affairs, and wanting a Heart for greater Things: That he had run him down in every Argument: That at ſeveral Times he had outwitted him by mere Pretence of Paſſion, ſometimes loud, ſometimes ſullen, to the mighty Advantage of France: He ſays he repreſents every minute Paſſage, in order to inſtruct his Maſter in the Arts of Negotiations, and the Notions he ought to imbibe of Men and Things.’ In ſhort, there is every where diſpers'd a magnificent Character of Himſelf; and he ſeem'd to delight in nothing more than to excel in all the Myſteries of Circumvention; of which this was the chief, That his Enemy ſhou'd leave him in Peace, and He his Enemy in War.

His Opinion of the Journey.

The King's Reception at Fontarabia.

2. His Britiſh Majeſty arriv'd at Fontarabia on the 25th of October, New Stile, where he was receiv'd by Don Lewis according to the Spaniſh Mode and Generoſity, upon his Knees, and with the ſame Reverence that cou'd be ſhew'd to his own King, had he been in that Place. He let him know, ‘ how much his Maſter was troubled that the Condition of his Affairs, and the ſudden Neceſſity that was upon him to make a long Journey, wou'd not permit him to invite his Majeſty to Madrid, and to treat him ſuitable to his Grandeur: That now having happily concluded the Peace, he had nothing ſo much in his Thoughts, as how he might be able to afford ſuch Aſſiſtance as his Majeſty needed.’ Don Lewis for himſelf made all thoſe Profeſſions, that cou'd be expected from him; and he confeſs'd, That there was no Proviſion made in the Treaty, That the two Crowns ſhou'd jointly aſſiſt his Majeſty; but that he believ'd the Cardinal wou'd be ready to perform all good Offices towards him; and for his Particular, his Majeſty ſhou'd receive good Teſtimony of the profound Veneration he had for him. He likewiſe intimated a Wiſh, that he cou'd yet have ſome Conference with the Cardinal, who was at a little Diſtance, at his old Quarters St. Jean de Luz. Upon which the King ſent the Marqueſs of Ormond to viſit his Eminence, and to let him know, That his Majeſty had a Deſire to come and confer with him, and to receive his Counſel and Advice. But the Cardinal wou'd by no Means admit it, and ſaid it wou'd adminiſter unſeaſonable Jealouſy to the Parliament of England, without any manner of Benefit to the King. According to his way, he made large Profeſſions of his Affections to the King, but deſir'd, he wou'd have Patience till the Marriage ſhou'd be over, which wou'd be in the next Spring, till when their Majeſties muſt remain in thoſe Parts: But as ſoon as that was diſpatch'd, the whole Court wou'd return to Paris; and that it wou'd not be long there, before he gave the King ſome Evidence of his Kindneſs and Reſpect. The Marqueſs cou'd obtain no better Anſwer than this; but Don Lewis, with a Thouſand Excuſes, That their Expences had been ſo great, as had waſted all their Mony, preſented his Majeſty with ſeven Thouſand Gold Piſtoles, to defray, as he ſaid, the Expences of his Journey, with Aſſurance, That, when he came into Flanders, he ſhould find all neceſſary Orders for the better accommodating his Affairs.

Don Lewis was not only thus generous in his Purſe, but was earneſt in his Solicitations to the Cardinal, as appears from his Eminence's Letter to Monſieur le Tellier, on the 6th of November, in which he ſays, ‘ That Don Lewis had very particularly ask'd him the Queſtion, if he might give the King of England any Hopes of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's good Will for his Reſtoration? and that Don Lewis had mention'd it with great Tenderneſs, ſpeaking much to that King's Advantage; adding, That he was not a violent or troubleſome Solicitor, like the Duke of Lorrain, but mov'd with great Gentleneſs for what might change his unhappy Condition for a better. To this, ſays He, I reply'd, That my Maſter wanted not Compaſſion, but it was not a Seaſon to be drawn into new Troubles. I pray'd him not to be miſ-led by that King, or his Miniſters, who wou'd pretend that a ſmall Succour wou'd do their Work: For I knew as well as if I had been preſent, all that they did, or cou'd ſay to Him, and all they hop'd for from the troubleſome Conjuncture, and the Help of Friends in England, and the ſeveral Ports devoted to Him for his Landing, and what great Matters might be done by the Aid of four or five Thouſand Men: For if we but engage in a Little, he thinks we are faſt for the Whole. I told him, That his ſaid Majeſty was too credulous, and that there were other Difficulties than he imagin'd. And becauſe I found Don Lewis but too yielding to their Deſires, who had indeed ask'd but four or five Thouſand Men; I plainly told him, That ſince by the preſent Peace his Catholick Majeſty had Men to ſpare, it was not likely he wou'd conſent to let another partake in the Glory of eſtabliſhing a King, when it cou'd be done at ſo cheap a Rate.’ In ſhort, the whole Strain of the Cardinal's Conduct towards the Exile King and his Miniſters, ſeems to ſavour of that his native Principle, That whoſoever is affronted once, muſt be perſecuted for ever.

The whole Time of the King's Stay at Fontarabia was about twenty Days; during which Time it is juſtly believ'd that his Majeſty, as well as two of his Attendants, the Earl of Briſtol and Sir Henry Bennet, was prevail'd on by the Importunity of the Spaniard and the Privacy of the Place, to embrace the Religion of the Church of Rome, at leaſt in outward Appearance. This is a Secret not well diſcover'd by any publick Writer; yet the Particulars were well known to the Lord Clarendon, who, tho' for good Reaſons he might be very tender in this Point, ſeems plainly to glance at it when he ſays, That the Cardinal told Don Lewis, 'That it was rather Time for all Catholicks to unite to the breaking the Power and Intereſt of the Heretical Party, wherever it was, than to ſtrengthen it by reſtoring the King of England, except he wou'd become Catholick.' And then he immediately adds, 'And it is believ'd by wiſe Men, that in that Treaty, ſomewhat was agreed to the Prejudice of the Proteſtant Intereſt; and that in a ſhort Time, there wou'd have been much done againſt it both in France and Germany, if the Meaſures they had there taken had not been ſhortly broken, chiefly by the ſurpriſing Revolution in England, &c.' And tho' he afterwards ſays that the King gave great Indications of his own Steadineſs when he return'd to Bruſſels, yet he immediately adds, 'That many made little Doubt, but that it wou'd ſhortly be very manifeſt to the King, that his Reſtoration depended wholly upon a Conjunction of Catholick Princes, who cou'd never be united, but on the Behalf of the Catholick Religion,' But this Secret has been more fully acknowledg'd of late Years, by the eldeſt Son of this noble Author, and more particularly by the Marqueſs, afterwards Duke of Ormond, who beſt knew the whole Matter, and who has declared to ſeveral Perſons of Worth and Honour, 'That He himſelf, to his great Surpriſe and Concern, accidentally in a Morning early, ſaw the King in the great Church on his Knees before the High Altar, with ſeveral Prieſts and Eccleſiaſticks about him: That he was ſoon after confirm'd in his Sentiments by Sir Henry Bennet and the Earl of Briſtol, who both own'd the King to be a Catholick, as well as Themſelves: The Former was of an Opinion, that the King ought in Policy to declare his Religion, as the moſt hopeful Method to recover his Dominions; but the Latter look'd upon it as the moſt dangerous Advice that cou'd be given, ſuch as wou'd be the Ruin of the King's Cauſe; and it was finally agreed by the Majority of the little Court there, that this Change ſhou'd be kept as the greateſt Secret imaginable.' After the Reſtoration the Marqueſs of Ormond thought it convenient, or neceſſary, to diſcover the whole Matter to the Earl of Clarendon the Chancellor, and the Earl of Southampton the Treaſurer; who readily joyn'd in promoting that Act of Parliament in 1661, which makes it ſo penal for any Perſon to ſay that the King was a Papiſt; which lock'd up the Mouths of all, as well thoſe few who juſtly believ'd, as thoſe many who groundleſsly ſuſpected the King's Religion.

On the 12th of November the King prepar'd for his Return from Fontarabia; and on that Day the Cardinal writ his laſt Letter to Le Tellier, in which he has theſe Words, 'I have given Leave that the King of England may, in his Way to Bruſſels, ſecurely paſs through France.' However, his Majeſty, having receiv'd the forementioned Preſent from Don Lewis, and ſome new Promiſes of engaging the Cardinal in his Favour, departed with no little Satisfaction, as appears from one of Chancellor Hyde's Letters to Dr. Barwick, in which he ſays, 'I may tell you, his Majeſty is very much deceiv'd Himſelf, if both Crowns are not reſolv'd to aſſiſt him.' The King took Paris in his Way to viſit the Queen his Mother, with whom a good Underſtanding was made upon removing all former Miſtakes; and towards the End of December he return'd ſafely to Bruſſels, where he found his two Royal Brothers, the Dukes of York and Gloceſter, impatiently expecting him. The Pleaſure and Variety of his Journey, and the civil Treatment he had receiv'd from Don Lewis, with the good Diſpoſition he had found in his Mother, had much reviv'd the King's Spirits, and the Joy for his Return diſpers'd the preſent Clouds; but he had not been long at Bruſſels, before he diſcern'd the ſame Melancholy in the Looks of his Friends, which he had left there. All which was confirm'd and encreas'd by the News they receiv'd from England, That the Power of the Committee of Safety was at an End, and that the Remnant of the Long Parliament had again aſſum'd the Government of the Three Kingdoms, out of which they had been twice before ejected with ſo much Reproach and Infamy. This ſurpriſing Reſurrection of the Parliament that had been ſo often deſpiſed, ſo often buried, and was the only Image of Power that was moſt formidable to the King and his Party, ſeem'd now to eradicate all their Hopes; and was interpreted by that Party, as an Act of Providence to eſtabliſh all their Murders and Uſurpations. A little before this Change, the Cardinal himſelf, as well as the Spaniſh Miniſters, began to ſhow a Readineſs to advance any Deſign of the King's; but when they ſaw thoſe inveterate Men in Poſſeſſion of the Government, who reſolv'd to level all Powers that oppos'd them, they look'd upon the Parliament as more ſecurely ſettled againſt all Domeſtick Diſturbances, and more formidable with Reſpect to their Neighbours, than it had been under Cromwell Himſelf: and thought of nothing more, than how to make advantagious and firm Alliances with it.

Chancellor Hyde's Correſpondence with Dr. Barwick.

3. Notwithſtanding all the diſcouraging Proſpects of this Year 1659, Chancellor Hyde continually exerted himſelf in the Royal Cauſe by his Letters, Meſſages, and other Correſpondencies in England, but more eſpecially during the King's Abſence from Bruſſels, which was the greateſt Part of ſix Months. He had a conſtant Communication with many of the King's Party, but with none more cordially and effectually than Dr. John Barwick, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, a moſt worthy Divine, who had been ejected out of his Fellowſhip in St. John's College in Cambridge, and after that, for his bravely attempting the Relief of the King and Church, had met with new Sufferings from the perſecuting Spirit of the Times. Between Hyde and this loyal Man there paſs'd many Letters, which I have had the Favour to ſee and tranſcribe from the Originals; and by which it appears, that the Chancellor beſtow'd more Pains this Year for the Good and Recovery of the Engliſh Nation, than he has thought fit to take Notice of in his famous Hiſtory. His tender Care for the Church of England, and his Proviſion for the Succeſſion of Biſhops, do every where appear in theſe Letters; ſo that his Memory muſt be eſteem'd by all that are true Lovers of that Conſtitution. In one of his Letters he ſays, 'The King hath done all that is in his Power, and if my Lords the Biſhops will not do the reſt, what can become of the Church? The Conſpiracies to deſtroy it are very evident, and if there be no Combination to preſerve it, it muſt expire. I do aſſure you, the Names of all the Biſhops who are alive, and their ſeveral Ages, are as well known in Rome as in England; and both the Papiſts and the Presbyterians value themſelves very much upon computing, in how few Years the Church of England muſt expire.' In another Letter he has theſe Words, 'Aſſure your ſelf, thoſe Princes, who think Epiſcopacy of the Eſſential of the Chriſtian Religion, wou'd yet be very glad to ſee it determin'd and expir'd in England.' As to the Preſervation of the Church, and preferring the moſt worthy Perſons in it, he always paid a particular Deference to the Opinion of Dr. Wren, Biſhop of Ely, then a Priſoner in the Tower; and ſtill looking upon the King as a true Proteſtant, he writes thus in another Letter; 'His Majeſty is not more fix'd in any Principle, than in the Belief that the Church can never be reſtored and repaired by any Expedient, but the Learning, Virtue, and Reputation of the Churchmen; and he will be ſo careful in making that Proviſion, that I have heard him often ſay, That he wou'd abhor that Churchman, who wou'd give the leaſt Sum of Mony for the greateſt Preferment, and turn away that Servant who wou'd endeavour to get Mony that Way; and I think him as unlike to ſwerve from that Reſolution, as ever Prince was.' Then as to himſelf, he declares in another Letter, 'If I can help it, if the King was at Whitehall to Morrow, he ſhou'd never prefer any Man in the Church, who ſought it; and I think I have Reaſon to believe his Majeſty is of that Mind.------ There is indeed too much Reaſon to doubt, that if the Crown was reſtored to Morrow, the Church wou'd not be repaired in many Years: Yet I am of Opinion, that it will be either totally ruin'd, towards which there is too great a Conſpiracy between Perſons who agree in nothing elſe, or elſe that it will be reſtored to a great Luſtre: For all Diſcourſes of the Treaty at the Iſle of Wight trouble me little; ſince as I am confident the King will never endure it, ſo if he ſhou'd conſent to it, it can never be reduc'd to Practice, or a Peace be eſtabliſh'd in the Kingdom by it.----I hope God Almighty will work one Miracle more for preſerving the Church, as he did many for the eſtabliſhing it.'

Theſe, and ſuch like Negotiations, the noble Writer has thought proper to omit in his Hiſtory, and likewiſe a remarkable Incident at this Time, in which no other Writer, that we know of, has been exact and particular. This was the Contract of Marriage of his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, who was ſo captivated with the Perſon of the young Lady Anne, eldeſt Daughter of the Chancellor, that he promis'd and reſolv'd to make her his Wife; which he afterwards with all Privacy confirm'd, when he had the ſtrongeſt Temptations to the contrary. This has been charg'd upon the Chancellor as a high Preſumption, in daring, without his Majeſty's Knowledge, to mingle his own with the Royal Blood; but we have all Reaſon to believe, that this was for a Time kept as much a Secret from the Chancellor, as it was from the King. However it was projected, this Marriage prov'd of ineſtimable Conſequence; for beſides the ſecuring of the Proteſtant teſtant Religion, and innumerable other Benefits, it produc'd two Daughters, who prov'd the greateſt Ornament, as well as Bleſſing of the three Kingdoms.

The Death of Biſhop Morton,

Bp. Brownrig,

Mr. Salkeld,

Dr. Fuller,

Mr. Moor,

Mr. Oſbaldeſtone,

And here we ſhall conclude the old Year 1659 with the ſhort Characters of the moſt conſiderable Men who dy'd in that Space of Time; and firſt of two worthy Prelates, as firſt, Dr. Thomas Morton, Biſhop of Durham, educated in St. John's College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, a learned, pious, and venerable Perſon, who happily employ'd his Pen both againſt Superſtition and Faction, and held great Correſpondence with eminent Foreigners of different Perſuaſions; After he had gone through many Preferments, and undergone many Changes and Alterations, he dy'd very old, wanting but five of a hundred Years. The other was Dr. Ralph Brownrig, Biſhop of Exeter, a great Man for the Anti-Arminian Cauſe, yet a mighty Champion for the Liturgy of the Church, and Ordination by Biſhops alone: He was formerly Maſter of Catharine-Hall in Cambridge, in which Univerſity he eminently ſhewed his Parts and Abilities; but he enjoy'd his Biſhoprick but a very ſhort time, ſo that he was forc'd to retire to a private Gentleman's Family, till, a Year before he dy'd, he was invited to be Preacher of the Temple; which Place he ſupply'd with admirable Succeſs and Applauſe, ſo that his Death was highly lamented by Men of all Parties. After theſe Prelates we are to mention two or three other eminent Divines, and particularly Mr. John Salkeld, a Perſon who was for ſome Years a Jeſuit of the Church of Rome, and profoundly read in Theological and other Authors; but being for the Fame of his Learning brought before King James, he was ſo far convinc'd by his Majeſty's Arguments as to come over to the Church of England, for which he was wont to ſtile himſelf The Royal Convert; and that King honour'd him ſo far as to call him The Learned Salkeld in his Works and Writings. The next we are to mention is Dr. William Fuller, Dean of Durham, and an eminent London Divine, who was educated in all kinds of Learning in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and afterwards became famous for it, his Wiſdom, Piety, and excellent Preaching; but in the Times of Trouble he loſt all his Preferments, and dy'd very obſcurely not long before the Time of Triumph. After him is Mr. William Moor, Fellow of Caius-College in Cambridge, and Library-Keeper to that Univerſity, a great Divine, a general Scholar, and a celebrated Antiquary, who became famous for the Number and Eminency of his Pupils; and is ſtill remember'd with Honour for his Beneficence to his College, his Labours in his Station, and particularly his painful collecting the Univerſity Statutes into one Body. The laſt Divine we ſhall mention is Mr. Lambert Oſbaldeſtone, a learned Man, once chief School-maſter of Weſtminſter, and Prebendary of that Church, of whom ſome Account is given in the Year 1637; who loſt his School that Year by Means of a ſevere Sentence in the Star-Chamber, at a Time when there were above fourſcore Doctors of the three great Faculties in the two Univerſities, who gratefully acknowledg'd their Education under him: Afterwards favouring the Royal Cauſe, he was forc'd to live retiredly for the moſt Part, and in this Year dy'd in great Obſcurity.

Bradſhaw,

And Prideaux.

Beſides all theſe there dy'd the infamous Bradſhaw, in Denomination the chief of the Regicides, on the 31ſt Day of October, who for ſeveral Years, tho' with large Intermiſſions of his Power, ſeem'd to have been intoxicated with the Title of Lord Preſident, and with the Guard and Appearance of the chief Magiſtrate of the Common-wealth of England. We need not here ſay any thing of his Family and Character, which has been already remember'd; but only to take Notice, that as ſoon as Lambert had in Appearance deſtroy'd the Parliament, he ſunk, and was extreamly dejected. At his laſt Appearance in the Council of State, when Colonel Sydenham in a Speech endeavoured to juſtify the Proceedings of the Army, and to prove, as every Party then pretended, That they were neceſſitated to uſe this laſt Remedy by a particular Call of the Divine Providence; he declared his Abhorrence, and told the Council, That being now going to his God, he had not Patience to hear his great Name ſo openly blaſphemed; and ſo departed, and withdrew from publick Employment. Within a few Days after, being on his Death-bed, and adviſ'd by a Gentleman to examine himſelf about the Matter of the King's Death, he anſwer'd, That if it were to do again, he wou'd be the firſt Man that ſhou'd do it, and ſo dy'd without the leaſt Signs of Remorſe or Repentance. His Body was carry'd out with great State and Attendance, and interr'd in Weſtminſter-Abby, and, as Heath expreſſes it, his Crime publiſh'd for his Commendation; his Funeral Sermon being preach'd by Mr. Rowe, beginning with this Text out of Iſaiah, The righteous periſheth, and no Man layeth it to heart; and merciful Men are taken away, &c. Not long before, in the Month of Auguſt, there dy'd a Friend of his, Mr. Edmund Prideaux, a good Chancery Lawyer, and true Parliamentarian, who was made Attorney-General and Poſt-Maſter during the whole Uſurpation, by which he got a vaſt Eſtate, leaving, as it is credibly reported, ſixty thouſand Pounds in Gold in his Coffers, beſides Lands of a very great Value.

Monk and Lambert againſt each other.

VI. We are now arriv'd at our laſt great Stage, and juſt entering into that glorious Year 1660, ſo famous for the wonderful Changes it produc'd in the three Kingdoms. Darkneſs and Confuſion had overſpread the Nation; Mens Minds were perplexed and diſtracted with innumerable Imaginations and Conjectures; and at this Time there was a general Expectation of a Storm in the North from the two Armies of Monk and Lambert, who for above a Month together kept their Stations, the former at Coldſtream, and the latter at Newcaſtle and the neighbouring Parts. They both ſeem'd reſolv'd to end the Quarrel by the Sword; tho' Monk at the ſame Time made a great Advantage under the Notion of Treaty, which he cunningly protracted by a new Pretence, upon the Revolt of Portſmouth, and the Defection of the Fleet. Lambert's Army was more formidable in Appearance, and much more numerous, eſpecially in Horſe, but was ill paid, and not ſo well modell'd and ſecured as Policy required. Monk's Forces were under better Diſcipline, more enured to Labours and Hardſhips, and better able to encounter with thoſe prodigious Quantities of Ice and Snow, that had then cover'd the Land after an extraordinary Manner. But Lambert, by reaſon of his victorious Army, ſeem'd ſtill to have much the Advantage and Superiority.

Fairfax prepares to aſſiſt the former.

While both Armies lay in this Poſture, in the Month of December, the famous old General, the Lord Fairfax, who had more than any Man turn'd the Scale againſt the Royal Cauſe, began to exert himſelf, and to ſhew the trueſt and moſt effectual Marks of his Repentance. He then dwelt at Nun-Appleton near York; where beſides a Letter he receiv'd from the King by the Hands of Sir Horatio Townſend, he receiv'd One from General Monk, urging him to joyn with him againſt Lambert, 'who was an Enemy to Parliaments, and oppreſs'd the Northern Counties with Taxes and Free Quarters.' Upon which he reſolv'd to attempt it, notwithſtanding the Difficulty of the Adventure, the Shortneſs of the Warning, and his own great Infirmities at that Time; and accordingly he ſent to ſeveral of his old Friends, Sir Hugh Bethel, Colonel Smithſon, and others, to acquaint them with his Intention of having a Meeting and Rendezvous the firſt Day of January, on Marſton-Moor. It was very neceſſary that General Monk ſhou'd be fully acquainted with this; but the firſt Meſſenger was unhappily ſtop'd in his Paſſage through Lambert's Army. Upon which his Lordſhip reſolv'd to ſend his Kinſman upon this Difficult Errand, young Mr. Brian Fairfax, from whom I had this Account; who late at Night receiving Inſtructions from Mr. Bowles, a worthy Miniſter in York, ſet forwards the next Morning in the Habit of a Peaſant, accompany'd with an ordinary Guide. Being ſtrong and well mounted, he travell'd Day and Night over the ſlippery and ſnowy Mountains of Yorkſhire, Weſtmorland and Cumberland; and having ſurmounted the Inconvenience of his Guide's lam'd Horſe, and the imminent Danger of Death from the Moſs-Troopers, he arriv'd ſafely firſt at Kelſey and then at Coldſtream. At Midnight he found General Monk at his Head Quarters in a poor thatcht Houſe with ſeveral Officers about him. Then ſecretly delivering him his Meſſage, with the Account of Fairfax's Day of Rendezvous, and repeating 'the Neceſſity of watching Lambert's Army, that they fell not upon them in Yorkſhire,' the General in the vulgar Phraſe anſwer'd, I will watch him, as a Cat watches a Mouſe; not a Troop ſhall ſtir, but I will follow them. After Half an Hour's Converſation, and a little Refreſhment, Mr. Fairfax returned with all Expedition, and got back to Appleton on the laſt Day of December; having perform'd this diſmal Journey of near three hundred Miles, without any other Sleep but taking ſome inconſiderable Reſt in a Chair.

Which occaſions a general Defection of Lambert's Army.

This ſecret Negotiation, not mention'd by any former Writer, prov'd of great Importance; and the very next Morning, being the appointed Day, the Lord Fairfax, now afflicted both in Body and Mind, repaired to the Place of Rendezvous, where with his Son-in-Law the Duke of Buckingham, he met with Sir Thomas Slingsby, and many other brave Gentlemen, attended with a good Appearance of Horſe. The Fame of this Riſing, under ſo great and beloved a Commander, had an immediate Influence upon Lambert's Men; inſomuch that the noted Iriſh Brigade of no leſs than twelve Hundred Horſe, in the Rear of his Army, preſently forſook him, and came over to Fairfax; being commanded by Colonel Redman, Goodman, Stroud, &c. This, together with a Vote from the new reſtored Parliament at Weſtminſter, 'That all their Armies ſhou'd 'return to the ſeveral Quarters they were in before the 'Month of October,' caus'd ſuch a general Defection in Lambert's Army, that he was forc'd to fly with leſs than a hundred Horſe; being ſome time after taken and committed to the Tower. Fairfax in the mean Time march'd directly to York, where Lambert's Friend Colonel Lilburn was Governor, with his own Regiment, who refus'd him Entrance. But ſeveral worthy Gentlemen, Sir Philip Monkton and others, declared for his Lordſhip, and ſome of them, with more Zeal than Diſcretion, for the King; ſo that in a few Days the Gates were ſet open. Thus far the Lord Fairfax help'd forwards the great Machine; and he was the firſt Man in England that openly declar'd not only againſt Lambert, but for a Free Parliament, the neareſt Step to the King's Reſtoration. And his Son-in-Law, the Duke of Buckingham, in a Manuſcript Letter to the King afterwards, has theſe Words, 'As to your Majeſty's Reſtoration, I may claim my Share of Honour, being then with my Lord Fairfax; and if he had not declared againſt Lambert, Monk had never march'd into England.' And ſo far was the Way plain'd, and the Paſſage open'd to let in the great Deliverer.

Monk's March towards London.

2. And now the Clouds began to diſſipate, and to produce ſome Appearance of the Sun, tho' it gave but a mean Glimmering, and uncertain ſort of Light: And General Monk, being further encourag'd by the News of the Seizure of Dublin-Caſtle, and the Declaration of Sir Charles Coot in Ireland for the Parliament, immediately diſpos'd his Army to march up towards London; and having firſt ſent Major-General Morgan back with ſome Forces to ſecure the Peace of Scotland, Himſelf with about four thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, paſs'd the River Tweed on Sunday the firſt of January, in order to advance directly forwards the next Day. His Men were all ſuch in whoſe Affections he had full Confidence, who readily march'd up to the Knees in Snow and Ice, in hopes of warmer Quarters in the South, and of doing ſome ſignal Service for their Leader. He march'd without making any Halt through Wooler, Morpeth, Newcaſtle and Durham, till he arriv'd at the City of York, where he ſtay'd five Days. At the firſt of theſe Places he receiv'd a Meſſage from the Parliament, of the Re-eſtabliſhment of their Authority, with Thanks for his Care and Fidelity. At the next Place he receiv'd an Expreſs from the Common-Council of the City of London, declaring their Deſires for a full Parliament, wherein they might have ſome Share; alledging, 'That they had never a Member in this pretended Parliament, to repreſent their Renowned City.' In all Places he was met by the Gentry of the Counties through which he paſs'd, and ſaluted by all the People with loud Acclamations of Joy; every one expecting ſomething Great and Wonderful to happen by his Means and Abilities. But in all this Journey, the General wiſely cover'd Himſelf with Silence and Darkneſs; and tho' he was apply'd to by many great and worthy Perſons, yet he kept himſelf upon a cloſe Guard, and anſwer'd in general Terms, That his Endeavours ſhou'd never be wanting for the Good and Welfare of his Country.

He meets Fairfax at York.

At York the General was receiv'd by the Lord Fairfax with open Arms, who, tho' extreamly afflicted with the Gout and Stone, invited his Excellency to dine at his Country Houſe in Appleton. Much was expected from the Interview of two ſuch Great Men and Soldiers, noted for their Taciturnity; but the Lord was much freer in declaring his Mind, as to a Free Parliament, &c. than the General thought fit to diſcover. The Latter was continually attentive, and handſomly receiv'd the Requeſts of his Lordſhip and Gentry of that large County, firſt in Perſon, and then in Writing, 'That he wou'd be Inſtrumental in reſtoring his Native Country to her Liberties, and to the making up thoſe Fences which had been thrown down by ſo many Years Diſtractions; either by reſtoring thoſe which were violently and forcibly ſecluded in 1648, to their Truſt; or elſe by cauſing a free and full Parliament to be call'd and elected by the free Votes of the Country, according to the undoubted Birthright of every Engliſhman.' This, and other Addreſſes to the ſame Purpoſe, he receiv'd with much Civility, and few Words: He took all Occaſions publickly to declare, That nothing ſhou'd ſhake his Fidelity to the preſent Parliament; yet privately aſſur'd thoſe, who he believ'd ought to hope well, That he wou'd procure a free Parliament; ſo that every one promis'd himſelf what he moſt deſir'd. But Mr. Bowls the Miniſter, being alone with him at Midnight, went further than a Free Parliament, and urg'd him to ſtay at York, and declare for the King; aſſuring him of great Aſſiſtance. Which being immediately told to Mr. Price his Chaplain, he put him in Mind of the Saying of Guſtavus when he enter'd the German Empire, That if his Shirt knew what he intended to do, he wou'd tear it from his Back and burn it. So the General wiſely reſolv'd to ſleep till he got within the Walls of London, and then to open his Eyes, and conſider what he had to do.

16$\frac{59}{60}$. Car. II.

But in the mean Time, before he left York, he thought fit again to conſider the Temper of his Army, which was now encreas'd by ſeveral revolted Parties; and accordingly he modell'd Lambert's and Lilburn's Regiments of Horſe, giving the firſt to Bethel, and the Latter to Smythſon, and chang'd moſt of the other Officers. Which done, he waited for new Orders from the Rulers at Weſtminſter.

The Proceedings of the Parliament.

3. The March and Motions of General Monk ſoon became the Diſcourſe and Wonder of the whole Nation, and gradually rais'd the Fears and Apprehenſions of the Parliament, tho' at firſt they had look'd upon him as their Deliverer and Reſtorer to their Places. They were no ſooner ſeated, but they took all poſſible Care to eſtabliſh their full Power and Authority: They caſhier'd and impriſon'd ſeveral Officers of the Army, who had acted againſt them; and Sir Henry Vane, Major Saloway, and divers other Members of the Houſe who had concurr'd with the Committee of Safety, were likewiſe confin'd to their Houſes: They reſolv'd upon a new Council of State, conſiſting of about Thirty, as Monk, Fairfax, Haſlerigg, Morley, Wallop, Scot, Love, Weaver, White, Reynolds, Robinſon, Rolls, Harrington, Thompſon, Widdrington, Dixwell, Saint John, Nevil, Fagg, Corbet, Challoner, Say, Aſhley-Cooper, Lawſon, Berners, Foot, Love, Terril and Bethel. To ſtrengthen their Power, as they thought, they appointed that every one of theſe ſhou'd, before they act, take a ſolemn Oath of Abjuration of the King and all his Family, together with all Government by a ſingle Perſon, or Houſe of Lords. Which Oath being in ſtricter Terms than any before, caus'd many to diſlike it; but the Leaders that promoted it alledg'd, 'That without that, they cou'd have no certain Aſſurance of Power; and that the Hollanders and thoſe of the United Provinces cou'd never be fix'd in their Government, till they had made a Renunciation of the King of Spain.' And the Matter was carry'd to that Height, that not thinking it enough for the Council of State, they urg'd that every Member of the Houſe ſhou'd alſo take the ſaid Oath. This was much oppos'd by Fielder, Weaver, Dove, Hutchinſon, Ingoldsby, both the Puries, and many more of the ſoberer Sort, who alledg'd, 'That it wou'd be a confining of Providence to make ſuch an Oath, a Snare to many good Men, and a Terror to ſuch as were truly conſcientious; who might ſuſpect this to be the Forerunner of many Oaths to fetter their Liberties.' Moſt of theſe were Perſons of whom they had no Jealouſy, ſo that it caus'd a great Diviſion in the Houſe; and when the Act for the Council of State came to be executed by the Adminiſtration of the Oath, Weaver, Morley, Fagg, Saint John, and ſeveral more, to a third Part at leaſt, refuſ'd it, and were therefore not admitted to ſit and act.

They grow ſuſpicious of Monk,

When theſe new Governours found themſelves ſo much at Eaſe, as to be out of Danger from Lambert, they heartily wiſh'd that General Monk was again in his old Poſt in Scotland. But as he continu'd his March to York, without expecting their Orders, ſo they decently knew not how to command a Perſon to return, whom they had ſent for to aſſiſt them, without ſeeing him, and giving him Thanks and a Reward for his Service: Yet they were deſirous to leſſen his Forces as much as they cou'd, and caus'd him to ſend back Part of them into Scotland; and then to ballance his Greatneſs and Popularity, they began ſecretly to favour and employ Fleetwood's and Lambert's Officers. They were daily allarm'd with ſome Particular or other in his March and Stay at York; and his receiving ſo many Addreſſes from the People, and his treating ſome Parties ſo civilly, much ſtartled them: And tho' his Profeſſions of Fidelity to the Parliament, and referring all Things to their Wiſdom, had a good Aſpect towards them, yet they fear'd he might obſerve too much how generally odious they were grown to the People, which might leſſen his Reverence towards them. His general Deportment was ſo ſuſpected to ſome, that Harry Martin in the Houſe, according to his comical Way, 'reſembled him to One, that being ſent for to make a Suit of Cloaths, brought with him a Budget full of Carpenters Tools; and being told, that ſuch Things were not at all fit for the Work he was deſir'd to do, anſwer'd, It matters not, I will do your Work well enough I warrant you.' They were likewiſe jealous of Fairfax's Riſing for them; and therefore cou'd not think Yorkſhire a proper Place to quarter his Army in; which made them the more inclinable to ſend for him to London.

And ſend two Agents to him.

But the better to ſecure him, and to give ſome Check to that Freedom of Addreſſes, and Reſort of Malignants, they ſent two of their faithful and abjuring Members, Scot and Robinſon, under the Pretence of returning the Thanks of the Houſe for his great Services, to continue and be preſent with him, and reprehend any Boldneſs that ſhou'd appear in Delinquents. As ſoon as the City knew of this, they likewiſe ſent three of their chief Citizens, Foulke, Vincent and Bromfield, to perform the ſame Compliments, and to confirm him in his Inclinations to a free Parliament, as the Remedy all Men deſired.

Monk continues his March to London.

In the mean Time the General, having ſent Colonel Clark's Regiment of Foot, and Major-General Morgan's Regiment of Horſe back into Scotland, remov'd from York to Nottingham, where he continu'd for a few Days; his Forces now conſiſting of four Regiments of Foot, and three of Horſe, to the Number of about five thouſand eight hundred Men: A ſmall Army, but very well modell'd. In all his Paſſage to this Place, and to London it ſelf, he was entertain'd with ringing of Bells, and a mighty Concourſe of Gentry, and of all Sorts of People, who flock'd to him with their Addreſſes from ſeveral Counties; the Purport of which was, to deſire either a full and free Parliament, or the Reſtoration of the ſecluded Members of this. And it is very obſervable, That in all the Counties, ſo much Caution was obſerv'd, that no Gentleman ſign'd any of theſe Addreſſes, that had been ingag'd in the Cauſe of the preſent King, or his Royal Father; which made it clearly appear what the Senſe of the Country was at that Time. At Nottingham the General was met by Dr. Clarges, and Mr. Gumble his Chaplain, who, having been privately ſent to London, now gave him a full Account of the Affections and Deſigns both of the City and Parliament. At Leiceſter he was met, and graciouſly receiv'd by the two honourable Spies from the Parliament, Scot and Robinſon; and at Harborough by the Deputies of the City of London. Theſe latter in their Speech deſir'd That the Parliament might be Full and Free; at which Scot was ſo impatient, that without ſuffering the General to anſwer, he told them, That ſince the Parliament had ſubjected the Military Power to the Civil, they were Free; and having already given their Judgment as to the ſecluded Members, it did not become them to inſiſt upon their Readmiſſion. The General complying with this, the Citizens retired in Diſcontent, till he inform'd them by a private Meſſenger, That he was compell'd to temporize till he had an Opportunity to diſcover his Intentions. Scot behav'd himſelf after the ſame Manner at Northampton, where more Addreſſes appear'd; and again at St. Albans, when Sir Richard Temple deliver'd his Addreſs, he told him he wou'd firſt take up the Sword, as old as he was, before the things they petition'd ſhou'd be granted.

He writes to the Parliament to remove their Forces.

At St. Albans the General ſtay'd about four Days, to remove a particular Impediment that highly affected his Cauſe: There were ſtill at London four Regiments of Horſe, under Okey, Rich, Haſlerigg, and Desborough, and eight of Foot, under Ayres, Markham, Streater, Fitch, Moſſe, Fleetwood, Morley and Fagg; amounting to nine or ten thouſand Men; a Number ſufficient to daſh the General's Deſigns in Pieces, unleſs he cou'd gain them to his Intereſt, or divide them. As the ſhorteſt Method he wrote to the Parliament, intimating, 'That he had ſome Apprehenſions that thoſe Regiments and Troops of the Army who had formerly deſerted them, tho' for the preſent they were return'd to their Obedience, wou'd not live peaceably with his Men; and therefore deſir'd that all thoſe Forces in London, except the Regiments of Colonel Fagg, and Colonel Morley, might be preſently remov'd, and ſent to more diſtant Quarters, that there might be Room for his Army.' This was a ſurpriſing Meſſage, and exceedingly perplex'd them; and made them ſee their Fate wou'd ſtill be under the Force and Awe of an Army. Their Diviſions had encreas'd ſince the Removal of Vane, Saloway, &c. and Haſlerigg daily loſt Ground; ſo that as their Authority delin'd, they found it more neceſſary to comply. Accordingly they ſent their Orders for ten of the twelve Regiments to depart; which, with the Reaſon and Ground of their Reſolution, was ſo diſdainfully receiv'd, that a Mutiny aroſe among the Soldiers, and the Regiment then quarter'd in Somerſet-Houſe expreſsly refus'd to obey thoſe Orders; ſo that there was a great Appearance of new Uproars. But the Officers, who wou'd have gladly inflam'd them upon ſuch an Occaſion, were either abſent, or under Reſtraint: So that at laſt all was well compos'd, and both Officers and Soldiers remov'd to the Quarters aſſign'd them, with ſufficient Animoſity againſt thoſe who were to ſucceed them in their Places.

They obey.

Monk enters London.

4. All Obſtructions thus remov'd, and the General's Attendance of Great Perſons much increas'd at Barnet, on the third Day of February, he march'd his whole Army to London. He enter'd by Gray's-Inn Lane, and from thence down Chancery Lane, and ſo through Temple-Bar, along the Strand to Whitehall. The three Regiments of Horſe march'd firſt, himſelf at the Head of them gallantly mounted, his Trumpets roderichly clad before him, ſeveral led Horſes behind, and Perſons of Quality after him; the Foot cloſing up the Rear. He was met by the Speaker in the Strand, who came out of his Coach while the General alighted: They embrac'd with great Shew of Kindneſs and Friendſhip, and then the General rode forwards to Whitehall, where a particular Apartment was prepared for him. Here ſoon after his Arrival, a great Secret was reveal'd to him, as coming from Secretary Scot, namely, 'That not only his Power for commanding the Army ſhou'd be taken from him in a few Days, but that he ſhou'd be ſent to the Tower, and queſtion'd for his Life; not doubting but ſuch Things wou'd be prov'd againſt him, as wou'd take off his Head.' He rewarded the Diſcoverer, and ſo well provided againſt the Danger, that he heard no more of it.

When all Men's Mouths were fill'd with Stories, and their Minds with Suſpence, on the third Day after his Arrival, the General was ſolemnly conducted to the Parliament. There a Velvet Chair was appointed for him; and the Speaker made a Speech to him to this Effect, 'That tho' it was God, and not Man, who had done this great Work, and ought to have the Glory of it; yet the Influence of that Glory extended to him the Inſtrument, as a Reward of his prudent and wiſe Conduct: That when their Friends had deſerted them, and there was a great Defection in Duty and Truſt, ſo that the whole Nation ſeem'd to have been expos'd to the utmoſt Ruin, they diſcern'd, as the Prophet did, a little Cloud afar off, which in an Inſtant became the Refreſhment of the whole Nation, and a glorious Mercy to them all: That the Houſe had a true Senſe of his Services, and return'd their hearty Thanks to him, and all his Officers and Soldiers.' The General, without any great Eloquence of Speech, after he had thank'd them for the Honour they had done him, told them in plain Words, 'That in his March from Scotland, ſeveral Applications, with numerous Subſcriptions, had been made to him, for a Full and Free Parliament, for Admittance of the ſecluded Membere without any previous Oath or Engagement; and that this Parliament wou'd determine their Sitting: To all which he had anſwer'd, That they were now a Free Parliament; and that they had voted to fill up their Houſe, and then they wou'd be a Full Parliament; and that they had already determin'd their Sitting: But as for the ſecluded Members, this Parliament had already given Judgment in it, in which all People ought to acquieſce; and that to admit any Members to ſit in Parliament, without a previous Oath to preſerve the Government in Being, was never done in England. But now he crav'd Pardon to ſay it to themſelves, That the leſs Oaths or Engagements were impos'd, their Settlement wou'd be the ſooner attain'd to: That he knew all the ſober Gentry wou'd cloſe with them, if they might be tenderly and gently us'd: That it was their common Concernment to amplify, not to leſſen their Intereſt, and to be careful that neither the Cavalier nor the Fanatick Party ſhou'd get a Share in the Civil, or Military Power.' Then he ſpake of Ireland and Scotland, who, he ſaid, fear'd nothing more than to be over-run with Fanatick Notions.

The Speaker's Speech to him.

His Anſwer.

All this being ſpoken with more than his uſual Warmth, there were ſome Expreſſions in it which they diſlik'd; but others gave them ſome Eaſe and Hopes that he wou'd be faithful, tho' inwardly they heartily wiſh'd him again in Scotland, and that they had been left to contend with the Malignity of their old Army. To try him further, they invited him to take his Place in the Council of State, of which he had been before elected a Member. In Order to this he muſt of Neceſſity take the new Oath of Abjuration; which had been before propounded to him by thoſe who had thus argu'd for the Neceſſity of it: 'That it was high Time to diſcriminate their own Party, that they might come to know whom they cou'd truſt; it being found that there had been a great Defection, even among themſelves.' The General was not unprovided of an Anſwer, and ſo crav'd leave to demurr; adding, 'That he had not ſeen any Advantage from their Promiſſory Oaths, ſince thoſe who took them made no Scruple to break them, particularly in the Caſe of the Covenant and Engagement; and ſuggeſted, that ſeveral beſides himſelf, nominated to be of the Council of State, had not yet abjured; nor did he know how it wou'd reliſh with his Army, who were very tender in that Point. But that they might ſee they had no Reaſon to ſuſpect him or his Army, he deſir'd they wou'd make tryal of their Fidelity and Obedience to them, and if they found he either diſobey'd or diſputed their Orders, he was then in their Power: For he brought not an Army to make them jealous of him; but had ſent back a great Part of it, after he underſtood that they were eſtabliſh'd in their Power.

He declines the Abjuration Oath.

Within a Day or two they had this extraordinary Occaſion to make Experiment of his Courage and Fidelity Notwithſtanding they had renew'd their Ordinances for all Collections and Payments, they found it neceſſary, for their preſent Supply, to require the City immediately to collect and bring in their Arrears of their Taxes, and at the ſame Time to borrow a conſiderable Sum of Mony of them; which cou'd not be eaſily and regularly done but by the Advice, and with the Conſent of the Common-Council.

This was now conſtituted of ſuch Perſons as were weary of the Parliament, and wou'd by no Means comply with their Commands; therefore they did not only refuſe their Conſent to what was demanded, but in the Debate of it, excepted againſt their Authority, and in Effect declar'd, ‘ That they wou'd never ſubmit to any Impoſition that was not granted by a full and free Parliament.’ And it was generally believ'd, that they had aſſum'd this Courage upon ſome Confidence they had in the General, and the Apprehenſion of this, made the Parliament to be in the greater Perplexity and Diſtraction. This Refuſal being likely to put an End to their Empire, they reſolv'd upon this Occaſion to make a full Tryal of their own Power, and of their General's Obedience. Accordingly the Matter was referr'd to the Conſideration of the Council of State, what was proper to be done towards reducing the rebellious City to that Submiſſion they ought to pay to the Parliament. The Council, after Debate, came to this Agreement and Reſolution, ‘ That early the next Morning, the General with his Forces ſhou'd march into the City, and there ſeize the Perſons of the moſt active Common-Council Men, and commit them to the Tower; after that to pull down the Poſts and Chains they had lately ſet up, and take down the Gates and Portcullices, and there quarter his Men, till he had reduc'd them to Obedience.’ They kept the General that Night with them till two in the Morning, for the greater Security, and to prevent any new Impreſſions that might hinder or retard this Reſolution. There were Endeavours us'd by ſome of the Non-Abjurors to diſſuade him, who waited his Return from Council; but it was ſo unſeaſonable an Hour, that the General was got to Bed, and cou'd hear no more than the bare Propoſition.

He is order'd to pull down the Gates, &c. of the City,

The next Morning, being the ninth of February, he enter'd upon this odious Work: He went into the City, and after he had plac'd his main Guards for his own Security, he diſtributed the Remainder of his Army to their ſeveral Poſts, charging them to pull down the City Gates, break their Portcullices, and pluck up their Poſts and Chains; while he Himſelf, in the mean Time, ſent for and impriſon'd the moſt daring and diſaffected Members of the Common-Council, purſuant to his Orders. Theſe Proceedings were very aſtoniſhing to the City, and no leſs ſurpriſing to the Soldiers, who with the utmoſt Regret and Murmurings obey'd their General. Several of the Officers refus'd to act, but offer'd to lay down their Commiſſions; which the General wou'd not ſuffer them to do, but thus reprehended them, What! will you not obey the Parliament's Orders? Inſinuating that this Odious Action had been unavoidably forc'd upon him; and indeed by the Frowns and Clouds in his Face they ſoon perceiv'd his Meaning, and readily took the Hint to cabal againſt theſe new Task-Maſters. Various were the Outcries in the Streets againſt the General; but Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, who was a Spectator, was ſo highly pleas'd, that he cry'd out, Now George, we have Thee for ever, Body and Soul! and thus elevated he ran to the Parliament, and in the ſame Manner broke out in the Preſence of many Members, All is our own, He will be honeſt! This was the Criſis that ſo ſoon chang'd the Face of Things; and no Accident of War cou'd have more fully aſſur'd his Army to him, or have made the Parliament more hateful to their Reſtorers. That this was Monk's own Contrivance, is believ'd by Dr. Price, and more than intimated by Ludlow; and ſoon after he ſaid to the Former, This was a Trick you knew not of: I aſſure you, that I cou'd not have done my Buſineſs ſo ſoon without it, and poſſibly not at all. Yet many at that Time fear'd, that if the Parliament had cultivated his tame Reſignation with any Temper and Diſcretion, by preparing his Approbation to their Proceedings, they might have found a full Compliance, at leaſt no Oppoſition, to all their Counſels. But they were ſo infatuated with Pride and Inſolence, that they cou'd not diſcern the Ways to their own Preſervation.

Which he performs.

While they were thus executing their Tyranny upon the City, they were contriving how to leſſen the General's Power and Authority, and reſolv'd to join others with him in the Command of the Army; and upon that very Day they receiv'd a Petition, which they had fomented, preſented to them by a notorious Man, formerly mention'd, Praiſe-God Barebone, in the Head of a Croud of Sectaries. Which Petition begun with all imaginable Bitterneſs and Reproaches againſt the Memory of the late King, the Perſon of the preſent King, and all the Nobility, Clergy and Gentry of the Kingdom who adhered to him; urging for an utter Extirpation of all of them. It took Notice of many Diſcourſes of calling a new Parliament, or of admitting thoſe Members to ſit, who had been excluded in the Year 1648; ‘ either of which, as the Petitioners alledg'd, wou'd prove the inevitable Deſtruction o all the Godly in the Land:’ And therefore they earneſtly beſought them, ‘ That no Perſon whatſoever might be admitted to the Exerciſe of any Office or Function in the State, or in the Church, no not ſo much as to teach a School, who did not firſt take the Oath of Abjuration of the King and all his Family, and that he wou'd never ſubmit to the Government of any one ſingle Perſon whatſoever; and that whoſoever ſhou'd preſume to propoſe, or mention the Reſtoration of the King, in Parliament, or any other Place, ſhou'd be adjudg'd guilty of High-Treaſon.’ This Petition was receiv'd with great Approbation by the Houſe, their Affection much applauded, and the Thanks of the Parliament very ſolemnly return'd by the Speaker: tho' theſe Men were known by them to be but a few Weeks before the Confidents of Lambert and the Parliament's Enemies. So ſordidly obſequious were theſe poor little Remains and Dregs of a Parliament.

Barebone's Petition.

5. Hitherto in Appearance the General had been all Obedience; but now there began a viſible Turn of the Tide. For as ſoon as he had return'd out of the City to White-Hall, he was preſently attended by ſome of his chief Officers, who freely inveigh'd againſt the Proceedings of the Parliament, inſiſted upon ‘ their Ingratitude towards him, and the Indignity offer'd him, both in their odious Imployment, and their giving ſuch Countenance to a Rabble of infamous Varlets, who deſir'd to inflame the whole Kingdom in Compliance with their Fanatick and mad Enthuſiaſms; therefore ſome ſpeedy Remedy was of Neceſſity to be thought on and apply'd.’ The General was too wiſe to loſe this Advantage; but however ſeem'd to require Time to deliberate upon it. But they earneſtly reply'd, ‘ That if ſome Thing was not immediately done, to bear their Teſtimony againſt ſuch Proceedings, He wou'd ſoon be loſt, and They with him; but He in the firſt Place, becauſe he had now more Enemies in the Council of State, and alſo in the Parliament, than he imagin'd.’ The General ſoon yielded to their Fears and Counſels, and the more readily, becauſe that Day he had been privately aſſur'd of the Tower of London by Colonel Morley the Lieutenant, who likewiſe promis'd him the Conjunction of Colonel Fagg. In all Secrecy therefore it was debated and concluded, That a Letter ſhou'd be ſent to the Parliament the Day following; and late at Night Orders were iſſu'd out, that the principal Officers ſhou'd meet very early at the General's Lodgings the next Morning. Being come, the Occaſion of their convening was expounded by the Secretaries of the Night who had ſat up to pen and tranſcribe the Letter to the Parliament, and their Aſſent to it deſir'd. The General ſubſcrib'd it firſt, and they in Order: The Subſtance of the Letter was, after a Complaint of ſeveral Grievances, a peremptory Requeſt, or rather Command, ‘ That by Friday next, being within ſeven Days, they ſhou'd ſend forth Writs to fill up all the vacant Places in the Houſe; and when that was done, fix a determinate Time for their own Sitting, and ſo give Place to a full and free Parliament.

Monk's Letter to the Parliament.

This Letter was preſently printed and diſpers'd through the City; and before it cou'd be read in the Houſe, the General had diſpatch'd Meſſengers to Sir Thomas Allen the Lord-Mayor; deſiring Proviſion of Quarters for his Forces; and immediately march'd his whole Army into Finſbury-Fields. The Lord-Mayor was at firſt aſtoniſh'd, but being better inform'd, he ſoon provided a Dinner for the General and his chief Officers. After he had dined, he deſired the Lord-Mayor and the Aldermen, with the Common-Council, which the Parliament had diſſolv'd, to meet him at the Guild-Hall. At this Meeting he was attended by vaſt Throngs of People, who were eager to know the Meaning of it. He excus'd Himſelf to the Aſſembly ‘ for what he had been conſtrain'd to do in the City by Order of Parliament, aſſuring them he was much troubled for that rigorous Work. He declared Himſelf ready to expoſe his Perſon to all Dangers for their Service, and that he had not forgot the kind Letter they had ſent him at Morpeth: That he was then of the ſame Opinion with them, but was oblig'd at that Time to conceal it, till he might have an Opportunity of diſcovering his Sentiments with better Advantage.’ He alſo acquainted them, ‘ That he had ſent a Letter to the Parliament, that they wou'd fill the Houſe, and put an End to their Sitting by the Sixth of May.’ It cannot be expreſs'd with what Shoutings and Acclamations this News was receiv'd among the People, who with the loudeſt Tranſports of Joy, cry'd out A free Parliament! a free Parliament! And beſides Bells, Guns, Wine, and other Marks of the moſt dilated Gladneſs, there was a continu'd Blaze throughout the City and Suburbs of no leſs than ſix thouſand Bonefires. At each of theſe they waſted and burnt all ſorts of Rumps, which they ſaid was to celebrate the Funeral of the Parliament: And there can be no Invention of Fancy, Wit, Mirth, or Ribaldry, that was not that Night exercis'd to defame the Parliament, and to magnify the General.

His Declaration to the City.

The Effects of it.

The Parliament frighted.

All this was very amazing and diſtracting to the Parliament; and Ludlow mov'd that they wou'd immediately adjourn to the Tower, and there call their diſperſed Forces together. However they continu'd ſtill to ſit, and proceeded in all Things with their uſual Confidence. They were not willing to deſpair of recovering their General again to them; but yet to leſſen his Authority, they made an Act to put the Government of the Army into the Hands of new Commiſſioners, Monk, Haſlerigg, Walton, Morley and Alured, making three a Quorum, but denying a Motion that Monk ſhou'd be of that Quorum. They ſent Scot and Robinſon to him with diſſembling Meſſages, to aſſure him of their high Opinion of his Services, and to recall him to his Lodgings at White-Hall. But he was now reſolv'd to throw himſelf upon the City, and not yet to truſt his Perſon near Weſtminſter. Within a few Days they ſent a Committee to treat with him, and to make ſuch Proffers to him as they conceiv'd wou'd beſt agree with his Ambition. The Entertainment he gave this Committee, was the engaging them in a Conference with another Committee of the Secluded Members, that he might know how one had the Right to ſit in Parliament, while the other were excluded. In this Conference the Sitting Members alledg'd ‘the Declaration of the General when he firſt appear'd for ‘them againſt the Army, that it was for the Parliament as ‘it ſate the 11*th of* October.’ The Secluded Members reply'd, ‘That their Re-admiſſion was no Infringement of ‘it; for the ſame Parliament wou'd ſit ſtill;’ adding further, ‘That the Purport of that Declaration was, to reduce ‘the Military Power in Obedience to the Civil; and that ‘they had been excluded the Houſe only by Force of the ‘Sword, without any legal Forfeiture of their Rights.’ But the Sitting Members vehemently urg'd the Safety of Themſelves, the Army, the Conſciences of the Godly, and the Sale of publick Lands; ‘all which they fear'd wou'd ‘be diſturb'd by the Introduction of the Secluded Mem‘bers.’ The other gave full Anſwers to all theſe Objections, and engag'd upon their Honours, ‘That they wou'd ‘not look upon what had been done ſince their Seclufion, ‘nor diſturb the Propriety or Pretences of any; but wou'd ‘amicably ſit and act for the Good of their Country, till ‘by their Diſſolution they made Way for another Parlia‘ment.’ When the General had heard them all, to the great Mortification of one Party, he made no Scruple to declare ‘That in Juſtice the Secluded Members ought to ‘be admitted before the Calling of another Parliament, and ‘the Diſſolution of this.

Monk declares for the Secluded Members.

After a Week's Stay in the City, the General new Quarter'd his Army, and return'd to his former Lodgings at White-Hall; where he appointed ſuch of the Secluded Members as were in Town, to the Number of fourſcore, to meet and confer with him. He told them, ‘That he ‘hop'd they were not ignorant what Care and Endeavours ‘had been us'd for the Healing the Breaches and Diviſions ‘of the Nation; and that in Order thereunto divers Con‘ferences had been procured between them: Yet having ‘a fuller Satisfaction from thoſe Gentlemen who had been ‘Secluded, he had put them all to the Trouble of that ‘Meeting, that he might open himſelf to them with more ‘Freedom than formerly. But leſt he ſhou'd be miſtaken ‘in his Delivery, or miſapprehended in his Expreſſions, as ‘he had lately been, he had put what he deſign'd to ſay in ‘Writing;’ which he commanded his Secretary to read to them, of which this was the Subſtance; ‘That by what ‘he had heard, the Settlement of the Nation lay in their ‘Hands, and that he was aſſured they wou'd become Ma‘kers up of its woful Breaches, in Purſuit whereof he ‘ſhou'd think nothing too dear: That he wou'd impoſe ‘nothing on them, but took leave to mind them, that the ‘old Foundations were ſo broken, that, in the Eye of Rea‘ſon, they cou'd not be reſtored but upon the Ruin of the ‘Nation: That the Intereſt of London lay in a Common‘wealth, the only Government capable of making her the ‘Bank for the Trade of Chriſtendom: That he thought a ‘moderate, not a rigid Presbyterian Government moſt ac‘ceptable to the Churches Settlement: That their Care ‘wou'd be neceſſary to ſettle the Conduct of the Army, ‘and Maintenance for the Forces by Sea and Land; deſi‘ring them further, that they wou'd ſummon a new Parlia‘ment, and make a legal Diſſolution.

His Diſcourſe to them.

The General had not to this Hour ſeem'd to them to have any Deſign, or Thought to ſerve the King, but appear'd to be really of the Opinion he intimated in his Paper, That it was a Work impoſſible: So that they thought he deſired Nothing, but that he might ſee a Common-wealth eſtabliſh'd in ſuch a Model as Holland was, where he had been bred; and that Himſelf might enjoy the Authority and Place which the Prince of Orange poſſeſs'd in that Government. The Paper being read, the Secluded Members took their Leaves, and being well ſupported by the Guards, they took their Places in the Parliament Houſe without any Interruption, to the great Grief and Amazement of the former Houſe-Keepers, who were ſo incens'd at this Intruſion, as they call'd it, that ſeveral of them diſown'd their Authority, and forſook the Houſe; tho' many of the more moderate Sort ſtaid behind, and ſat with the reſt. About ſeventeen of them, who moſt dreaded the King's Return, repaired to the General to underſtand the Reaſons of theſe Proceedings from his own Mouth. He receiv'd them with the ſame Civility and Proteſtations as formerly; and Ludlow tells us, that when they demanded of him, whether he wou'd joyn with them againſt Charles Stuart and his Party, he apply'd himſelf to Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, and ſaid, Sir Arthur, I have often declared to you my Reſolution ſo to do. Then formally laying hold of his Hand, he added, I do here proteſt to you in the Preſence of all theſe Gentlemen, that I will oppoſe to the utmoſt the ſetting up of Charles Stuart, a ſingle Perſon, or a Houſe of Peers. After which he began to expoſtulate with them touching their Suſpicions, in theſe remarkable Words: What is it that I have done in bringing theſe Members into the Houſe? Are they not the ſame that brought the King to the Block? tho' others cut off his Head, and that juſtly. The Secluded Members were reſtored on Tueſday the 21ſt of February, which being a great Step towards the happy Settlement of the Nation, there were that Day new Rejoycings and Bonefires through all the City of London.

He reſtores them to their Places.

The Long PARLIAMENT improv'd.

6. The Long Parliament was now very much increas'd and improv'd; and tho' in continu'd not much above three Weeks before its Diſſolution, yet many Things of Moment were tranſacted in that Time, which were the apparent Dawnings of a glorious Change. The Secluded Members, who daily increas'd, being far more numerous than the other, they repeal'd many Acts of the Rump, which had been made for their own Ends: They took off thoſe Sequeſtrations which they had laid on Sir George Booth, and his Party, which muſt have prov'd almoſt a general Calamity to the Nation; and releas'd Sir George and many others from their ſeveral Priſons. Thoſe of the King's Party who had ſhelter'd themſelves in Obſcurity, began to appear abroad; and the new Lord Mordaunt, who was known to be entirely truſted by the King, convers'd without Controle. And they were the more incourag'd, becauſe the Parliament had ratify'd that Vote made in December 1648, viz. ‘That the Conceſſions of ‘the late King were a ſufficient Ground to proceed on, ‘for ſettling the Peace of the Kingdom.’ And more than than, they expung'd and raſed out the ENGAGEMENT made in 1649, out of the Journals, and voted it to be null and void. They moreover ſet at Liberty Dr. Wren Biſhop of Ely, who had been eighteen Years Priſoner in the Tower; and order'd a Stop to be put to the Sale of the Eſtates of the Lord Craven, and Lord Saint John, the firſt of whom had his Eſtate taken from him by unparallel'd Injuſtice. Then to ſhew their Gratitude to their Reſtorer, they enlarg'd the General's Commiſſion, making him Commander in Chief of all the Forces of England, Scotland and Ireland, vacating the Power the Rump had lately granted to particular Commiſſioners. Before they aroſe they likewiſe releas'd the Scotch Lords Lauderdale, Lindſey, and Sinclare, from the tedious Impriſonments, to which upon various Pretences they had been committed.

They model the Militia.

In order to the ſecuring the Peace of the Nation, they took Notice, that the Rump had put the Militia of the Kingdom into the Hands of Sectaries, Perſons generally of no Degree or Quality, and notorious only for ſome new Tenent in Religion, and for ſome Barbarity ſhewn to the King's Party. All theſe Commiſſions were therefore revoked, and the Militia put under the Government of the Nobility, and principal Gentry throughout the Kingdom; yet ſtill with this particular Exception, That no Perſon ſhou'd be truſted in that Province, who firſt did not declare under his Hand, ‘That he did confeſs and acknowledge, ‘That the War rais'd by the two Houſes of Parliament ‘againſt the late King, was Juſt and Lawful, until ſuch ‘Time as Force and Violence was us'd upon the Parlia‘ment in the Year 1648.’ And particular Orders were ſent to Hull by Colonel Alured and Major Smith, that the Governor Overton ſhou'd immediately deliver up that Garriſon into the Hands of Colonel Fairfax, and repair immediately to London; and He, notwithſtanding his former Declaration, That he was reſolv'd to keep it till the Coming of King JESUS, preſently obey'd the Order, which prov'd much to the Advantage of the preſent Peace of the Nation. In the laſt Place, they rais'd an Aſſeſsment of one Hundred Thouſand Pounds by the Month, for the Payment of the Army, and defraying the publick Expences for Six Months, to which the whole Kingdom willingly ſubmitted; and the City of London, upon the Credit and Security of that Act, advanc'd as much ready Mony as they were deſired.

And lay a Tax.

After this new improv'd Parliament had ſate about three Weeks, they began to diſcourſe of their Diſſolution; but ſeveral

ſeveral of the Members, unwilling to part with their Sovereignty, were offering to break the Articles of their Admiſſion, and appear'd againſt the immediate Calling of another Parliament. Mr. Prynne with too much Precipitance ſaid, That if the King muſt come in, it was ſafeſt for them that he ſhou'd come in by their Votes who had made the War againſt his Father. Upon which he was ſent for by the General, and admoniſh'd to be quiet; and it was the particular Buſineſs of Monk and his Friends to keep this expiring Parliament ſteddy, and clear from the intermeddling with the Change of Government. So at length the Act for the Diſſolution of the preſent, and the Summoning a New Parliament, was read. It was in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberties of the Common-Wealth of England, with this principal Qualification, 'That all and every Perſon and Perſons, who have adviſed, aided, abetted or aſſiſted in any War againſt the Parliament, 'ſince the firſt of January 1641; He, They, or their Sons 'ſhall be incapable to be Elected to ſerve as Members of 'the next Parliament, unleſs He or They have ſince manifeſted their good Affections to the Parliament.' The Houſe being ready to paſs this Act, Mr. Crew, a Perſon deeply engag'd in the late War, mov'd, That before they diſſolv'd themſelves, they wou'd bear their Witneſs againſt the horrid Murder of the King. Which Motion occaſion'd many to declare their Abhorrence of that Fact; and one of them concluding his Diſcourſe with proteſting, That he had neither Hand nor Heart in it, Mr. Scot with his uſual Inveteracy ſaid, That he ſhou'd deſire no greater Honour in the World, than to have the following Inſcription engraven on his Tomb; 'Here lieth one who had a Hand and Heart 'in the Execution of Charles Stuart late King of England.' Having ſaid this, he and ſeveral others left the Houſe; and ſo the reſt iſſu'd out Writs to call a new Parliament to meet on the 25th Day of April; and then, on the 16th Day of March, after they had appointed a Council of State, they diſſolv'd themſelves, againſt all the Importunities of the violent Sectaries, to the unſpeakable Joy of all the reſt of the Kingdom, who, notwithſtanding their different Affections, Expectations, and Deſigns, were unanimous in their Wearineſs and Deteſtation of this formidable Aſſembly. And here ended the LONG PARLIAMENT, which, with innumerable Alterations, and ſeveral Intermiſſions, had continu'd the Scourge of the Nation, and the Terror of the Neighbourhood, for about nineteen Years.

The LONG PARLIAMENT diſſolv'd.

1660. Car. 12.

VI. I. And now the dark Cloud, that had cover'd and overſhadow'd the three Kingdoms for ſo many Years, was happily diſpell'd, and a Brightneſs appear'd throughout the Nation; and it is ſcarce credible, with what Torrents of Joy the People, wearied with the Continuance of that black Parliament, and freed from the Fears of a Reſurrection, entertain'd the News of its Diſſolution. Vaſt and various were the Expectations of the World concerning the new Parliament that was to meet within a little above five Weeks: But in the mean Time the chief Government of the Kingdom was lodg'd in a Council of State, which conſiſted of thirty one in Number, namely, Arthur Anneſly Lord Preſident, General Monk, the Lord Fairfax, Mr. William Pierpoint, Mr. John Crew, Mr. Richard Knightly, Colonel Popham, Colonel Morley, Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Chief Juſtice Saint John, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Sir John Evelin, Sir William Waller, Sir Richard Onſlow, Serjeant Maynard, Sir William Lewis, Colonel Montague, Colonel Harley, Colonel Norton, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir John Temple, Colonel Thompſon, Mr. John Trevor, Sir John Holland, Sir John Potts, Colonel Birch, Colonel Roſſiter, Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, Mr. John Swinfin, and Mr. John Weaver. Theſe were moſt of them ſober honeſt Gentlemen, who did not wiſh ill to the King; yet ſeveral were for clogging his Return with Limitations and Conditions; and nothing was more generally talk'd of than the late King's Conceſſions in the Iſle of Wight, to which he had yielded with much leſs Chearfulneſs than he walk'd to the Scaffold. Of this Sort Saint John and Hollis appear'd zealous; tho' few wiſe Men cou'd expect thoſe Articles to be reduc'd to Practice, or the Peace of the Nation eſtabliſh'd by them. Anneſly the Preſident was well contented that the King ſhou'd receive particular Information of his Devotion, and of his Reſolution to do him Service; which he manifeſted in many Particulars of Importance. And had the Courage to receive a Letter from his Majeſty, and return'd a dutiful Anſwer to it; all which had a very fair and promiſing Aſpect.

The COUNCIL OF STATE.

But ſtill the King and his Friends knew not what to think of the General, and the Paper he had deliver'd at the Conference with the Members; for which he ſeem'd to have no Temptation, but his violent Affection to a Common-Wealth. Few or none of the Royal Party cou'd find any Means of Addreſs to him; yet they did believe, and they were much the better for that Belief, that the King had ſome ſecret Correſpondence with him. He was daily hurry'd and perplex'd with his unweildy Burden, yet knew not how to make it lighter by Communication; and he ſpent much Time in Conſultation with Perſons of every Intereſt, the King's Party only excepted. Yet he found in every Day's Diſcourſes in the City, with thoſe accounted Presbyterians, and with other Perſons of Quality and Conſideration, that the People generally wiſh'd for the King, and really believ'd, there cou'd be no firm and ſettled Peace in the Nation, that did not comprehend his Intereſt, and compoſe the Prejudice againſt his Party. But then they ſaid, He muſt be bound by ſtrict Articles; and every one diſcours'd of the Conditions they thought were beſt for the Nation, or rather for Themſelves. Upon this Account the General was preſent at Northumberland-Houſe in a Conference with that Earl, the Earl of Mancheſter, and other Lords, together with Hollis, Waller, Lewis, and other conſiderable Perſons, who were eſteem'd the Heads of the moderate Presbyterian Party; who for the moſt Part wou'd have been contented, upon Proviſion for their own Security, to have the King reſtored to his Rights, and the Church to its Poſſeſſions. In this Conference, when the King's Return was directly propos'd, as abſolutely neceſſary to the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Queſtion only made, upon what Terms they ſhou'd admit him; the General inſiſted upon the moſt rigid Propoſitions, and urg'd it in ſuch a Manner, that the Lords grew jealous that he had ſuch an Averſion to the King's Reſtoration, that it wou'd not be ſafe for them then to inſiſt on the Propoſition; and that it were beſt to acquieſce till the Parliament met, and that they cou'd make ſome Judgment of the Temper of it.

The General under great Difficulties.

Mr. Morrice very ſerviceable to him.

It is certain, the General was then under great Difficulties, and his Mind much diſtracted with the various Sentiments and Opinions, that were every Day offer'd to him: But he ſeems to have been beſt fix'd by the Advice and Aſſiſtance of Mr. William Morrice, a worthy Gentleman of Devonſhire, of a fair Eſtate and Reputation, a Perſon learned and of good Parts, and of a ſtudious and retired Life. This Gentleman was ally'd to the General, and entirely truſted by him in the Management of his Eſtate in that Country, which was now very conſiderable. He was look'd upon as a Man far from any Malice towards the King, if he had not good Affections for him; and now being choſen in the enſuing Parliament, he made haſte to London, the better to obſerve the Face of Affairs. With him the General conſulted freely touching all his Perplexities and Obſervations; how he found moſt Men of Quality and Intereſt inclin'd to call in the King, but upon ſuch Conditions as muſt be very ungrateful, if poſſible to be receiv'd; and the London Miniſters talk'd already ſo loudly of them, that the Covenant being new printed, and by Order fix'd up in all Churches, they in their Sermons ſo diſcours'd of the ſeveral Obligations in it, that every Body underſtood, they thought it neceſſary the People ſhou'd return to their Allegiance. Mr. Morrice's Advice to the General was very prudent, and much to the Advantage of the King's Affairs: But at the ſame Time, beſides the Promiſes made by Sir Arthur Haſlerigg and other deſpairing Republicans, he was daily beſieg'd, and violently attack'd by the Perſwaſions and Arguments of Sir Richard Willis and Colonel Dolman, who often ſtagger'd his Reſolutions. Sir Richard finding himſelf loſt with the King, vehemently joyn'd with the Colonel in adviſing the General 'Either 'to ſet up the Rump Parliament again, which was ſtill in 'his Power, alledging, That England never made a better 'Figure beyond Sea, than while under their Government, 'from the late King's Death to their firſt Diſſolution: Or 'elſe, if he did not like that, to ſet up Himſelf, for which 'he might make a Title, as being deſcended from Arthur 'Lord Liſle, the laſt of the Plantagenets:' But for calling home the King, as Men in Deſpair, they told him plainly, That if he did ſo, he wou'd put the Government of the Kingdom under Pimps and Whores, and that all wou'd decline into Infamy and Decay. A worthy Friend of the Author's has been often told by Sir William Morrice, who was admitted into all their Conferences, and was the only Perſon made privy to them, That the General long hung very dubious what to do, upon their warm Suggeſtions; and that the greateſt Difficulty he had to fix him ſteady for the King's Reſtoration, was from the Arguments and Objections of theſe Men, who, as he ſaid with ſome Reſentment, were the trueſt Prophets he ever met with in his Life.

The Advice of Sir R. Willis, and Col. Dolman.

The French Ambaſſador tempts the General.

But that which ſeem'd to have been his greateſt Temptation was, the Overtures of Monſieur Bourdeaux the French Ambaſſador, who promis'd him from his Maſter Mazarine the powerful Aſſiſtance of France to ſupport him, if he wou'd take the Government upon himſelf; ſo ſteadily averſe was the Cardinal to the Reſtoration of a Perſon he had ſo much injured and ſlighted. Some ſay he bravely reſiſted the Propoſal, but Mr. Locke expreſly tells us, that he at laſt did agree with the French Ambaſſador to aſſume the Government to Himſelf. Since that Gentleman probably had his Account from the Fountain-Head, the Reader may be pleas'd to take it in his own Words: This Bargain was ſtruck up between them late at Night, but not ſo ſecretly, but that his Wife, who had poſted her ſelf conveniently behind the Hangings, where ſhe cou'd hear all that paſs'd, finding what was reſolv'd, ſent her Brother Clarges away immediately with Notice of it to Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper. She was zealous for the Reſtoration of the King, and had therefore promis'd Sir Anthony to watch her Husband, and to inform him from Time to Time how Matters went. Upon this Notice Sir Anthony caus'd the Council of State, whereof he has One, to be ſummon'd; and when they were met, he deſired the Clerks might withdraw, he having a Matter of great Importance to communicate to them. The Doors of the Council-Chamber being lock'd, and the Keys laid upon the Table, he began to charge Monk, not in direct and open Accuſation, but in obſcure Intimations, and doubtful Expreſſions, giving Ground of Suſpicion, That he was playing falſe with them, and not doing as he promis'd. This he did ſo ſkilfully and intelligibly to Monk, that he perceiv'd he was diſcover'd, and therefore in his Anſwer to him fumbled, and ſeem'd out of Order; ſo that the reſt of the Council perceiv'd there was ſomething in it, tho' they knew not what the Matter was: And the General at laſt averring, That what had been ſuggeſted was upon groundleſs Suſpicions, and that he was true to his Principles, and ſtood firm to what he had profeſs'd to them, and had no ſecret Deſigns that ought to diſturb them, and that he was ready to give them all manner of Satisfaction; Sir Anthony cloſed with him, and made a further Uſe of what he ſaid than he intended. For he meant no more than ſo far as to get away from Them, upon this Aſſurance which he gave them: But Sir Anthony told him, That if he was ſincere in what he ſaid, he might preſently remove all Scruples; He ſhou'd preſently take away their Commiſſions from ſuch and ſuch Officers in the Army, and give them to thoſe whom he named, and that preſently before he went out of the Room. Monk was in Himſelf no quick Man, he was guilty, alone, among a Company of Men who he knew not what they wou'd do with him; for they all ſtruck in with Sir Anthony, and plainly perceiv'd that Monk had deſign'd ſome foul Play. In theſe Straits, being thus cloſe preſs'd, and knowing not how elſe to extricate himſelf, he conſented to what was propos'd; and ſo immediately, before he ſtirr'd, a great Part of the Commiſſions of his Officers were chang'd; and Sir Edward Harley, among the reſt, who was a Member of the Council, and there preſent, was made Governor of Dunkirk in the Room of Sir William Lockhart, and was ſent away immediately to take Poſſeſſion of it. By which Means, ſays the ſame Author, the Army ceas'd to be at Monk's Devotion, and was put into Hands that wou'd not ſerve him in the Deſign he had undertaken. The French Ambaſſador, who had the Night before ſent away an Expreſs to Mazarine, poſitively to aſſure him 'That things went 'as he had deſired, and that Monk was fix'd by him in 'his Reſolution to take on himſelf the Government,' was not a little aſtoniſh'd the next Day to find Things taking another Turn; and indeed this ſo much diſgrac'd him in the French Court, that he was preſently call'd home, and ſoon after broke his Heart. This was that which gave the great Turn to the Reſtoration of King Charles; whereof Sir Anthony had laid the Plan in his Head a long Time before. Thus far Mr. Locke, whoſe ſingular Account is left wholly to the Judgment of the Reader.

Diſappointed by Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper.

The Portugal Ambaſſador applies to the General.

In the mean Time the General had Application of another kind made to him from the Portugal Ambaſſador, Don Franciſco de Melo, who came over into England upon this following Occaſion. Upon the Concluſion of the late Pyrenean Treaty, the French the more to blind the Eyes of the Spaniard, and to excite the Portugueſe to ſeek out new Helps, had pretended to deſert the Intereſt of the latter, and to leave them to the Mercy of the former; which occaſion'd this Miniſter diligently to apply to the Powers then uppermoſt in England, for a certain Number of Troops to be ſent to the Aſſiſtance of his Maſter; which at length concluded in a Treaty with the Council of State, now lying in the Paper Office. But when Monk's Power became ſo conſpicuous, he made his chief Overtures to him; and being accompany'd with Father Ruſſel, a Prieſt of the Engliſh College at Liſbon, who ſerv'd him as an Interpreter, he at the firſt Time ſpoke only thus much to him: 'That he wou'd not preſume to enquire if his Excellency 'had any good Inclinations for the King's Return; but 'this he wou'd advertiſe him as an Intelligence of great 'Moment to England, That the Spaniards had reſolv'd, 'if his Majeſty ſhou'd be call'd home, to detain him at 'Bruſſels, till he had engag'd for the Reſtoration of Dunkirk, if not Jamaica.' The General made no Anſwer; but when the Ambaſſador found that he was heard, and that there were ſome good Effects of his Intelligence, he ſoon proceeded to other Matters with the General, and to make Offer of the Infanta of Portugal to the King, as a Match the moſt advantagious of any in the World to England; 'ſince beſides the greateſt Portion in Mony that 'ever Queen had, that Princeſs was to bring with her 'Tangier, which, as the Ambaſſador ſaid, wou'd make the 'Engliſh Maſters of the Trade in the Mediterranean, and 'Bombaim, which wou'd give them the like Advantage in 'the Eaſt-Indies; and wou'd likewiſe ſerve to humble the 'Power of Spain,' which the General, according to the Notions he had imbib'd in his younger Days, thought to be the greateſt Advantage of all. Therefore taking all theſe Things in their full Extent; but eſpecially conſidering that nothing was at preſent deſired but Forces, and that thereby the moſt mutinous of thoſe Regiments bred up by Cromwell might be ſent away, and the Peace of the Kingdom ſecured, the General clos'd intirely with what was offer'd; and Mr. Morrice was eminently concern'd in the Treaty, which was immediately and effectually offer'd by the General to the King at his Return into England. So ſoon was this Match provided, and ſo contrary to the common Accounts of it; and what is ſtill remarkable; by a particular Article of the Treaty, it was ſtipulated for the Benefit of Portugal, 'That Dunkirk ſhou'd never be parted withal 'to the Spaniard;' which laid the Foundation for the Sale of it afterwards to the French. Of all which we have unqueſtionable Proof from good Manuſcripts, and other ſufficient Evidences.

He propoſes a Wife for the King.

Sir John Greenvil's Application to the General.

2. But to return to the preſent Affairs of the King, who was for ſome Time under great Doubts and Suſpence. None of his profeſs'd and known Friends were yet admitted to the Privacies of the General. His Kinſman Sir John Greenvil, formerly mention'd, had ſeveral Times attempted to gain a ſecret Conference with him in vain, and at laſt earneſtly apply'd himſelf to Mr. Morrice to obtain that Favour. That Gentleman was employ'd by the General to learn of what Quality his Buſineſs was, aſſuring him That he was authoris'd to receive his Meſſage, and that he wou'd return the General's Anſwer to it. But Greenvil refus'd the Propoſal, and told him, That it concern'd none but the General himſelf; and him ſo very much, that without further Delay he muſt impart it to him; and in Caſe he poſitively refus'd him a private Hearing, he was reſolv'd to ſpeak to him where-ever he ſhou'd next meet him. The General had now been pretty well fix'd by the Arguments of Mr. Morrice, or perhaps the Management of Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper; and now finding by the many loyal Elections for the enſuing Parliament, that if he did not ſtrike in with Expedition, the great Work wou'd probably be taken out of his Hands, he reſolv'd to cloſe with Sir John Greenvil's Propoſal, and appointed the next Night for a private Meeting with him.

He privately delivers him a Letter from the King.

This being agreed, Sir John with all Secrecy went to Morrice's Chamber at St. James's, where the General ſoon after was ready to receive him. Theſe two being alone, and Morrice Door-keeper to the Confereence, Sir John addreſs'd himſelf to the General, with an Acknowledgement, That he was infinitely oblig'd to his Excellency, for giving him this Opportunity of diſcharging a Truſt of ſo great Importance both to himſelf, and the whole Kingdom; and that whatſoever became of him, he thought himſelf very happy in having this good Occaſion of performing his Duty to the King his Maſter. At the ſame Inſtant he preſented the General with a Letter from the King, and produc'd another directed to himſelf, as alſo the Commiſſion which he had from his Majeſty to treat with him. The General taking the Paper, ſtep'd back; and with a frowning Countenance demanded of him How he durſt ſpeak to him in ſuch a Matter, without conſidering the Danger he had hazarded? But Sir John's Anſwer was, That he had long ſince duly conſider'd this Matter, with all the Danger that might attend it; which was not yet ſufficient to deter him from the Performance of his Duty in this Particular; and he was the more encourag'd in it, in regard his Excellency cou'd not but remember the Meſſage he receiv'd in Scotland, by his Brother. Whereupon the General, approaching him with a pleaſing Aſpect, and embracing him in his Arms, ſaid, Dear Couſin, I thank you with all my Heart for the Prudence, Fidelity and Conſtancy you have ſhew'd in this great Affair; and I am much pleas'd alſo at your reſolute Secrecy in it: For cou'd I have known that you had reveal'd it to any Man living, ſince you firſt truſted my Brother with it, I wou'd never have treated with you; which now I ſhall moſt willingly; and the rather, becauſe you are one of my neareſt Kinſmen, and of a Family to which I owe many Obligations. So the General, having read the King's Letters, and the Commiſſion, he ſaid, I hope the King will

will forgive what is paſt, according to the Contents of his gracious Leter; for my Heart was ever faithful to him, but I was never in a Condition to do him Service till this preſent Time; and you ſhall aſſure his Majeſty, that I am now not only ready to obey his Commands, but to ſacrifice my All to his Service: To witneſs this I call this honeſt Man from the Door. So he call'd Mr. Morrice to him, who by this Time cou'd not but underſtand the Deſign of the Meeting.

Being all together, Sir John begg'd of the General to ſend ſome Confident of his own to the King; to which the General willingly yielded; but told him the Confident muſt be himſelf; for he was reſolv'd not to write to the King as yet; and without that, the King had no Reaſon to give Credit to a Meſſenger of his, tho' he might well believe one of his own ſending. And ſo he left him to confer with Mr. Morrice, and to take ſuch Inſtructions from him, as had been before diſcours'd between him and the General. That which Mr. Morrice communicated to him was, after an Enlargement 'on the Perplexity of the General, from the ſeveral prevailing Humours and Factions, and that he durſt not truſt any Officer of his own Army, or any Friend but himſelf, with his ſecret Purpoſes;' he adviſ'd in particular, 'That the King wou'd write a Letter to the General, in which, after ſome gracious Expreſſions, he ſhou'd deſire him to deliver the incloſ'd Letter, and Declaration to the Parliament;' the particular Heads, and Materials for which Letter, Morrice diſcours'd to him; of which the End was to ſatiſfy all Intereſts, and to comply with every Man's Humour, and indeed to ſuffer every Man to enjoy what he pleaſ'd. After Sir John had ſufficiently diſcours'd all Particulars with him, and taken ſuch Memorials in Writing as he thought neceſſary, within a Day or two he was brought with equal Warineſs to the General in another Place; to whom he read the ſhort Notes he had taken; to which little was added: And the General ſaid, That if the King writ to that Purpoſe, when he brought his Letter to him, he wou'd keep it in his Hands, till he found a proper Time to deliver it, or ſhou'd think of another Way to ſerve his Majeſty. But above all Things he intreated him, To deſire his Majeſty from him to go preſently out of the King of Spain's Dominions; for he had certain Intelligence he wou'd be detain'd by the King of Spain's Miniſters, if he ſtaid in his Country. He propoſ'd Breda as the moſt proper Place; and that for the publick Satisfaction, whatſoever he ſhou'd ſend in Writing, ſhou'd bear Date as from that Town; and he enjoyn'd Sir John not to return, till he himſelf had ſeen the King out of the Spaniſh Dominions. Thus inſtructed he left him, who taking with him the loyal Lord Mordaunt for a Companion of his Journey, ſet out for Flanders about the Beginning of April.

He receives Inſtructions, and goes over to the King.

3. Sir John Greenvil's Negotiation was manag'd with ſuch Secrecy, and his Journey to Bruſſels was ſo ſpeedy and fortunate, that few knew of it before his Arrival there; and thoſe who did, and went in his Company, did not ſo much as ſuſpect the Buſineſs in which he was ingag'd. The King, upon Intimation of his being come, went privately to his Lodgings, and was alone with him; and he diſcover'd his Inſtructions from the General to his Majeſty, by whom he was believ'd, tho' he brought no Letter. Immediately the King conſulted with his Lord Chancellor Hyde, the Marquis of Ormond, and Secretary Nicholas, in the Preſence of this Gentleman. And in this Privy-Council Monk had a Commiſſion ſign'd to be Captain-General of all his Majeſty's Forces in the three Kingdoms.

The King meets him privately.

The King, who was oblig'd to Quickneſs in Diſpatch, ſtill found himſelf under ſeveral Difficulties with relation to the Particulars which were recommended to be done; ſome of which he believ'd altogether impracticable, as the leaving all Men in the State they were in, and confirming their Poſſeſſion of all the Lands they held by Purchaſe, or Donation, or Confiſcation, whether they belong'd to the Crown or the Church. Then the complying with all Humours in Religion, and the granting a general Toleration, was a Breach of all the Laws in Force, and cou'd not be ſuppoſ'd to conſiſt with the Peace of the Kingdom. As to a general Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, no Man was more diſpoſ'd to it than his Majeſty; but then he thought it neither conſiſted with his Honour, or his Conſcience, that his Father's Judges ſhou'd be comprehended in that Act of Pardon: Yet it was adviſ'd, 'That there might be little or no Exception; becauſe, it was alledg'd, that ſome of them had facilitated the General's March by falling from Lambert, and others had openly advanc'd the King's Service.' So, after great Deliberation, and weighing the Importance of complying with the General's Advice as far as Honour and Conſcience wou'd permit, his Majeſty directed ſuch Letters and Declarations to be prepared, as ſhou'd in a good Degree anſwer the Counſels of the General, and yet make the Tranſactions of thoſe things he did not like, the Effect of the Power of the Parliament, rather than of his own Approbation. And the Confidence he had upon the general Election of honeſt and prudent Men, and in ſome Particulars Perſons who were already choſen, diſpoſ'd him to make a general Reference of what he cou'd not reſerve to himſelf, to the Wiſdom of the Parliament; for he well knew, that whatſoever Title they aſſum'd, or he gave them, they muſt have another kind of Parliament to confirm all that was done by them; without which they cou'd not be ſafe and ſatisfy'd, nor his Majeſty ſtand oblig'd. Agreeable to theſe Conſiderations, ſeveral Letters were drawn up, and ſign'd by the King, one to the General and the Army, another to the Houſe of Commons, a third to the Houſe of Lords, another to the Fleet, and one more to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London; in each of which was incloſ'd a Declaration beſides, of which Account will be given afterwards.

He prepares Letters and Declarations to be ſent into England.

As to that Advice of removing ſuddenly out of Flanders, the King readily comply'd with that, being further urg'd to it by the Lord Mordaunt, who, juſt as he left England, had receiv'd Information from a Diſcovery made by his loyal Friend Dr. Chriſtopher Merrett, 'That the Spaniards had a full Purpoſe of ſeizing his Majeſty at Bruſſels, and that it wou'd not be ſafe for him to ſtay any longer.' To make way for this Removal, the King viſited the Marquiſs of Carracena, and civilly told him, That he deſign'd the next Day to go to Antwerp, and from thence to Breda, to ſpend two or three Days with his Siſter the Princeſs of Orange; to whom the Dukes of York and Gloceſter were already gone, to acquaint her with the King's Purpoſe; and he likewiſe inform'd him, That there were ſome Perſons come from England, who wou'd not venture to come to Bruſſels, from whom he expected Propoſitions which might prove very beneficial to him, which oblig'd him to make that Journey. The Marquiſs ſeem'd to think the Journey of little Moment, and wou'd have diverted him from it; but the King, to carry on the Diſguiſe, deſir'd him, That the Forces he had promiſ'd him might be ready againſt his Return, to be embark'd upon the firſt hopeful Occaſion, and ſo parted, with a Deſign to go the next Morning. Within a few Hours the King found that he cou'd not be too much in Haſte for his Journey: For in that Night there came one Mr. William Galloway, an Iriſh Page to de Cardinas, to Chancellor Hyde's Lodgings, and finding his Secretary, told him, He muſt needs ſpeak with his Lord immediately, for he had ſomething to impart that concern'd the King's Life. The Chancellor, tho' at that time in Bed, order'd him to be admitted; and the poor Man trembling told him, That his Lord de Cardinas and the Marquiſs of Carracena had been long together that Evening; and that he had over-heard them ſay ſomething of ſending a Guard to attend the King: That, about an Hour after, they parted; and the Marquiſs ſent a Paper to de Cardinas, who left it on his Table when he went to Bed: That himſelf, who lay in his Maſter's Anti-Chamber, look'd into the Paper when his Maſter was in Bed, and ſeeing what it was, had brought it to the Chancellor. It imported an Order to an Officer 'to attend the King with a Party of Horſe, for a Guard where-ever he went, and not to ſuffer him, on any Terms, to go out of Bruſſels.' As ſoon as the Chancellor had read the Order, he ſent it to the King, who was likewiſe in Bed; and his Majeſty having read it, it was return'd to Galloway, who went home, and laid it again upon his Maſter's Table. The King immediately order'd Sir William Armorer his Querry to be call'd up, and charg'd him with all Secrecy, That he wou'd be gone at Three a Clock that Morning: And accordingly he ſafely departed with the Marquiſs of Ormond, Sir William, and two or three Servants more. Between eight and nine that Morning, an Officer did come and inquire for the King; but it happen'd, by this ſeaſonable Diſcovery, that his Majeſty had happily made his Eſcape ſome Hours before, to the great Diſappointment of the Spaniſh Governor.

A Diſcovery made to the King.

He ſecretly leaves Bruſſels.

As ſoon as the King got into the States Dominions, between Antwerp and Breda, he deliver'd to Sir John Greenvil all thoſe Diſpatches, which were prepared and dated, as from Breda, upon the ſame Day in which he receiv'd them, and where his Majeſty was to be that Night. The Copies of all were likewiſe deliver'd to him, that the General, upon Peruſal of them, might chuſe, without opening the Originals, Whether he wou'd deliver them, if he found any thing he diſlik'd; and the King referr'd it to him to proceed any other way, if upon any Alterations he thought fit to vary from his former Advice. Sir John, before his Departure, humbly deſir'd his Majeſty's Pardon, if in his Negotiation he had exceeded his Inſtructions of Reward. To which the King graciouſly anſwer'd, That whatever he had promiſ'd in his Name, ſhou'd be punctual- ly perform'd upon his Reſtoration. Upon which he inform'd his Majeſty, That he had propounded to the General a Hundred Thouſand Pounds per Annum, as a Donative to him and his Officers, together with the Office of Lord High Conſtable and Chancellor of England; but he had generouſly refus'd all theſe Offers, and beſides had given him this in Charge, 'That he ſhou'd not propound any thing to his Majeſty as a Gratification for Service, either for himſelf, or for any Friend or Officer under him.' The King then preſs'd Sir John to know what he ſhou'd do for him; but he, after the Example of the General, nobly refus'd all Propoſals of Reward for the Service in which he had been ſo eminently ſucceſsful, till he ſhou'd happily ſee his Majeſty at Whitehall. However the King had then put up into this brave Gentleman's Packet, tho' unknown to him, a Warrant under his Hand and Seal for an Engliſh Earldom, and the Aſſurance of three Thouſand Pounds per Annum for ever, to ſupport his Honour; together with a Promiſe to pay his and his Father's Debts, which had been contracted in the War, and in the Service of his Majeſty and his Royal Father. With theſe Diſpatches Sir John Greenvil, and his Companion the Lord Mordaunt, who privately expected his Return at Antwerp, made what Haſte they cou'd towards England; and the King that Night got ſafely to Breda, where he continu'd with his Royal Relations for above a Month.

And goes to Breda.

Sir John Greenvil returns to the General.

Sir John Greenvil, at his Return to London, beſides the above-mention'd Commiſſion to the General, produc'd his Majeſty's Seals and Signet, by which his Excellency was empower'd to make a Secretary of State; which, by the Advice of Sir John, he conferr'd upon Mr. Morrice, who in a ſhort time after had the Honour of Knighthood. And over and above his publick Letters, which were reſerv'd to be communicated at a proper Seaſon, he brought a private one to the General from the King, written with his Majeſty's own Hand. To this the General return'd an Anſwer by Mr. Bernard Greenvil, Brother to Sir John, who at this time cou'd not be ſpared to go over to Breda, becauſe the Parliament was approaching, where he was to preſent his Majeſty's Letters and Declarations. This was the firſt time that the General durſt, or wou'd venture to write to the King; which was immediately after he had read over and approv'd the Copies of the ſeveral Diſpatches. And it ought to be remember'd for his Honour, that from this time he behav'd himſelf with true Affection to the King; and tho' he labour'd under the ſtrongeſt Temptations to the contrary, he us'd all his Endeavours to promote the Intereſt of his Majeſty: Yet at the ſame time he as carefully retain'd the Secret, and did not communicate to any Perſon living, excepting Mr. Morrice, that he had receiv'd any Letter from the King, till the very Minute he took the Opportunity to preſent it to the Houſe of Commons.

4. In the mean time the whole Nation was buſily employ'd in the Election of Members for the enſuing Parliament; in which it was wonderful to ſee the general Joy and Chearfulneſs that poſſeſs'd the Minds and Looks of all Men, and the no leſs ſtupid Conſternation of the Fanatick Party; ſo that it appear'd that Heaven had diſarm'd their Spirits of their uſual Violence, even to their perſonating a concurrent Contentment in this ſtrange Change of Affairs. But while all things carry'd ſo pleaſing and promiſing an Aſpect, there happen'd a Buſineſs that very much troubled the King and his Friends, and might probably have deſtroy'd all the Hopes that began to flatter them. Upon the Diſſolution of the Rump Parliament, the higheſt Deſpair ſeiz'd upon all who had been the late King's Judges; and all who had afterwards concurr'd with them, and exercis'd the ſame Power, believ'd their Ruin to be near and inevitable. And therefore they contriv'd all Methods to preſerve themſelves, and to prevent the aſſembling a new Parliament; which if they cou'd interrupt, they made no Doubt but the Rump Members wou'd again reſume the Government. To this Purpoſe they employ'd their Agents among the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, who had been diſgracefully remov'd to make Room for General Monk's Forces: And they inflam'd theſe Men with the Senſe of their own deſperate Condition, 'who, beſides the Loſs of their Arrears, ſhou'd be now offer'd as a Sacrifice to the Cavaliers, their conquer'd Enemies, who were implacably incens'd againſt them.' Not did they omit to make the ſame Infuſions into the Soldiers of the General's Army, who were ſuſceptible of the ſame Fears and Apprehenſions. And when their Minds were thus prepared, Lambert, who had been made cloſe Priſoner in the Tower, unexpectedly made his Eſcape; his Party having in all Places ſo many of their Combination, that they imagin'd they cou'd compaſs any Deſign, eſpecially with ſuch an able Commander at the Head of them.

Lambert breaks out of the Tower.

This Eſcape, in ſuch a nice Conjuncture, threw the General and the Council of State into a great Agony: They foreſaw many threatning Inconveniencies; but without Delay they proclaim'd Lambert and his Accomplices Traytors, and required all Perſons to endeavour to ſuppreſs them; and to the ſame Purpoſe Colonel Roſciter and Colonel Ingoldsby were ſent out with a ſufficient Strength of Horſe; of whom it was the Fortune of the latter to have Advice of his being near Daventry in Northamptonſhire with a Party of four Troops, beſides ſome Sectaries who were likewiſe joyn'd with him. Upon his Departure, the General ſent privately for Sir John Greenvil, and told him plainly, That if Colonel Ingoldsby were beaten, and Lambert's Army ſo increas'd as not to be ſuppreſs'd without a War; he then wou'd put off his Diſguiſe, declare the King's Commiſſion, own it for the Authority by which he acted, and commiſſion the Royal Party into Arms in all Places through England, Scotland, and Ireland: Wherefore he requir'd Sir John to attend him, and receive Orders from him for his Majeſty's Service. But indulgent Providence had appointed the glorious Reſtoration to be without Blood: For Colonel Ingoldsby poſting towards Lambert, his forlorn Hope chanc'd to meet with Haſlerigg, one of his four Captains, whom they apprehended; but he was ſet at Liberty upon his Parole given to bring over his Troops to them, which he perform'd the next Day. At length Ingoldsby facing Lambert's Party, the Enemy finding himſelf too weak to fight, deſired to treat; which being granted, Lambert propos'd the ſetting up Richard Cromwell, and reſtoring him to be Protector; which being look'd upon as a fooliſh Propoſal, they prepared to fight. But another Troop deſerting Lambert, he made ready for Flight, hoping by the Fleetneſs of his Horſe to have eſcap'd; but notwithſtanding he was overtaken by Ingoldsby himſelf, and being demanded to yield himſelf his Priſoner, offer'd not ſo much as to draw his Sword, but ſervilely cry'd out, Pray, my Lord, let me eſcape! what Good will my Life or Impriſonment do you? Beſides him there were taken Colonel Cobbit, Major Creed, Colonel Okey, Colonel Axtel, Lieutenant-Colonel Young, with ſeveral others, who were all ſent to the Tower, and other Priſons, a little before the Meeting of the Parliament.

He is taken by Colonel Ingoldsby.

In the mean time many ſeditious Pamphlets were publiſh'd, to debauch the Minds of the People, and Tickets were thrown into the Courts of Guards in the Night, to excite and corrupt the Soldiers: But none appear'd to have been penn'd with more Virulency and Malice, than that ſuppoſititious Paper entitled, A Letter from Bruſſels, &c. which pretended to lay open the implacable Diſpoſition of the King's own Temper, in the moſt affecting Terms that cou'd be invented. Theſe and others were anſwer'd by diſplaying his Majeſty's natural Clemency and forgiving Temper, which at this Time was highly neceſſary to be believ'd. For the greateſt Obſtruction to his Return at this Time, was the Conſcience of the perſonal Injuries, and barbarous Uſage, which all the Royal Party had ſuſtain'd, and the Apprehenſion that their Animoſities were ſo great, that, notwithſtanding the beſt Acts of Oblivion, all Opportunities wou'd be taken for ſecret Revenge; and that They who had been deeply oppreſs'd for near twenty Years, wou'd for the future uſe their new reſtored Power with great Inſolence. To obviate therefore this too reaſonable Imagination, and to ſtop the Mouths of Libellers, ſome wiſe Perſons of the King's Party publiſh'd an excellent Declaration, in which, after Thanks given to the General, they ſincerely profeſs'd, 'That they reflected upon the paſt Suffering as from the Hand of God; and therefore did not cheriſh any violent Thoughts or Inclinations againſt any Perſons whatſoever, who had been any way inſtrumental in them; and that, if the Indiſcretion of any Particular Perſons ſhou'd tranſport them to Expreſſions contrary to this their general Senſe, they utterly diſclaim'd them.' They farther promis'd, 'by their quiet and peaceable Behaviour to teſtify their Submiſſion to the Council of State, in Expectation of the future Parliament; on whoſe Wiſdom, they truſted, God wou'd give ſuch a Bleſſing, as might produce a perfect Settlement both in Church and State.' And laſtly they declared, 'That as the General had not choſen the Sandy Foundation of Self-Government, but the firm Rock of National Intereſt, whereon to frame a Settlement, ſo it was their Hope and Prayer, that when the Building ſhou'd come to be rais'd, it might not, like Rome, have the Beginning in the Blood of Brethren; nor, like Babel, be interrupted by Confuſion of Tongues; but that all might ſpeak one Language, and be of one Name; that all Mention of Parties and Factions, and all Rancour and Animoſities may be thrown in and bury'd like Rubbiſh under the Foundation.' This was ſign'd by nineteen Lords, one Biſhop, twenty nine Knights, four Doctors of Divinity, and ſeventeen Lawyers and Gentlemen of Note, and all their Names publiſh'd in Print. This and the like healing Methods were happily obſerv'd in many other Parts of the Nation; which very much contributed towards the allaying the preſent Diſtemper, and prov'd an excellent Preparation for the Approach of the bleſſed Parliament.

The FREE PARLIAMENT.

VII. 1. At length came on the vaſt expected Day, the 25th of April, when that happy Convention, call'd the Free Parliament, met and ſate in two Houſes; introduced by a Sermon preach'd by Dr. Reynolds. The Lords choſe the Earl of Mancheſter for their Speaker, and the Houſe of Commons made Choice of Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, who had been a Member of the Long Parliament, and continu'd, rather than concurr'd with them, till he was excluded in 1648. The Lord General was choſen Knight for his own County of Devon, and likewiſe for the Univerſity of Cambridge; and not above four or five of thoſe call'd Rumpers were return'd. The firſt Thing they did, was to order 'That the Lord General ſhou'd have the Acknowledgment and hearty Thanks of the Parliament, for the eminent and unparallel'd Services done theſe Nations, in freeing them from Slavery, without the leaſt Bloodſhed;' which was accordingly perform'd. Thanks alſo were after that given to Colonel Ingoldsby, for his Service againſt Lambert. And now the Reſtoration of Monarchy was ſo apparent, that ſeveral of the Republicans thought complying wou'd be the ſureſt Means of Safety; and Sir Arthur Haſlerigg himſelf came to the General, and delivered up his two Regiments, and the Governments of Berwick, Newcaſtle and Tinmouth, which were given him by the late Powers, on Condition to have his Life and Eſtate preſerv'd; both which were generouſly aſſured to him. After their Thanks return'd, the Members proceeded to bitter Invectives againſt the Memory and Actions of Cromwell, with Execration upon the horrid Murther of the late King. And in theſe general Heads they ſpent the two firſt Days of their Sitting; no Man, how loyal ſoever, having the Courage to mention the King, till they cou'd exactly diſcover the Intentions of the General, who cou'd only protect ſuch a Propoſition from being penal to him that made it, by the former Ordinances of the Rump-Parliament.

The Houſes having adjourn'd two or three Days, upon the Account of a Faſt, on the firſt of May, when all Men were ſtill in a Suſpence, the General, having ſurvey'd the Temper of the Houſe, reſolv'd at once to open the grand Affair. He ſtood up and told them, That one Sir John Greenvil, who was a Servant of the King's, had brought him a Letter from his Majeſty; which he had in his Hand, but wou'd not preſume to open it without their Direction; and that the ſame Gentleman was at the Door, and had a Letter to the Houſe: Which was no ſooner ſaid, than with a general Acclamation he was call'd for, and being brought to the Bar, he ſaid, That he was commanded by the King his Maſter, having been lately with him at Breda, to deliver that Letter to the Houſe; which he was ready to do: And ſo, giving it by the Serjeant to be deliver'd to the Speaker, he immediately withdrew.

Sir John Greenvil delivers

The King's Letter to the General,

And that to the Commons,

The Houſe with all Earneſtneſs call'd out to have both Letters read, that to the General, and that to the Speaker. The Former was directed To General Monk, to be by him communicated to the Preſident, and Council of State, and to the Officers of the Army under his Command. It conſiſted chiefly of an earneſt Invitation to them all 'to concur with Him in the Remedy he had apply'd, which in Human Underſtanding, was only proper for the Ills they all Groan'd under; and to make themſelves the bleſſed Inſtruments of Peace and Reconciliation between King and People: Declaring beſides, That he had more endeavour'd to prepare and improve the Affections of his Subjects at home for his Reſtoration, than to procure any Aſſiſtance from abroad; which Aſſiſtance, in this Conjuncture, he need not want.' The Letter to the Speaker was more eagerly call'd for, which conſiſting of Things more material and particular, many of the Words and Expreſſions ought here to be inſerted in full Length. As, 'We do aſſure you upon our Royal Word, that none of our Predeceſſors have had a greater Eſteem of Parliaments, than we have in our Judgment, as well as from our Obligation: We do believe them to be ſo vital a Part of the Conſtitution of the Kingdom, and ſo neceſſary for the Government of it, that We well know neither Prince nor People can be in any tolerable Degree happy without them; and therefore you may be confident, That we ſhall always look upon their Counſels, as the beſt we can receive; and ſhall be as tender of their Privileges, and as careful to preſerve and protect them, as of that which is moſt near to Ourſelf, and moſt neceſſary for our own Preſervation. And as this is our Opinion of Parliaments; ſo We are moſt confident, That you believe and find, that the Preſervation of the King's Authority is as neceſſary for the Preſervation of Parliaments; and that it is not the Name, but the right Conſtitution of them, which can prepare and apply proper Remedies for thoſe Evils which are grievous to the People, and can thereby eſtabliſh their Peace and Security. And therefore we have not the leaſt Doubt, but that you will be tender in, and as jealous of, any Thing that may infringe our Honour, or impair our Authority, as of your own Liberty and Property; which is beſt preſerv'd by preſerving the Other.----------We look upon you as wiſe diſpaſſionate Men, and good Patriots, who will raiſe up thoſe Banks and Fences which have been caſt down, and who will moſt reaſonably hope, That the ſame Proſperity will again ſpring from thoſe Roots, from which it hath heretofore and always grown; nor can we apprehend that you will propoſe any Thing to Us, or expect any Thing from Us, but what We are as ready to give, as You to receive.--------If you deſire Security for Thoſe who, in theſe calamitous Times, either wilfully or weakly have tranſgreſs'd thoſe Bounds which were preſcribed, and have invaded each others Rights, We have left to you to provide for their Security and Indemnity, and in ſuch a Way, as you ſhall think juſt and reaſonable; and by a juſt Computation of what Men have done and ſuffer'd, as near as is poſſible, to take care that all Men be ſatisfy'd. If there be any crying Sin, for which the Nation may be involv'd in the Infamy that attends it, We cannot doubt but that you will be as Solicitous to redeem it, and vindicate the Nation from the Guilt and Infamy, as We can. If you deſire that Reverence and Obedience may be paid to the Fundamental Laws of the Land, and that Juſtice may be equally and impartially adminiſter'd to all Men, it is that which We deſire to be ſworn to our Self, and that all Perſons in Power and Authority ſhou'd be ſo too. In a Word, there is Nothing that you can propoſe that may make the Kingdom happy, which We will not contend with you to compaſs; and upon this Confidence and Aſſurance, We have thought fit to ſend you this Declaration, &c.

Together with his DECLARATION.

At laſt was read his Majeſty's Declaration to all his Loving Subjects, which being of the greateſt Moment, ought to be inſerted without any Abridgment or Diminution. 'If the general Diſtraction and Confuſion, which is ſpread over the whole Kingdom, doth not awaken all Men to a Deſire, and Longing, that thoſe Wounds which have ſo many Years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all We can ſay will be to no Purpoſe. However, after this long Silence, We have thought it our Duty to declare, how much We deſire to contribute thereunto: And That, as We can never give over the Hope, in good Time, to obtain the Poſſeſſion of that Right, which God and Nature hath made our Due; ſo We make it our daily Suit to the Divine Providence, that He will, in Compaſſion to Us and our Subjects, after ſo long Miſery and Sufferings, remit, and put Us into a quiet and peaceable Poſſeſſion of that our Right, with as little Blood and Damage to our People as is poſſible; nor do We deſire more to enjoy what is Ours, than that all our Subjects may enjoy what by Law is Theirs, by a full and entire Adminiſtration of Juſtice throughout the Land, and by extending our Mercy where it is wanted and deſerv'd. And to the End that Fear of Puniſhment may not engage any, conſcious to Themſelves of what is paſt, to a Perſeverance in Guilt for the future, by oppoſing the Quiet and Happineſs of their Country, in the Reſtoration both of King, and Peers, and People to their juſt, ancient and fundamental Rights; We do by theſe Preſents declare, That We do grant a free and general Pardon, which We are ready, upon Demand, to paſs under our Great Seal of England, to all our Subjects of what Degree or Quality ſoever, who within Forty Days after the Publiſhing hereof, ſhall lay hold upon this our Grace and Favour, and ſhall by any publick Act declare their doing ſo, and that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects; EXCEPTING ONLY SUCH PERSONS AS SHALL HEREAFTER BE EXCEPTED BY PARLIAMENT. Thoſe only excepted, let all our Subjects, how faulty ſoever, rely upon the Word of a King, ſolemnly given by this preſent Declaration, That no Crime whatſoever committed againſt Us, or our Royal Father, before the Publication of this, ſhall ever riſe in Judgment, or be brought in Queſtion, againſt any of them, to the leaſt Indamagement of them, either in their Lives, Liberties, or Eſtates, OR (as far forth as lies in our Power) SO MUCH AS TO THE PREJUDICE OF THEIR REPUTATIONS, by any REPROACH, or TERMS OF DISTINCTION from the reſt of our beſt Subjects; We deſiring and ordain- ordaining, That henceforward all Notes of Diſcord, Separation, and Difference of Parties, be utterly aboliſh'd among all our Subjects; whom We invite and conjure to a perfect Union among Themſelves, under our Protection, for the Reſettlement of Our Juſt Rights, and Theirs, in a Free Parliament; by which, upon the Word of a King, We will be adviſed. And becauſe the Paſſion and Uncharitableneſs of the Times have produced ſeveral Opinions in RELIGION, by which Men are engag'd in Parties and Animoſities againſt each other; which, when they ſhall hereafter unite in a Freedom of Converſation, will be compoſed, or better underſtood; We do declare a Liberty to tender Conſciences; and that no Man ſhall be diſquieted, or called in Queſtion for Differences of Opinion in Matters of Religion WHICH DO NOT DISTURB THE PEACE OF THE KINGDOM; and that We ſhall be ready to conſent to ſuch an Act of Parliament, as, upon mature Deliberation, ſhall be offer'd to Us, for the full granting that Indulgence. And becauſe in the continu'd Diſtractions of ſo many Years, and ſo many and great Revolutions, many Grants and Purchaſes of Eſtates have been made to and by many Officers, Soldiers and Others, who are now poſſeſs'd of the ſame, and who may be liable to Actions at Law, upon ſeveral Titles; We are likewiſe willing That all ſuch Differences, and all Things relating to ſuch Grants, Sales, and Purchaſes, ſhall be determin'd in Parliament; which can beſt provide for the juſt Satisfaction of all Men who are concern'd. And we do further declare, That We will be ready to conſent to any Act or Acts of Parliament to the Purpoſes aforeſaid, and for the full Satisfaction of all Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers of the Army under the Command of General Monk; and that they ſhall be receiv'd into Our Service upon as good Pay, and Conditions, as they now enjoy.

The Joy and Gratitude of the Commons.

From this Moment Charles Stuart was no more mention'd, or heard of: Such a general Torrent of Joy was never ſeen within thoſe Walls; and tho' there were ſome Members, who in all Probability were inwardly vex'd to the Soul, yet they had not the Hardineſs to appear leſs tranſported than the reſt; and even Robinſon Himſelf, formerly a moſt fierce Man againſt the King, was now one of the Firſt who magnify'd his Majeſty's Grace and Goodneſs. And ſo, without deferring it a Minute, and without one contradicting Voice, they appointed a Committee to prepare an Anſwer to his Majeſty's Letter, ‘Expreſſing the great and joyful Senſe the Houſe had of his gracious Offers, and the humble and hearty Thanks for the ſame, and with Profeſſions of their Loyalty and Duty to his Majeſty; and that the Houſe will give a ſpeedy Anſwer to his Majeſty's gracious Propoſals.’ They likewiſe order'd, at the ſame Time, ‘That both his Majeſty's Letters, that to the Houſe, and that to the General, with his Majeſty's Declaration therein incloſed, and the Reſolution of the Houſe thereupon, ſhou'd be forthwith printed and publiſh'd, as well as enter'd at large in the Journal of the Houſe.’ Then the Houſe took into Conſideration, That the King being long depriv'd of his Revenue, might be in Want of Mony, and therefore Order'd, ‘That Fifty Thouſand Pounds ſhou'd be ſpeedily rais'd and preſented to his Majeſty, with ten Thouſand to the Duke of York, and five Thouſand to the Duke of Gloceſter.’

The King's Letter to the Lords.

In the mean Time Sir John Greenvil attended on the Houſe of Lords, where beſides the King's Declaration, he deliver'd a Letter from his Majeſty, in which were theſe Words: ‘We have thought it very fit and ſafe for Us to call for your Help, in the compoſing the confounding Diſtempers and Diſtractions of the Kingdom; in which your Sufferings are next to thoſe We have undergone our Self; and therefore you cannot but be the moſt proper Counſellors for removing thoſe Miſchiefs, and for preventing the like for the future. -------- We are moſt confident you will diſcharge your Truſt with that Juſtice, and Wiſdom, that becomes you, and muſt always be expected from you; and that, upon your Experience how one Violation ſucceeds another, when the known Relations and Rules of Juſtice are once tranſgreſs'd, you will be as jealous for the Rights of the Crown, and for the Honour of your King, as for your Selves.’ The reading of the Declaration and Letter was ſucceeded with ſuch Acclamations as had never been known in that Place; and the Joy cou'd not be confin'd within the Walls of the Houſe; but a Conference was immediately deſired with the Commons; who preſently joyn'd with them in this Vote, Vote of both Houſes.

‘That according to the ancient and fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords, and Commons:’ And they appointed a Committee to ſearch the Journals, for what Acts or Orders there had been made inconſiſtent with that Government. On the ſame Day the King's Letter and Declaration was deliver'd to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, who were likewiſe tranſported with his Majeſty's Goodneſs towards them, and the Promiſes he made to that his Native City. And to manifeſt their Duty and Gratitude, they immediately order'd a Preſent of ten Thouſand Pounds for the King, a Thouſand Pounds for the Duke of York, and as much for the Duke of Gloceſter. Preſently the whole City was fill'd with Shouts and Acclamations, and nothing but Raptures appear'd in every Man's Countenance; Guns, Bells, and Bonfires proclaim'd the general Exultation; and that Night was crown'd with ſuch Torrents and Overflowings of Joy, as can neither be deſcrib'd nor expreſs'd.

2. The next Day the Committee who were appointed by the Houſe of Commons, proceeded to prepare an Anſwer to the King's Letter and Declaration: They found it difficult to ſatisfy all Men, who were well contented that the King ſhou'd be invited to return; but ſome thought, that the Guilt of the Nation required leſs Precipitation than was like to be us'd; and that a Treaty ought firſt to be made with the King, and Conditions of Security agreed on, before his Majeſty ſhou'd be receiv'd. Many of thoſe who had conferr'd together before the meeting of the Parliament, had deſign'd ſome Articles to be prepared, according to the Model of thoſe at Killingworth, in the Time of King Henry the Third, to which the King ſhou'd be ſworn before he came home. Then the Presbyterian Party, of which there were many Members in the Houſe, tho' they were rather troubleſome than powerful, ſeem'd very ſolicitous that ſomewhat ſhou'd be concluded in Veneration of the Covenant; and, at leaſt, that ſomewhat ſhou'd be inſerted in their Anſwer to the Diſcountenance of the Biſhops. But the more general Warmth and Zeal of the Houſe threw away all thoſe Formalities and Affectations: They cry'd out, They had proceeded too far already in their Vote upon the Receipt of the Letter, to fall back again, and offend the King with colder Expreſſions of their Duty. In Concluſion, after two Days Debate, finding an Impatience without the Walls equal to that within the Houſe, they were contented to gratify the Presbyterians in the Length of the Anſwer, and in uſing ſome Expreſſions which wou'd pleaſe Them, and cou'd do the King no Prejudice. Much of it is a kind of a Repetition of the King's own Expreſſions, and therefore not needful to be inſerted; but one Paragraph ought not to be omitted, which is as follows:

The Commons Letter to the King.

‘And we beſeech your Majeſty, we may add this farther for the Vindication of Parliaments, and even of the laſt Parliament, conven'd under your Royal Father of happy Memory, when through Miſtakes and Miſunderſtandings, many Inconveniences were produced, which were not intended, That thoſe very Inconveniences cou'd not have been brought upon us by thoſe Perſons who had deſign'd them, without violating the Parliament itſelf. For they well knew it was not poſſible to do a Violence to that ſacred Perſon, whilſt the Parliament, which had Vowed and Covenanted for the Defence and Safety of that Perſon, remain'd entire. Surely, Sir, as the Perſons of our Kings have ever been dear unto Parliaments, ſo we cannot think of that horrid Act committed againſt the precious Life of our late Sovereign, but with ſuch Deteſtation and Abhorrency, as we want Words to expreſs it; and, next to wiſhing it had never been, we wiſh it may never be remember'd by your Majeſty, to be unto you an Occaſion of Sorrow, as it will never be remember'd by Us, but with that Grief and Trouble of Mind which it deſerves; being the greateſt Reproach that ever was incurr'd by any of the Engliſh Nation, an Offence to all the Proteſtant Churches abroad, and a Scandal to the Profeſſion of the Truth of Religion here at home; though both Profeſſion and true Profeſſors, and the Nation itſelf, as well as the Parliament, were moſt innocent of it; it having been only the Contrivance and Act of ſome few ambitious and bloody Perſons, and ſuch others, as by their Influence were miſ-led.

Thanks given to Sir John Greenvil.

The Letter being engroſs'd and ſign'd, Sir John Greenvil was appointed to attend the Houſe; and being conducted to the Bar, the Speaker ſtood up, and thus addreſs'd Himſelf to him: I need not tell you with what grateful Hearts the Commons have receiv'd his Majeſty's gracious Letter; you yourſelf being an Ear and Eye-Witneſs of it: Our Bells and our Bonfires have already began the Proclamation of his Majeſty's Goodneſs, and of our Joys: We have told the People, That our King, the Glory of England, is coming home again, and they have reſounded it back in our Ears, That they are ready, and that their Hearts are ready to receive Him: Both Parliament and People have cry'd aloud to the King of Kings in their Prayers, LONG LIVE KING CHARLES THE SECOND! I am likewiſe to tell you, That the Houſe do not think fit that you return back to our Royal Sovereign, without ſome Teſtimony of our Reſpects to yourſelf; and therefore have order'd der'd that five Hundred Pounds ſhou'd be deliver'd to you, to buy you a Jewel, as a Badge of that Honour which is due to a Perſon whom the King has honour'd with ſo gracious a Meſſage: And I am commanded in the Name of the Houſe to return you their very hearty Thanks. So mighty a Change was this, that a Servant of the King's, who, for many Years together, had been in Priſons and Confinements, only for being his Servant, and but a few Months before wou'd have been brought to a ſhameful Death, if he had been known to have ſeen the King, ſhou'd now be thus rewarded for bringing a Meſſage from him. From this Time there was ſuch a zealous Emulation and Impatience in Lords and Commons, and City, and generally over the Kingdom, that, as the noble Writer obſerves, a Man cou'd not but wonder where thoſe People dwelt who had done all the Miſchief, and kept the King ſo many Years from enjoying the Comfort and Support of ſuch excellent Subjects.

Both Houſes make a Proclamation of the King.

3. The next great Thing that was conſider'd, both by Lords and Commons, who had a Conference for that End, was, how they might with the greateſt Show and Luſtre perform the Reſpects preparatory to his Majeſty's Return. They well remember'd, That upon the Murder of the late King, there was a Declaration, That no Man, upon Peril of his Life, and Forfeiture of his Eſtate, ſhou'd preſume to declare his Succeſſor; which had ſo terrify'd the People, that they hardly durſt ſo much as pray for him. Wherefore, tho' this Parliament had us'd all Methods to publiſh their Return to their Obedience, yet they thought it neceſſary for the better Information and Conviction of the People, to make ſome ſolemn Proclamation of the King's undoubted Right to the Crown, and to oblige all Men to pay that Reverence and Duty to him, which they ought to do by the Laws of God and the Land. Accordingly, with the Conſent of both Houſes, a Proclamation was drawn up in theſe remarkable Words: 'Altho' it can no Way be doubted, but that his Majeſty's Right and Title to his Crown and Kingdoms, is, and was every Way compleated by the Death of his moſt Royal Father of glorious Memory, without the Ceremony or Solemnity of a Proclamation; yet, ſince Proclamations in ſuch Caſes have been always uſed, to the End that all good Subjects might upon this Occaſion, teſtify their Duty and Reſpect; and ſince the armed Violence, and other the Calamities of many Years laſt paſt, have hitherto deprived us of any ſuch Opportunity, whereby we might expreſs our Loyalty and Allegiance to his Majeſty: We therefore the Lords and Commons now aſſembled in Parliament, together with the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, and other Free Men of this Kingdom now preſent, do, according to our Duty and Allegiance, heartily, joyfully, and unanimouſly acknowledge and proclaim, That immediately upon the Deceaſe of our late Sovereign Lord King Charles, the Imperial Crown of the Realm of England, and of all the Kingdoms, Dominions, and Rights belonging the ſame, did, by Inherent Birth-Right and Lawful Undoubted Succeſſion, deſcend and come to his moſt Excellent Majeſty Charles the Second, as being Lineally, Juſtly, and Lawfully next Heir of the Blood Royal of this Realm, and that by the Goodneſs and Providence of Almighty God, He is, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, the moſt Potent, Mighty, and Undoubted King; and thereunto We moſt humbly and faithfully do ſubmit, and oblige our Selves, Our Heirs, and Poſterity for ever. GOD SAVE THE KING!'

The Solemnity of its Publication.

This Proclamation being prepared, the Lords and Commons order'd the Arms of the Common-Wealth in all Places to be taken down, and the Lieutenant of the Tower to publiſh the higheſt Expreſſions of Joy by the great Guns, at the appointed Time; while the General concerted all Things with the City, to compleat the grand Solemnity. So on Monday, the 8th of May, a new Day of Triumph, the Lords being met in the Painted Chamber, walk'd in Order through Weſtminſter-Hall, with the Earl of Mancheſter their Speaker at the Head of them. At the Hall Gate they were accompany'd and attended by the Speaker, and the whole Body of the Houſe of Commons; where being regularly plac'd, both Lords and Commons ſtood bare, while Mr. Byſhe, Garter King at Arms, dictated, and Mr. Ryly, Norroy King at Arms, with a loud Voice firſt pronounc'd the fore-written Proclamation. This done, the Lords and Commons took their Coaches, and proceeded in the following Manner: Firſt went the Bailiff of Weſtminſter, with his Servants riding with white Staves to prepare the Way; then follow'd a gallant Troop of Officers, and other Gentlemen, with Trumpets before them; next the General's Life-Guard, with a new Claſs of Trumpets; then a Herald between the Serjeant of the Commons, and the Mace of the Council; next Mr. Ryly between two Serjeants, after whom came Mr. Byſhe and the Uſher of the Black Rod: Then follow'd the Speaker of the Houſe of Lords, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and the Lord General Monk, each in their Coach and Six Horſes, being follow'd by the Lords and Commons in their Coaches, and a Troop of Horſe bringing up the Rear. Thus they proclaim'd his Majeſty a ſecond Time before White-Hall; and then advancing to Temple-Bar, the noble Show was encreas'd by a glorious Cavalcade of the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, &c. with all the Officers of the City Militia, moſt ſplendidly accouter'd. The Streets were lined on both Sides by the Train'd-Bands of London, from Temple-Bar to the Royal Exchange, the City Horſe falling in with the Life Guard; and ſo with this Addition of Solemnity, his Majeſty was again proclaim'd at the End of Chancery-Lane, at Cheapſide, and at the Exchange, with ſuch overflowing Raptures and Tranſports, as exceed all Imagination. At Night the whole City ſhin'd with Bonfires and Fire-Works, and the Air reſounded with the Noiſe of Bells, Guns, Warlike Inſtruments, and the repeated Acclamations of the People; while Feaſtings in the Houſes, and Rivers of Wine in the Streets join'd in the publiſhing the Univerſal Joy; which ſoon diffus'd itſelf throughout the Kingdom with ſuch an overbearing Inundation, as was never known in any Age before.

Applications made to the King at Breda,

From England,

VIII. 1. During the various and hopeful Tranſactions in England, the King, who had happily eſcaped from Bruſſels, continu'd at Breda for above a Month, where on every Day was open'd to him ſome new Scene and Proſpect of Felicity. Expreſſes came frequently from London, upon the Obſervations of his Friends, and the Applications made to them by many who had been very active againſt him, and were now as ſollicitous his Majeſty ſhou'd know, that they wholly dedicated themſelves to his Service. Many Perſons now came to Breda, not as formerly to Cologn, Bruges and Bruſſels, under Diſguiſes, and in Fear to be diſcover'd, but in the moſt publick Manner, and with the Vanity to be taken Notice of, to preſent their Duty to the King. Every one ſeem'd ready to boaſt of their Services, and to magnify their Sufferings under the late Tyrannical Government; when ſeveral of them had been purely paſſive under it, and others real Promoters of it. For ſome of theſe, when they were extolling their Loyalty and former Behaviour, it is ſaid, the King call'd for Wine, and applying himſelf to the Duke of York, drank to the Health of theſe Gentlemen, with this Remark, That he was out of their Debt, having, as he thought, done as much for them, as they had done for him. Every Day the Numbers of the Engliſh encreas'd at Breda, where the Magiſtrates took particular Care for their Accommodation: Some were imploy'd to procure Pardons for thoſe who thought themſelves in Danger; and others brought good Preſents in Engliſh Gold to the King, that the Names of them and their Friends who ſent them, might be remember'd among the firſt who ſhew'd their Affections by ſupplying his Neceſſities. Among theſe, Mr. Lenthall, late unhappy Speaker of the Long Parliament, commiſſion'd a Friend to give the King three thouſand Pounds from him, and to deſire that he might continue Maſter of the Rolls; but the Perſon he had employ'd was told, That the Place was already promis'd to another.

From Flanders,

The King had not been long at Breda, before the Spaniſh Miniſters at Bruſſels began to think, that his Majeſty's Affairs were not altogether ſo hopeleſs as they had weakly imagin'd them to be, and that there was more in his Remove to Breda than at firſt appear'd. They had daily expected to hear, that the States of Holland had forbidden him to remain in their Dominions, as they had done when his Preſence had been leſs Publick. But when they cou'd hear of no ſuch Thing, but that the Reſort to the King daily encreas'd; and that he had ſtay'd longer there than he had intimated to them, the Marquiſs of Carracena ſent a Perſon of prime Quality to Breda, 'to invite his Majeſty to return to Bruſſels; the rather, becauſe he had receiv'd ſome hopeful Propoſitions from England, to which he was not willing to return an Anſwer, without receiving his Majeſty's Command and Approbation.' The King civilly ſent him Word, 'That upon the Account of his Buſineſs in England, he was oblig'd to ſtay where he was; and that he was not without Hope that his Affairs might ſucceed ſo well, that he ſhou'd not be neceſſitated to return to Bruſſels at all.' As ſoon as the Marquiſs receiv'd this Anſwer, he return'd the ſame Meſſenger with a kind of Expoſtulation, 'for the Indignity that wou'd be offer'd to his Catholick Majeſty, if he ſhou'd leave his Dominions in ſuch a Manner; and therefore beſought him, either to return himſelf thither, or that the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloceſter, or at leaſt one of them,

1660. Car. 12.

‘ might come to Bruſſels, that the World might not believe that his Majeſty was offended with the Catholick King, who had treated him ſo well.’ The King and the two Dukes made their Excuſes with all poſſible Acknowledgment ‘ of the Favours and Civilities they had receiv'd from his Catholick Majeſty, and from the Marquiſs himſelf;’ but were too wiſe to comply with either of the Particulars: So that when he found he was to receive no Satiſfaction, he reveng'd himſelf upon De Cardinas with a thouſand Reproaches, for his Stupidity and Ignorance in the Affairs of England, and what related to them, after he had reſided ſixteen Years Ambaſſador in that Kingdom.

From France,

Cardinal Mazarine had better Intelligence from London, from whence he had Accounts of every Day's Alteration, and of the general Belief that Monk had other Intentions than he yet diſcover'd. And when he heard that the King was remov'd from Bruſſels to Breda, he immediately perſuaded the Queen Mother of England to ſend the Lord Jermyn, who at her Deſire had lately been made Earl of St. Albans, to invite the King ‘ to come into France, and to make that Treaty, which probably wou'd be between the enſuing Parliament and his Majeſty, in that Kingdom; which wou'd greatly conduce to her Majeſty's Intereſt and Honour; in which the Power of the Cardinal might be of great Importance in diverting, or allaying any inſolent Demands which might be made.’ And the Cardinal himſelf made the ſame Invitation by that Lord, with Profeſſions of extraordinary Kindneſs; and ‘ That his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty was infinitely deſirous to perform all thoſe Offices and Reſpects to him, which he had always intended, but was never able to accompliſh till now:’ Adding thus much farther, ‘ That if his Majeſty found that the Expedition of his Affairs wou'd not permit him to come to Paris, all Preparations ſhou'd be made for his Reception at Calais, or any other Place he ſhou'd appoint, for entertaining himſelf with the Queen his Mother;’ with all other Expreſſions of the higheſt Eſteem, with which the Artifice of that great Miniſter was plentifully ſupply'd. The Earl of St. Albans found the King too well fortify'd to yield to any Importunities he cou'd advance; and ſo was content to return with his Majeſty's Acknowledgments and Excuſe, ‘ That he cou'd not decently paſs through Flanders, after he had refus'd to return to Bruſſels; and without going through thoſe Provinces, he cou'd not well make a Journey into France.’ However it was no ſmall Satisfaction to the King, to find himſelf ſo ſolemnly invited by the Miniſters of thoſe two great Kings, to enter their Dominions, out of one of which he had been rejected with the greateſt Indignities, and through the other had been ſuffer'd to paſs with the greateſt Difficulties.

And from Holland.

The King met with a third Invitation, that prov'd more acceptable: He had not been many Days at Breda, before the States-General ſent Deputies of their own Body to congratulate his Majeſty's Arrival in their Dominions, and to acknowledge the great Honour he had vouchſaf'd to do them. And ſhortly after, other Deputies came from the States of Holland, beſeeching his Majeſty, ‘ That he wou'd grace that Province with his Royal Preſence at the Hague, where Preparations ſhou'd be made for his Reception, in ſuch a Manner as wou'd teſtify the great Joy of their Hearts for the Bleſſings which Divine Providence was pouring upon his Head.’ The King kindly accepting their Invitation, they return'd with a Reſolution to make his Majeſty's Journey thither, and his Entertainment there, equal to their Profeſſions.

The King's Reception at the Hague.

2. All things being prepared, and the States having ſent the Yatches and other Veſſels, for the Accommodation of his Majeſty and his Train, as near Breda as the River wou'd permit, the King, with his Royal Siſter and two Brothers, left that Place in the Beginning of May; and ſoon after went on Board the Yatches, which carry'd them to Rotterdam; while Dort, and the other Places near which they paſs'd, ſhew'd all the Expreſſions of Joy, by the Conflux of the People on the Banks of the River, and all other Ways, which the Situation of thoſe Places wou'd permit. At Rotterdam they enter'd into their Coaches; from whence to the Hague they ſeem'd to paſs through one continu'd Street, by the wonderful and orderly Appearance of the People on both Sides, with ſuch repeated Acclamations, as if they were the Perſons reſtored to Peace and Security. The publick Entrance into the Hague, the Reception there, and the conducting his Majeſty to the Houſe provided for his Entertainment, was very magnificent, and in all Reſpects anſwerable to the Wealth and Grandeur of that State. The Treatment of the King, and all who belong'd to his Service, at the Charge of the States, during the Time of his Abode there, was incredibly noble and ſplendid; the Expence of which, and the Preſents, amounted to an hundred thouſand Pounds; and the general Joy was ſo manifeſt, that it cou'd only be exceeded by that of his own Subjects. The States-General in a Body, and the States of Holland in a Body apart, perform'd their Compliments with all Solemnity; and then ſeveral Perſons, according to their Faculties, made their Profeſſions; and a fix'd Number of them was always appointed to wait in the Court, to receive his Majeſty's Commands. All the Ambaſſadors and publick Miniſters of Kings, Princes, and States, repaired to his Majeſty, and declared the Joy of their Maſters on his Behalf: So that it might well be thought, that this Reſtoration was brought about by the general Combination and Activity of Chriſtendom, that appear'd now to be ſo much affected with it.

1660. Car. 12.

A Committee from the Engliſh Parliament,

Within a few Days Admiral Mountague appear'd with moſt of the Engliſh Fleet before Scheveling, before he had receiv'd full Orders from the Parliament; from whom an Officer was ſent to the King, to preſent his Duty to him, and the Duke of York, now their High Admiral, to receive Orders. Upon which the Duke of York went on Board to take Poſſeſſion of the Command of the Fleet; where he was receiv'd by all the Officers and Sea-men with all poſſible Duty and Submiſſion, and with thoſe Huſſa's which are peculiar to that People. After he had ſtay'd a Day there, in receiving Information of the State of the Fleet, and a Catalogue of the Names of the ſeveral Ships, his Highneſs return'd with it that Night to the King, that his Majeſty might make Alterations, and new name thoſe Ships which too much preſerv'd the Memory of the late Governors, and of the Republick. The Remainder of the Fleet brought over the Committee of the Lords and Commons, that the Parliament had ſent to invite his Majeſty to return. The States having taken Care for their decent Accommodation, they deſired Admiſſion to his Majeſty, who immediately receiv'd them very graciouſly. From the Houſe of Peers were deputed ſix of their Body, and, according to Cuſtom, double the Number from the Commons. The Lords were the Earls of Oxford, Warwick, and Middleton, the Lord Viſcount Hereford, the Lord Berkley of Berkley-Caſtle, and the Lord Brook. From the Commons were ſent the Lord Fairfax, the Lord Bruce, the Lord Falkland, the Lord Caſtleton, the Lord Herbert, the Lord Mandevil, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Horatio Townſend, Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, Sir George Booth, Sir John Holland, and Sir Henry Cholmely. Theſe Perſons preſented the humble Invitation and Supplication of the Parliament, ‘ That his Majeſty wou'd be pleas'd to return, and take the Government of the Kingdom into his Hands; where he ſhou'd find all poſſible Affection, Duty, and Obedience from all his Subjects:’ And ſo they preſented to him and his Brothers the Sums formerly mention'd, that had been given by the Commons. The King treated all the Committee very graciouſly together, and every one of them ſeparately after ſuch an obliging Manner, that ſome of them who were conſcious to themſelves of their former Demerit, were highly pleas'd to find him a Perſon of ſo princely and ſo generous a Nature. The Lord Fairfax was particularly diſtinguiſh'd, who deſir'd to ſee the King in private, and to ask him Pardon, which he obtain'd with all Readineſs; and he drew upon him the Curioſity and Eyes of all Men, being known to have been the mighty General of all the Parliament Forces.

And from the City of London.

The City of London, which had been too inſtrumental in driving the King's Father from that Place, that it might not appear leſs zealous in retrieving all former Errors, at the ſame time ſent twenty of the moſt ſubſtantial Citizens, ‘ to aſſure his Majeſty of their Fidelity, and moſt chearful Submiſſion; and that they plac'd all their Felicity and Hope of future Proſperity in the Aſſurance of his Majeſty's Grace and Protection; for the meriting of which, their Lives and Fortunes ſhou'd be always at his Majeſty's Diſpoſal;’ with which they preſented him with the aforemention'd Sum of ten thouſand Pounds. The King told them, He had always a particular Affection for the City of London, the Place of his Birth; and was very glad, that they had now ſo good a Part in his Reſtoration: And, as being oblig'd to them in particular, he heartily thank'd them, and knighted them all; an Honour no Man in the City had really receiv'd in near twenty Years, and with which they were extreamly pleas'd. And indeed his Majeſty's obliging Behaviour to theſe, and to the Commiſſioners from the Parliament, was ſo remarkable, that every Day in London Letters were receiv'd, extolling the King's unbounded Goodneſs as well as his uncommon Abilities.

With ſome Presbyterian Divines.

With theſe Commiſſioners from the Parliament and the City, there came about ten of the Presbyterian Divines, particularly Reynolds, Calamy, Caſe, and Manton, who wou'd not be look'd upon as Chaplains to the reſt; but being the popular Preachers of London, deſired to be eſteem'd the Repreſentatives of that Party. They begg'd to be allow'd the Favour of a formal Audience from his Majeſty; in which they preſented their Duties, and magnify'd the Affections of themſelves and their Friends; ‘ who, they ‘ ſaid, according to the Obligation of the Covenant, had ‘ always wiſh'd well to his Majeſty; and, upon the Opportunity that God had put into their Hands, had lately ‘ inform'd the People of their Duty, which, they preſum'd, ‘ his Majeſty had been well appris'd of.’ Then they thank'd God, ‘ for his Conſtancy to the Proteſtant Religion;’ and profeſs'd, ‘ That they were no Enemies to ‘ Moderate Epiſcopacy; only deſiring That ſuch Things ‘ might not be preſs'd upon them in God's Worſhip, ‘ which, in the Judgments of thoſe who us'd them, were ‘ acknowledg'd to be Matters Indifferent, and by others ‘ held Unlawful.’ The King, who knew they were real, tho' late, Inſtruments in his Reſtoration, ſpoke very kindly to them, and ſaid, He had heard of their good Behaviour towards him; and that he had no Deſign to impoſe hard Conditions upon them, as to their Conſciences: That they well knew, he had referr'd the ſettling all Differences of that Nature to the Wiſdom of the Parliament; which beſt knew what Sort of Indulgence was neceſſary for the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom. But theſe Divines were not ſo ſatisfy'd, but deſired ſeveral private Audiences of his Majeſty; in which they took the Freedom to ſuggeſt, ‘ That ‘ ſince the Book of Common-Prayer had been long diſcontinu'd in England, and the People ſo diſus'd to it, ‘ that many of them had never heard it in their Lives, it ‘ wou'd be much wonder'd at, if his Majeſty, at his firſt ‘ Landing in the Kingdom, ſhou'd revive the Uſe of it in ‘ his own Chapel, whither all Perſons wou'd reſort;’ and therefore they beſought him, ‘ That he wou'd not uſe it ‘ Entirely and Formally, but have only ſome Parts of it ‘ read, with Mixture of other good Prayers, to be us'd ‘ by his Chaplains.’ To this his Majeſty anſwer'd with ſome Warmth, That while he gave them Liberty, he wou'd not have his own taken from him: That he had always us'd that Form of Service, which he thought the beſt in the World; and had never diſcontinu'd it in Places where it was more diſlik'd than he hop'd it was by them: That when he came into England, he wou'd not ſeverely enquire how it was us'd in other Churches, tho' he doubted not to find it us'd in many; but he was reſolv'd to have no other us'd in his own Chapel. Then they more importunately beſought him, ‘ That the Uſe of the Surplice might be diſcontinu'd ‘ by his Chaplains, becauſe the Sight of it wou'd give ‘ great Offence and Scandal to the People.’ They found the King as immoveable in that Point as in the other, who told them plainly, That he wou'd not be reſtrain'd himſelf, when he gave ſo much Liberty to others: That it had been always held a decent Habit in the Church, conſtantly practis'd in England till theſe late ill Times: That it had been ſtill retain'd by him; and tho' he was oblig'd for the preſent to tolerate much Diſorder and Indecency in the Exerciſe of God's Worſhip, he wou'd not by his own Practice in any Degree diſcountenance the good Order of the Church in which he had been educated. Tho' they were much diſappointed in finding him ſo little compliant with their Schemes, yet they declin'd giving him any more Trouble upon this Head, hoping to find their Importunity in England more effectual.

The States Speech to the King.

3. After a Stay of about ten Days at the Hague in Triumphs and Feſtivals, in Splendor equal to the greateſt of Monarchies, and which were concluded with ſeveral rich Preſents made to his Majeſty, the King took his Leave of the States with all the Profeſſions of Amity that were due to their generous Civilities. On the other Side the States, at his Departure, made a remarkable Speech, which, for the Curioſity of it, is here moſtly inſerted. ‘ If one ‘ may judge of the Content we have to ſee your Majeſty ‘ depart from our Province, by the Satisfaction we had to ‘ enjoy your Preſence, we ſhall have no great Trouble ‘ to make it known to you. Your Majeſty might obſerve in the Looks of all our People, the Joy they had ‘ in their Hearts, to ſee a Prince cheriſh'd of God, a Prince ‘ wholly miraculous, and a Prince who probably will ‘ make a Part of their Quietneſs and Felicity. Your Majeſty ſhall preſently ſee all the Streets filled, all the Ways ‘ cover'd, and all the Hills loaden with People, who will ‘ follow you to the Place of your Embarkment, and ‘ wou'd not leave you, if they had wherewithal to carry ‘ them to your Kingdom. Our Joy is common to Us ‘ with that of our Subjects; but as we know, better than ‘ they, the ineſtimable Value of the Treaſure we poſſeſs; ‘ ſo are we more ſenſible of this ſad Separation. It wou'd, ‘ Sir, be inſupportable to us, if we did not re-enter into ‘ our ſelves, and conſider, That it is the Thing in the ‘ World we moſt deſired, and the greateſt Advantage alſo ‘ that we cou'd wiſh to your Majeſty. We therefore acquieſce, becauſe we know That this Removal is no leſs ‘ neceſſary for us, than glorious for your Majeſty; and that ‘ it is in your Kingdom that we muſt find the Accompliſhment of the Prayers we have made, and ſtill make for you ‘ and us.---The Appointment in which we ſee your Majeſty ready for your Journey, forbids us to enlarge our ‘ ſelves upon a Subject which wou'd never weary us, if ‘ we had Words anſwerable to our reſpectful Sentiments. ‘ But we have no Deſire to encreaſe the juſt Impatience ‘ you Majeſty may have to ſee your ſelf in your own Kingdom: We pray God, Sir, that your Return may be ‘ quiet and happy; and that as He has diſpos'd the Hearts ‘ and Affections of your Subjects to acknowledge their ‘ Lawful and Sovereign Prince, it will pleaſe Him alſo to ‘ command the Winds and Seas to expedite your Voyage; and that after you have receiv'd on your own ‘ Coaſts the ſame Prayers, which we ſhall reiterate, you ‘ may enjoy in your Royal Perſon, and in your never-‘ ceaſing Poſterity, all the Felicity and Proſperity, which ‘ your humble Servants wiſh to your Majeſty.

He takes Leave of them and his Friends.

It was on the 24th of May, that the King, having taken leave of the States, left the Hague, accompany'd with Prince William of Naſſaw, the Admiral of Holland, and the young Prince of Orange, riding on Horſeback between his two Brothers, the Dukes of York and Glocester; while the Ladies attended on him in their Coaches along the Way, and together with him went on board the Royal Charles, formerly the Naſeby, where he was receiv'd by Admiral Mountague with the moſt ſubmiſſive Veneration. The Ways, the Downs, the Sand-Hills and Shores, were throng'd with an innumerable Multitude of all Sorts of People ecchoing his Departure with the loudeſt Vows for his good Succeſs. The Seaſon being clear, and the Sea calm, his Majeſty mounting upon the Stern, caſt his Eyes on the Shore he ſo lately left; and ſeeing the infinite Crowds of Spectators there, he was pleas'd to ſay, That he thought his own Subjects cou'd ſcarce have more Tenderneſs for him than thoſe People, in whoſe Affections he ſaw he reign'd no leſs, than he was going to reign in the Wills of the Engliſh. Shortly after, having kiſs'd his Nephew the Prince of Orange, and his Aunt the Queen of Bohemia, and bid them farewell, he with great Difficulty was ſeparated from his beloved Siſter, the Princeſs Royal. That matchleſs Lady, who had born and ſlighted ſo many Viciſſitudes of ill Fortune; and who had ſo frequently alleviated the Calamities of her Brothers by her charming Diſcourſes, cou'd ſcarce now, without ſhaking her Conſtancy, endure the Abſence of a few Days, which were to prove ſo glorious to both of them. The Anchors being at length weighed, the King left this friendly Shore, and in one continual Thunder of Cannon, within leſs than two Days arriv'd triumphantly in his own Country, from which he had, near nine Years before, been driven away with all the Marks of Diſgrace, and all the Hazards of Life.

The mild Proceedings of the Parliament.

4. While the King was preparing for his Return, the Parliament and City were as buſily employ'd in making his Reception eaſie and honourable. The former were daily endeavouring to pave the Way by binding up the Wounds, and mending up the Breaches of the Nation, by the moſt gentle and moſt probable Methods they cou'd find. They proceeded much upon the merciful Part of the King's Declaration, in preparing a general Act of Pardon and Oblivion; but at the ſame Time they were ſo ſenſible of the Difference between common Offenders, and the Regicides themſelves, that they reſolv'd at leaſt, a certain Number of the latter ſhou'd ſuffer the Law without Mercy. Accordingly they order'd all to be ſeiz'd on that were concern'd in the horrid Murder of the late King; ſtill determining to make a further Difference between the moſt harden'd Criminals, and thoſe that acted with leſs Malice and Conſideration. And firſt they attainted the Blood and Memory of four deceaſed Perſons, moſt flagrant and inveterate, Bradſhaw, Cromwell, Ireton and Pride. In preparing the General Act of Pardon, the Commons proceeded with all Tenderneſs and Caution, eſpecially with Relation to the late Civil War; in which they were very unwilling totally to condemn the Parliament's Part in it. This particularly appear'd in the Treatment they gave to Mr. Lenthall, a Member of the Houſe, who, in the Debate of the Bill, took the Freedom to ſay, He that firſt drew his Sword againſt the late King, committed as great an Offence, as he that cut off his Head. Upon which, being ſeiz'd by the Serjeant, he was brought to the Bar, where the Speaker, by Order of the Houſe, gave him this following Reprimand: Sir, the Houſe has taken very great Offence at ſome Words you have let fall upon the Debate of this Bill of Indemnity; which, in the Judgment of the Houſe, contain as high a Reflection on the Juſtice and Proceedings of the Lords and Commons of the laſt Parliament, in their Actings before 1648, as cou'd be expreſs'd. They apprehend there is much of Poyſon in the ſaid Words; and that they were ſpoken out of Deſign to inflame, and to render them, who drew the Sword to bring Delinquents to Puniſhment, and to vindicate their their juſt Liberties, into Ballance with them who cut off the King's Head: Of which Act they expreſs their Abhorrence and Deteſtation; appealing to God, and their Conſciences bearing them witneſs, That they had no Thoughts againſt his Perſon, much leſs againſt his Life. Therefore I am commanded to let you know, that had theſe Words fallen out at any other Time in this Parliament, but when they had Conſiderations of Mercy, Pardon and Indemnity, you might have expected a ſharper and ſeverer Sentence than I am now to pronounce. But the Diſpoſition of his Majeſty is to Mercy; he hath invited his People to accept of it; and it is the Diſpoſition of the Body of this Houſe to be Healers of Breaches, and to hold forth Mercy to Men of all Conditions, ſo far as may ſtand with Juſtice and Juſtification of themſelves before God and Man. I am therefore commanded to let you know, That that being their Diſpoſition, and the preſent Subject of this Day's Debate being Mercy, you ſhall therefore taſte of Merey. Yet I am, according to Command, to give you a ſharp Reprehenſion, and I do as ſharply and ſeverely as I can, reprehend you for it.

1660. Car. 12.

Preparations for the King's Reception.

But what at this Time chiefly took up the Thoughts of the Parliament, and the City too, was the Manner of the King's Reception at his Return, which was reſolv'd to be as magnificent as was poſſible; and in which all Heads and Hands join'd with the utmoſt Vigour and Alacrity. All that was rich and pompous, all that was gay and beautiful, which the fineſt Inventions cou'd contrive, and the niceſt Fingers compleat, was at this Time prepared and provided, towards the diſplaying and perfecting the moſt glorious Sight that England ever ſaw. The Joy of the poor depreſs'd Cavaliers broke out every where with an incredible Elaſticity; and they were ſo ſeiz'd with Tranſports and Ecſtaſies, that they cou'd not be recover'd for many Days. An impetuous Eagerneſs and Impatience for the King's Return appear'd in all Mens Looks and Motions; and vaſt Numbers for ſeveral Days took Horſe from the City, and other Places, towards the Coaſts of Kent, to get the firſt View of that Fleet, which, as was juſtly believ'd, wou'd bring over the great Bleſſing and Reſtorer of three Kingdoms.

He lands at Dover,

On the 25th of May the wiſh'd-for Fleet appear'd; and on the next Day his Majeſty landed at Dover, being conducted to the Shore by Mr. John Talbot, who was the firſt Man he Knighted in England. General Monk ſtood ready to receive Him, which he did with all Duty upon his Knees; while his Majeſty took him into his Arms, embrac'd, and kiſs'd him. The King after that walk'd up with the General under a Canopy, a Chair of State being carry'd by his Side; and in the Way the Mayor and Aldermen of Dover, with the Miniſter, met his Majeſty, and after a ſhort Speech preſented him with a large Bible with Gold Claſps. The General ſuggeſting that Dover was not commodious for ſo great a Reſort, the King, with his two Royal Brothers, together with the General and the Duke of Buckingham, took Coach, and haſtned away to Canterbury. Never were ſeen ſuch vaſt Numbers of People of all Degrees and Conditions thronging all the Road from Dover to London, which by the young Virgins was ſtrew'd with the fineſt Herbs and Flowers: The Hillocks were cover'd, and the Trees were loaden with Spectators, all lifting up their Hands, and bleſſing God that they had liv'd to ſee the happy Day of his Majeſty's Reſtoration.

Goes to Canterbury,

At his Entrance into Canterbury his Majeſty was met and complimented by the Mayor, Aldermen and Recorder of that ancient City, and preſented with a Tankard of Maſſie Gold, and ſo conducted to the Palace. Here he ſtay'd the next Day, being Sunday, and reſtored the uſual Devotions of the Cathedral. The Company being here increas'd by a new Concourſe of Nobility, and other Perſons of Quality, his Majeſty aſſembled his Council, and ſwore the General and Mr. Morrice Privy-Councellors, the latter of whom he Knighted, and made Secretary of State. That Day the King alſo honour'd the General with the Garter, as he likewiſe did the Marqueſs of Hertford, and the Earl of Southampton, who had been elected many Years before, and ſent one alſo to Admiral Mountague, who remain'd in the Downs.

And Rocheſter,

On Monday He went to Rocheſter, the Numbers of his Attendants ſtill increaſing; and the next Day, being the 29th of May and his Birth-Day, he determin'd to make his Solemn Entrance into the Metropolitan of his Three Kingdoms. At Black-Heath the Army was drawn up in the Sight of his Majeſty, who us'd many gracious Expreſſions towards them; which were anſwer'd with the loudeſt Acclamations. The Regiments being plac'd in Order, the King advanc'd towards London, and about one a Clock arriv'd at St. George's Fields, where the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen had erected a glorious Tent, and provided a ſumptuous Collation.

Arrives at London.

The City Sword being there deliver'd to him, he return'd it, and Knighted the Lord-Mayor, Sir Thomas Allen. After a ſhort Repaſt, the King proceeded through Southwark into London to begin the moſt noble and glorious Cavalcade that England had ever ſeen. To prepare for the Magnificence of it, all the Streets from London-Bridge to White-Hall were ſurpriſingly beautify'd with Tapeſtry and all Sorts of rich Ornaments, and lined with the ſeveral Liveries and the Train'd-Bands of London and Weſtminſter, all in the fineſt Habits they cou'd procure; while the Conduits flow'd with the moſt delicious Wines, and the Windows, Balconies, and Scaffolds purpoſely erected, were crouded with ſuch infinite Numbers of Spectators, that it look'd as if the whole Kingdom had been gather'd to that Place.

His triumphant Entry.

The Manner of the grand Proceſſion, was thus: Firſt march'd a gallant Troop of Gentlemen in Cloth of Silver, brandiſhing their Swords, and led by Major-General Brown: Then follow'd another Troop of two Hundred in Velvet Coats, with Footmen and Liveries attending them in Purple: Then another Troop led by Alderman Robinſon, in Buff-Coats, with Cloth-of-Silver Sleeves, and very rich Green Scarfs; and after theſe a Troop of about Two Hundred, with blue Liveries laid with Silver, with ſix Trumpeters, and ſeveral Footmen, in Sea-Green and Silver: Then a Troop of two Hundred and Twenty, with Thirty Footmen in Gray and Silver Liveries, and four Trumpeters richly habited: Then another Troop of an Hundred and Five with Gray Liveries, and ſix Trumpets; and another of Seventy, with five Trumpets: And then three Troops more, two of three Hundred, and one of one Hundred, all glorioufly habited, and gallantly mounted. After theſe came two Trumpets with his Majeſty's Arms; the Sheriffs Men in red Cloaks richly lac'd with Silver, to the Number of fourſcore, with Half-Pikes in their Hands: Then follow'd ſix Hundred of the ſeveral Companies of London on Horſeback, in black Velvet Coats, with Gold Chains, each Company having Footmen in different Liveries, with Streamers, &c. After theſe came Kettle-Drums, and Trumpets, with Streamers; and after them twelve Miniſters at the Head of his Majeſty's Life-Guard of Horſe, commanded by the Lord Gerard: Next, the City Marſhal with eight Footmen in divers Colours, with the City Waits and Officers in Order: Then the two Sheriffs, and all the Aldermen of London in their Scarlet Gowns and rich Trappings, with Footmen in Liveries, red Coats lac'd with Silver and Cloth of Gold: The Heralds and Maces in rich Coats: Then the Lord-Mayor carrying the Sword bare, with his Excellency and the Duke of Buckingham bare alſo; and then, as the Luſtre to all this Splendid Triumph, rode the KING himſelf between his two Royal Brothers, the Dukes of York and Gloceſter. Then follow'd a Troop of Horſe with white Colours; and after them the General's Life-Guard, led by Sir Philip Howard, and another Troop of Gentry; and laſt of all five Regiments of the Army-Horſe, with Back, Breaſt and Head-Piece, which diverſify'd the Show with Delight and Terror.

Thus triumphantly was his Majeſty conducted to his Royal Palace at White-Hall, amidſt continual Shouts and Acclamations, reſounding and ecchoing from ſeveral hundred thouſand Mouths, tranſported even to Ecſtaſie and Madneſs. At White-Hall he was moſt ſolemnly attended by the two Houſes of Parliament, who caſt themſelves at his Feet, and in two ſhining Speeches, teſtify'd their Vows of Affection and Fidelity to the utmoſt Degree of Loyalty. The Night was turn'd into Day, and the whole City into one great Luminary, by the continual blazing of Bonefires, and the Irradiations of Sky-Rockets, Stars, and all Sorts of Fire-Works; and all accompany'd with the moſt profuſe Entertainments of the richeſt Wines, and greateſt Rarities, and indeed with all poſſible Marks of the moſt dilated Joy and Gladneſs that ever had been ſeen in any Nation in the World: And this ſo unexpreſſible and univerſal, that his Majeſty ſmilingly ſaid to ſome about him, He doubted it had been his own Fault he had been abſent ſo long; for he ſaw no one who did not proteſt, he had ever wiſh'd for his Return.

The Concluſion.

As England had never ſeen ſuch a glorious Sight, ſo it is juſtly believ'd that no other Nation have; no not Rome it ſelf: For all the magnificent Triumphs that ever that proud City ſaw ought not to be compared with this Solemnity; where there were no miſerable Princes to be expoſed, no innocent Captives to be murther'd; where there were none of the Spoils of Kingdoms and Provinces, and the Price of the Blood and Tears of innumerable Wretches, but the moſt free and exalted Expreſſion of a deliver'd and overjoy'd Nation, triumphantly reſtored, without one Drop of Blood, by the All-merciful and Powerful Hand of Heaven.

The End of the Second Volume.

THE PREFACE.

(As Printed to the Firſt Edition of the Third Volume.)

H*AVING been ſo particular in the Preface to the Second Volume, I have the leſs Reaſon to trouble the Reader with enlarging upon the Third; which conſiſts of the Hiſtory of a leſs Number of Years, and with leſs Variety of Incidents and Changes; but ſtill in their own Nature ſo curious and deſirable, as may be of ſingular Uſe and Satisfaction to the Generality of the Nation. It contains the actual Reigns of two Kings and Brothers, who were excellently well fitted and qualified by Nature and Education for their exalted Stations, and ſo well prepared and ſeaſon'd by Adverſity and Oppoſition, as to make themſelves and their People great and happy in this World: Whoſe Lives and Actions, both laudable and culpable, I have endeavour'd to repreſent with all Simplicity and Fidelity, as well as all Freedom and Decency.*

The firſt of theſe Reigns, notwithſtanding all the Advantages of the clear Underſtanding and good Nature of the Prince, was attended with great Mixture of Counſels, and ſtrange Viciſſitudes of good and bad Events, throughout the greateſt Part of the Time. So that the whole Space has been ingeniouſly compared to the four Seaſons of the Year; in which three Quarters are generally fair, hopeful, flouriſhing, and gay; but as conſtantly follow'd by ſevere Winters that freeze, wither, deſtroy and cut off many hopeful Plants, and Expectations of Things to come. The next Reign, which was much ſhorter, may perhaps be compared to a Day, clear and calm in the Morning, tho' not without a Mixture of ſomething dubious and lowring; but in a little Time ſpread and cover'd over with dark and diſmal Clouds, threatning a general Ruin and Deſolation, 'till of a ſudden they were diſſipated and diſpell'd after an unknown and miraculous Manner. So that the Reader, from theſe two Reigns, may expect Profit and Entertainment ſufficient to recompence all his Labour.

It were to be wiſh'd indeed that the Materials in this Volume were altogether as plentiful and valuable as thoſe from whence the laſt was taken; but conſidering the Nature of the Subject, they were not to be ſo much expected, eſpecially at preſent; but were rather to be hop'd for afterwards, when Time has abated and remov'd the Fear and Caution, that is ſo natural to good Writers. However, I have endeavour'd to make the beſt Uſe of thoſe Materials I cou'd procure; the Principal of which may be ſeen in the Beginning of every great Section; and tho' not ſo particular as ſome ſtrict Men may expect, yet, I preſume, ſufficient to ſatisfy any fair and candid Reader, who will have ſo good an Opinion of the Judgment and Honeſty of the Author, as not to expect every Sentence to be ſupported by a particular Authority. Thoſe that expect ſo much, are too often unwilling to be ſatisfy'd with the greateſt Evidence, when it comes in competition with either Intereſt, or Party.

Beſides the Uſe of all printed Tracts, ſuch as Annals, Collections, Memoirs, Letters, Tryals, Pamphlets, Speeches, Gazettes, &c. I had, as in the laſt Volume, the Advantage of ſeveral Manuſcripts and private Accounts from Perſons of unqueſtion'd Knowledge and Credit, which have ſerved much to inrich and inlighten the Work, to clear up many Difficulties, and to invalidate ſeveral vulgar Stories that have crept into the common Books, and been ſwallow'd as Truths by moſt People. And particularly I had the Benefit of the Journals of the Lords and Commons in the two Reigns, which were of ſingular Advantage in perfecting the Parliamentary Accounts; and in which there are many Particulars valuable, new, and never before publiſh'd: And eſpecially in the famous Long Parliament, ſo much applauded and cenſur'd; a Parliament that continu'd above ſeventeen Years, 'till remov'd and deſtroy'd by the Heats ariſing from the Popiſh Plot.

As to the Plot in particular, I have been more than ordinary careful in tracing out the Steps, and examining into the Bottom of that Myſtery of Villany. And if I have not done it ſo perfectly as it deſerves, I have done it more completely and regularly than it is to be found in any one ſingle Writer before me; not only in its Beginning and Riſe, but alſo in its Effects and Conſequences, which produc'd many ſtrange and bloody Events, that ſo far unhing'd the Prerogative of the Crown, that it was hard to ſet it right without endangering the Privileges of the People. To be Maſter of which Account, I made uſe of ſeveral living Aſſiſtances of Worth and Knowledge, beſides what Books and Pamphlets I cou'd procure; from all which I believe I have ſet the whole in a better Light than it has been generally ſeen in before; and if that Plot appears to be another thing than what it has been commonly taken for, it is owing to Evidence and Conviction, more than to Humour and Opinion.

The

PREFACE.

The Tranſactions of the laſt Reign were leſs myſterious, and more open and apparent, and conſequently not ſo hard to be diſcover'd or diſplay'd. Yet that Reign was not without its Depths, as well as Shallows; and tho' the grand Steps were viſible and obvious to the World, yet there was intermixt ſo much Artifice and Subtlety, as was ſufficient to try the Underſtandings, as well as the Honeſty, of a great Part of the Nation. Matters were indeed carry'd on with ſtrange Zeal and Precipitation, but yet were ſo deeply laid, that a very little leſs of either, humanly ſpeaking, muſt have carry'd the Point. And thoſe very Proceedings that caus'd the Ruin of the King and the Popiſh Cauſe, was ſo very near overthrowing that of the Proteſtant and Engliſh Eſtabliſhment, that our Eſcape can be call'd no leſs than a mighty Deliverance; a Deliverance in which the Hand of Heaven appear'd eminently viſible and conſpicuous, not only here, but in other Parts of Chriſtendom.

This laſt has ever been my firm and poſitive Belief, and the Effect of the moſt deliberate Conſideration and Reflection; therefore I freely aver, and gratefully acknowledge the Greatneſs of the Deliverance, in ſpite of the innumerable Inconveniencies ſome have ſaid to attend it, and without any Fear of the Charge and Scandal of Partiality. And this has been acknowledg'd not only by the greateſt and wiſeſt Men, but by ſeveral of thoſe whoſe Conſciences unhappily held them from receiving the full Benefit of it. I ſpeak not this to enter into a Controverſy, but rather to admire and adore the Wiſdom of Heaven, which has maturely and in due Seaſon brought about that Eſtabliſhment, which ſome factious or miſ-led Perſons by a crude Anticipation were weakly attempting in the latter End of King Charles the Second's Reign; which in that Juncture muſt, in all Probability, have involv'd three Kingdoms in Blood.

It were to be deſir'd, that the Hiſtory of the Revolution it ſelf, with all its concurrent Circumſtances, was undertaken by ſome eminent Hand, whoſe Knowledge and Genius is equal to ſo noble a Subject: In the mean Time I hope the World will reſt ſatisfy'd with what I have done; in which they may find all the ſeveral known Steps and Proceedings laid open with Perſpicuity and Regularity. In performing whereof, and the greateſt Part of this laſt Reign, I have been much eas'd, not only by Mr. Bohun*'s labour'd Work, but alſo by the Author of* The Life of King William, who, I am told, had very good Aſſiſtance in that Piece.

In Writing of this Volume, I particularly aim'd at obſerving a juſt Decorum with relation to the two Royal Brothers, and their chief Miniſters; and beſides the Caution againſt the ſtrong Prejudices that have ſo much prevail'd of late, I have conſider'd them chiefly according to the Dignity of their Offices. I have indeed been very free with their publick Errors and Miſmanagements; but at the ſame Time very fearful of examining and expoſing, much leſs dilating upon their private Vices and Extravagancies. The Crimes of great Men are not to receive the vulgar Puniſhments of Stocks, Whips, and Pillories; but they are naturally attended with Fines and Forfeitures, and even Death and Extirpation. To ſearch far into their dark and ſecret Receſſes, is preſumptuous in the Writer, and dangerous to the Reader: Impartiality indeed will not ſuffer thoſe remote Exorbitancies to appear very inconſiderable, but Decency requires that they ſhould very little appear; the one will not allow them to be varniſh'd over, and the other commands them to be thrown into Shades.

I find it the more neceſſary to condemn and avoid thoſe Ways, becauſe in theſe latter Times we meet with ſo many Abuſes of that Kind both in Books and Converſation. Too many in a free Country take a Pleaſure in cenſuring and vilifying their Superiors; and by making bold with crown'd Heads, they bring all upon the Level, and turn Liberty into Licentiouſneſs. And, what is commonly the Conſequence, thoſe Perſons who are ſo ready to pry into the Vices of Princes, too rarely take notice of their Virtues. Of this Sort we find a numerous Spawn ſince the Revolution, as Libellers and Dealers in Scandal, and ſome of the Writers of Secret Hiſtories, who have taken ſuch Liberties with their Betters, as are hardly to be found in any other Part of the World. And thus while the true and valuable Hiſtorians are diving into the rich Mines of Nature, theſe diminutive Writers are raking into Kennels and Common-Shores.

A faithful Hiſtorian indeed ought to lay open and repreſent the publick Errors and Miſcarriages of Princes and great Men, but always with Deference to their Stations and Characters. In ſuch Caſes I have taken all becoming Freedom, but with no little Caution, for fear of ſwimming beyond my Strength. I have us'd the greateſt Freedom with what I account the principal Blemiſh in the Reign of King James the Second, the frequent Breach of his Royal Word. Such open Breaches ought not to be ſilently paſs'd over by an Hiſtorian, whoſe Buſineſs in ſuch a Caſe is to judge and condemn without Reſerve. A Failure in this Kind is acting againſt Natural Principles, and therefore beyond the Power of Excuſe. Had that unfortunate Prince never made thoſe ſolemn and voluntary Promiſes, his Endeavours to eſtabliſh Popery and Arbitrary Power would (in Hiſtory) have admitted of various Mitigations; he had then ſuffer'd leſs in his Memory, and his Caſe would have been more pity'd. But it has been by ſome alledg'd, That without theſe Promiſes, he could not hope to carry his grand Point; which only ſhews to what a miſerable Dilemma he was reduc'd, that either he muſt violate his Honour, or ſacrifice his Religion. And if the Former muſt thus give place to the Latter, what a wretched Idea muſt the World have of that Religion that cannot be ſupported but by what has been abhorr'd, or at leaſt diſclaim'd and diſavow'd, by Jews, Turks, Pagans, and Infidels!

But this ungrateful Subject may eaſily carry an Author beyond the Compaſs of a Preface, therefore it is Time to deſiſt.----I ſhall only repeat the Promiſe I made in the laſt Preface, of Correcting and Amending whatever is found to be amiſs; and further add, That tho' I have been too bold in attempting this Third Volume, as coming too near my own Time, yet I am not afraid to venture a few Years further, upon a Fourth, namely, the compleat Reign of King William; which poſſibly I may undertake, if I meet with reaſonable Aſſiſtance and Information from thoſe that are able to give it.

The Introduction.

I. 1. HAving fully got through a ſtormy and tempeſtuous Seaſon of many Years Continuance, a tedious Time of various Miſery and Confuſion, We arrive at the moſt unexpected Order and Settlement, at ſuch a glorious Calm and Sunſhine, as the ſudden Brightneſs and Splendor of it was to many of the Nation harder to be born than all the preceding Clouds and Darkneſs. The Greatneſs and Quickneſs of the Change, render'd the Pleaſure not only inexpreſſible, but inſupportable, even to ſeveral of Thoſe who had endured the greateſt Hardſhips and Perſecutions with uncommon Patience; every Man's Head being ſeiz'd with ſome Degree of Raptures and Madneſs. It might naturally have been expected, that thoſe Torrents of Joy, that overflow'd the Nation, and bore down all before them, ſhou'd have had more tragical Effects upon the late Uſurpers and Oppreſſors, whoſe Power was now diſſolv'd and bury'd beyond all Hopes of a Reſurrection. Therefore it is highly to be admired and applauded, that the Tranſports and Reſentments of an injured Body of Men, who had ſo ſuddenly got their Enemies at their Mercy, ſhou'd be ſo much ſpent in Smoak and Air, and not reverberate with a more ſignal Rage and Vengeance. We cannot ſufficiently revere that Power of Heaven, that put ſo quick and full a Period to a Rebellion and War that had rag'd near twenty Years, and had been proſecuted with all the diſmal Circumſtances of Murder, Devaſtations and Parricide, that Fire and Sword, in the Hands of the moſt impious Men, cou'd produce; but that Mercy is ſtill more bright and adorable, that in ſo ſhort a Space did not only bind up and heal all thoſe Wounds, but even made the Scars as undiſcernable, as, in reſpect to the Deepneſs, was poſſible; which was certainly, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, a glorious Addition to the Deliverance. How, and by whom any of theſe Scars came to be rubb'd, or any of theſe Wounds to be open'd, will be particularly ſeen afterwards: But in the mean Time we may juſtly take notice, That this unexpected Felicity, humanly ſpeaking, was in a great Meaſure owing to the Moderation and Goodneſs of the King Himſelf, and his chief Miniſters, who being return'd to a People inebriated with Joy, and without any Reſtriction, but that of Honour and Conſcience, had Opportunity and Temptation of carrying their Revenge and Power to any Exorbitancy whatſoever. The King's own Clemency was apparent and remarkable; and it was his Opinion, both before and after his Arrival, 'That the beſt Means to reſtore the decay'd Body of the Kingdom to its former Health and Vigour, was not to cure one Part, by afflicting of the Other; but to heal thoſe Wounds which were already feſter'd, by their proper Lenitives, and to remove all the Cauſes of future Animoſities.

The Character of King Charles the Second.

And here it will not be improper to give ſome Character of the King Himſelf, as we find it by the beſt Hands at this Time, reſerving Another for him at the Time of his Death, which will differ almoſt as much as two Pictures drawn for the ſame Perſon at the moſt diſtant Time of his Age. His Majeſty was now juſt thirty Years of Age, ſomewhat taller than the middle Stature of Engliſhmen; ſo exactly form'd, that the moſt curious Eye cou'd find no Error in his Shape. His Countenance was rather grave than ſevere, but much ſoftned whenever he ſpoke; his Complexion ſomewhat dark; but highly enlightned by his quick and ſparkling Eyes. The Figure of his Face was very lovely till near twenty twenty Years of Age; but after that, growing learner, the Majeſty of his Looks happily ſupply'd the Lines of Beauty; which was very much ſet off by plentiful Ornaments of his ſhining black Hair. His Motions were ſo eaſy and graceful, that they highly recommended his Perſon to all Strangers, whether he walk'd, or danc'd, or play'd at Tennis, or rode the great Horſe, which were his uſual Exerciſes: In ſum, his Mien fully denoted his Quality; and whereſoever he appear'd, he immediately obtain'd the Reſpect and Affections of all that approach'd him; for all his Looks and Actions help'd to diſplay the Beauties of his Mind, a vivacious Wit, a delicate Apprehenſion, and an excellent Underſtanding. Theſe natural Endowments were highly improv'd, not only by his own uncommon Induſtry, but by a numerous Train of Accidents uſually unknown to other Princes. So that, beſides his great Skill in modern Languages, Hiſtory, Mathematicks, Navigation, &c. his Mind was adorn'd with ſuch Virtues, as might, if continu'd, have prov'd a perpetual Source of Happineſs to Himſelf and Kingdom, as Juſtice, Fortitude, Clemency, Temperance and Sobriety. The two latter were conſpicuous at this Time; Oaths and Drunkenneſs were Strangers to him; and tho' he cannot be clear'd of another Vice, of which the Duke of Monmouth's Mother was not the only Inſtance, yet the former Part of his Life ought by no Means to be compared to the latter; and it is obſerv'd by a good Hand, that for many Years before his Return, he had been ſo chaſte or cautious, that thoſe about him cou'd hear no Whiſper of any indecent Gallantry. In general, he had learn'd ſo much Experience from the Variety of his Father's Fortunes, from the Oppoſition of his Enemies, the Treachery of his ſeeming Friends, and the frequent Neceſſity of treating with all Parties in Perſon, that it might juſtly be ſaid of Him, as it was of his Grandfather of France, He that wou'd corrupt his Council, muſt firſt begin with the King. Such was the preſent King, when he return'd to his overjoy'd People, bringing with him all the Preſages of a happy Government; and cou'd he have withſtood the Charms of Proſperity with the ſame Virtue and Vigour he did the Storms of Adverſity, he might well have prov'd not only a real, but a laſting Bleſſing to his three Kingdoms.

And of the Duke of York.

His Brother, the Duke of York, was at this Time a Prince of thoſe Qualifications that were every Way hopeful and promiſing to the Nation; and was particularly remark'd for being a loyal and obedient Subject, as well as a faithful and affectionate Brother. His Education had been always laudable, and under the beſt Inſtructors; but he had employ'd a great Part of his Time in the continual Exerciſe of Arms. His Genius led him that Way, and he generally apply'd himſelf to it, from the Age of nine Years, when he was with his Father at Edgehill, till the Age of twenty ſeven, when he return'd into England with his Brother. He made ſeveral Campaigns under the great Marſhal de Turenne, from whom he gain'd mighty Commendations both for his Valour and Affability. And as to the former, the famous Prince of Conde was often heard to ſay, That if ever there was a Man in the World without Fear, it was the Duke of York; and during this Reign, he preſerv'd this Character of Intrepidity at all Times, and upon all Occaſions. This Diſpoſition was particularly obſerv'd by a great Man of France, who having travell'd into England, and remark'd upon the Court, he took particular Notice, That tho' the Intereſt of this Prince ought to keep him to the Court, he rather choſe to be in the Army, and that he valu'd an Opportunity of ſignalizing his Courage, above the greateſt Political Advantages. As to the Religion of this Prince, which in Time had ſuch remarkable Effects upon the Nation, he was a Proteſtant of the Church of England by Profeſſion, but of that of Rome in his Heart, as his beſt Friends teſtify. He had valiantly withſtood many a Shock from his Mother, and other Popiſh Zealots, but at length yielded, as they tell us, to a peculiar Accident, his reading of Dr. Heylin's Hiſtory of the Reformation; where, as they ſay, the Luſt of King Henry the Eighth, the Ambition of the Duke of Somerſet, the Policy of Queen Elizabeth, and the Avarice of Thoſe who had ſeiz'd the Church Lands, gave him a mortal Averſion to the Reformation it ſelf, and brought him over to the contrary Party. The King his Brother had many Times endeavour'd to prevent this Change, and more particularly in the Year 1654, when the Duke of Glouceſter was in the greateſt Danger in France; at which Time alſo hearing of the Attempts made upon the elder Brother, he wrote a memorable Letter to him, in which he let him know, 'That if ever he hearken'd to his Mother, or any Body elſe 'in that Matter, he muſt never think to ſee England or Him 'again:' And if the general Miſchief that muſt happen to Him and the Family did not move him, 'he deſired him 'to conſider and remember the laſt Words of his dead 'Father, which were to be conſtant in his Religion, and 'never ſhaken in it; which if he did not obſerve, this 'ſhou'd be the laſt Time he ſhou'd hear from his affectionate 'Brother.' Yet after all this, the King Himſelf, as we have full Reaſon to believe, in the Year before his Reſtoration, yielded privately to the Temptations of the Spaniard at Fontarabia, and conſented to embrace the Romiſh Faith. This, as well as the Religion of the Duke, was a very great Secret for many Years; only the Duke being more zealous and hearty for the Popiſh Principles, thought fit to appear more openly in 1671, at which Time he made his Abjuration to Father Simons, an Engliſh Jeſuit; while the King, in the main, generally conceal'd his Inclinations, which were leſs ſtrong and operating, till the Time of his Death.

The King eſtabliſhes his Privy-Council,

2. To proceed in the Hiſtory: His Majeſty's firſt Care after his Reſtoration, was to ſettle his Houſhold, and conſtitute his Privy-Council; in which, to teſtify his Impartiality and good Nature, as well as Policy, he made Choice of ſeveral Counſellors, who had been profeſs'd Enemies to his Father and Himſelf. They conſiſted of Thirty in Number, namely, the Duke of York, the Duke of Glouceſter, Sir Edward Hyde, General Monk, Admiral Montague, the Marqueſs of Ormond, the Marqueſs of Dorcheſter, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Lindſey, the Earl of Berkſhire, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Viſcount Say, the Lord Wentworth, the Lord Seymour, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir George Carteret, Sir Anthony Aſhley-Cooper, Colonel Charles Howard, the Marqueſs of Hertford, the Earl of Mancheſter, the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of St. Alban's, the Earl of Leiceſter, the Lord Colepeper, the Lord Roberts, Mr. Arthur Anneſley, Sir John Barkley, Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Morrice. Of theſe, the Duke of York was inveſted with the Office of Lord High-Admiral of England, and Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports: Monk was continu'd Captain-General of all the Forces of the three Kingdoms, and made Maſter of the Horſe to his Majeſty: Sir Edward Hyde was continu'd in the Office of Lord-Chancellor of England: The Earl of Southampton was made Lord-Treaſurer; the Marqueſs of Ormond, Lord-Steward of the Houſhold; the Lord Say, Privy-Seal; the Lord Seymour, Chancellor of the Dutchy; the Earl of Mancheſter, Lord-Chamberlain of the Houſhold; Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Treaſurer of the Houſhold; Sir John Barkley, Comptroller; Sir George Carteret, Vice-Chamberlain; and Sir Edward Nicholas and Sir William Morrice, were made chief Secretaries of State. On theſe laſt, and others of the Council, his Majeſty in a ſhort Time conferr'd ſuch Honours as were thought ſuitable to their Services or Expectations: Particularly General Monk was made Duke of Albemarle, which Dutchy had been anciently appropriated to the Royal Blood; Sir Edward Hyde was made Earl of Clarendon; Admiral Montague, Earl of Sandwich; the Marqueſs of Ormond was made an Engliſh Earl, and afterwards a Duke; the Marqueſs of Hertford was made Duke of Somerſet; Mr. Anneſley, Earl of Angleſey; and Hollis, Barkley, Cornwallis, and Aſhley-Cooper were made Barons and Peers of England.

And his Judges.

The King alſo by ſeveral Steps made a careful and judicious Proviſion for the Benches and Courts of Judicature: For the Chancery, Sir Edward Hyde, as before-mention'd; for the Rolls, the Lord Colepeper, who ſhortly dying was ſucceeded by Sir Harbottle Grimſtone; for the King's-Bench, Sir Robert Foſter, Sir Thomas Mallet, Sir Thomas Twiſden and Sir Wadham Windham; for the Common-Pleas, Sir Robert Hyde, Sir Thomas Tyrrel, and Sir Samuel Brown; and for the Exchequer, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Sir Matthew Hale, Sir Edward Atkins, and Sir Chriſtopher Turner; Sir Jeoffrey Palmer was made Attorney-General, and Sir Heneage Finch Sollicitor-General. At the ſame Time his Majeſty took ſpecial Care for the commiting all Military Offices of the higheſt Truſt, as well as the Civil already mention'd, into the Hands of ſuch Perſons as were judg'd moſt proper for his Service: So that the Governments of all the moſt important Fortreſſes, Caſtles and Iſlands, and the Commands of the ſeveral Regiments, were by General Monk conferr'd upon ſuch Lords, and other Perſons of Honour, as the King was pleas'd to recommend to him for that End, till ſuch Time as the Army cou'd conveniently be diſbanded. Likewiſe for the farther ſettling of the Militia of the Nation, Lord-Lieutenants were conſtituted of the chief Nobility of the Land, each having under them, as Deputy-Lieutenants, ſuch Gentlemen of the ſame Counties as had moſt eminently ſhew'd their Affections to his Majeſty.

The chief Miniſters.

Among the Miniſtry at this Time, there were five or ſix who had a ſpecial Influence and Authority; as Chancellor Hyde, the Earl of Southampton, the Duke of Ormond, the Duke of Albemarle, the Earl of Sandwich, and Secretary Nicholas. The three firſt were united in the ſtricteſt Bonds of Love and Friendſhip: They continually join'd their Endeavours for the Good of their Country, and prov'd noble Inſtruments in cloſing up the Wounds, and eſtabliſhing the Proſperity of the Nation. Yet ſtill the Chancellor had the Superiority and Preference of them all in the Favour and Eſteem of the King, who for about two Years after his Return rely'd entirely on his Advice and Conduct. His Daughter had been ſecretly marry'd, or rather contracted abroad to the Duke of York; and ſo ſecretly, that after the great Revolution, when her Pregnancy appear'd, his Highneſs was attack'd by ſeveral Friends in private with ſo much Vigour and Reſentment, that he was brought under the ſtrongeſt Temptations to diſown the Obligation: But the King, tho' much ſurpris'd at the unequal Alliance, after ſtrong Solicitations, very generouſly preſerv'd the Honour of an excellent Servant, who had not at firſt been privy to it, and aſſured him, That this Accident ſhould not leſſen the Eſteem and Favour he had for him; yet his own good Judgment made him immediately ſenſible, and to declare it to his intimate Friends, That this muſt certainly be the Occaſion of the Diminution of his Credit. Being prime Miniſter of State, and principal Manager of the publick Affairs, he was oblig'd to ſuſtain the Odium of ſome unpopular Acts, of which the real Springs were then altogether unknown. Yet the Nation at the ſame Time cou'd not but be ſenſible of the Greatneſs of his Abilities and Induſtry; that he was a wiſe and faithful Servant, both to his King and Country; and that none was more dextrous and happy in making up the Breaches between Both, without too much hazarding the Repoſe of Either. Notwithſtanding he was a finiſh'd Stateſman, and every way equal to the Height of his Station, he was judg'd to have had a general Failing, which has been ſometimes, and by good Men, turn'd to his Commendation; and this was a certain overbearing Greatneſs, or perhaps Haughtineſs, which was ſo viſible in his publick Actions, and ſometimes private Reproofs, that it gave Uneaſineſs to many who envy'd his Grandeur, and the Favours he enjoy'd. This, together with a Strictneſs of Morals that carry'd ſome Awe with it, muſt needs be diſagreeable to a Court which gradually gave Countenance and Encouragement to all ſorts of Pleaſures that proceeded from new Taſte, Politeneſs, Converſation, Courtſhip, and Gallantry, with other Names that ſerv'd to cover or palliate the greateſt Licentiouſneſs. Notwithſtanding he gave a great Check to all theſe in the worſt Senſe, and took the Liberty to reprove the greater, as well as the leſſer Offenders, he happily ſtood his Ground, and maintain'd his Authority, till he had more than Time to compoſe the Minds of the People, and ſettle the moſt difficult Affairs of the Nation.

The firſt Complaint againſt Him.

The firſt Complaint againſt this great Man proceeded chiefly from the Cavalier Party, and his Friends; and this began ſo early after the Reſtoration, that it will be very proper to take ſome Notice of it before we proceed farther in the Hiſtory. The King, as was before hinted, to ſhew that he wou'd not reign only over a Party of his Subjects, and to teſtify his Readineſs to forgive, thought it proper and fit to reward and prefer ſeveral who had been open Enemies to his Father and himſelf; and at the ſame Time he ſet aſide, or beyond Expectation neglected many loyal and faithful Subjects, who had been illuſtrious Sufferers for the Cauſe of both Kings. The Care for the former was thought to be the Cauſe of the Neglect of the latter; and tho' the Reaſons for either were not then well or fully known, yet both became ſo conſpicuous to the Nation, that a diſadvantagious Report was ſoon ſpread abroad, 'That the 'Chancellor had inſtill'd a Principle into the King's Mind, 'That he muſt prefer and advance his Enemies, to gain them 'to be his Friends; but for his old Friends, it was no Matter 'how he us'd them, for they wou'd continue ſo ſtill.' This Report did not only fall heavy upon the Chancellor, but likewiſe reach'd the King himſelf, whoſe general Practice in this Matter will hardly admit of a total Vindication, tho' of a very great Alleviation. Much of it was owing to Neceſſity, as well as Policy: For the Sufferings of the King's Friends were too great and too numerous, ever to expect a full Compenſation and Reward; and the preſent Poverty, and the inſenſibly encreaſing Expences of the Court render'd it ſtill more impracticable. Beſides, the Pretenders were as numerous, or at leaſt as noiſy, as the real Sufferers; and they oftentimes by their Importunities exercis'd the King's Good Nature to the Diſadvantage of the other. Every one was ready to celebrate and diſplay his own particular Merits; but never more plauſibly, than when they related to the glorious Work of the Reſtoration. Great Numbers were eager to be thought Sharers and Aſſiſtants in that important Affair; and not a few were really ſo, who had before been violent Promoters of all that was diſſerviceable to the Crown. Of this Sort the King thought himſelf particularly oblig'd to take Notice, and diſtinguiſh them by his Favours. It is believ'd that this Conſideration brought in the Earl of Mancheſter, the Lord Say, Mr. Hollis, Sir Anthony Aſhley-Cooper, and ſeveral others who had been great Agents in the grand Rebellion: Among whom the Earl of Mancheſter did ſignally diſtinguiſh himſelf by the moſt manifeſt Tokens of Repentance, and the moſt real Aſſurances of future Loyalty.

The Presbyterians encourag'd.

The Presbyterians having had a very conſiderable Hand in the Reſtoration, the King, for ſome Time eſpecially, ſhew'd a particular Regard to them, and made choice of two prime Miniſters of their Party, Mr. Richard Baxter and Mr. Edmund Calamy, beſides others, to be his Chaplains in Ordinary. His Majeſty's publick Acknowledgment of their Aſſiſtance, with other Circumſtances, afterwards gave that Party Occaſion to extend the Merits of their Services, and to challenge the chief Hand in that wonderful Revolution. This has been frequently inſiſted on, not ſo much to praiſe themſelves, as to aggravate the Ingratitude of a Government, which they ſay was ſo much indebted to Them; and this is ſtill continu'd as a Matter of warm Diſpute between the Church and Presbyterian Party. The moſt common Anſwer to this often repeated Challenge, is not ſo much a direct Denial of the Fact, as an Aſſertion, drawn from many Circumſtances in Hiſtory, 'That whatever the Presbyterians did in this Matter, was 'principally to relieve themſelves from the Oppreſſions of the 'Independents, and other Sectaries, who had wreſted the 'Power out of their Hands, and not out of any real Affecti'on for the King, or the Church, which very much alter'd the 'Merit of their Services; eſpecially when they afterwards 'ſhew'd ſo little Repentance for thoſe Actions that produ'ced all the Miſeries of the Nation.' But not to enter too far into a Matter of Controverſy, which may lead us aſide, we ſhall conclude and determine the Hiſtory of the Reſtoration in the Words of a great Man, written four or five Years after it: 'Shall the Honour of that immortal 'Work be fix'd on a private Sect? Whereas it was accom'pliſh'd by the immediate Favour of Divine Providence, 'by the Wiſdom of a victorious General, by the perpetual 'and immoveable Fidelity of the Royal Party, by the 'Hands, the Wiſhes, the Tongues, and the united Deſires 'of three Kingdoms. 'Tis true indeed, the Presbyterians 'went along with the mighty Torrent, but the whole 'Courſe of this happy Violence is not therefore to be attri'buted to them. It was in that, as in a ſudden Land 'Flood, which, as it comes down, carries with it Trees, 'and Stones, and Houſes, and all that it meets in the Way. 'And even all theſe which lay before quiet, nay, which 'reſiſted the firſt Waters while they were weak, do add to 'the Impetuoſity of the Current when it is going. But we 'muſt not therefore ſay that the Flood it ſelf took its Riſe 'from thence, ſeeing it was in truth caus'd by Rain com'ing down from Heaven, and by Streams flowing in from 'every Part of the Country.' And now it is Time to proceed to the healing Methods us'd after the Reſtoration, and to begin with the Convention-Parliament, that was to ſettle the Happineſs of the Kingdom.

The Share they had in the Reſtoration.

An Account of the CONVENTION.

3. The Convention-Parliament, that had met on the 25th Day of April laſt, conſiſted of many conſiderable Perſons of different Parties; not without ſeveral of the King's Enemies, and two or three of the Regicides themſelves, as Hutchinſon and Laſſels. As to their Election, they were limited to particular Qualifications by the laſt Long Parliament; one of which was, 'That all that advis'd, or vo'luntary aided in the War againſt the Parliament in 1641, 'unleſs they have ſince given a Manifeſtation of their good 'Affection, they, or their Sons, ſhall be incapable of being 'elected Members of this Parliament.' The Speaker himſelf, Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, had been a Member of the Long Parliament, and had joyn'd with them, tho' after a more moderate way, till the Treaty of the Iſle of Wight; ſoon after which he was excluded the Houſe with many others. Notwithſtanding all the foremention'd Care, many of the Royal Party, and other Promoters of Peace, were elected; ſo that the Houſe of Commons conſiſted of ſuch a Number of Perſons as were fully diſpos'd to do Juſtice to the King, and to make up all the Breaches of the Nation. The Houſe of Peers, tho' at preſent without the Biſhops, ſeem'd ſtill more united, and were reſolv'd to make a full Compenſation for all former Errors and Miſcarriages: And both Houſes had made as large Steps towards an Accommodation, as Time wou'd permit, before the Arrival of the King. At which Time their Speeches and Compliments to his Majeſty at Whitehall, teſtify'd as much Joy, Affection, and Loyalty as can be expreſs'd by any Subjects in the World.

The King's Speech to it.

Within two Days after his Arrival, his Majeſty, accompany'd with his two Royal Brothers, York and Gloceſter, Lord-Chancellor Hyde, and many other Perſons of Honour, went in a ſolemn Manner by Water to the Houſe of Lords: Where, being ſeated on his Throne, and the Commons appearing at the Bar, he in a ſhort Speech acquainted them with the Occaſion and Cauſe of his preſent ſending for them, namely, to paſs thoſe Bills which he underſtood were prepared for him, all which were very material at this Time. ‘The firſt was for conſtituting the preſent Convention to be a Parliament: The ſecond for authorizing the Tax for Seventy Thouſand Pounds per Menſem for three Months longer; and the third for Continuance of Proceſs and all judicial Proceedings.’ Which being paſs'd, the Lord-Chancellor in a handſom Speech told both Houſes, ‘With how much Readineſs his Majeſty had paſs'd theſe important Acts, and how willing they ſhou'd at all times hereafter find him, to paſs any other that might tend to the Advantage and Benefit of the People; in a particular Manner deſiring, in his Majeſty's Behalf, That the Bill of Oblivion, in which they had made ſo good a Progreſs, might be expedited: That the People might ſee and know his Majeſty's extraordinary gracious Care to eaſe and free them from their Doubts and Fears; and that he had not forgotten his gracious Declaration made at Breda, but that he wou'd in all Points make good the ſame.’

The Convention turn'd into a PARLIAMENT.

They begin with a general Act of Pardon.

II. 1. The Convention, having now the Eſſence of a Parliament, tho' not the exact Form, proceeded in the great Affairs of the Nation with all Diligence and Vigour. They had, among others, three great Points to bring to Perfection, the general Act of Indemnity, the disbanding of the Army, and the ſettling the Publick Revenues. The firſt was judg'd moſt neceſſary to begin withal: The Commons thought that neither themſelves, nor the People of England, were freed from that Guilt and Puniſhment which the unhappy Times had contracted, unleſs they laid hold on his Majeſty's Grace, mentiond in his Declaration from Breda; therefore they reſolv'd, ‘That the Houſe doth declare, That they do in the Name of themſelves, and all the Commons of England, lay hold on his Majeſty's gracious Pardon, mention'd in his Declaration, with Reference to the excepting of ſuch as ſhall be excepted in an Act of Pardon.’ And accordingly a Declaration was drawn up, and ſolemnly preſented to the King in the Banquetting-Houſe by Mr. Denzil Hollis. The King graciouſly accepted of this Declaration, as well as another from the Lords; and about the ſame Time he iſſu'd out a Proclamation, declaring, ‘That all ſuch of the late King's Judges, as did not render themſelves within fourteen Days, ſhould be excepted out of the General Pardon. Upon which ſeveral of them ſurrender'd themſelves, while ſome made their Eſcape, and others were taken in their Flight. At the ſame Time ſeveral of the moſt eminent Officers under the Uſurpation, for their greater Security, got their particular Pardons exemplify'd under the Great-Seal of England. The King was very forward in granting theſe Pardons, and was more than ordinary preſſing for a ſpeedy paſſing the Act of Oblivion. Nor was his Majeſty wanting to give all ſuch publick Teſtimonies of a Virtue and Prudence, as might render him deſervedly Glorious in the Eſteem of all ſober and moderate Perſons; and that by ſeveral wholeſom Edicts, eſpecially by that ſeaſonable Proclamation which he publiſh'd, one of the firſt Things he did after his Arrival, ‘For the diſcountenancing and puniſhing of Debauchery, Profaneneſs, and other Vices;’ which began openly to break out from the ungovernable Joy of the Times.

Addreſſes, &c.

Every Day produc'd Rejoycings and Triumphs; and the King was perpetually entertain'd with the loyal Addreſſes of his People, and with the ſolemn Congratulations of Foreign Princes and Potentates, who ſeem'd all to vie in Haſte and Zeal for ſending over their Ambaſſadors and Agents to compliment his Majeſty upon his happy Reſtoration to his Royal Dignity and Government. Addreſſes came from all Parts of the Kingdom, as well as from Scotland and Ireland; and all thoſe Towns and Corporations that had bought out their ſeveral Fee-Farm Rents formerly belonging to the Crown, and by the late Common-wealth alienated from it, ſent their Deputies to the King, to make a voluntary Surrender of them into his Hands. Others preſented him with Sums of Gold and other Gifts, according to their reſpective Abilities: But the City of London, as being the chief, and the Seat of Kings for many Ages, judg'd themſelves oblig'd in Point of Duty and Reputation, to exceed all the reſt in the Glory of their Performances towards their Sovereign; and therefore to the Splendor of their former Preparations at his firſt Reception and triumphant Entrance, they added the Expence of a moſt magnificent Entertainment at Guild-Hall, which was gloriouſly beautify'd and adorn'd for that great Occaſion.

The King and Parliament entertain'd by the City.

To which Place the King, his two Royal Brothers, the Lords of the Privy-Council, both the Houſes of Parliament, and the chief Officers of State being ſolemnly invited, were on the 5th of July conducted thither in mighty Pomp and State by the Lord-Mayor and Grandees of the City, where they were feaſted in a munificent Manner with the moſt exquiſite Rarities, and admirable Muſick, and whatever elſe cou'd be thought agreeable and equal to ſuch an illuſtrious Aſſembly.

The Commons proceed in the Act of Indemnity.

2. All this Time the Parliament proceeded in the Act of Oblivion, but met with ſeveral Obſtructions that proceeded from the Animoſities of ſome who were for ſeverer Proceedings. The King himſelf was a great Promoter of the Act, and often ſate in Council about that, and the great Affairs of the Government: But notwithſtanding his great Care and Zeal to compoſe all publick Differences, many ill-affected Perſons in Pamphlets aſpers'd his Actions, endeavouring to inſinuate, That he intended nothing leſs than the Performance of his Promiſes from Breda. This caus'd him to ſend a remarkable Meſſage to the Houſe of Commons by Secretary Morrice, to quicken their Debates about the Act of Indemnity, as the beſt Means to quiet the Minds of his Subjects.

The King's Meſſage to them concerning it.

He told them, ‘He had too ample a Manifeſtation of their Affections and Duty towards him, to make the leaſt Doubt of the Continuance and Improvement thereof, or in the leaſt Degree to diſlike what they had done, or to complain of what they had left undone. He knew well the Weight of thoſe Affairs which depended upon their Counſels, and the Time that moſt unavoidably be ſpent, where there muſt be naturally Difference of Opinions and Judgments amongſt thoſe, whoſe Deſires of the Publick Peace and Safety were the ſame. And that neither He nor They muſt be overmuch troubled, if they found the good Intentions and unwearied Pains, taken to reduce thoſe good Intentions into real Acts, for the Quiet and Security of the Nation, miſrepreſented, and miſ-interpreted, by thoſe who are in truth much afflicted to ſee the publick Diſtractions, by God's Bleſſing, ſo near an End; and by others upon whoſe Weakneſs, Fears and Jealouſies, the Activity and Cunning of thoſe ill Men hath had too great an Influence. That how wonderful and miraculous ſoever the great Harmony of Affections between him and his Subjects is; yet it is not to be thought that God Almighty had wrought that Miracle to that Degree, that a Nation ſo miſerably divided for ſo many Years, wou'd be ſo ſoon and intirely united in their Affections and Endeavours, as were to be wiſhed; but that the Evil Conſciences of many continu'd ſo awake for Miſchief, they wou'd not be willing to take Reſt themſelves, or ſuffer others to take it: That they all had too ſad Experience of the unhappy Effects of Fears and Jealouſies, how groundleſs and unreaſonable ſoever, not to think it very neceſſary to apply all timely and proper Remedies to thoſe Diſtempers, and to prevent the Inconveniencies and Miſchiefs which ſo naturally flow from thence: That he well foreſaw, That the great Violation, which the Laws of the Land had for ſo many Years ſuſtain'd, had fill'd the Hearts of the People with terrible Apprehenſions of Inſecurity to themſelves, if all they had ſaid and done ſhou'd be liable to be examin'd and puniſh'd by thoſe Laws which had been ſo violated. And that nothing cou'd eſtabliſh the Security of King and People, but a full Proviſion, that the Returning to the Reverence and Obedience of the Law, which is good for All, ſhou'd not turn to the Ruin of Any who were willing and fit receive that Protection hereafter from the Law, and to pay that Subjection to it, which were juſt and neceſſary. And therefore he made a free Offer of a General Pardon, in ſuch a Manner as was expreſs'd in his Declaration; and how ready and deſirous he was to make good the ſame, appear'd by his Proclamation iſſu'd out upon and according to their Deſire. However, it was evident, That all he had offer'd or did offer, did not enough compoſe the Minds of the People; nor in their Opinions cou'd their Security be provided for, till the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion was paſs'd.’ He told them, ‘He had found great Induſtry us'd to perſuade his good Subjects, that he had no Mind to make good his Promiſes, which he deſired to perform for his own Sake as well as theirs. Therefore he did very earneſtly recommend it to them, That all Expedition might be us'd in the paſſing that moſt neceſſary Act, whereby his good Subjects generally wou'd be ſatisfy'd, that their Security was in their own Hands, and depended upon their future Actions, and that they were Free for all paſt; and ſo the Endeavours of ill Men wou'd be diſappointed, who wou'd perſuade them not to do well Now, becauſe they had done amiſs Heretofore. And that he was the more engag'd to this Recommendation, becauſe upon the Reflection of their eminent Zeal and Affection for his Service, and hearty Concurrence with him in all things deſired from them, Men were apt to perſuade others, tho' not believing it themſelves, That the paſſing this Act was therefore not deſired, becauſe he did not enough preſs the Diſpatch of it; which he did deſire from his Heart, and was confident they wou'd the ſooner do it, upon his earneſt Recommendation.

The Commons diſpatch the Bill:

This Meſſage did ſo much quicken the Debates of the Commons, that they diſpatcht the Bill in a very ſhort time after, and ſent it up to the Lords; by which the Peoples Minds were much compos'd, and the more, becauſe his Majeſty, by a Proclamation after it, did declare a Kind of Impatience for the Delay of it. The Commons had been very favourable, and in the Act had excepted for Life and Eſtate but a few of the moſt notorious Regicides; but the Lords were more ſtrict and warm in their Debates, being incited by the Importunities of ſeveral Widows and Relations of thoſe who had ſuffer'd Death by the late Uſurpers. Therefore they enter'd into a Conſultation, to except all from Pardon that had been Judges in any High Court of Juſtice. But the Clemency of the King extended to all who were not immediately guilty of his Father's Murder; and obſerving that thoſe Debates much obſtructed the ſpeeding and perfecting that Bill he ſo earneſtly deſired to have finiſh'd, on the 27th Day of July, about two Months after his Reſtoration, he went to the Houſe; and in a remarkable Speech, he expreſs'd his Zeal for it in theſe Words.

The King's Speech to the Lords upon the ſame Subject.

'My Lords, When I came firſt hither to you, which was within two or three Days after I came to Whitehall, I did, with as much Eearneſtneſs as I cou'd, both by my ſelf and the Chancellor, recommend to you and the Houſe of Commons, the ſpeedy Diſpatch of the Act of Indemnity, as a neceſſary Foundation of that Security we all pray for. I did ſince, by a particular Meſſage to the Houſe of Commons, again preſs them to haſten that Important Work; and did likewiſe by a Proclamation publiſh to all the Kingdom, That I did with Impatience expect that that Act wou'd be preſented to Me for my Aſſent, as the moſt reaſonable and ſolid Foundation of that Peace, Happineſs and Security I hope and pray for to my ſelf, and all my Dominions. I will not deny it to you, That I thought the Houſe of Commons too long about that Work; and therefore now, it is come up to you, I wou'd not have you guilty of the ſame Delay. I thank God, I have the ſame Intentions and Reſolutions now I am here with you, which I had at Breda; and believe that I owe my being here, to God's Bleſſing upon the Intentions and Reſolutions I then expreſs'd to have. I will read to you what I then ſaid:

'And to the End that Fear of Puniſhment may not engage any, conſcious to themſelves of what is paſt, to a Perſeverance in Guilt for the future, by oppoſing the Quiet and Happineſs of their Country, in the Reſtoration both of King, Peers, and People, to their juſt, ancient and fundamental Rights; We do by theſe Preſents declare, That we do grant a free and general Pardon, which we are ready, upon Demand, to paſs under our Great Seal of England, to all our Subjects of what Degree or Quality ſoever, who within forty Days after the publiſhing hereof ſhall lay hold upon this our Grace and Favour, and ſhall by any publick Act declare their doing ſo, and that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects; excepting only ſuch Perſons as ſhall hereafter be excepted by Parliament. Thoſe only excepted, Let all our Subjects, how faulty ſoever, rely upon the Word of a King, ſolemnly given by this preſent Declaration, That no Crime whatſoever committed againſt us, or our Royal Father, before the Publication of this, ſhall ever riſe in Judgment, or be brought in Queſtion againſt any of them, to the leaſt Indamagement of them, either in their Lives, Liberties, or Eſtates, or, as far forth as lies in our Power, ſo much as to the Prejudice of their Reputations, by any Reproach, or Terms of Diſtinction from the reſt of our beſt Subjects; we deſiring, and ordaining, That henceforward all Notes of Diſcord, Separation, and Difference of Parties, be utterly aboliſhed among all our Subjects; whom we invite and conjure to a perfect Union among themſelves, under our Protection, for the Reſettlement of our juſt Rights, and theirs, in a Free Parliament; by which, upon the Word of a King, we will be adviſed.

'My Lords, If you do not join with me in extinguiſhing this Fear, which keeps the Hearts of Men awake, and apprehenſive of Safety and Security; you keep Me from performing my Promiſe, which if I had not made, I am perſuaded neither I nor you had been now here: I pray let us not deceive thoſe who brought, or permitted us to come together. I knew well there were ſome Men, who cou'd neither forgive themſelves, nor be forgiven by us; and I thank you for your Juſtice towards thoſe, the immediate Murtherers of my Father: And I will deal truly with you, I never thought of excepting any other. I pray think well upon what I have offer'd, and the Benefit you and I have receiv'd from that Offer; and encourage and oblige all other Perſons, by not excluding them from the Benefit of this Act. This Mercy and Indulgence is the beſt Way to bring them to a true Repentance, and to make them more ſevere to themſelves, when they find we are not ſo to them. It will make them good Subjects to me, and good Friends and Neighbours to you; and we have then all our End, and you ſhall find this the ſecureſt Expedient to prevent future Miſchief. Therefore I do earneſtly deſire and conjure you, to depart from all particular Animoſities and Revenge, or Memory of paſt Provocations; and that you will paſs this Act without other Exceptions, than of thoſe who were immediately guilty of the Murther of my Father.' Then, after a few Expreſſions of leſs Moment, and a Word or two concerning Ireland, he thus concluded: 'I do again conjure you, That you will uſe all Expedition in the Diſpatch of this Bill.

3. This Speech did not only expedite the Paſſing of this Act in the Houſe of Peers, but gave a general Satisfaction to the People, who were exceedingly eas'd in their Minds with the King's immoveable Care on the Behalf of all his Subjects. And ſhortly after, to prevent all Delays, and remove all Impediments, the King ſent a very obliging Meſſage, to be communicated to both Houſes in theſe Words: 'His Majeſty is well inform'd of the Value of thoſe Conceſſions, which are to paſs in the Act of Indemnity, which relate entirely to his Majeſty's Profits, and which have little or no Relation to the War: He knows well that the Arrears of the Wars, the Alienations with Licenſe, Purveyance, Reſpite of Homage, the Arrears of the Rents ſtill in the Hands of the Tenants, and the other Particulars, amount to a vaſt great Sum; all which are releas'd and diſcharg'd by this Act. But his Majeſty is ſo well ſatisfy'd of the good Affection of the Houſe of Commons, and of their Intentions and Reſolutions to ſettle ſuch a Revenue upon his Majeſty, as may preſerve the Crown from Want, and from being undervalu'd by its Neighbours: That he is reſolv'd not to inſiſt upon any Particular, which the Houſe of Commons deſir'd his Majeſty ſhou'd releaſe; and therefore as his Majeſty thanks the Houſe of Peers for the Information they have given him, and for the Care they have expreſs'd for his Majeſty's Profit, ſo he is well contented that that Clauſe ſhall paſs in ſuch a Manner as the Houſe of Commons have ſet down, and continues his earneſt Deſires, that all Expedition be us'd in paſſing the ſaid Act in the Manner he hath formerly expreſs'd.' This ſeaſonable and condeſcending Meſſage did not only produce the hearty Thanks of the Houſe of Commons, but likewiſe a particular Order 'For the ſettling ſuch a Revenue on his Majeſty, as may maintain the Splendor and Grandeur of the Kingly Office, &c.

He ſends an obliging Meſſage after it.

Nor was his Majeſty's Mind ſo intent upon this neceſſary Affair, as to neglect the other Concerns of Government: But obſerving, That the late Differences of his People had created many Animoſities among them, which occaſion'd frequent Duels, he thought fit to prevent the Miſchiefs of them by a Proclamation, by which he maniſeſted ſo great a Diſlike of Duels, as 'Strictly to command all his Subjects whatſoever, neither by Themſelves nor any Other, by Meſſage, Word or Writing, or other Ways or Means to challenge, or cauſe to be challeng'd, any Perſon or Perſons to fight in Duel, nor to carry, accept, nor conceal any Challenge, nor actually to fight, or be Second to any therein.' And he further declared, 'That every Perſon offending againſt his Commands herein, ſhou'd not only incurr his Diſpleaſure, but be incapable of holding any Office in his Service, and never after be permitted to come to Court or preferr'd, beſides the ſuffering ſuch Puniſhment as the Law ſhou'd inflict on ſuch Offenders: And all Perſons that ſhou'd accept or know of ſuch Challenges, and not reveal the ſame to one of the Privy-Council, or the next Juſtice of Peace, ſhou'd be liable to the ſame Penalties' And laſt of all, he was ſo ſtrict in the Matter, as to forbid 'any Interceſſion to be made for Offenders againſt this Proclamation.

His Proclamation againſt Duels.

At the ſame Time the King took no leſs Care of the Benefit and Revenues of the Church, eſpecially with Relation to poor Vicarages and other Endowments, and wrote Letters to all the Biſhops, Deans and Chapters in the Kingdom, teſtifying his Will and Pleaſure, 'That no Leaſe be granted of any Rectory or Parſonage, belonging to any of them, or their Succeſſors, unleſs they firſt provided, That the reſpective Vicarages or Curates Places, where no Vicarages are endow'd, have ſo much Revenues in Glebe Lands, or other Emoluments, as commonly will amount to eighty Pounds per Annum; or more, if it will bear it: And where the Rectories are of ſmall Value, and cannot admit of ſuch Portion to the Vicar or Curate, that then one half of the Profits of ſuch Rectory be reſerv'd for the Maintenance of ſuch Vicar or Curate, &c. All which being communicated to the Houſe of Commons, new Thanks were return'd by them to his Majeſty, in which they particularly teſtify'd 'the great Joy they took in the Goodneſs and Favour he had expreſs'd to his People.' And after that proceeded to prepare ſuch a Bill as ſhou'd beſt anſwer his Majeſty's pious Intentions.

His Care of the Church.

4. The great Act of Indemnity, in a ſhort Time, was ſent from the Lords to the Commons with ſeveral Alterations, to which the Commons were unwilling to agree: For the latter had ſubjected twenty, that were not the King's Judges, to be liable to ſuch Pains and Penalties, not extending to Life, as ſhou'd be inflicted by another Act to be paſs'd in this Parliament: Whereas the Lords finding the King's Inclination to tend towards the pardoning of all but ſuch as were his Father's Judges, or otherwiſe Actors in his Murder, they diſagreed to that Part of the Act, as to all thoſe nam'd by the Commons, except Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Sir Henry Vane, and Colonel John Lambert, who were eſteem'd to be ſo maliciouſly active in Oppoſition to his Majeſty's Government, as to be excepted from any Conditions of Pardon. The Lords were more ſtrict as to the King's Judges, and thought none ought to be ſpared, even thoſe who had ſurrender'd themſelves upon the Proclamation; but the Commons were of Opinion that a Difference ought to be made between thoſe and the reſt. They for ſome Time adhered to their firſt Reſolutions; but after ſeveral free Conferences, Matters were ſo compromis'd, that they agreed with the Lords in all Things, except ſome little Alterations to their Form of the Act: Vane and Lambert were excepted as to Life and Eſtate, but Haſlerigg remain'd liable to ſuch Pains, Penalties and Forfeitures, as ſhou'd be inflicted on him, not extending to Life; and the reſt of thoſe, put under the ſame Qualification by the Commons that were not of the King's Judges, were with others made only incapable of Offices, &c. The Favour ſhewn to Sir Arthur Haſlerigg was chiefly owing to General Monk, who in the Beginning of the Reſtoration, being unwilling to make a Man deſperate, who had two Regiments at his Command, had promis'd him upon his Submiſſion, to ſecure both his Life and Eſtate. This being made known in a Conference by the Houſe of Commons, was juſtify'd with great Modeſty by the General in the Houſe of Peers, and his Life was thereupon pardon'd in the Act, and ſhortly after his Eſtate alſo was, at the Mediation of the General, granted to his Heir, a Perſon averſe to his Father's Principles: Sir Arthur himſelf, a while after his Impriſonment, dying of a Feaver in the Tower.

The Lords and Commons agree about the Act of INDEMNITY.

At the laſt Conference between the Lords and Commons, Chancellor Hyde took Occaſion to ſpeak of the King's Affection to his People by a very remarkable Inſtance, affirming, 'That he, being employ'd in a ſolemn Embaſſy to the Court of Spain, had it ſtrictly given him in Charge by his preſent Majeſty, to avow and declare, That the horrid Murther of his Royal Father was not the Act of the Parliament, or the People of England, but of a very wretched, and a very little Company of Miſcreants in this Kingnom.' This was ſo very pleaſing and obliging to the Houſe of Commons, that upon the Report of it to them, they order'd ſuch of the Privy-Council as were Members of that Houſe, 'That they preſent to his Majeſty the humble, hearty and thankful Senſe this Houſe hath of his Majeſty's Juſtice and Favour, in making this juſt Defence for the Parliament, and People of England.' And within a few Days after, they compleated the much deſired Act of Indemnity.

The Subſtance of the ACT.

The Act was large and very extenſive, and ſuch as was moſt likely to compoſe the Minds of a divided and diſtracted People, and to give Eaſe and Quiet to various and innumerable Criminals. One healing Clauſe was, 'That if any Perſon objected againſt another any Words of Reproach, tending to revive the Memory of the late Differences, he ſhou'd pay ten Pounds, if a Gentleman, and forty Shillings, if one of a more inferior Degree. As to the Exceptions, the Act gave no Benefit to Row, Garland, Harvey, Smith, Martin, Waller, Titchburn, Fleetwood, J. Temple, Wait, Meyn, Heveningham, Pennington, P. Temple, Lilburn, Millington, Potter, Wogan, Downs, Scroop, Liſle, Say, Walton, Harriſon, Whally, Barkſteed, Ludlow, Liveſey, Okey, Hewſon, Goffe, Holland, Challoner, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Clement, Scott, Cawley, Love, Dixwell, Blagrave, Cook, Broughton, Dendy, Hewlett, Peters, Hacker, Axtell, or any of them; nor to thoſe two diſguis'd upon the Scaffold the 30th of January 1648.' All which Perſons, for being inſtrumental in the Murther of the late King, are wholly excluded: But in regard the nineteen firſt-mention'd had render'd themſelves according to the Proclamation of the 6th of June, and thereby pretended to ſome Favour, it was enacted, 'That if the ſaid Row, and the reſt ſo firſt mention'd, are attainted, their Execution ſhou'd be ſuſpended, until the King and Parliament ſhou'd order the ſame.' Only Mr. Scroop, for vindicating his Crime, was again excepted. 'Next, Cromwell, Ireton, Bradſhaw, and Pride, though dead, were excepted, and the Lands and Goods, Rights and Truſts of them, and one and twenty others deceas'd, viz. Ewer, Danvers, Maleverer, Purefoy, Blakeſtone, Conſtable, Dean, Allen, Pelham, Moor, Alred, Edwards, Norton, Ven, Andrews, Stapely, Horton, Fry, Hammond, Skippon and Bouchier, were made ſubject to ſuch Penalties and Forfeitures as by another Act to be paſs'd ſhou'd be ordain'd. Moreover, Mounſon, Mildmay, Harrington and Wallop, as not having ſign'd the Warrant for the Execution of the King, were reſerv'd to future Penalties and Forfeitures, not extending to Life. Phelps and Haſlerigg were put into the ſame Condition. Hutchinſon and Laſſels were made incapable to execute any Place of Truſt, and to pay one Year's Value by Way of Fine. Oliver St. John, and ſeventeen others nam'd in the Act, were to be excluded from any Benefit by this Act, if they accepted or executed any Office in England, either Eccleſiaſtical, Civil, or Military. And all that had given Sentence of Death in any of the late illegal High-Courts of Juſtice, except Colonel Ingoldsby, and Colonel Thomlinſon, were diſabled from being Members in any Parliament, or bearing any Office in England or Wales. Laſtly, no Perſons were to be indemnify'd who had enter'd into any Lands, &c. called Fabrick Lands, or poſſeſs'd themſelves of any Rents or Revenues given for the Repair of any Cathedral or any other Church, or who had ſacrilegiouſly enrich'd themſelves by the converting of the Plate, Utenſils, and Materials belonging to ſuch Churches, to their private Uſe.' After all we muſt not forget that Sir Henry Vane and John Lambert were intirely excepted out of the Act.

Other Acts.

With this, ſome other Acts were prepar'd for the Royal Aſſent, particularly One for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings; which was likewiſe a very healing Act, and highly neceſſary at this Juncture; ſince, without this, beſides other Inconveniencies, there muſt have been ſo great a Concuſſion in moſt Mens Eſtates, as wou'd have render'd them ſubject to perpetual Difficulties and Uncertainties. By this All Proceedings in Law, Equity, &c. ſince the firſt of May 1642, were confirm'd, notwithſtanding any Defect of Legal Power, or Difference in Stile or Title; but ſtill with ſome Reſtrictions, eſpecially as to Crown and Church Lands, where no Purchaſers cou'd pretend or expect to have a Right. A Third was an Act for a Proviſion of Mony to pay off the Armies and Navy, which was by an extraordinary Poll, that variouſly comprehended Perſons of all Ranks and Conditions. The Fourth was an Act for reſtraining the taking of exceſſive Uſury, which makes it highly penal to any that ſhou'd take above ſix Pounds for the Loan of a hundred Pounds for a Year, and to any Scrivener or Broker that ſhou'd take above five Shillings for the ſame, or above twelve Pence for the making or renewing a Bond or Bill. The laſt publick Act was for a perpetual Anniverſary Thankſgiving on the twenty ninth Day of May, the Day of his Majeſty's Nativity and Reſtoration.

The King's Speech at his paſſing them.

Theſe Acts being ready, the King on the 29th of Auguſt paſs'd them, with the following Speech to both Houſes: 'My Lords, and Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, I have been here ſome times before with you, but never with more Willingneſs, than I am at this Time. And there are few Men in the Kingdom have longed more impatiently to have thoſe Bills paſs'd, than I have done to paſs them; and I hope they will be the Foundation of Peace and Security to us all. I do very willingly pardon all that is pardon'd by this Act of Indemnity, to that Time which is mention'd in the Bill: Nay, I will tell you, That from that Time to this Day, I will not uſe great Severity, except in ſuch Caſes where the Malice is notorious, and the Publick Peace exceedingly concern'd. But for the Time to come, the ſame Diſcretion and Conſcience, which diſpos'd me to the Clemency I have expreſs'd (which is moſt agreeable to my Nature) will oblige me to all Rigour and Severity, how contrary ſoever it be to my Nature, towards thoſe who ſhall not now acquieſce, but continue to manifeſt their Sedition and Diſlike of the Government, either in Actions or Words. And I muſt conjure you all, my Lords and Gentlemen, to concurr with me in this juſt and neceſſary Severity; and that you will, in your ſeveral Stations, be ſo jealous of the Publick Peace, and of my particular Honour, that you will cauſe exemplary Juſtice upon thoſe who are guilty of ſeditious Speeches or Writings, as well as thoſe who break out into ſeditious Actions: And that you will believe thoſe who delight in reproaching and traducing My Perſon, not to be well affected to You and the Publick Peace. Never King valu'd himſelf more upon the Affections of his People than I do: Nor do I know a better Way to make my ſelf ſure of your Affections, than by being juſt and kind to you all: And whilſt I am ſo, I pray let the World ſee, That I am poſſeſs'd of your Affections. For your Poll-Bill, I thank you as much as if the Mony were to come into my own Coffers; and wiſh with all my Heart that it may amount to as great a Sum as you reckon upon.------

Reſ. 1.

I pray very earneſtly, as faſt as Mony comes in, diſcharge that great Burthen of the Navy, and disband the Army as faſt as you can; and till you can disband the reſt, make a Proviſion for their Supply. I do conjure you, as you love me, let me not hear the Noiſe of Free Quarter, which will be imputed to my want of Care and Government, how innocent ſoever I am. I am ſo confident of your Affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to my ſelf: And yet I muſt tell you, That I am not richer, that is, I have not ſo much Mony in my Purſe, as when I came to you. The Truth is, I have liv'd principally ever ſince upon what I brought with me, which was indeed your Mony: You ſent it to me, and I thank you for it. The weekly Expence of the Navy eats up all you have given me by the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage: Nor have I been able to give my Brothers one Shilling ſince I came into England, nor to keep any Table in my Houſe but where I eat my ſelf. And that which troubles me moſt, is, to ſee many of you come to me at Whitehall, and to think you muſt go ſome where elſe to ſeek a Dinner. I do not mention this to you, as any thing that troubles me: Do but take Care of the Publick, and for what is neceſſary for the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom, and take your own Time for my own Particular; which I am ſure you will provide for with as much Affection and Frankneſs as I can deſire.'

Part of the Speaker's Speech.

At the ſame Time a long Speech was made by the Speaker, Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, who diſcourſing upon the ſeveral Bills preſented to the King, upon the Act of Indemnity, he has theſe Words: ‘ There is another Bill intitled, An Act of Free and General Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion: It may well be call'd a free Pardon; for your Majeſty was pleas'd to offer it before we had Confidence enough to ask it, and at a Time when your People had moſt need of it; and it may as truly be called a General Pardon in reſpect of the Extenſiveneſs of it. But looking over a long, black, prodigious, diſmal Roll and Catalogue of Malefactors, we there met not with Men, but with Monſters, guilty of Blood, precious Blood, precious Royal Blood, never to be remember'd without Tears; incomparable in all kinds of Villanies that ever were acted by the worſt of Miſcreants, Perverters of Religion, Subverters of the Government, Falſe to God, Diſloyal to the beſt of Kings, and Perfidious to their Country. And therefore we find an abſolute and indiſpenſible Neceſſity incumbent on us, to except and ſet ſome apart for an Antidote to expel the Poiſon of Sin and Rebellion out of others, and that they may be made Sacrifices to appeaſe God's Wrath, and ſatisfy Divine Vengeance.'

5. The Parliament underſtanding from the King that they were to have a Receſs after the 13th of the next Month, proceeded with all Vigour to compleat ſome Bills under Conſideration. That which was of moſt immediate Importance, was a Bill for the ſpeedy disbanding the Army and Garriſons, upon which they were very intent.

The Commons Care in ſettling the Revenues of the Crown.

The next was the Eſtabliſhment of the Revenues of the Crown; and underſtanding the preſent Wants of the Royal Family, they began with a Preſent of ten Thouſand Pounds to the Duke of York, and another of ſeven Thouſand to the Duke of Gloceſter. They juſtly conſider'd that the Misfortunes of the late King, and the conſequent Miſeries, were originally owing to his Want of Mony; and therefore they particularly examin'd into that Matter. They found the Total of the Revenue which came unto his late Majeſty, amounted from the Year 1637 to the Year 1641 incluſive, communibus Annis, unto 895819 Pounds; whereof 210493 Pounds did ariſe by Payment partly not warranted by Law, and partly expir'd: And that the Expences of his late Majeſty's Government did amount, communibus Annis, to about 200000 Pounds a Year above the Receipt; in which Computation the Incomes ariſing by Ship-Mony are not comprehended. Next, they found that the preſent Revenue of his now Majeſty, by the additional Compoſition for the Court of Wards, may be computed at 819389 Pounds, or thereabouts; which Revenue they thought too little for the Support and Dignity of the Crown of England; therefore they reſolv'd to make a very conſiderable Addition.

But before they cou'd compleat that Matter, having prepared ſeven or eight publick Bills for the Royal Aſſent, on the 13th of September his Majeſty came to the Houſe of Peers and paſs'd them all. What they were, and the Nature of them, will appear from the Speaker's Speech, as following,

The Speaker's Speech to the King.

‘ Sir, the Royal Favour and Fatherly Kindneſs unto your People, hath naturaliz'd their Affections to your Perſon, and their Obedience to your Precepts: And as it is their Duty, ſo it is their Deſire to manifeſt and evidence the Truth and Reality thereof, by ſupporting and upholding that Grandeur and Splendor which is due to the Majeſty of ſo meritorious a Prince as your ſelf; and therefore they have reſolv'd, uno Flatû and Nemine Contradicente, to make up your Majeſty's conſtant and ordinary Revenue twelve hundred thouſand Pounds per Annum. But finding as to ſome Part of the Settlement of that Revenue, there will be a Neceſſity of making uſe of the Legiſlative Power; and that the Bills brought into the Houſe for that Purpoſe cannot poſſibly be made ready for your Royal Aſſent, until the next Meeting of your Houſes again, therefore they have taken your Majeſty's preſent Supply into their Conſideration; and firſt how to raiſe it in the moſt expeditious way to anſwer your preſent Occaſions. They have wrapt up their Affections to your Majeſty, and the Truſt repoſed in them by the People, in one of theſe Bills here in my Hand, intitled, An Act for the ſpeedy raiſing of a hundred thouſand Pounds for a preſent Supply, to be levy'd by way of Land-Tax within the Space of one Month.-----Sir, they have likewiſe paſs'd another Bill with Rules and Inſtructions how to impower and direct your Commiſſioners in what manner to disband your Army and Garriſons, and to pay off ſome Part of your Fleet, and to begin with thoſe Ships now in Harbour. But not knowing for certain whether the Monies upon the Poll-Bill, which is deſigned for that Purpoſe, will be ſufficient to defray that Charge; and being unwilling that any thing ſhould be wanting on their Parts to perfect ſo good a Work, ſo acceptable to your Majeſty, and ſo grateful to all your People, they have paſs'd another Act for raiſing a hundred and forty thouſand Pounds, at ſeventy thouſand Pounds per Menſem, to begin the firſt of November.----Sir, there are other Bills likewiſe which wait and attend for your Royal Aſſent; one entitled, An Act for regulating the Bay Trade, which is the only way to keep up the Credit of that which is now in ſome Danger to be loſt: When the Credit of Trade begins to decline, the Trade it ſelf decays with it, and is never long liv'd after it.------Sir, there is another Bill intitled, An Act for encouraging and encreaſing Shipping and Navigation; which will enable your Majeſty to give Laws to foreign Princes abroad, as your Royal Predeceſſors have done before you.------Sir, there is another Bill entitled, An Act for reſtoring ſome Miniſters into their Places, out of which they have been long and injuriouſly ejected and expos'd, and for confirming others in vacant Places. Crazy Titles need your Majeſty's Help, as much as crazy Bodies need the Help of a Phyſician: And what your Majeſty hath already done in that kind to this Parliament, and what you are now about to do, and what you have ever expreſs'd your Readineſs in, if we cou'd be as ready as your Majeſty is to give, we hope to baniſh all Fears and Jealouſies out of Mens Minds for the future, and teach them with much Confidence and Contentedneſs to reſt, and wholly rely upon your Majeſty's Grace and Goodneſs, for what may be thought further neceſſary to be done hereafter, when a fitting Opportunity ſhall be offer'd at the next Meeting of your Houſes of Parliament.'-----

In the paſſing of theſe, and about fourteen private Bills, which related chiefly to the reſtoring of ſome Perſons to their Eſtates, his Majeſty made this following Speech:

The King's Speech at paſſing ſeveral Bills.

‘ My Lords and Gentlemen, If my Preſence here had not been requiſite for the paſſing of theſe many Bills, I did always intend to ſee you together before your Adjournment, that I may again thank you for the many good things you have done for Me and the Kingdom: And in truth, I do thank you more for what you have done for the Publick, than what you have done for my Own Particular; and yet I do thank you for that with all my Heart. But I confeſs to you, I do thank you more for the Proviſion you have made to prevent Free Quarter, during the Time the Army ſhall be disbanded, which I take to be given for my Satisfaction, than I do for the Preſent you have made me for my own particular Occaſions. And I do promiſe you, which is the beſt way I can take to gratify you, I will not apply one Penny of that Mony to my own particular Occaſions, what Shift ſoever I make, till it is evident to me that the Publick will not ſtand in need of it; and if it do, every Penny of it ſhall be diſburs'd that way, and I dare ſay I ſhall not be the poorer for it. I cannot but take Notice of one particular Bill I have paſs'd, which may ſeem of an extraordinary Nature [An Act for reſtoring the Marqueſs of Hertford to the Dukedom of Somerſet.] But you all know it is for an extraordinary Perſon, who hath merited ſo much of the King my Father, and my ſelf, as a Subject can do: And I am none of thoſe who think, That Subjects, by performing their Duties in an extraordinary Manner, do not oblige their Princes to reward them in an extraordinary Manner. There can be no Danger from ſuch a Precedent; and I hope no Man will envy him, becauſe I have done what a good Maſter ſhould do to ſuch a Servant. My Lords and Gentlemen, I will not deny to you,

1660. Car. 12. Ref. 1.

‘That I had ſome Inclination, when I conſented to your Deſire for your Receſs, to have made a Seſſion, which I thought moſt agreeable to the ancient Order of Parliaments; and I hope you will joyn with me in reducing of Parliaments to their ancient Rules and Orders, the Deviation from which hath done us no Good. And I think there were never ſo many Bills paſs'd as I have this Day, without a Seſſion: But upon the Deſire, and Reaſons given by the Houſe of Commons, for an Adjournment, without a Seſſion, I do very willingly part from that Inclination, and do as willingly give you Leave, and direct you to adjourn your ſelves to the Sixth of November, when I hope you will meet again: And in the mean Time that you will be welcome to your Countries, and do much Service.’

The Subſtance of the Chancellor's Speech.

After which his Majeſty referr'd to the Lord Chancellor to ſpeak of many other things which he had to recommend to them: For in the Time of their Receſs, the Army was to be daily disbanding; of which many ſuſpicious Diſcourſes had been ſpread abroad by diſaffected Perſons: Some ſaid the King wou'd keep them up; and others, that they wou'd not ſuffer themſelves to be disbanded. And tho' an Act was paſs'd to confirm Miniſters, yet farther Order was to be taken in Reference to Church Government, and particularly in reſpect to tender Conſciences; as alſo about Purchaſes and Sales of Publick Lands, which had, without Iſſue, much taken up the Time of both Houſes. And therefore ſince the Parliament was to adjourn before theſe Matters were effected, it was expedient to ſatisfy the People with the King's generous Intentions in theſe and other Affairs. Accordingly the Lord-Chancellor diſplay'd his Eloquence in a long Speech, conſiſting of Variety of Subjects, principally tending to the compoſing and healing of all former Differences. As to the Army, he told them, ‘That his Majeſty cou'd not take it unkindly at their Hands who thought he wou'd not disband them: It was a ſober and rational Jealouſy; ſince no other Prince in Europe cou'd be willing to diſband ſuch an Army, every Way ſo valuable, &c.’ But what he alledg'd, as the greateſt Felicity to a diſtracted Nation, was the Act of Indemnity; in which he particularly inſiſted upon that moſt charitable Clauſe, ‘That made it penal to any Perſons, who within three Years, ſhou'd maliciouſly call, or object againſt others any Name or Words of Reproach, any Ways tending to revive the Memory of the late Differences.’ Nay farther, he let them know, ‘That even evil and envious Looks, murmuring and diſcontented Hearts, were directly againſt the Equity of the Statute, and, as far as they were diſcover'd, ſhou'd be ſo eſteem'd by his Majeſty.’ Therefore he conjured them from the King, ‘to joyn with Him in reſtoring the whole Nation to its primitive Temper, and Integrity, to its old Good Manners, to its old Good Humour, and its old Good Nature: Good Nature, a Virtue ſo peculiar to Them, ſo appropriated by God Almighty to this Nation, that it can be tranſlated into no other Language, hardly practis'd by any other People.’ After this he put them in Mind of the neceſſary Severity that ought to be us'd towards ſuch as ſhall ſtill continue to widen the Breaches; but likewiſe happily told them, ‘That too much Ill cou'd not befall Thoſe, who did the beſt they cou'd to corrupt his Majeſty's Nature, and to extinguiſh his Mercy.’ The whole conſiſted of great Variety, and was fill'd with ſuch generous and healing Sentences, as were agreeable to the beſt of Kings, and beſt of Miniſters; and concluded in theſe Words, ‘Be but pleas'd your ſelves, and perſuade others to be ſo; contrive all the Ways imaginable for your own Happineſs, and you will make his Majeſty the beſt pleas'd and the moſt happy Prince in the World.

The Parliament adjourn'd for near two Months.

Upon finiſhing this Speech the King retired, and both Houſes of Parliament adjourn'd themſelves to the ſixth Day of November, after they had ſat four Months and eighteen Days, from their firſt Meeting, and three Months and fourteen Days from the King's Arrival; in which Time they compleated as much Buſineſs, as cou'd poſſibly be expected, in this great Exigency of Affairs.

III. 1. During the Time of the Parliament's Receſs, which continu'd almoſt two Months, while Joy and Triumphs ſtill appear'd in every Place, a darker Scene began to open, and the Divine Vengeance took Place againſt the moſt notorious Murderers of his Majeſty's Royal Father. The Judges, Officers, and other immediate Actors in that bloody Tragedy, were in Number about Fourſcore; of whom four or five and twenty were dead, and gone to receive the Judgment of Heaven; eighteen or nineteen were fled from Juſtice; about ſeven, who were thought to have ſinn'd with leſs Malice, without Tryal had their Lives ſpared: and twenty nine were reſerv'd for preſent conſiſted of thirty four in Number, namely, Sir Thomas Allen, Lord-Mayor of London, Lord-Chancellor Hyde, the Earl of Southampton, the Duke of Somerſet, the Duke of Albemarle, the Marqueſs of Ormond, the Earl of Lindſey, the Earl of Mancheſter, the Earl of Dorſet, the Earl of Barkſhire, the Earl of Sandwich, the Lord Say, the Lord Roberts, the Lord Finch, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir Charles Barkley, Mr. Secretary Nicholas, Mr. Secretary Morrice, Sir Anthony Aſhley-Cooper, Mr. Arthur Anneſly, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Juſtice Foſter, Mr. Juſtice Mallet, Mr. Juſtice Hyde, Mr. Baron Atkins, Mr. Juſtice Twiſden, Mr. Juſtice Tyrrel, Mr. Baron Turner, Sir Harbottle Grimſton, Sir William Wild Recorder of London, Mr. Serjeant Brown, Mr. Serjeant Hale, and Mr. John Howel. The Proſecutors in Behalf of the King were Sir Jeffery Palmer Attorney-General, Sir Heneage Finch Sollicitor-General, Sir Edward Turner Attorney to the Duke of York, Serjeant Keeling, Mr. Wadham Windham, and Mr. Edward Shelton Clerk of the Crown. As the Bench conſiſted of ſeveral who had been great Promoters of that Cauſe which ruin'd the late King, ſo were ſeveral of the Witneſſes of the ſame Stamp, ſuch as Mr. Maſterſon, Colonel Hunks, Colonel Tomlinſon, Mr. John Ruſhworth, Mr. William Lenthal, Mr. Anthony Mildmay, &c.

Twenty nine Regicides try'd.

Tryal and Judgment, namely, Waller, Harriſon, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, Axtel, Heveningham, Marten, Millington, Tichborn, Roe, Lilburn, Harvey, Pennington, Smith, Downs, Potter, Garland, Fleetwood, Meyn, J. Temple, P. Temple, Howlet and Waite. For the Tryal of theſe the King appointed an extraordinary Bench of Commiſſioners, conſiſting of the beſt and moſt able of the Nobility, Judges, Lawyers and Gentlemen, to ſit at the Old-Baily, and determine the whole with the higheſt Decency and Solemnity. They

The Judges and Witneſſes, &c.

All the Commiſſioners being met on the 9th Day of October, the Grand Jury was ſworn, which conſiſted of Baronets, Knights, and Gentlemen of the beſt Rank. Which done, Sir Orlando Bridgman, who ſat as principal Judge, in a long and learned Charge, clearly open'd and ſtated the whole Matter to them: He told them, after a proper

The Subſtance of Bridgman's Speech.

Introduction, ‘That he muſt deliver to them for plain and true Law, That no Authority, no ſingle Perſon, no Community of Perſons, not the People Collectively, or Repreſentatively, had any coercive Power over the King of England.’ He ſhew'd them by the Common and Statute Law, ‘That the King was not only the Head of the People, but the Head of the Common-Wealth, the Three Eſtates of the Realm. All which was agreeable to the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance; which Oaths, all Men who enter'd into the Parliament Houſe were oblig'd to take. Now for a few Members of the Houſe of Commons, who had taken theſe Oaths, and by them ſtood oblig'd to defend the King againſt all Attempts againſt his Perſon, Crown and Dignity; for a few Members, not an eighth Part of the Houſe, to aſſume to Themſelves an Authority to make Laws, to erect an High Court of Juſtice, and to take away the Life of their Sovereign; a King, that had not only redreſs'd all Grievances in the Beginning of the Parliament, as the Star-Chamber, High Commiſſion Court, Ship-Mony, &c. but had afterwards made ſuch Conceſſions in the Iſle of Wight, as were more than the People cou'd deſire-----When theſe few Commons, not only without, but excluding the reſt of the Commons, and likewiſe rejecting all the Lords, ſhall take upon them this Authority, and, by Colour of this, ſentence to Death their Sovereign Liege Lord, and, as King, put him to Death before his own Royal Palace at Noon Day; it was ſuch an Aggravation of Villany, that no Words cou'd expreſs it: No Story in any Romance, or invented Tragedy, cou'd produce the like. Therefore, for any of theſe Criminals to ſhelter themſelves under this pretended mock Authority, was ſo far from being an Excuſe, that it was the Height of Aggravation.’

The Criminals indicted.

The Criminals being put upon their Tryal the next Day, and their Indictment read, two only pleaded Guilty, Sir Hardreſs Waller and Mr. George Fleetwood. The reſt pleaded Not guilty; tho' ſeveral of them for the while trifled with the Court: Particularly Harriſon, after Uſeleſs Evaſions, ſaid, He wou'd be try'd according to the Laws of the Lord; and when they told him the neceſſary Form was By God and the Country, he ſaid, They were vain Words. Harry Martin pleaded, ‘That he was not excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, the Perſon there mention'd being Henry, and not Harry, which was his real Name;’ but the Court inform'd him, ‘That a Miſnomer in this Caſe was not pleadable.’ Carew put himſelf upon his Tryal with this ſtrange Salvo, Saving to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt his Right to the Government of theſe Nations. Axtel for a while ſtood mute; and after the Court had convinc'd him of the Danger of it, and put him upon the Form of God and the Country, he anſwer'd, That is not lawful; God is not locally here. Hugh Peters declar'd, He wou'd not for ten Thouſand Worlds ſay he was guilty; and ſo deſir'd to be try'd by the Word of God; which he of all Men had ſo ſcandalouſly abus'd, that it produc'd a loud Laughter in the Court.

Harriſon's Tryal.

2. The Forms of Indictment being over, the next Day began with the Tryal of Thomas Harriſon, not long ſince call'd Major-General Harriſon, an inveterate Man, and moſt deeply engag'd. He was charg'd not only with ſitting as a Judge upon the late King, but with bringing him Priſoner to London, and treating him rudely, and, as a particular Aggravation, with ſaying to thoſe who drew up his Charge, Gentlemen, it will be good for us to Blacken him what we can; pray let us Blacken him! The Priſoner began his Defence by a ſurpriſing Argumentation, ' from the Notoriety of the Fact, That it was not done in a Corner; That he believ'd God was with his Servants in thoſe Days, however it ſeem'd good to him to ſuffer this Turn to come upon them: That he had with Prayers and Tears deſired to know the Mind of God in it; but he had received no Conviction of the Evil of it, but rather Aſſurance: He profeſs'd the Harmleſſneſs of his Nature to Man, Woman and Child: That he follow'd not his own Judgment, but his Conſcience to the Lord: That divers of thoſe upon the Bench were formerly as active in the ſame Cauſe: That he had ſuffer'd Impriſonment, becauſe he wou'd not turn aſide from the Cauſe to Cromwell, and refus'd the Temptation of ſitting at his Right Hand: That what he had done, was by Authority of Parliament; and that neither this nor any other inferior Court, had any Cognizance or Juriſdiction on That; and therefore they could not queſtion Him that acted in Obedience to that Authority; and that he did act in the Fear of the Lord.' Hereupon the Court and Audience were amaz'd, and cry'd out, Away with him, for he made God the Author of his Treaſons and Murders! And as to his pretended Authority, by which he warranted his Actions, it was anſwer'd, ' That the King and Lords cou'd not do any Thing without the Commons, nor the King and Commons without the Lords, nor the Lords and Commons without the King; and for the Priſoner to excuſe, nay, juſtify himſelf, upon Pretence of being impower'd by one Houſe, nay the eighth Part of a Houſe, to condemn their King, whom no Authority upon Earth cou'd call in Queſtion, and without Whom both Houſes together cou'd not take away the meaneſt Subject's Life, deſerv'd not only Reproof, but immediate Sentence.' They told him, ' That this Diſcourſe was to infect the People;' and Sir Edward Turner added, That he had the Plague all over him. So the whole Court unanimouſly and ſeverally rejected that treaſonable Tenet of an Authority in both or either Houſes without the King, and overrul'd that Plea. At which Harriſon deſired Counſel; and after ſome Interlocutions, he began a Diſcourſe of the War; the King's ſetting up his Standard againſt his People, and ſhedding of innocent Blood: And being interrupted there, avouching the ſame Authority, he profeſs'd his Abhorrence of blackening the King; and equivocated with his bringing him Priſoner from Hurſt-Caſtle, ſince he was commanded to do it from the General. At laſt he urg'd his Unpreparation for his Tryal, being ſix Months a cloſe Priſoner; but that he had ſome Acts of Parliament to produce to his Juſtification, and ſo concluded. Judgment being demanded, the Jury pronounc'd him guilty, without ſtirring from the Place; and Sentence of Execution was paſs'd upon him. Ludlow mentions two Particulars, not to be found in the printed Tryals: The firſt, the Truth of which is much doubted, was, that the Executioner in an ugly Dreſs, with a Halter in his Hand, was plac'd near the Priſoner, and continu'd there during the whole Time of the Tryal. The other was, That after Sentence had been pronounc'd againſt him, he ſaid aloud as he was withdrawing from the Court, That he had no Reaſon to be aſham'd of the Cauſe in which he had been engag'd. But whether this be to the Advantage of the Priſoner, is left to the Judgment of the Reader.

Scroop's Tryal.

The next that was ſet to the Bar was Colonel Adrian Scroop, who was convicted by the ſame Evidence of ſitting as Judge in the High Court of Juſtice, and ſigning the Warrant for the Execution of the late King; as alſo by the Teſtimony of Sir Richard Brown, the Lord-Mayor Elect, who ſaid, ' That ſince the Return of the King, in ſome accidental Conference, he ſeem'd to allow and approve of the Fact, by ſaying, Many People did not think it ſuch a heinous Matter; and that ſome be of one Mind, and ſome of another:' Which he deny'd now to have expreſly ſaid; but bewail'd the Misfortune of that Encounter with Sir Richard; ' For whereas before, he was not excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, the very laſt Day it paſs'd he was, by that Means, even then excepted. He juſtify'd that Authority, and the Fact committed by that Authority, but not the Perſon; proteſting he had no Malice againſt the King, and that it was an Error of Judgment, not of his Will; and that he ſaw a great many Faces at this Time that were miſ-led as well as himſelf: That he really took the Parliament's Authority for valid.' But being over-rul'd in that Plea, according to the preceding Tryal, he acquainted the Jury, ' That he lay under a great Prejudice by the Fact, and deſired them to conſider his Caſe as they wou'd their own; and hinted at the Benefit of the Proclamation.' He had more of the Port and Language of a Gentleman than any of the reſt of the King's Judges; and tho' he was found guilty, yet it is juſtly believ'd that he wou'd have eſcap'd with Life, had not his Crime been aggravated by the particular Teſtimony of Sir Richard Brown.

Carew's Tryal.

Mr. John Carew was next brought to the Bar, who being charg'd with ſitting as a Judge, and ſigning the bloody Warrant for the Murder of the King, he fell into the like Diſcourſe with Harriſon, declaring, ' That he was ſo far from acting with a traiterous and malicious Heart; that what he did was in the Fear of the Lord, and in Obedience to his holy and righteous Laws; and next in Obedience to that which was the Supream Authority of the Nation; which having been controverted in the Face of the whole World, the Lord had given an Anſwer upon ſolemn Appeals to theſe Things.' The Court interrupted him, and the Lord Chief Baron bad him remember, That the Devil ſometimes appear'd in the Habit of an Angel of Light. Others charg'd him with ſowing Sedition, and the Solicitor told him, ' Tho' he pretended Conſcience, and the Fear of the Lord, all the World knew he did it againſt the Law of the Lord, his own Conſcience, the Light of Nature, and the Laws of the Land, againſt the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy which he himſelf had taken.' He ſtill inſiſted upon the Power and Authority of the Parliament, and ſo left it with the Jury, who without removing from the Bar brought him in guilty.

Scot's Tryal.

Mr. Thomas Scot being the next at the Bar, the ſame Witneſſes were produc'd in all Things as the former, concerning his ſitting and ſigning the Warrant for Execution: But ſome Things were added by Way of aggravation; particularly it was ſworn, ' That he was ſo far from repenting of the Act, that in open Parliament he deſired that upon his Tomb-Stone he might have this Inſcription, Here lies Thomas Scot, who adjudg'd to Death the late King. And afterwards, upon the Diſſolution of the Parliament, he in the Houſe added theſe Words, Since it is your Pleaſure to have it ſo, I know not how to hinder it; but when that is done I know not where to hide this Hated Head of mine.' The Priſoner was very bold in his Defence, and declared ' That he was not to anſwer for Words ſpoken in Parliament; and that it was a high Breach of Privilege.' To which he was anſwer'd, ' That there cou'd be no Privilege of Parliament for Treaſon, nor Felony neither.' Then he flew to the Authority of the Commons in Parliament, and inſiſted ' It was a Parliament, and that that Court had no Cognizance to declare whether it was a Parliament or not.' To this he was anſwer'd, ' That then any Man might pretend to an Authority of Parliament: If forty Men ſhou'd meet at Shooter's-Hill, as the little Convention did at Weſtminſter, and ſay, We declare our ſelves the PARLIAMENT OF ENGLAND; becauſe they do ſo, ſhall not this be judg'd what is a Statute, and what not?' He then alledg'd, ' He knew not but that it might be as lawful for the Commons to make Laws, as this preſent Parliament, being call'd by the Keepers of the Liberties of England;' adding withal, ' That the Authority of the remaining Members might be as good as the Parliament was when the Biſhops were excluded; and Two Eſtates may take away a Third, if the Second do not continue to execute their Truſt, He that is in Occupancy may have a Title to the whole; therefore he affirm'd he had a Parliamentary and Legiſlative Power to juſtify him.' To this was reply'd, ' That the Biſhops were taken away by an Act, with the Conſent of the King, Lords and Commons; and therefore the Juſtification of this poyſonous Doctrine was inſufferable.' After ſome little ſtruggle more, the Jury, being directed, ſoon brought him in Guilty.

Clement's and Jones's Tryal.

There were two others to be try'd on the ſame Day, Mr. Gregory Clement, and Colonel John Jones, both for aſſuming a Power of judging and condemning the late King. The former wav'd his Plea, and confeſs'd his Crime, and deliver'd a Petition, as Sir Hardreſs Waller had before. Colonel Jones made ſome little Defence, but upon a full Proof of his ſitting in Court, and ſigning the Warrant, he acquieſc'd. And ſo all the five that were try'd this Day receiv'd Sentence together. Before the paſſing of which, Sir Orlando Bridgman made an affecting Speech to them and the Audience, in which, after he had enlarg'd upon the Virtues and Conceſſions of the late King, and the Peace and Proſperity that once flouriſh'd in his Reign, he more immediately apply'd to the Criminals: And becauſe Mr. Scot and others had alledg'd, That they had by Prayers and Tears often ſought the Lord, That if there were any Iniquity in It, he wou'd ſhew it them; 'he remember'd them of our Saviour's Saying, The Time cometh, that whoſoever killeth you, will think that he doeth God Service----There is a ſpiritual Pride; Men may over-run themſelves by their own Holineſs, and may follow pretended Revelations: Men may ſay I have pray'd about ſuch a Thing: A Man may commit a Robbery, or Murther, meerly becauſe he will, and may come and ſay, I have pray'd againſt it, and cannot underſtand it to be a Sin, as one in Shropſhire did, and yet notwithſtanding kill'd his own Father and Mother.

Cook's Tryal.

3. The Commiſſioners, having try'd ſome of thoſe who were more ſtrictly call'd The King's Judges, thought fit to proceed to ſome others who were more remotely, tho' as effectually concern'd as the reſt. The firſt of theſe was the Solicitor John Cook, who was arraign'd for aſſuming a Power over the King's Life; for drawing and exhibiting the Charge; for preſſing the Charge to be taken pro Confeſſo; in ſum, for being Inſtrumental in the King's Death. It was alſo particularly ſworn againſt him, 'That he acknowledg'd he was a wiſe and gracious King, but added, That he muſt die, and Monarchy with him.' To all which he anſwer'd very acutely, to the Honour of his Parts, and Infamy of his Practice: He began with St. Paul's Plea, 'Againſt the Law, and againſt Cæſar, he hop'd he had not offended at all. For firſt, he cou'd not be juſtly ſaid to have contriv'd or counſell'd the Death of the King, becauſe the Proclamation for the King's Tryal was, without Diſpute, publiſh'd on the ninth of January, which was the Day before he was appointed Solicitor to the High Court of Juſtice. In the ſecoud Place, tho' the Court ſhou'd not admit that to be an Act of Parliament, which had authoriz'd him; yet he aſſured himſelf they wou'd allow it to be an Order, which was enough to acquit him of Treaſon. Thirdly, That he, who had been neither Accuſer, Witneſs, Judge, or Executioner, cou'd not be guilty in this Caſe. He alledg'd, he was but Counſel, and acted in his Sphere for a Fee; in which his Crime might be call'd Avaritia, but not Malitia: That he was no Sword-Man: That he executed no Power over the King: That to pray and demand Juſtice, tho' Injuſtice be done upon it, cou'd not be Treaſon within the Statute: That when he demanded Juſtice, it might be meant of Acquittal, as well as of Condemnation; and that if it ſhou'd be accounted Treaſon in a Counſellor to plead againſt the King, it muſt alſo be Felony to plead againſt a Man who happens to be unjuſtly condemn'd for Felony: That the High Court of Juſtice, tho' now call'd tyrannical and unlawful, was yet a Court, had Officers attending them, and many think had Authority, there being then no Other in the Nation than that which gave them their Power; and if this will not juſtify a Man for acting within his own Sphere, it will not be lawful for any one to exerciſe his Profeſſion, unleſs he may be ſure of the Legality of the Court in which he acts.' He obſerv'd, 'that the Word Inſtrumental, in the Exception of the Act, was inſignificant, or otherwiſe incomprehenſive of him: That by the King's gracious Letter, a Free Parliament was to declare the excepted Perſons; which this cou'd not be, not being called by the King's Writ. Laſtly he ſtill pray'd for the Equity of that Act of Parliament in the Reign of Henry the Seventh, which indemnify'd thoſe that acted under a de Facto Authority.' After all his long Pleadings, he was anſwer'd by the Court, 'That he had been ſufficiently prov'd Inſtrumental in taking away the King's Life; therefore his alledging, That he was neither Witneſs, Jury, Judge nor Executioner, was no more than ſaying, Becauſe there are others worſe than my ſelf, I am innocent: That as no Man cou'd have a lawful Calling to purſue the Life of his King, ſo for a private Perſon, tho' he only intends to beat a Man, yet if he dies thereupon, in Law it is Murder; and if a Man counſels another to commit Murder, he is guilty himſelf: That his demanding the King as a Traytor to be brought to Juſtice, cou'd not reaſonably be meant that of Acquittal: That no Court cou'd ſhelter or excuſe a Perſon in the Commiſſion of Treaſon: That by a Free Parliament the King deſign'd the preſent Parliament, and as ſuch confirm'd it, before he paſs'd the Act of Indemnity. And laſtly for the Act of Parliament alledg'd, the Intent and Meaning of it was againſt him; it was to preſerve the King de Facto, how much more the King de Jure; eſpecially ſince he was both charg'd and ſentenc'd in the Court as King of England.' Being told that warranting the Authority was an Aggravation of his Crime, he deſired not to be miſtaken, meaning only in Point of High-Treaſon; ſo he wou'd have gladly eſcap'd with a Miſdemeanor, or Miſpriſion; but the Jury, after a little Conſideration, brought him in guilty as to the whole Indictment.

Hugh Peters's Tryal.

The next Perſon try'd was a Criminal of a peculiar Nature, Hugh Peters, who had been long a Scandal to the Pulpit: He was charg'd with contriving the King's Death, 'by conſpiring with Oliver Cromwell at ſeveral Times and Places, and procuring the Soldiers to cry out Juſtice, againſt the Traytor at the Bar! by preaching divers Sermons to perſuade the Army to take off the King, comparing him to Barabbas, and the Soldiers to Jeſus Chriſt, and applying part of that Pſalm where it is ſaid, They ſhall bind their Kings in Chains, &c. to the Proceedings againſt him; aſſuring them from the Bible, That whoever ſheddeth Man's Blood, by Man ſhall his Blood be ſhed; and that neither the King, nor Prince Rupert, nor none of that Rabble, were excepted. He was alſo accus'd of comparing the High Court of Juſtice, to the Laſt Judgment by the Saints, and of ſaying, That the Levites, Lords and Lawyers muſt be taken away in order to eſtabliſh a Common-Wealth; That the King was a Tyrant, and that the Office was Chargeable, Uſeleſs, and Dangerous.' To all which he made a very mean Defence, having loſt all his uſual Briskneſs of Wit, and Preſence of Mind: 'He made ſome little Cavils againſt the Witneſſes, and in Effect only declar'd himſelf to be an Orthodox harmleſs Man, and that he had ever acted without Malice, Avarice, or Ambition.' He was alſo ſtrongly ſuſpected of being the Executioner; but as to that, he prov'd he was ſick in Bed that very Day. The Jury ſoon found him guilty of Treaſon; and ſo Solicitor Cook and he receiv'd Sentence together.

Axtel's Tryal.

The next Day appear'd at the Bar Colonel Daniel Axtel, who had eſcap'd, as he thought, the Exception in the Act, but was lately added to the miſerable Number, upon the Account of other Blood that likewiſe lay upon him. The chief Heads of his Charge were, 'That he commanded the Guards both at the Tryal and Execution of the King; that he order'd the Soldiers, in a tumultuous Manner, to cry out Juſtice and Execution! and beat ſome for not doing ſo; and that he bid them Shoot at a Lady, ſuppos'd to be the Lady Fairfax, whom he there term'd Whore, for ſaying that Cromwell was a Rogue, and that the twentieth Part of the People never conſented to the Tryal of the King: That he had ſent for and encourag'd the Executioner, and that he had charg'd a Perſon with Cowardiſe for refuſing to ſign the Warrant for Execution.' He made long Harangues in his Defence, and ſaid, 'That he was commanded thither by his General, whom the Lords and Commons had commiſſion'd: That they had declared Themſelves to be the Interpreters of the Law; and if he had not obey'd his General's Command, he was then liable to the Puniſhment: That that Statute of 25 of Edward III. did not extend to private Perſons in that Caſe: That ſeveral Judges had declared, That it was lawful and juſtifiable to obey the Parliament: That if the Collected Body in Parliament be guilty of Treaſon, where will they find a Jury in the Diſtributed Part of the People?' Here he was charg'd for being One of thoſe who actually put the Force upon the Houſe, and turn'd the Parliament into a Juncto. He anſwer'd 'he only obey'd his Superiors; and that Eſſex, Mancheſter, Fairfax, nay General Monk, were equally guilty for acting by the ſame Commiſſion: That he was appointed to keep the Peace in the Court, and therefore it was no Treaſon to ſilence a Lady that ſpoke impertinently; and if the Soldiers did cry Juſtice, Execution! he might beat them and ſay I'll Juſtice you, I'll Execution you: That at the worſt, Juſtice being an Attribute of God, it was no Treaſon to require it; and that the Execution of it was no more: That, as Cook had ſaid before, he neither Sentenc'd, Signed, Sealed nor Sate; and pleaded the Statute of Henry VII. for aiding a King de Facto. To all which he was anſwer'd, 'That there cou'd be no Excuſes for direct Treaſon: That the Parliament, tho' conſiſting of Lords and Commons, nor the General, cou'd never give any Authority to murther the King; nor was it in his Commiſſion to guard the High-Court of Juſtice, nor to cry for Execution: That any of thoſe Things was an Overt-Act of his Imagination, and ſufficiently prov'd that Juſtice and Execution was the Intent of Murthering the King, which was confirm'd by his wrathful Speech to the Lady.' Theſe, and other Things being alledg'd by the Court, the Jury ſoon brought him in guilty of Treaſon.

Hacker's Tryal.

The next brought to the Bar was Colonel Francis Hacker; againſt whom the Wineſſes depos'd 'That he was one of the Perſons that were upon the Guard, and kept the King Priſoner: That the Warrant for ſeeing the Sentence againſt the King put in Execution, was directed to Him with Others: That in Proſecution of that Commiſſion, he had ſign'd a Warrant for Executing the King; and that, by Virtue of the Warrant he had receiv'd, he took the King out of the Cuſtody of Colonel Thomlinſon, and conducted him to the Scaffold where he was put to Death. He had been all the while preſent at the laſt Tryal, and ſaw how fruitleſs it wou'd be to make the ſame Allegations with Axtel; Therefore he only ſaid, 'That he had ‘ had acted by the Command of his Superiors, and that he ‘ had always endeavour'd to ſerve his Country in all his ‘ publick Actions:’ So that his Tryal was ſoon diſpatcht, and he brought in guilty of Treaſon.

The reſt ſubmit,

4. Of the twenty nine Regicides that were reſerv'd for Tryal, Ten only ſuffer'd Death, the Tryals of whom have already been related. The nineteen remaining were Harvey, Pennington, Marten, Millington, Tichborn, Roe, Lilburn, Smith, Downs, Potter, Garland, Heveningham, Meyne, J. Temple, P. Temple, Wait, Hewlet, Waller and Fleetwood. The two laſt, as was formerly obſerv'd, had pleaded guilty; and the Reſt, having all, but Hewlet, ſurrender'd themſelves upon the King's Proclamation, were, if condemn'd, to have their Execution ſuſpended, till the ſame ſhou'd be order'd by the King and Parliament. But firſt they were all oblig'd to undergo the Formality of Tryal; in which moſt of them ſubmitted to Mercy, uſing very little other Excuſe but ‘ that they were Ignorant and ‘ free from Malice.’ So that we have but little Material in their Tryals: Only ſomething ſhou'd be ſaid concerning Three of them, Marten, Downs and Hewlet.

Except Marten, Downs and Hewlet.

Colonel Harry Marten was charg'd not only with Sitting, Signing and Sealing, as others were, but alſo, That at the firſt Meeting of the High-Court of Juſtice in the Painted Chamber, upon the Landing of the King from White-Hall to Sir Robert Cotton's Houſe, Cromwell upon Sight of Him, asking them this Queſtion, The firſt Thing the King will demand of us will be, By what Authority we bring him before us; what ſhall we ſay, by whoſe Authority? After a little Pauſe Marten reply'd, In the Name and Authority of the Commons and Parliament aſſembled, and the good People of England. In Anſwer to this he firſt own'd the Fact, but not the Malice; and when, as an Aggravation, he was told That he Sign'd the Warrant merrily, and in ſport, he immediately return'd, Then it was not in Malice. And ſo he proceeded to juſtify the Authority of the Parliament; and tho' he own'd it was but a Remnant of a Parliament, ‘ yet in the Caſe of Commons to a Cottage, ‘ if a Stick be but left, the Commons ſtill belong'd to that ‘ Cottage.’ Colonel Downs, upon his Tryal, had ſomething to plead which none of the reſt had; namely, that in the King's Tryal, he had caus'd the Court to adjourn, and had ſaid and done what wou'd have been of the higheſt Importance to his Majeſty, had he not been over-rul'd; the Particulars of which may be ſeen in the former Part of this Hiſtory. Captain Hewlet, once a Serjeant of Colonel Hewſon's Regiment, was indicted for being the Man that was in the Frock, and cut off the King's Head: This was averr'd from his own Confeſſion by three Witneſſes; and as many atteſted it was Gregory Brandon the common Executioner: ‘ That He, the Executioner, after it was ‘ done, was put into a Boat, and trembled every Joint of ‘ him; and that he affirm'd as much to the Lord Capel at ‘ his Suffering by the ſame Ax, of which the Executioner ‘ aſſur'd him.’ The Priſoner further ſaid, ‘ That he ‘ cou'd make it appear he was not upon the Scaffold that ‘ Day, nor near it, for that he and other Serjeants were ‘ ſecured that Day, for refuſing to be there.’ But the other Witneſſes Evidence being expreſs, He was found guilty. The Court gave him all the Advantage that cou'd be, and repriev'd him, ſo that he eſcap'd with Life.

Bridgeman*'s concluding Speech.*

As the Lord chief Baron Bridgeman had open'd, ſo he concluded the whole Affair with a learned and affecting Speech, addreſs'd to the greateſt Number of the Criminals then ſtanding at the Bar. He told them, ‘ That what he ‘ did was with as much Sorrow of Heart as they had ‘ themſelves, many of them being of liberal Education, ‘ and of great Parts.’ He let them know, ‘ That they ‘ were now only before the Tribunal of Man, to receive ‘ Judgment for their Offence here; but there was another ‘ Judgment hereafter, and a Tribunal before which all ‘ muſt appear, and receive according to their Works. And ‘ ſince Mercy was reſerv'd by Heaven for the greateſt Offenders, he adviſ'd them to lay hold on the moſt probable ‘ Means to obtain it, and have a ſpecial Care of being ‘ given over to a Reprobate Senſe, and of a ſeared Conſcience, and bold Confidence, which wou'd prove the ‘ moſt ſignal Judgment upon them.’ He did not at all blame them for making the beſt Defence they cou'd for their Lives; but then he fully made it appear, ‘ That their ‘ Condemnation was juſt, and according to the certain ‘ ſtanding Laws of their Country: Accordingly he repeated to them ſome Things he had formerly ſaid concerning the legal Supremacy of the Kings of England, ‘ and that no Body or Community of Men had any coercive ‘ Power over their Perſons. Then he nam'd the Words of ‘ the Act of the Firſt of King James, wherein the Lords ‘ and Commons did acknowledge an humble and natural ‘ Liege Obedience to the King as Supreme, his Heirs and ‘ Succeſſors; and in the Name of themſelves and all the People, humbly ſubmit themſelves untill the laſt Drop of their ‘ Blood be ſpent in Defence of the King and his Royal Poſterity. Remember, added He, theſe were not Words ‘ of Compliment: You ſhall find that they, all of Them, ‘ and ſo did as many of You as were Members of Parliament before you came into the Houſe of Commons, took ‘ the Oath of Allegiance, which was made after this Recognition, or otherwiſe were not to be Members: In ‘ which Oath you ſwore to defend the King, his Perſon, ‘ his Crown and Dignity, &c. Therefore their Oaths were ‘ a further Aggravation of their Crimes; and there never ‘ was ſuch a Blow given to the Church of England, and ‘ the Proteſtant Religion.’ Then, after a new adviſing them to beware of an obſtinate, perverſe Courſe, he proceeded to Sentence of Execution.

The Execution of Harriſon, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker and Axtel.

5. What follow'd was more tragical and amazing, which was the Execution and Behaviour of Ten of theſe wretched Criminals; in which there appear'd a prodigious Spirit of Enthuſiaſm. Harriſon was the Firſt, who on the thirteenth of October, ſuffer'd according to the Letter of the Law at Charing-Croſs, the People loudly ſhouting at his exemplary Fall. He was firſt hang'd with his Face towards the Banquetting-Houſe, and then, being cut down alive, his Body was quarter'd and plac'd upon the City Gates, and his Head upon Weſtminſter-Hall. Two Days after Mr. Carew was brought to the ſame Place, and ſuffer'd in the ſame Manner; only, upon the Interceſſion of his Friends, the King permitted his Body to be bury'd. The following Day John Cook and Hugh Peters were together brought to the Place, and were executed after the ſame Manner; Cook's Head being plac'd upon Weſtminſter-Hall by Harriſon's, and that of Peters upon London-Bridge. On the Day following four ſuffer'd at the ſame Place, at two ſeveral Times, firſt Scot and Clement, next Scroop and Jones. As to Hacker and Axtel, being Criminals of another Nature, and not the King's Judges, they were order'd to be hang'd and quarter'd at Tyburn; but the Body of Hacker was, by the King's Favour, given to his Friends, and bury'd. To aggravate the Severity of theſe Executions, Ludlow mentions two Circumſtances not obſerv'd by every Writer: The Firſt was, that when Cooke was drawn upon his Sledge, the Head of Harriſon, with his Face uncover'd, was plac'd before him, to the great Deteſtation of the People. The other was, when his Body was cut down and quarter'd, the Executioner, rubbing his bloody Hands together, came to Peters, then going to ſuffer, and ask'd him How he lik'd that Work? To whom the other reply'd, He was not at all terrify'd, and that he might do his worſt.

An Account and Character of them.

To give ſome ſhort Account of theſe Sufferers: Firſt, Thomas Harriſon was a Butcher's Son of Newcaſtle Underline in Staffordſhire, who being brought up an Attorney, left his Employment, and betook himſelf to the Army in the Beginning of the Wars; where his pragmatical Spirit, his voluble Tongue, and his Enthuſiaſtical Preaching, ſo recommended him to the Army, and to Cromwell himſelf, that he was gradually rais'd to the Office of a Major-General. Being a great Confident, by his Aſſiſtance Cromwell broke the Power of the Presbyterians, purg'd the Houſe of Commons, and brought the King to his Tryal, and laſt of all deſtroy'd the Long Parliament, call'd the Commonwealth of England. But upon his making himſelf ſole Governor, Harriſon left him with great Scorn and Indignation, and became the Ring-leader of that dangerous Sect call'd the Fifth-Monarchy Men; and ſubmitted to be rebaptiz'd to gain the Anabaptiſts to his Party. Being very buſie in raiſing Forces to oppoſe the Reſtoration, he was prevented in his Deſign, taken Priſoner, and brought to his Tryal and fatal End. The next was Mr. John Carew, a Corniſh Gentleman, Brother to Sir Alexander Carew, who loſt his Head in 1644; who, notwithſtanding a liberal Education, fell into the Fifth-Monarchy Crew, and being an Enemy to all Regal Government, he not only hated King Charles, but afterwards Cromwell Himſelf, whoſe Power and Intereſt he had ſo much promoted. Mr. John Cook was a Man of mean Birth, and inconſiderable Fortune, but of very good Parts and a genteel Education; who being made a Barriſter at Law, his ſmall Practice made him ready to joyn with the Regicides; for which he was rewarded with the Title of Lord-Chief-Juſtice in Ireland, where he prov'd a great Preacher and Favourer of the Anabaptiſts. In the Height of his Preferment, he cou'd not always conceal the Laſhes of a troubled Conſcience, with Relation to his particular Crime; tho' at laſt he dy'd as impenitent as any of the reſt. Hugh Peters was firſt educated in, then whipt and expell'd out of Cambridge; and from thence became an Itinerant Preacher in New-England, Holland, and other Places, and afterwards a Chaplain in the Camp, where he acted ſeveral Parts, as that of Colonel and Agitator, and became the great Scandal of the Pulpit, by his ſtrange Cant, Scurrility, and Buffoonry. At the Reſtoration he was diſcover'd by one of his New-England

Confidents, ſeiz'd in Bed with another Man's Wife, and ſo brought to his Priſon and Tryal. Thomas Scot was born of obſcure Parents in Buckinghamſhire, being firſt a Brewer's Clerk or Partner in London, and then a Country Attorney; and ſignalizing his Zeal for the Cauſe, he was choſen a Member of Parliament for a Borough in his own County, and always continu'd a moſt inveterate Enemy againſt his Sovereign Maſter. Gregory Clement was firſt a Merchant; but failing there, he forc'd himſelf into the Parliament Houſe, and ſought to grow rich by a new Trade in Biſhop's Lands, wherein he got a conſiderable Eſtate: He was turn'd out of the Rump Parliament for his Lewdneſs, but was taken in again when they were reſtored after Cromwell's Interruption. His Guilt or his Ignorance wou'd not ſuffer him to make any Plea at the Bar, or any Speech at the Gallows. Mr. Adrian Scroop was deſcended of a good Family in Buckinghamſhire, and ally'd to the Cavalier Family in Lincolnſhire, having above the reſt the Port and Mien of a Gentleman: He was a great Puritan and Stickler againſt the King, for which he was rewarded with ſeveral Employments, and particularly the Office of a Colonel. The next Man was Mr. John Jones, a Man of a mean Family in Wales, once a Serving-Man to Sir Thomas Middleton; but riſing in the Wars, he got into the Parliament-Houſe, and marry'd one of Cromwell's Siſters; after which he obtain'd ſeveral Places; and beſides that of Colonel in the Army, he was made Governour of Anglesey, and then a Commiſſioner for the Government of Ireland, where he behav'd himſelf after a ſevere and tyrannical Manner. There is little to be ſaid of the two laſt, Hacker and Axtell; only the former was a Soldier of Fortune, whoſe notable Reſolution and Conduct brought him into the Familiarity of Cromwell. The latter was firſt a Grocer's Apprentice in London; but being an Anabaptiſt, and a gifted Man, he ſoon became acquainted in the Army, where that and his barbarous Diſpoſition rais'd him to the Office of a Lieutenant-Colonel.

Their prodigious Behaviour

Nothing can be more aſtoniſhing and ſhocking to good Chriſtians and Subjects than the Behaviour of theſe Criminals, as it is publiſh'd by their own ſpecial Friends under the Title of The Speeches and Prayers of ſome of the late King's Judges, &c. by which we ſee that they were ſo far from expreſſing the leaſt Repentance, that moſt of them glory'd in the Villany; and none of the primitive Martyrs left the World with ſo much Aſſurance and Self-Juſtification. Harriſon declar'd, That the Lord's Spirit did witneſs with his Spirit, that all his Sins were done away by Jeſus Chriſt; and as he was carry'd to his Execution, he ſeveral times cry'd out, I go to ſuffer upon the Account of the moſt glorious Cauſe that ever was in the World! Then in his laſt Speech he ſaid, He believ'd, e'er it be long, the Lord wou'd make it known from Heaven, That there was more of God in it than Men were aware of. Carew declared, What he did was of the Lord, and if it were to be done again, he wou'd do it. He ſaid, The Lord had juſtify'd the Cauſe in the Field once already, but he wou'd again do it with a Witneſs. He afterwards added, I dye not in the Lord only, but for the Lord: And think not that this bleſſed Cauſe ſhall be loſt, for it ſhall reach the End of the Earth. Cook began his Speech upon the Ladder in theſe Words, The moſt glorious Sight that ever was ſeen in the World, was our Lord Jeſus upon the Croſs; and the moſt glorious next to that, is to ſee any poor Creature ſuffer for him in his Cauſe. And in his laſt Prayer he has theſe Words, I believe that an Army of Martyrs wou'd willingly come from Heaven, to ſuffer in ſuch a Cauſe as this I come here to ſuffer for. Scot declar'd it To be a Cauſe not to be repented of; and expreſs'd no other Sorrow but for his asking the Benefit of the King's Proclamation. Axtel ſaid, If he had a thouſand Lives, he cou'd lay them all down for the Cauſe; and declar'd, They had nothing againſt him, neither by God's Law, nor their own Law, to condemn him; therefore, They had meerly murther'd him, and might as well have done it at the Tower, as brought him thither to make this Buſtle: Yet he very charitably wiſh'd, That his Blood might not cry to the Third and Fourth Generation. Hacker ſhew'd much of the ſame Spirit, and in a Paper he read at his Execution he ſaid, I thank the Lord, I have nothing lies upon my Conſcience as Guilt whereof I am now condemned; and do not doubt but to have the Sentence revers'd. The Behaviour of Scroop and Jones was more decent than the reſt; for tho' both theſe aged Gentlemen in Effect maintain'd the ſame Cauſe, yet the former pray'd for the King, and the latter acquitted his Majeſty, ‘as having done nothing but ‘the Part of a loving Son to a Father; and the Court, as ‘acting by Law according to the beſt of their Underſtandings:’ Yet ſpeaking of the Sledge that was to carry him to Execution, he cou'd not help ſaying, It was like Elijah*'s fiery Chariot, only it goes through* Fleet-ſtreet.

Such were the prodigious Effects of Enthuſiaſm, Poſſeſſion, or ſomething that wants a Name; which were ſufficient to create Horror in good Men, and Infidelity in bad. Yet this obdurate and impenitent Behaviour is believ'd not to have riſen wholly from within, or from a ſedate Frame of Mind: For others tell us that moſt of them made uſe of Art, and prepared themſelves for their Journies by intoxicating Cordials and other ſtrong Liquors: Particularly Harriſon and Carew, in whoſe Looks there was a ſenſible and remarkable Change; which by Carew's Friends is related in this ſhocking Expreſſion, His Countenance ſhining with great Glory. As to Hugh Peters, he had taken ſo large a Potion, that he for ſome time behaved himſelf like an Ideot, and was ſtupidly drunk; which caus'd Cook, who ſuffer'd with him, to ſay, Here is a poor Brother coming, I am afraid he is not fit to dye at this Time.

The reſt eſcape with Life.

As to the nineteen other Priſoners, formerly mention'd, who came in upon the Proclamation, and were condemn'd as well as the reſt, they were all remitted to the Tower, till the farther Pleaſure of the King and Parliament ſhou'd be known. Their Eſtates were immediately ſeiz'd into the King's Hands; but they ſo far eſcap'd in their Perſons, that none of them ſuffer'd Death, as many expected and deſir'd: Only ſome few others, who were afterwards taken, ſuffer'd the Law, as will be mention'd in due Time.

6. During theſe Proceedings of Juſtice, the King and his Miniſtry were uſing all ſoftning Methods to allay and cure the Diſtempers of the Nation; eſpecially thoſe relating to Religion, which had been the principal Cauſes of the late Wars. Almoſt all Diſſenters from the Church of England had apply'd themſelves to the Crown, but more particularly the Presbyterians, who had a comfortable Proſpect from the Favours ſhewn to their chief Miniſters, the Countenance of great Men, and the King's Declaration at Breda. In order to bring all to a good Temper, the King, according to his Promiſe made at the Adjournment of the Parliament, on the 25th of October publiſh'd a long and healing Declaration to all his loving Subjects, moſt agreeable to that from Breda, which had particularly declar'd, ‘That no Man ſhou'd be diſquieted or called in ‘queſtion for Differences in Opinion in Matters of Re‘ligion, which did not diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom; ‘and that the King ſhou'd be ready to conſent to ſuch an ‘Act of Parliament, as upon mature Deliberation ſhou'd ‘be offer'd to him, for the full granting that Indulgence.’

The King's Declaration.

In this new Declaration his Majeſty, towards the Beginning, complains, ‘That he had not been ſo candidly dealt ‘with as he deſerv'd; and that there were unquiet and ‘reſtleſs Spirits who continu'd their Bitterneſs againſt the ‘Church, and endeavour'd to raiſe Jealouſies, as if he was ‘not true to the Profeſſions he had made: And in order ‘thereto, beſides their publiſhing of ſeveral ſeditious Pam‘phlets, they had printed and diſpers'd a former Declara‘tion he had made in Scotland; of which he ſhou'd ſay ‘no more, than That the Circumſtances by which he was ‘forc'd to ſign that Declaration, were well known to the ‘World; and that the worthieſt and greateſt Part of that ‘Nation did even then deteſt and abhor the ill Uſage of him ‘in that Particular.’ After this he proceeded to declare, ‘That upon a full Conference with learned Men of ſeve‘ral Perſuaſions, he found, That the Miſchiefs, under ‘which both the Church and State at preſent ſuffer'd, did ‘not reſult from any form'd Doctrine or Concluſion main‘tain'd by either Party, but from the Paſſion, Appetite, ‘and Intereſt of particular Perſons, who contracted ‘greater Prejudice from thoſe Affections, than from their ‘Opinions.’ After having declar'd his Affection and Eſteem for the Church of England, and that he cou'd not preſently call a Synod, according to his Deſign, he in the mean Time, to allay the preſent Diſtempers thought fit to make theſe eight following Conceſſions or Orders. ‘The ‘firſt was to promote the Power of Godlineſs in the Ex‘erciſes of Religion and the Lord's Day, and to encou‘rage the frequent Preaching of Biſhops. 2. To ap‘point Suffragan Biſhops, eſpecially in the larger Dioceſes. ‘3. That no Biſhop ordain, or exerciſe Church-Cenſures ‘without the Advice and Aſſiſtance of the Presbyters; ‘and that Lay-Officers be excluded in Matters purely Spi‘ritual. 4. That Deans and Chapters be better fitted to ‘afford Counſel and Aſſiſtance to the Biſhops in Ordina‘tions and other Spiritual Matters. 5. For the Regula‘tion of Confirmation, Admiſſion to the Lord's Supper, ‘and Catechiſm; in which Rural Deans were to be aſ‘ſiſting. 6. That no Biſhop exerciſe any Power, or im‘poſe any Thing, but according to the known Law of the ‘Land. 7. For appointing ſome learned Divines to reviſe ‘and make ſome Amendments to the Liturgy; and that ‘ſcrupulous Perſons be not puniſh'd for the Diſuſe of it ‘at preſent. The Eighth and laſt was concerning Cere‘monies, in which Perſons were for the preſent left at Li‘berty, as to Kneeling in the Sacrament, the Croſs in Bap‘tiſm, bowing at the Name of Jeſus, and even the Oath

‘ of Canonical Obedience.’ Such was the Subſtance of theſe Conceſſions, which are thought by a late ingenious Writer to have been overſtrain'd, as not only to over-rule the Canons, and diſable the Diſcipline of the Church, but likewiſe to diſpenſe with the Statutes to the Conſtruction of a Repeal, and ſo to lye hard on the Civil Conſtitution. But theſe were Times of Unſettlemeht and Neceſſity, which required Uncommon and Irregular Remedies: And, with this Conſideration, if we read the Declaration at large, we ſhall find in general a noble Spirit of Wiſdom and Goodneſs, and an excellent Pattern for Poſterity, when they are beſt diſpos'd to conſider of the moſt proper and healing Methods, either for the Reſtoration of the Diſcipline, or the making up the Breaches of the eſtabliſh'd Church.

Epiſcopacy revives.

In the mean Time the Church of England and Epiſcopacy gradually reviv'd in the Nation; tho' the Biſhops themſelves, by Reaſon of the Act of Parliament in 1641, ſtill continu'd excluded from the Houſe of Peers. It is obſervable that only nine of the old Biſhops ſurviv'd the Times of Confuſion, who now all recover'd their Epiſcopal Sees; as William Juxon Biſhop of London, William Pierce Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Robert Skinner Biſhop of Oxford, John Warner Biſhop of Rocheſter, William Roberts Biſhop of Bangor, Matthew Wren Biſhop of Ely, Bryan Duppa Biſhop of Salisbury, Henry King Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Accepted Frewen Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry. Of theſe, in a ſhort Time, Juxon was tranſlated to the See of Canterbury, Frewen to that of York, Duppa to Wincheſter, and Skinner to Worceſter.

New Biſhops

Seven or eight others were conſecrated this Year, and appointed to their reſpective Biſhopricks, as John Coſens to that of Durham, William Lucy to Saint-Davids, Benjamin Laney to Peterborough, Richard Stern to Carliſle, Hugh Lloid to Landaff, Bryan Walton to Cheſter, and John Gauden to Exeter. About the ſame Time ſeveral of the Presbyterian Miniſters were invited to Church Preferments; Mr. Calamy had the Biſhoprick of Litchfield and Coventry offer'd him, Dr. Reynolds that of Norwich, and Mr. Baxter that of Hereford: Dr. Manton was offer'd the Deanry of Rocheſter, Dr. Bates the Deanry of Litchfield and Coventry, and Mr. Bowles the Deanry of York: But all refus'd, on the Account of the uncertain Continuance of the Terms of the Declaration, except Dr. Reynolds, who accepted of Norwich, and continu'd about ſixteen Years in that Biſhoprick. Theſe Biſhops, tho' they were ſtill hinder'd from their Places and Votes in Parliament, were fully reſtored to their Spiritual Juriſdiction, and all other Rights of Ordination, Inſtitution, Cenſures, &c. ſo that the eſtabliſh'd Church daily recover'd its former Authority, and began to ſhine with its uſual Splendor.

All this Time Joy and Pleaſure appear'd in all Places; and the King was not only entertain'd with the continual Addreſſes of his Loyal Subjects, but with the more ſolemn Congratulations of Foreign Princes and States, who by their Agents and Ambaſſadors did often ſend over Preſents as well as Compliments; and particularly thoſe of the United Provinces diſtinguiſh'd themſelves by an excellent Collection of Pictures, and other Rarities. In the paying of theſe Foreign Ceremonies a dreadful Rencounter hapned on Tower-Hill, in a Diſpute of Precedence between the Coaches of the French and Spaniſh Ambaſſadors.

The Arrival of the Princeſs of Orange.

In the midſt of theſe Times of Feſtivity, the admirable Princeſs of Orange, having recommended the Intereſt of her young Son the Prince to the Care of the States General, who had now agreed to inveſt him with the Truſt and Dignity of his Anceſtors, came over into England to viſit her Royal Brothers, and once again to ſee her native Country, from which ſhe had been abſent about nineteen Years. But the Joy in ſeeing her eldeſt Brother peaceably enthroned, was extreamly clouded by her Sorrow for the Loſs of her youngeſt and beloved Brother Henry of Oatlands Duke of Gloceſter, who juſt before her landing dy'd of the Small-Pox, on the 13th of September, aged twenty Years, two Months and five Days.

The Death and Character of the Duke of Gloceſter.

His Funeral was ſolemniz'd in Weſtminſter-Abby; his Brother the Duke of York being chief Mourner, attended by the three Dukes of Richmond, Buckingham and Albemarle, and follow'd by the reſt of the Nobility, &c. He was not only lamented by his Royal Relations, but by all great and good Men, being a Prince excellently accompliſh'd, Religious, Valiant, and Wiſe above his Years, a dutiful and affectionate Brother, a juſt Counſellor, a good Maſter, and a faithful Friend. As to his Religion, he was an inviolable Obſerver of his dying Father's Inſtructions, and an Invincible Aſſerter of the Proteſtant Faith againſt all the Errors of Popery; to preſerve him from the Temptations of which, his pious Siſter, now coming to viſit him, had for ſome Years parted with one half of her annual Income that was left to her own Diſpoſal; as I learnt from an unqueſtionable Hand.

The Arrival of the Queen Mother.

Within a few Days after, there arriv'd the Queen Mother from France with a conſiderable Train, among whom was her fair Daughter Henrietta Maria, now ſixteen Years of Age, together with Prince Edward, Brother to the Elector Palatine. Theſe were all formally met by the King, the Duke of York, and the Princeſs of Orange, and on the 2d of November conducted to White-Hall, from which Palace the Queen had been abſent nineteen Years. This Viſit was made to effect ſeveral political Ends, as particularly to adviſe of a Match between the young Princeſs and Monſieur, Brother to the French King; and likewiſe to promote a Match for the King himſelf. And firſt, we are inform'd, ſhe propos'd the famous Hortenſia Mancina, Neice to the Cardinal Mazarin, with a Portion of above twenty Millions of Livres. But that being rejected as an improper Match, ſhe then promoted the Alliance with Portugal, and a Match with the Infanta of that Kingdom, which had been ſet on foot by the Portugal Ambaſſador before the Reſtoration, and propos'd by General Monk to the King immediately after his Arrival in England. During her Majeſty's Stay, which was not above two Months, ſhe us'd her frequent Endeavours to perſuade her Son to remove the Chancellor Hyde from his Councils; and finding ſhe effected nothing in that Affair, ſhe became uneaſie and more willing to depart; yet, by the King's Importunity, ſhe at length admitted the new Dutcheſs of York to come into her Preſence; tho' by her Behaviour towards her, while preſent, it appear'd that ſhe thought her not worthy to be treated as a Daughter. Her chief Deſigns in this Viſit, contrary to thoſe of the Chancellor, ſeem'd to have been to promote the Intereſt of France and Portugal againſt the Monarchy of Spain: And notwithſtanding the former had articled not to aſſiſt Portugal, yet Mazarin, to encourage the Engliſh to a Treaty, and to ſend Forces thither, engag'd to eaſe them of their Tranſport Charge, and promis'd to advance two hundred thouſand Crowns in Specie as ſoon as the Treaty was ſign'd; and tho' he dy'd himſelf ſoon after, it was punctually perform'd by his Creature Monſieur Colbert. And here it is obſervable, that this Mony and new Alliance begot the 19th Article of that Treaty, by which it was ſtipulated, ‘ That Dunkirk ſhou'd never be given up to the King of Spain:’ Which laid the Foundation for the ſelling of that important Place to France, and which in a little Time was fully effected.

The Second Meeting of the Firſt PARLIAMENT.

IV. 1. After a Receſs of near two Months, the Parliament met on the 6th Day of November according to the former Adjournment; and one of the firſt Things done by the Houſe of Commons was, the Appointment of a Committee to attend the Queen-Mother with a congratulatory Meſſage, ‘ Repreſenting the Joy and Contentment ‘ this Houſe had receiv'd on Occaſion of her Majeſty's ‘ Return to England.’ To which the Queen in her Anſwer, ‘ acknowledg'd with Thankfulneſs the Expreſſions ‘ of the Houſe; deſiring the Continuance of their Reſpects, ‘ Which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe ſhou'd never fail to do what lay in ‘ her Part to deſerve.’ The Compliment of the Commons was ſeconded with a Preſent of ten thouſand Pounds made to her Daughter Henrietta Maria, as likewiſe the ſame Sum to the Princeſs of Orange, which prov'd very acceptable at this Time. The next Concern was to compleat the Disbanding of the Army, which had been too great a Burthen and Terror to the Nation, which was now daily diminiſh'd and reduc'd to a ſmall Compaſs. The Effect of it ſo viſibly appear'd in the Declenſion and Downfall of the Presbyterian Intereſt, that Mr. Prynne cou'd not with-hold from expreſſing his former Zeal, and after he had reported to the Houſe the Number of Regiments disbanded, he deſired the Houſe, That they wou'd be mindful not to do thoſe things that might bring them together again; which ſo rous'd the other Party, that with Difficulty he eſcap'd a ſevere Cenſure.

Their Active Proceedings.

Both Houſes apply'd themſelves to the making ſuch Laws as were moſt proper for the preſent Occaſion; in which they were the more diligent and ſpeedy, becauſe they receiv'd a Meſſage from the King informing them, That upon the Account of the Preparations for his Coronation, and other Reaſons, he had determin'd to diſſolve them in the End of December; and therefore deſired, ‘ That they might the more vigorouſly apply themſelves ‘ to the Diſpatch of the moſt important Buſineſs that depended before them.’ Shortly after the Houſe of Commons repreſented to his Majeſty ‘ The great Senſe that ‘ Houſe had of the many Expreſſions of Grace which ‘ they had receiv'd from him in his ſeveral Declarations; ‘ further acquainting him with the great Unanimity of the ‘ Houſe in ſettling a Revenue of Twelve Hundred Thouſand Pounds per Annum on his Majeſty, according to ‘ their former Vote.’ To which Vote the King return'd his Thanks for their Care of him; and aſſured them, That he wou'd employ his Revenue for the Good of Them and the Kingdom. In the mean Time the Parliament order'd, ‘ That the ſeveral Bodies of Oliver Cromwell, John Bradſhaw, ſhaw, Henry Ireton, and Thomas Pride, be taken out of their Graves, drawn on a Hurdle to Tyburn, there to be hang'd up from Ten a Clock till Sun-ſetting, and then bury'd under the Gallows.’ At the ſame Time they made an Act of Attainder, which did not only extend to the Blood and Eſtates of theſe Four, but alſo to the nineteen Regicides that fled from Juſtice, namely, Liſle, Say, Waulton, Whalley, Barkſtead, Ludlow, Liveſey, Okey, Hewſon, Goffe, Holland, Challoner, Cawley, Corbet, Love, Dixwell, Blagrave, Broughton, and Dendy, who by this Act ſtood Adjudg'd, Convicted, and Attainted of High Treaſon.

The Commons likewiſe took Notice of an inferior Criminal, William Drake, a Citizen and Merchant of London, and drew up an Impeachment againſt him for writing and publiſhing a dangerous Book intitled The Long Parliament Revived, in which he endeavours to prove that the ſaid Parliament was not yet legally diſſolv'd. This rais'd a conſiderable Noiſe, but they wanted Time to bring it to a Tryal. About the ſame Time, upon the Rumour of Plots and Deſigns to ſeize the King, and the Tower, to kill the Queen Mother, and reſtore the Long Parliament, of which we can give no certain and perfect Account, ſeveral old Officers were ſecured, as Overton, Desborough, Salmon, Farley, and Whitby in the City, and Duckenfield, Morgan, and ſeveral others, in the Country.

The Sum of the Speaker's Speech to the King.

2. After a Seſſion of near two Months, and a Diſſolution expected, on the 29th of December, the King came to the Houſe of Peers, and paſs'd all the publick and private Bills that were ready for the Royal Aſſent. The Nature of thoſe that were of a publick Concern we find from the following Part of the Speaker's Speech.--------- ‘ As I am commanded, I moſt humbly aſſure your Majeſty, That the many healing Expedients propounded by your Self in your ſeveral Gracious Declarations, have been the Subject Matter upon which your Commons have wrought all this Parliament. And in the firſt Place they took into Conſideration the great and growing Charges which then lay upon your People for the Pay of your Army and Navy. And they conceiv'd it neceſſary to begin with that Part wherein your People have the more Eaſe, and the greateſt Security and Satisfaction; Which was the disbanding and diſcharging the Forces by Sea and Land: And this led them into a Conſideration of proper Ways and Means for raiſing Monies for that Purpoſe, as the Poll-Bill, and the Aſſeſſment of Seventy Thouſand Pounds per Month. But thoſe not having done the Works, here are Others ready in my Hand: The One entitled An Act for levying the Arrears of the twelve Months Aſſeſſment, &c. And the Other entitled An Act for the further Supplying ſeveral Defects in the Act for Disbanding all the Forces both by Land and Sea; and they hope this Account will be clear'd off at laſt. Sir, your Commons have likewiſe taken into Conſideration the Charge of your Summer's Fleet, &c. and paſs'd a Bill entitled An Act for Six Months Aſſeſſment at Seventy Thouſand Pounds per Menſem, to begin the Firſt of January. I have three other Bills in my Hand, which have Relation to your Majeſty's Revenue, and are Branches thereof: The One entitled An Act for the better ordering the Selling of Wines by Retaile, and for preventing Abuſes in the Mingling, Corrupting and Limiting the Prices of the ſame: And this Bill is tender'd to your Majeſty to prevent all future Diſputes touching the Legality thereof; for we know it is your Majeſty's Deſire that Nothing be done otherwiſe by any of your Miniſters acting under your Command. Another is entitled An Act for Erecting and Eſtabliſhing a Poſt-Office; and this being legally Settled, will be of great Uſe to all your Majeſty's Subjects for holding Intelligence with their Factors and Agents in Foreign Parts. The other Bill provides for the Encreaſe of your Majeſty's Ordinary and Conſtant Revenue, by Granting of an Impoſt upon Ale, Beer, Cyder, and other Liquors, therein expreſs'd, to hold for your Majeſty's Life. As it is the Deſire of your Commons, That your Majeſty might never be neceſſitated to reſort to Extraordinary or Unparliamentary Ways, for raiſing of Mony upon your People; ſo they likewiſe acknowledge it to be their Duties to ſupport and uphold, to the utmoſt of their Powers, the Honour and Grandeur of your Majeſty's State and Dignity. And for a further Evidence of your Commons duriful Affections to your Majeſty's Royal and Dear Perſon, they have paſs'd another Bill for Raiſing Seventy Thouſand Pounds for your Majeſty's further Supply. All which Bills I am commanded humbly to preſent to your Majeſty; and to pray your Majeſty's gracious Acceptance and Royal Aſſent.

‘ There are other Bills of Publick Concernment which have paſs'd both Houſes, and now attend upon your Majeſty for your Royal Aſſent: The One entitled An Act for Attainder of ſeveral Perſons guilty of the horrid Murther of his late Sacred Majeſty, your Royal Father of ever Bleſſed Memory. Another entitled An Act for Confirmation of Leaſes and Grants for Colleges and Hoſpitals, which will tend much to the Quieting of Mens Eſtates, that in the late Unhappy Times were forc'd to renew and change their Revenues much for the worſe, were it not for the Favour your Majeſty intends them in this Bill. There is another Bill entitled An Act to prohibit the Exportation of Wooll, Wooll-Fells, Fullers-Earth, or any other Scouring Earth; which will be the beſt Encouragement for the Woollen Manufactures; and without which there wou'd be a double Loſs; Firſt to your Majeſty in your Cuſtoms, and next to your People, who wou'd be diſcourag'd, and in a ſhort Time beaten out of that ancient Native Staple Trade, upon which depends the Subſiſtance of many Thouſand Families. There is another Bill entitled An Act for prohibiting the Planting, Setting, or Sowing of Tobacco in England and Ireland; which if permitted wou'd occaſion the Abatement of your Majeſty's Cuſtoms, the Deſtruction of your Plantations abroad, and the Diſcouraging of Navigation, and conſequently the Decay of Shipping, which are the Walls and Bulwarks of your Majeſty's Kingdom. There is One Bill more, entitled, An Act for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, together with Tenure in Capite, Knights Service, and Purveyances, and for ſettling a Revenue upon his Majeſty in lieu thereof. This Bill Ex re natâ may properly be call'd A Bill of Exchange; for as Care is therein taken for the Eaſe of your People, ſo the Supply of that Part of your Majeſty's Revenue, which formerly came into your Treaſury, by your Tenures and Purveyances, is thereby likewiſe fully provided for by the Grant of another Impoſition upon Ale and Beer, and other Liquors, to hold to your Majeſty, your Heirs, and Succeſſors for ever. And yet they ſhou'd not look upon the Conſiderations mention'd in this Bill as a full Compenſation for your Majeſty's parting with two ſuch Royal Prerogatives and Ancient Flowers of the Crown, if more were not imply'd than is expreſs'd. For your Tenures in Capite are not only turned into a Tenure of Soccage (which alone will for ever give your Majeſty a juſt Right and Title to the Labour of our Ploughs, and the Sweat of our Brows) but they are likewiſe turn'd into a Tenure in Corde. What your Majeſty had before in your Court of Wards, you will be ſure to find hereafter in the Exchequer of all your Peoples Hearts. The King of Spain's Mines will ſooner deceive Him, than this Revenue will fail you: For his Mines have Bottoms, but the deeper your Majeſty ſinks into the Hearts and Affections of your People, the greater will you find your Wealth, and the more invincible your Strength.--------Royal Sir, you have deny'd us Nothing we have ask'd this Parliament. Indeed you have out-done your Parliament, by doing much more for us, than we cou'd agree among our ſelves to ask. And therefore we muſt needs be a Happy Parliament, a Healing Parliament, a Reconciling and Peace-making Parliament, a Parliament propter Excellentiam that may truly be call'd Parliamentiſſimum Parliamentum------

The King's Speech to the Parliament.

Upon paſſing the forementíon'd Acts, the King made the following Speech, which ought to be inſerted without any Abridgement: My Lords and Gentlemen, ‘ I will not entertain you with a long Diſcourſe; the Sum of all I have to ſay to you, being to give you Thanks, very Hearty Thanks: And I aſſure you I find it a very difficult Work to ſatisfy my Self in my own Expreſſions of thoſe Thanks. Perfunctory Thanks, Ordinary Thanks for Ordinary Civilities are eaſily given; but when the Heart is full as mine is, it is a Labour to thank you. You have taken great Pains to oblige me; and therefore it cannot be eaſy for me to expreſs the Senſe I have for it. I will enlarge no further to You on this Occaſion, than to tell you, when God brought me hither, I brought with me an Extraordinary Affection and Eſteem for Parliaments. I need not tell you how much it is improv'd by your Carriage towards Me: You have out-done all the good and obliging Acts of your Predeceſſors towards the Crown; and therefore you cannot but believe my Heart is exceedingly enlarg'd with the Acknowledgment. Many former Parliaments have had particular Denominations for what they have done: They have been ſtiled Learned, and Unlearned, and ſometimes have had the worſt Epithets: I pray let us Reſolve that This be for ever call'd the HEALING, and the BLESSED PARLIAMENT. As I thank you, tho' not enough, for what you have done, ſo I have not the leaſt Doubt, but when I ſhall call the next Parliament (which I ſhall do as ſoon as you can reaſonably expect or deſire) I ſhall receive your hearty Thanks for what I ſhall then have done ſince I have parted with you. For I deal truely with you:

‘I ſhall not more propoſe any one Rule to my Self in my Actions and Counſels than this: What is a Parliament like to think of this Action, and this Counſel? And it ſhall be Want of Underſtanding in me, if it will not bear that Teſt. I ſhall conclude with this, which I cannot ſay too often, nor you too often where you go: That, next to the miraculous Bleſſing of God Almighty, and indeed as an immediate Effect of that Bleſſing, I do impute the good Diſpoſition and Security we are all in, to the happy Act of Indemnity and Oblivion: That is the Principal Corner Stone which ſupports this excellent Building, that creates Kindneſs in us to each other, and Confidence in our joint and common Security. You may be ſure I will not only obſerve it Religiouſly and Inviolably my Self, but alſo exact the Obſervation of it from Others: And if any Perſon ſhall ever have the Boldneſs to attempt to perſuade me to the contrary, he wou'd find ſuch an Acceptation from Me, as He wou'd have, who ſhou'd perſuade me to burn Magna-Charta, cancel the old Laws, and erect a new Government after my own Invention and Appetite.

The Subſtance of the Chancellor's Speech.

After this he referr'd them to the Lord Chancellor, who diſplay'd his uſual Eloquence in a very long Speech, conſiſting of Variety of Matter, chiefly tending to the healing of all former Differences, and expreſſing the great Happineſs of the preſent State of Affairs, together with the glorious Harmony between the King and his People, the beſt of Princes, and the moſt loyal Subjects. He applauded the Wiſdom of the Houſes in the King's Reſtoration, and likewiſe in all ſeveral Proceedings, and particularly told them, ‘That he made no doubt but all ſucceeding Parliaments wou'd pay to Them their Thanks for all they had done, and look upon their Actions, and their Example, with all poſſible Approbation and Reverence.’ As to the Reſtoration of the languiſhing Church to Peace, Unity and Order, he told them, ‘the King had been ſo careful, that Conſtantine himſelf had hardly ſpent ſo much of his own Time in private and publick Conferences to that Purpoſe.’ After many Topicks, entering upon the Glory and Reputation of England, he freely told them, ‘That they were too partial to it, who believ'd it the beſt Country in the World: There was better Earth, better Air, and a warmer Sun in other Countries; but he was not unjuſt when he ſaid, That England was an Incloſure of the beſt People in the World, when they were well inform'd and inſtructed: A People in Sobriety of Conſcience, the moſt devoted to God Almighty; in the Integrity of their Affections, the moſt dutiful to the King; in their good Manners and Inclinations, moſt regardful to their Superiors!’ Therefore he deſired the Houſe of Commons, in their Return home, to aſſure them, ‘That his Majeſty thinks himſelf the happieſt and greateſt Prince in the World, not from the Situation of his Dominions, and the Power of his great Navy, with which he can viſit his Neighbours, and keep them from viſiting him; but from being poſſeſs'd of the Affections and Hearts of ſuch Subjects; that he does ſo entirely love them, and depend upon them, That all his Actions, and all his Counſels ſhall tend to no other End, but to make them happy and proſperous.’ But notwithſtanding all this Care and Tenderneſs of his Majeſty, there were ſtill ſome Men, who by their Writings and Preachings endeavour'd to continue the former Breaches; and ſome others had been ſo dangerous to the publick Peace, that they had lately been ſecured in Priſon. And then he proceeded to give them a Narrative ‘how a Party of the late disbanded Officers and Soldiers, and others full of Diſcontent and ſeditious Purpoſes, had reſolv'd to attempt the Change of the preſent Government, and to erect a Common-Wealth; in which Ludlow, and other deſperate Perſons, were concern'd.’ Therefore, upon the Account of theſe unexpected Plots and Conſpiracies, he wiſh'd, ‘That their other weighty Affairs wou'd have given them Time to have publiſh'd their Opinion and Advice in the Buſineſs of the Militia; That the People, after ſo many Diſputes upon that Argument, might have found, That the King and his two Houſes of Parliament, were as much of the ſame Mind in That, as in other Things.’ Therefore to ſecure the Peace of the Nation, he acquainted them ‘That the King wou'd be conſtrain'd to eſtabliſh it for the preſent, as formerly his Predeceſſors had done.’ Then ſpeaking of the former Succeſſes ſo often inſiſted on by the Heads of the ruin'd Party, he retorted their Arguments, in the wonderful Preſervation of the King's ſacred Perſon, and alledg'd, ‘That God Almighty wou'd not have led him through ſo many Wilderneſſes of Affliction of all Kinds, conducting him through ſo many Perils by Land; ſnatching him out of the midſt of his Kingdom, when it was not worthy of him, and when the Hands of his Enemies were upon him, when they thought themſelves ſo ſure of him, that they wou'd bid ſo cheap and vile a Price for him: He wou'd not then have ſo cover'd him with a Cloud, that he travell'd with ſome Pleaſure, and great Obſervation through the midſt of his Enemies: He wou'd not ſo wonderfully have modell'd that Army; ſo inſpired their Hearts, and the Hearts of the whole Nation, with an honeſt and impatient Longing for the Return of their dread Sovereign; and in the mean Time have ſo exercis'd him with thoſe unnatural, or at leaſt unuſual Diſreſpects and Reproaches abroad, that he might have a harmleſs and innocent Appetite to his own Country, and return to his own People full Value, and the whole unwaſted Bulk of his Affections, without being corrupted or biaſs'd by extraordinary Foreign Obligations: God Almighty wou'd not have done all This, but for a Servant whom he will always preſerve as the Apple of his own Eye, and always defend from the moſt ſecret Machinations of his Enemies.’ In Concluſion, by the King's Command, he declar'd the preſent Parliament diſſolv'd.

The Diſſolution of the Firſt PARLIAMENT

The Behaviour of Hyde and his two Friends.

Thus ended the famous CONVENTION, about eight Months after the firſt Meeting, and ſeven after the Reſtoration, when it receiv'd the Royal Stamp of PARLIAMENT: An Aſſembly that began with the greateſt Expectation, and ended with the greateſt Satisfaction of all People. Never was ſo glorious a Harmony between the King and Parliament of England for many Years before. And here we may obſerve, with an ingenious Modern Writer, that it looks as if Heaven took a more than ordinary Care of the Engliſh, that they did not throw up all their Liberties at once, upon the Reſtoration of the King; for, tho' ſome were for bringing him back upon Terms, yet after he was once come, he ſo entirely poſſeſs'd the Hearts of his People, that they thought nothing too much for them to grant, or for him to receive. Among other Deſigns to oblige him, there was one form'd to ſettle ſuch a Revenue upon him for Life, as ſhou'd place him beyond the Neceſſity of asking more, except in the Caſe of a War, or ſome ſuch Emergency. And as to Particulars, another Writer informs us, That Mr. Alexander Popham, a Man of Intrigue and great Capacity, offer'd the King, with the Aſſiſtance of a Party he had in the Parliament, to procure an Act for ſettling on Him and his Succeſſors above two Millions a Year by way of Subſidy; which, with the Revenue of the Exciſe and other Duties, muſt have made him a very rich Prince. The King was well pleas'd with the Propoſal, eſpecially ſince the Want of Money had occaſion'd his Father's unfortunate Projects; but adviſing about it with Chancellor Hyde, that Miniſter told him, That the beſt Revenue he cou'd have, wou'd be the gaining the Hearts of his Subjects; that if he wou'd truſt to them, he wou'd find ſuch Supplies as ſhou'd never fail him in Time of Need. Therefore it may be added, with another Writer, It is to his Memory, that we owe our being a free People; for He, with his two great Friends, the Duke of Ormond and the Earl of Southampton, check'd the Forwardneſs of ſome who were deſirous to load the Crown with Prerogative and Revenue. He put a Stop to all this, which being afterwards odiouſly repreſented, brought on that great and laſting, but honourable Diſgrace. However, one Project for additional Authority took Place without any preſent Oppoſition; which was, That upon the disbanding of the Army, the King, beſides his uſual Band of Penſioners, thought fit, in Imitation of France and Foreign Kingdoms, to eſtabliſh a conſiderable Number of both Horſe and Foot Guards, commonly call'd the Life-Guard; which, tho' not diſlik'd at preſent, as being of ſpecial Uſe at this Time, was afterwards complain'd of as a conſiderable Grievance to the Nation, and as having too near an Alliance with a Standing Army.

The Affairs of Scotland.

3. While the King was buſily employ'd in ſettling and eſtabliſhing the grand Affairs of England, in this memorable Year, he was no ways negligent with reſpect to the Peace and Happineſs of his two other Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland. As to Scotland, the Engliſh Commiſſioners having been employ'd as Judges for the Government of that Nation, and having had their Commiſſions continu'd for ſome Time after the King's Reſtoration, they were at length by Letters from the Duke of Albermarle acquainted with the King's Pleaſure, ‘That from the 22d of Auguſt they ſhou'd ceaſe to act in this their Judicatory Power, in regard that Kingdom was thenceforth to be reduc'd to its ancient Form of Government:’ In order to which, Proclamation was made in the King's Name, for the ſpeedy convening of the Committee of the Three Eſtates of Scotland; and a Parliament alſo was to be call'd there within a few Months. In the Interim, the chief Miniſters of State were conſtituted; the Earl of Glencarn was made Lord Chancellor, the Lord Crawford-Lindſey Lord Treaſurer, the Earl of Caſſiles Juſtice General, the Earl of Lauderdale chief Secretary of State, and General Middleton the King's Commiſſioner, with ſeveral others. The Committee of Eſtates being aſſembled, made it their firſt Care to keep all Things in Peace and full Obedience to the preſent Government: For, notwithſtanding the late Unanimity of the People at Edinburgh, as well as other Places, in the publick proclaiming of his Majeſty, yet after a ſhort Space a Spirit of Diſcontent began to diſcover it ſelf among certain prime Miniſters of the Kirk Party, as appear'd by their meeting together at an appointed Place, for the drawing up a Remonſtrance concerning certain Things in which they thought themſelves aggriev'd: Of which the Committee of Eſtates having Notice, ſent immediately to apprehend them, and ſecured them in Priſon; and to prevent the like Diſturbance for the future, they ſet forth a Proclamation againſt all unlawful Meetings, and ſeditious Papers. The like Impriſonment hapned alſo to their Country-Man the famous Marqueſs of Argyle, who notwithſtanding he came to the Engliſh Court, with other of the Scotch Nobility and Gentry, upon Pretence of rendering his Service to his Majeſty, was found ſo culpable, that he was committed to the Tower for High Treaſon, and afterwards ſent to be try'd in his own Country.

But to make a perfect Settlement of the Peace and Proſperity of Scotland, as well as England, the King thought it neceſſary to ſummon a Parliament to meet at Edinburgh the 12th Day of December. And to prepare the Way, he iſſu'd out a Proclamation in that Kingdom, which ſhew'd him to be of the ſame Diſpoſition in all his Dominions. By this he ſolemnly declar'd, 'That he rely'd ſo much on the Loyalty, Prudence, and Care of his Parliament, as abſolutely to commit to Them the trying and judging of the Carriage of his Subjects during the late Troubles, concerning which he wou'd receive Addreſſes and Informations only from his Parliament or Committee of Eſtates. To whom, in the mean Time, he recommended the ordering and preparing that Affair, and to whom alone any of his People that were intereſted, might freely, and ſhou'd Only make their Applications; aſſuring them, That his own Honour once vindicated, and the ancient Prerogatives of the Crown once aſſerted, he wou'd grant ſuch a full and free Pardon, An Act of Indemnity, as might witneſs, That he deſired nothing more than that his People ſhould be ſettled with abundance of Happineſs, Peace and Plenty, under his Government.

And of Ireland.

As to the Kingdom of Ireland, his Majeſty very early iſſu'd out his Proclamation againſt all Diſturbers of the Peace in thoſe Parts, and with good Effect; and Colonel Eyres, who had endeavour'd to raiſe a Party there, was ſoon reduced by Sir Charles Coot. The Convention that had aſſembled in that Kingdom upon the Change of Government, as ſoon as they had taken Order for the ſettling of the publick Affairs, and had appointed certain Commiſſioners to wait upon his Majeſty with their congratulatory Addreſſes, thought fit to diſſolve themſelves, in Expectation of the King's Pleaſure for the calling of a full Parliament, and to make Way for the ancient Conſtitution of the Government by a Lord Lieutenant, as had been determin'd by the King and his Council. But in the mean Time, for the preſent Government of that Kingdom, his Majeſty made Sir Maurice Euſtace Knight Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Roger Earl of Orrerey Lord Preſident of Munſter, and Charles Earl of Montraith Lord Preſident of Connaught, to be Lords Juſtices, who manag'd and govern'd there with great Candor and Moderation. So that excepting from ſome whoſe Diſcontent and Guilt wou'd allow them no Reſt, there was now a general Quiet throughout the King's Dominions.

4. And now, to draw towards a Concluſion of this wonderful Year, we may take ſome Notice of the general Joy and Felicity that ſhin'd through the Britiſh Dominions, after ſuch Clouds of Darkneſs and Confuſion; which was introduc'd without one Drop of Blood, and afterwards eſtabliſh'd with the Execution of but ten Perſons in England, and the leſſer Puniſhment of a few more. This Revolution, begun by an over-ruling Providence, was moderated and compleated by the Wiſdom and Clemency of the preſent Adminiſtration, which ſo work'd up the Candor and Moderation of the Convention Parliament, that, in ſpite of the Repinings of ſome reſtleſs Perſons, the Happineſs was in Effect made univerſal. All Arts and Sciences at this Time acquired new Life and Vigour; all Sorts of Knowledge and Learning met with Countenance and Incouragement; all curious Inventions and Experiments were approv'd of and promoted, and Politeneſs and good Taſte came more and more into Faſhion; and even the Engliſh Tongue was daily more improv'd and refined, both as to Verſe and Proſe, by the ingenious Men of the Age, ſuch as Waller, Cowley, Denham, Davenant, Sprat, Leſtrange, Dryden, Etheridge, Wilkins, Tillotſon, and others, beſides thoſe of the Court, as the King himſelf, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earl of Rocheſter; who altogether introduc'd a more juſt and judicious way of Writing and Speaking than had been known before in England. This great Year likewiſe had the Fame of producing that memorable Eſtabliſhment, ſo much encourag'd by the King and the Court, call'd The Royal Society; a celebrated Body of Men, who this Year laid a glorious Foundation for the fineſt Inventions and Experiments in Mathematicks, Phyſick, Philoſophy, &c. which ſince then have met with innumerable Additions and Improvements, to the Glory of Learning, and the Honour of the Engliſh Nation. The chief Promoters of this Society in its Infancy were Dr. Ward, Mr. Boyl, the Lord Brouncker, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. Wallis, Sir William Murrey, Sir William Petty, Dr. Goddard, Dr. Willis, Dr. Bathurſt, Dr. Wren, and Mr. Rook; which afterwards receiv'd a great Addition of the moſt eminent Men in the Nation. The Felicity of this Year, being leſs reſiſtible by many than the preceding Adverſity, likewiſe unhappily produc'd other Sorts, or rather other Effects of Politeneſs and genteel Education, ſuch as jovial Entertainments, loyal Remembrances, free Converſation, amorous Intrigues, refined Courtſhip and Gallantry, with other ſoftning and faſhionable Expreſſions, which ſerv'd to cover the moſt enormous Viciouſneſs in the Court and other Places. All which was incourag'd and promoted by the Licentiouſneſs of the two new erected Theatres or Play-Houſes, where there ſeem'd to have been very little Reſtraint, and where a new Cuſtom was now introduced of bringing in Women upon the Stage, which before had been perſonated by Boys or young Men. Thus the Felicity of the Times was firſt ſully'd, and afterwards corrupted, ſo as by degrees to bring inſuperable Inconveniencies upon the Nation.
